"Vouchſafe to ſtayne thy royal couch with the poor inklings of thy ſervant and hand-maide, whome, nathleſſe, thou haſt moſt tual accompliſhment of his deſigns. He now threw off the maſk of diſſimulation, openly aſpired to the crown, and perpetrated other acts of injuſtice and violence. He propagated doubts with regard to the validity of Edward's marriage with the lady Elizabeth Gray; pretending that he had, previous to that tranſaction, been privately married to the lady Eleanor Talbot, daughter to the earl of Shrewſbury. But this not gaining belief, he had recourſe to a ſtill more deteſtable calumny. He gave out, that both Edward IV. and the duke of Clarence, were illegitimate; that the ducheſs of York had received into her bed different lovers, who were the fathers of theſe children, and that Glouceſter alone was the lawful offspring of the duke of York.

Human nature muſt be ſunk to the loweſt degree of brutality, when it ſcruples not to throw ſuch horrid calumnies on perſons whom even inſtinct teaches to reverence. The ducheſs of York, his own mother, on whom ſo baſe an aſperſion was thrown, was ſtill alive, and a princeſs of irreproachable virtue. But no conſiderations could change the purpoſe of Glouceſter. He cauſed theſe impudent aſſertions to be promulgated from the pulpit. Dr. Shaw, an eminent orator of thoſe times, (and a creature of the duke) was appointed preacher at St. Paul's; and having choſen for his text the following paſſage from the Wiſdom of Solomon, "Baſtard ſlips ſhall not thrive," he enlarged upon all the arguments that had any tendency to throw an odium on the births of Edward IV. and the duke of Clarence. He afterwards extolled the virtues of the Protector to the ſkies, repreſenting him as legal heir of the crown, and the only hope of the nation; concluding his panegyric, by crying aloud, "God ſave king Richard." The audience kept a profound ſilence, which greatly diſconcerted both the Protector and the preacher. Shaw loſt all his popularity from this ſhameful proſtitution of his talent, and Richard himſelf was beheld with that contempt he richly deſerved.

Glouceſter, however, was not to be diverted from his purpoſe by one miſcarriage. He had, indeed, proceeded too far, to think of receding. It was neceſſary for him to perſevere: he muſt either gain the ſceptre or periſh. It was therefore agreed in the council, which now conſiſted wholly of Richard's creatures, that another attempt ſhould be made to obtain the voice of the people in his favour. Accordingly the lord mayor, aldermen, and livery of London, were aſſembled at Guildhall; where the duke of Buckingham, in a ſtudied harangue, expatiated on the virtues of the duke of Glouceſter; and concluded with aſking, Whether they would have that prince for their king? A profound ſilence reigned through the whole aſſembly. The duke repeated the ſubſtance of his harangue, and aſked the ſame queſtion; but the ſame ſilence was continued. The mayor deſired the recorder might addreſs the aſſembly, he being always conſidered as the mouth of the city. The experiment was accordingly tried, but with no better ſucceſs; not a word eſcaped from the lips of the audience. "This is aſtoniſhing obſtinacy," cried the duke; "declare your ſentiments one way or other. But you ought to remember, that your conſent is not conſidered as neceſſary. The lords and commons have ſufficient authority to place whom they pleaſe on the throne; and when we aſk your conſent, it ſhould be conſidered as a favour. However, I now demand, in plain terms, whether you will, or will not, have the protector for your ſovereign?" This ſpeech, which was conſidered rather as a menace than an appeal to their judgment, occaſioned a general murmur through the whole audience. At length ſome of the meaneſt apprentices, incited by bribes from the government, ſet up a feeble cry of "Long live king Richard." This was conſidered as a ſufficient declaration of the ſentiments of the nation; the voice of the people was the voice of God; and Buckingham haſtened to acquaint the Protector, that he was called upon to aſſume the reins of government.

Richard pretended to be aſtoniſhed at the propoſal. He declared he would obſerve inviolably his loyalty to his preſent ſovereign, and exhorted them to imitate his example. He, however, ſuffered himſelf to accept the crown; and from that moment he acted as the legitimate and legal poſſeſſor of the Engliſh throne. All acts of royalty paſſed in his name, and the name of Edward was buried in oblivion.

But a truly tragical ſcene ſoon followed this ridiculous farce, namely, the murder of the two unhappy princes. Richard diſpatched orders to Sir Robert Brackenbury, conſtable of the Tower, to put his nephew to death. But this gentleman, who had a true ſenſe of honour, refuſed to have any ſhare in ſo infamous an office. Diſappointed in this attempt, Richard next applied to Sir James Tyrrel, a man practiſed in the ſcenes of blood, who readily accepted the inhuman commiſſion. Tyrrel choſe three aſſociates, namely Slater, Dighton and Foreſt; and having, by Richard's expreſs order, obtained the keys of the Tower, he led his companions in iniquity to the door of the chamber where the two princes lodged, bidding them execute their orders. They found the unſuſpecting innocents in a ſound ſleep, and after ſuffocating them with the bolſters and pillows, they ſhewed their naked bodies to Tyrrel, who ordered them to be buried at the foot of the ſtairs deep in the earth, and the ſpot to be covered with a heap of rubbiſh*.

Theſe were the bones of the royal infants ſo inhumanly murdered, which King Charles cauſed to be interred in Henry the Seventh's Chapel near two other royal children, viz. SECTION III.

RICHARD III.

(The third King of England of the Line of York, and the laſt of the Race of Plantagenet.)

RICHARD, having thus uſurped the throne of England, was crowned with great pomp at Weſtminſter on the 6th of July 1483. All the peers of the realm attended at this ceremony, that they might not, by their abſence, incur the ſuſpicion of the new king, who was now become the object of general terror.

The firſt ſtep Richard took after his coronation was, to endeavour to gain over the nobility to his intereſt; but his actions had been too notorious and execrable to prevail on the more virtuous part of that powerful order. Thoſe who adhered to him, however, received conſiderable emoluments; and the duke of Buckingham in particular, who had ſo greatly contributed to his obtaining the crown, was loaded with preferments. Richard alſo, in order to ſtrengthen his power with foreign alliances, ſent an ambaſſador to the court of Caſtile, with orders to renew the antient alliance between that crown and England. This buſineſs was accordingly effected; as was alſo a commiſſion which he ſent for prolonging the truce with the duke of Britany.

The public affairs being now ſettled, Richard reſolved on making a tour through ſome parts of England, and paſſing Windſor, Oxford, Glouceſter and Coventry, he at length ſtopped at York, where he appeared in all the pomp of royalty with his queen and his ſon prince Edward. Before he left York, he was crowned with great ceremony in the cathedral of that city, and his ſon (then only ten years of age) was created prince of Wales with the uſual formalities.*

When Richard had finiſhed his progreſs he returned to London; ſoon after which a circumſtance happened that evinced he was not ſo ſecurely placed on the throne as he had confidently imagined.

We have already obſerved with what a laviſh hand Richard beſtowed honors and riches on the duke of Buckingham, who had been his great friend and ſupport. It happened, however, that Buckingham, preſuming too far on his merit, had raiſed the jealouſy or indignation of Richard; and, while they were together at Glouceſter during the late excurſion, the duke having made ſome demands which the king thought unreaſonable, he gave him ſuch an anſwer as plainly ſhewed he was highly diſpleaſed. Buckingham, who was haughty, violent, and avaricious, was ſo offended at the king's refuſal that he deſired leave to quit the court to look after his private affairs. Richard, not imagining his denial had made ſo deep an impreſſion on the duke, or perhaps deſpiſing the effects of his reſentment, granted his requeſt, and Buckingham immediately retired to his caſtle of Brecknock, where Morton biſhop of Ely, who had been committed to his cuſtody by Richard, was confined.

The biſhop, who was an able politician, and a zealous friend to the houſe of Lancaſter, conſidered this diſguſt as a favourable incident to bring the duke over to his own party, eſpecially as the family of that nobleman had been zealous Lancaſtrians. The prelate was far from being diſappointed in his expectations: Buckingham liſtened with great attention to his arguments, and a ſcheme was formed for driving the tyrant from the ſeat of power, and placing on the throne the young earl of Richmond,† who was to marry the princeſs Elizabeth, now the lawful ſucceſſor of Edward IV. This alliance they thought could not fail of engaging the two families of York and Lancaſter in their intereſt; and conſequently extinguiſh the flames of civil diſcord which had ſo long ſpread deſolation over the kingdom.

Matters being thus far concerted, it was thought neceſſary to apply to the queen, who ſtill continued in the ſanctuary, in order to obtain her conſent and bring her over to their party. That princeſs readily accepted the propoſals, hoping ſoon to be in a capacity of retaliating on the head of the uſurper all the injuries he had inflicted on her family. The young earl of Richmond engaged to raiſe as many foreign forces

[*] It was during this progreſs that, according to all hiſtorians, Richard contrived the making away with the late king's two ſons, Edward prince of Wales and Richard duke of York, that their deaths happening in his abſence, he might be the leſs ſuſpected.

[†] It hath been already obſerved, that the earl of Pembroke, ſoon after the battle of Tewkſbury, had fled to the court of Britany, carrying with him his nephew, young Henry, earl of Richmond. That prince was now conſidered as the head of the Lancaſtrian party. He was heir, by the female line, to the houſe of Somerſet, and grandſon to Sir Owen Tudor, who had married Catherine of France, the widow of Henry V.

forces as poſſible, and ſolemnly promiſed to celebrate his marriage with Elizabeth as ſoon as he arrived in England.

Though the utmoſt care had been taken to keep theſe deſigns an impenetrable ſecret, yet they eſcaped not the vigilance of Richard, who firſt iſſued a proclamation, offering large rewards for taking any of the conſpirators, and then haſtened with all expedition to put the kingdom in a poſture of defence. He collected his troops, and began his march towards the weſtern counties, where he was informed the earl of Richmond propoſed to land, and where ſeveral of his friends were already in arms, expecting to be joined by the duke of Buckingham.

The duke had collected a powerful army, and was now advancing, by long and haſty marches, into the foreſt of Deane, in order to croſs the Severn, and join his weſtern friends at Saliſbury. But on approaching the borders of the river, he found the waters had overflowed their banks in a manner before unknown. The Welſh, alarmed with ſuperſtitious terrors at this extraordinary event, and at the ſame time diſtreſſed for want of proviſions, abandoned his camp, and Buckingham in a few days was left only with one ſervant who was faithful enough to attend his maſter in diſtreſs. He had now no other reſource than that of concealing himſelf till the arrival of the earl of Richmond, or ſome other accident occaſioned a revolution in the government. He accordingly diſguiſed himſelf in the habit of a peaſant, and took ſhelter in the houſe of one Baniſter, who had been a dependant on him, and whom he had by his liberality raiſed to a comfortable eſtate near Shrewſbury; but this wretch, dead to all the feelings of honour and gratitude, and allured by the promiſed reward in the king's proclamation, betrayed him to John Milton, the ſheriff of Shropſhire, who conducted him to Saliſbury, where Richard then kept his court. The unfortunate duke was immediately tried, condemned, and executed, according to the ſummary method practiſed in that age. Previous to his death he begged to be admitted to Richard's preſence, with a deſign, as was ſuppoſed, of ſtabbing him with a dagger, which, on his execution, was found concealed in his boſom.

The other conſpirators, who had taken up arms in different places, deſpairing of ſucceſs from the duke of Buckingham's fate, immediately diſperſed. The marquis of Dorſet and biſhop of Ely made their eſcape beyond the ſeas; and ſome others were equally fortunate; but ſeveral that fell into Richard's hands forfeited their lives.

The earl of Richmond had not been wanting on his part in endeavouring to join his friends on the day appointed. He embarked with 3000 men at St. Maloes on board forty veſſels, but being overtaken by a terrible ſtorm, his fleet was ſeparated, and he was obliged to return to the court of Britany, where he was informed of the unwelcome news of the duke of Buckingham, and the diſperſion of his friends.

A. D. 1484. Thus ended this threatning inſurrection againſt Richard, who now ventured to ſummon a parliament, which met on the 23d of January. In this aſſembly an act of attainder was paſſed againſt the biſhops of Ely, Saliſbury and Exeter, the earls of Oxford and Pembroke, and other ringleaders of the late inſurrection, who had fled the kingdom; and Richard was empowered by the two houſes to make grants of their forfeited eſtates. Among the perſons attainted, were the earl of Richmond and his brother: the eſtate of the latter, however, was given to her huſband the lord Stanley, whom the uſurper had lately created conſtable of England, and who became anſwerable to keep the counteſs from all illegal correſpondence for the future. Richard's title to the crown was confirmed; and his ſon Edward, being declared heir apparent, the lords ſpiritual and temporal unanimouſly ſwore to maintain his ſucceſſion.

Though Richard appeared now to be quietly ſeated on the throne, yet he ſtill laboured under diſagreeable apprehenſions from the intended marriage between the earl of Richmond and the princeſs Elizabeth. He ſaw the danger of ſuch a connection, and determined, if poſſible, to prevent it. In order to this, he paid his court to the queen dowager with ſuch art and addreſs, made ſo many profeſſions of a ſincere and unalterable friendſhip, that Elizabeth, tired with confinement, and thinking her former projects totally deſtroyed, liſtened to propoſals of the murderer of her children, and even promiſed him her daughter in marriage; Richard having made way for this ſtrange connection by carrying off his former wife by poiſon.

The queen's conſent being obtained, Richard applied to the court of Rome for a diſpenſation to conclude an alliance which was generally conſidered as inceſtuous. But before this papal inſtrument arrived, the face of affairs was ſuddenly changed, and Richard was hurled from that pinnacle of power he had ſo illegally aſcended.

A. D. 1485. The friends of the earl of Richmond, and in particular the noble exiles from England, had prevailed on him to make another attempt for obtaining the Engliſh diadem. Accordingly, the earl having received ſome troops from Charles VIII. who now filled the throne of France, he ſailed from Harfleur on the firſt of Auguſt, with a retinue of 2000 perſons; and, after a paſſage of ſix days, arrived at Milford-haven in Wales, where he landed without oppoſition. The next day he marched to Havrrfordweſt, where he was joyfully received by the inhabitants. As he advanced he was joined by the partiſans of both families, ſo that he ſoon found himſelf at the head of a very conſiderable army.

As ſoon as Richard was informed that the earl of Richmond was preparing for another invaſion, he took poſt at Nottingham, as one of the moſt centrical towns of his kingdom, and propoſed to march on the firſt alarm to the place which was moſt expoſed to danger. But he ſhould have remembered that he had much more to fear from his ſecret than from his open enemies. The duke of Norfolk was the only nobleman ſincerely attached to his intereſt; the reſt were friends to the earl of Richmond, and only waited for a favouable opportunity to deſert his ſtandard. But the perſons that gave Richard the greateſt uneaſineſs, were lord Stanley, and his brother Sir William, whoſe connections with the earl of Richmond were ſtrongly ſuſpected by the uſurper. He had, indeed, employed the former to levy a body of five thouſand men, but inſiſted that he ſhould leave his ſon, the lord Strange, as an hoſtage for his fidelity. This obliged lord Stanley to uſe the greateſt precaution in his proceedings. He found means indeed of informing Henry of his friendly intentions; but his equivocal behaviour rendered his deſigns ſuſpicious to both armies.

Richard was ſo alarmed at the continual increaſe of Henry's army, that he determined to give him battle as ſoon as poſſible, and decide, by a general action, their diſpute for the crown of England. Henry declined not the engagement, and the two armies came in ſight of each other at Boſworth, a place in Leiceſterſhire, rendered famous in hiſtory for the battle which terminated the quarrel between the houſes of York and Lancaſter. The royal army, which conſiſted of twelve thouſand men, all veterans and well armed, were formed into two lines. The firſt was commanded by the duke of Norfolk; and the ſecond by Richard in perſon, who appeared that day with the the royal diadem on his head. The earl's army did not conſiſt of more than five thouſand men, which was alſo divided into two lines; the firſt commanded by the earl of Oxford, and the ſecond by himſelf in perſon; Sir Gilbert Talbot commanded the right wing, and Sir John Savage the left. While the two armies were preparing for battle, lord Stanley poſted himſelf, at the head of four thouſand men, on a piece of ground fronting the intermediate ſpace between the two armies, while his brother Sir William Stanley, with three thouſand, ſtood facing him on the other ſide of that interval.

Richard, ſuſpecting Stanley's deſign, ſent him an order to join his army; but receiving an equivocal anſwer, he was ſo enraged at his treachery, that he would have ſtruck off the head of his ſon, had he not been diſſuaded from that reſolution by ſome of his chief officers, who repreſented to him, that ſuch an act could be attended with no advantage, and would certainly provoke Stanley and his brother to join the enemy, though perhaps their intention at preſent might be to remain neuter, till near the concluſion of the battle, and then declare for the party that ſeemed to have gained the advantage. Richard ſubmitted to theſe reaſons, well knowing that a victory over the earl of Richmond would enable him to take ample revenge on all his enemies.

All neceſſary preparations being made, both armies moved forward, and the battle was begun by a general diſcharge of arrows; after which the combat became cloſe and bloody. The duke of Norfolk made a motion to encloſe the left wing of Richmond's army, which being perceived by the earl of Oxford, he fell with the utmoſt fury upon Norfolk's diviſion, but was in the greateſt danger of being ſurrounded. Lord Stanley ſaw that it would be impoſſible for him to extricate himſelf from his preſent ſituation without aſſiſtance, and therefore advanced at the head of his forces, and joining Oxford's line ſecured his flank, and ſtood ready to receive the front of the line commanded by the king in perſon. At the ſame time Sir William Stanley flanked the right of the king's firſt line ſo critically that they were driven back upon the main body. In the mean time the duke of Norfolk having ſtrengthened the ſecond line, and the king's preſence animating his men, a dreadful diſpute enſued. Richard, finding himſelf deceived by the two Stanley's, collected all his force, and made a moſt furious charge upon the center of the enemy's army, where he underſtood the earl of Richmond commanded in perſon. His ſpirits, activity and addreſs, ſupplied all the defects in his ſtrength and perſon; hoping to decide, with one ſtroke, the fate of glory and empire between them, he laid Sir William Brandon, the earl's ſtandard-bearer, dead at his feet; he diſmounted Sir John Cheney, who ſupplied Brandon's place; he covered the ſpot where he fought with ſlaughter, and Richmond himſelf, who did not decline the combat, muſt have periſhed in the unequal conteſt, had he not been reſcued by Sir William Stanley's diviſion.

During this terrible diſpute between the centers of both armies, there was almoſt a total inactivity in the other parts, as if the guilt of Richard had enervated the hands of his ſoldiers, and ſunk their ſpirits. They were blind to his example, they were unanimated by his actions, and ſeemed willing to expiate, by their deaths, the crime of fighting under the banners of a tyrant. The earl of Northumberland's men threw down their arms, and opened a paſſage for Richmond's ſoldiers to penetrate to the very center of Richards army. Senſible of his deſperate ſituation, Richard plunged into the thickeſt of the battle, determining to ſell his life as dear as poſſible. The luſtre of a diadem, which he that day wore upon his head, diſtinguiſhing his perſon, occaſioned him to be in more danger than he otherwiſe would have been. But notwithſtanding he was in the midſt of his enemies, he ſtill ſupported the battle, and advanced againſt Henry with all the fury of deſpair. He called aloud to him to pay the forfeit of his treaſon and rebellious invaſion of his kingdom. Henry declined not the combat; but the two leaders were hardly engaged when Sir William Stanley, breaking in with his troops, ſurrounded Richard, who, after performing the moſt aſtoniſhing acts of valour, fell covered with wounds. The loſs of the king put an end to the conteſt; the royaliſts, deprived of their leader, ſought their ſafety in a precipitate flight.

Richard's crown being found in the field was brought to lord Stanley, who placing it upon Richmond's brows, hailed him king; the whole army repeatedly ſhouting, "Long live Henry VII. king of England!"

In this battle there fell about 4000 men on the ſide of the vanquiſhed; but the loſs on the other ſide was very inconſiderable. Among the former were the duke of Norfolk, the lord Ferrers of Chartley, Sir Richard Ratcliffe, Sir Robert Piercy, Sir Robert Brackenbury, Sir William Conyers, and Sir Richard Clendon. The body of Richard was found among the ſlain; but not the leaſt care was taken to preſerve it from indignity. It was thrown careleſsly acroſs a horſe, and in that ignominious manner conveyed to Leiceſter amidſt the ſhouts of the inſulting populace, where it was buried without any ceremony in the church of the Grey Friars.

The victorious Henry, with a policy that does honour to his prudence, pardoned all that ſubmitted to him. Sir William Cateſby, the tool of Richard's crimes, was the only perſon that ſuffered. He was diſcovered after the battle, and conveyed to Leiceſter, where he was beheaded. Lord Lovel, and the two Staffords, would, in all probability, have ſuffered the ſame fate, had they not fortunately made their eſcape. The young earl of Warwick, ſon to the deceaſed duke of Clarence, was the next day, by order of Henry, committed cloſe priſoner to the Tower.

Thus was England delivered of an ambitious, cruel, and unrelenting tyrant, who was deſtitute of every ſocial quality, and every ſentiment of humanity. No law of nature, no tie of conſanguinity could reſtrain the deſtructive prevalence of his boundleſs ambition, which ſeemed to engroſs his whole ſoul and ſtifle every emotion of conſcience.

It has been obſerved by ſome hiſtorians, that in all caſes, irreſpective of his ambition, he cultivated juſtice, piety and moderation; but ſurely ſuch an inſinuation, whatever candour it may evince, indicates a flagrant perverſion of characteriſtical diſplay: and we leave the impartial reader to judge, on a review of the more than ſavage tranſactions of his reign, whether all or any one of thoſe principles really influenced a ſingle action of his life; or, in other words, whether he ever practiſed a good deed, from the only motive intrinſically meritorious, the love of doing good.

He poſſeſſed great ſolidity of judgment, a vaſt fund of eloquence, an acute penetration, and undaunted courage. His ſtature was low, and his aſpect lowering and moroſe: one of his arms was withered, and one ſhoulder higher than the other, from whence he acquired the appellation of Crookback. He was the laſt of the Anjouvin race ſurnamed Plantagenet, who had ſat on the Engliſh throne for the ſpace of three hundred and thirty years; and with his death cloſed the civil wars between the two houſes of York and Lancaſter.

Richard left two natural ſons, namely, John, ſurnamed of Glouceſter, a minor, whom he had appointed governor of Calais, and all the territories in Picardy belonging to England, and Richard Plantaganet[*]; alſo a daughter, named Catharine, who was contracted in marriage to William Herbert, earl of Huntingdon, but died before ſhe was of age for conſummation.

The only remarkable circumſtances that occured in this reign are the following:

In his firſt year there happened ſuch a flood in Glouceſterſhire, that all the country was overflowed by the Severn: ſeveral perſons were drowned in their beds, cradles with children in them floated about the fields, and beaſts were drowned even on the hills. It was this flood that interrupted the duke of Buckingham in his progreſs againſt Richard, and was the cauſe of bringing him to the block.

Baniſter, who betrayed the duke, was afterwards puniſhed in the moſt diſtinguiſhed manner for his perfidy. His eldeſt ſon went mad, and died raving in a hog-ſty; his eldeſt daughter, who was very beautiful, was ſuddenly ſtricken with a foul leproſy: his ſecond ſon was deprived of the uſe of his limbs: his youngeſt ſon was ſuffocated in a puddle of filthy water; and himſelf, in an extreme old age, found guilty of murder; but ſaved by his clergy.

[*] Of this Richard (the ſecond natural ſon of king Richard III) we have diſcovered the following curious particulars, which we ſhall preſent the reader, as mentioned in a letter from Dr. Thomas Brett to Dr. William Warren, preſident of Trinity-hall, Cambridge:

"Dear Will, Sept. 1, 1733.

"In the year 1720 (I have forgot the particular day, only remember it was about Michaelmas) I waited on the late lord Heneage, earl of Winchelſea, at Eaſtwell houſe in Kent, and found him ſitting with the regiſter of the pariſh of Eaſtwell lying open before him. He told me that he had been looking there to ſee who of his own family was mentioned in it. But, ſays he, I have a curioſity here to ſhew you. He then ſhewed it me, and I immediately tranſcribed it into my almanack, "Richard Plantagenet was buryed the 22d daye of December, anno et ſupra. Ex Regiſtro de Eaſt-well, ſub anno 1550." This is all the regiſter mentions of him; ſo that we cannot ſay, whether he was buried in the church or church-yard; nor is there now any other memorial of him, except the tradition in the family, and ſome little marks where his houſe ſtood. The ſtory my lord told me was this:

When Sir Thomas Moyle built that houſe (Eaſtwell place) he obſerved his chief bricklayer, whenever he left off work, retired with a book. Sir Thomas had curioſity to know what book the man read, but was ſome time before he could diſcover it; he ſtill putting the book up if any one came towards him. However, at laſt Sir Thomas ſurpriſed him, and ſnatched the book from him, and looking into it, found it to be Latin. Hereupon he examined him, and finding he pretty well underſtood that language, he enquired how he came by his learning? The man replied, as he had been a good maſter to him, he would venture to truſt him with a ſecret he had never before revealed to any one. He then informed him, That he was boarded with a Latin ſchoolmaſter, without knowing who his parents were, till he was fifteen or ſixteen years old; only a gentleman came once a quarter and paid for his board, and took care to ſee that he wanted nothing. One day this gentleman carried him to a large houſe, where he paſſed through ſeveral ſtately rooms, in one of which he left him, bidding him ſtay there. Soon after, a man, ſuperbly dreſſed, came to him, aſked him ſome queſtions, talked kindly to him, and gave him ſome money. Then the firſt-mentioned gentleman returned, and conducted him back to his ſchool.

"Some time after the ſame gentleman came to him again, with a horſe and proper accoutrements, and told him, he muſt take a journey with him into the country. They went into Leiceſterſhire, and came to Boſworth Field; and he was carried to king Richard the Third's tent. The king embraced him, and told him he was his ſon. "But, child, ſays he, to-morrow I muſt fight for my crown; and, aſſure yourſelf, if I loſe that I will loſe my life too: but I hope to preſerve both. Do you ſtand in ſuch a place, (directing him to a particular ſpot) where you may ſee the battle out of danger; and when I have gained the victory come to me; I will then own you to be mine, and take care of you. But, if I ſhould be ſo unfortunate as to loſe the battle, then ſhift as well as you can, and take care to let nobody know that I am your father; for no mercy will be ſhewed to any one ſo nearly related to me." Then the king gave him a purſe of gold, and diſmiſſed him.

"He followed the king's directions: and, when he ſaw the battle was loſt, and the king killed, he haſtened to London, ſold his horſe and fine cloaths; and the better to conceal himſelf from all ſuſpicion of being ſon to a king, and that he might have means to live by his honeſt labour, he put himſelf apprentice to a bricklayer. But, having a competent ſkill in the Latin tongue, he was unwilling to loſe it; and having an inclination alſo to reading, and no delight in the converſation of thoſe he was obliged to work with, he generally ſpent all the time he had to ſpare in reading by himſelf.

"Sir Thomas ſaid, "You are now old, and almoſt paſt your labour; I will give you the running of my kitchen as long as you live." He anſwered, "Sir, you have a numerous family; I have been uſed to live retired; give me leave to build a houſe of one room for myſelf, in ſuch a field, and there, with your good leave, I will live and die." Sir Thomas granted his requeſt: he built his houſe, and there continued the remainder of his life."

He died in the year 1550; at which time he was in the 82d year of his age.

From the Acceſſion of Henry VII. (the firſt English Monarch of the Name of Tudor), to the Death of Queen Elizabeth.

SECTION I.

HENRY VII.

THE victorious Henry Tudor, earl of Richmond, having given orders concerning the diſpoſal and march of his army after the battle of Boſworth, ſet out for London, which he entered on the 27th of Auguſt, amidſt the univerſal acclamations of the people, who conſidered him as their deliverer from the moſt cruel of tyrants. He immediately repaired to St. Paul's cathedral, where he offered the ſtandards he had taken in the late battle, and Te Deum was ſung for his victory. After the ſervice was over, he went to his lodgings at the biſhop's palace, where, the next day, he aſſembled a council of all the nobility, and ſolemnly renewed the oath he had formerly taken to marry the princeſs Elizabeth.

The ceremony of the coronation was fixed for the 30th of October, and the intermediate time was employed by Henry in rewarding the zealous ſervices of his friends and adherents. John de Vere, earl of Oxford, was made conſtable of the Tower, Jaſper, earl of Pembroke, uncle to the king, and the tutor and guardian of his tender years, was created duke of Bedford. The earldom of Derby was conferred on his father-in-law Thomas Stanley, to whom he owed the important victory of Boſworth; and Edward ward lord Courtney was created earl of Devonſhire.

The day being arrived, and all neceſſary preparations made, Henry was crowned with great pomp and ſolemnity by cardinal Bourchier, archbiſhop of Canterbury. To augment the ſplendor of this ceremony Henry inſtituted a body guard, conſiſting of fifty archers called yeomen, under the command of a captain, who were to be always in attendance on his perſon: a project which, in all probability, Henry conſidered as indiſpenſably neceſſary to his own ſafety, though he prudently concealed his real ſentiments under the pretence of augmenting the grandeur of his court.*

As ſoon as the coronation was over, Henry ſummoned a parliament to meet at Weſtminſter on the 7th of November. In this aſſembly the crown was entailed upon Henry, not by recognition or ordinance, but by ſettlement. It was enacted, "That the inheritance of the crown ſhould reſt, remain, and abide in him and the heirs of his body;" and as he was under a ſentence of attainder that had been denounced againſt him in the late reign, they extricated themſelves from that difficulty by eſtabliſhing it as a maxim, "That the crown takes away all attainders and corruptions of blood." They paſſed an act of attainder againſt the late king and his adherents, among whom were the duke of Norfolk, the earl of Surry, the viſcount Lovel, the lords Zouche and Ferrers, Sir Walter and Sir James Harrington, Sir William Berkeley, and Sir Humphry Stafford.

Though Henry did not requeſt any ſupplies from the parliament, yet that aſſembly thought proper to ſettle on him for life the duty of tonnage and poundage, which had been enjoyed in the ſame manner by ſome of his predeceſſors. But when they preſented the bill for the royal aſſent, they petitioned his majeſty to marry the princeſs Elizabeth. The king promiſed to comply with their deſires; and after having reſtored Edward Stafford, eldeſt ſon to the duke of Buckingham, to the honours and eſtates of his family, which had been forfeited in the late reign, he diſſolved the parliament.

Notwithſtanding many of the partiſans of the houſe of York had been attainted by the late ſtatute, Henry thought proper to publiſh a proclamation, offering a general pardon to all that had carried arms againſt him, provided they ſubmitted within a limited time. The offer was gladly embraced by many of that party, who immediately left their ſanctuaries, and ſubmitted to Henry's government.

A. D. 1486. Henry, in order to increaſe his popularity, now determined to fulfil the promiſe he had made of marrying the princeſs Elizabeth; and the nuptials were accordingly celebrated on the 18th of January, to the inexpreſſible joy of the nation.

As moſt of the northern counties were warmly attached to the houſe of York, Henry determined to make a progreſs into thoſe parts, in order to remove the prejudices of the people and conciliate their affections to his government. He accordingly ſet out about Eaſter; but before he reached Lincoln he was informed that lord Lovel, and his two brothers the Staffords, had left their ſanctuary at Colcheſter-abbey, and were once more in arms againſt the government; that the latter were marching to beſiege the city of Worceſter; and the former, at the head of three or four thouſand men, was advancing to attack him in York. This intelligence did not intimidate Henry: aſſembled a ſmall body of troops, in whom he could confide, and ſent them againſt the inſurgents, under the command of the duke of Bedford. But that able general well knew that his little army were formidable only for their zealous attachment to their maſter, and therefore publiſhed a general pardon to all who ſhould lay down their arms. This prudent meaſure produced the deſired effect. Lovel, who was never celebrated for his courage and intrepidity, was ſo terrified with the fears of deſertion among his troops, that he abandoned his army, and made his eſcape into Flanders, where he was protected by the ducheſs of Burgundy. His forces immediately ſubmitted; and the other body of inſurgents, informed of this miſcarriage, raiſed the ſiege of Worceſter, and diſperſed. The two Staffords took ſanctuary in the church of Colnham, a village near Abingdon; but the privilege of that aſylum not extending to rebels, they were taken from the altar and brought to London, when Humphrey the elder was executed at Tyburn. The younger was pardoned, on pleading that he acted ſolely under the influence of his brother.

This was not the only inſtance Henry had of the great attachment of the people to the family of Edward IV. He had no ſooner returned to his capital than he received information of another ſcheme of a ſtill more dangerous nature, though, at the ſame time, of a very extraordinary and romantic kind. A report had, for ſome time, prevailed among the people, that Edward duke of York, youngeſt ſon to Edward IV. had eluded his uncle's cruelty, by making his eſcape from the Tower. The pleaſure with which this intelligence was received by the people, encouraged one Richard Simon, a prieſt of Oxford, who wanted neither ſubtilty nor courage, to raiſe a fictitious prince to diſpute with Henry the poſſeſſion of the throne. The inſtrument of this impoſture was Lambert Simnel, a youth of fifteen years of age. He was the ſon of a baker, but endowed with underſtanding and addreſs far ſuperior to his years and condition. The ſeditious prieſt had firſt inſtructed his pupil to perſonate the duke of York; but another report prevailing about that time, that the earl of Warwick had found means to leave the place of his confinement; and obſerving that this intelligence was ſtill more acceptable to the people, Simnel, by the dexterity of Simon, was immediately converted into Warwick. However qualified the young impoſtor might be to ſuſtain the character he was to perſonate, and however capable the prieſt might be of giving him the neceſſary inſtructions, there is great reaſon to think, that perſons of a much higher rank had joined in this conſpiracy; becauſe it appears that Simnel had better information in matters relating to the royal family than he could have derived from a perſon in Simon's ſituation. It has ever been ſuſpected, that the queen dowager, diſcontented with the king, and offended at the ſtate of abſolute inſignificance to which ſhe was reduced, favoured this ridiculous enterprize. Henry himſelf ſeems to have been of this opinion; for he ſoon after cauſed the queen dowager to be cloſely confined in the monaſtery of Bermondſey, and ſeized all her lands and revenues: nor did ſhe ever regain her liberty, but ended her life in poverty, ſolitude and confinement.

Simnel having received ſufficient inſtructions for ſupporting the character he was to perſonate, was ſent to Ireland, where the deception was not ſo likely to be diſcovered, and where the houſe of York had a great number of partiſans. The attempt ſucceeded. The impoſtor no ſooner claimed the protection of the earl of Kildare, as the unfortunate Warwick, than that credulous nobleman received him as a true Plantagenet.

tagenet. The populace followed his example. Simnel was received with acclamations of joy, and crowned in Dublin, with a diadem taken from a ſtatue of the Virgin, under the title of Edward VI.

A. D. 1487. This revolt in Ireland greatly alarmed Henry, who immediately purſued ſuch meaſures as he thought were moſt likely to ſuppreſs it. He ordered Warwick to be taken from the Tower, and led in poſſeſſion through the principal ſtreets of London, that the people might be convinced of the abſurdity of Simnel's pretenſions. This expedient had its proper effect in England; but in Ireland it was thought that the king had produced a counterfeit Warwick; and Henry found it would be abſolutely neceſſary to have recourſe to arms, in order to ſuppreſs the rebellion. He was the more confirmed in this opinion, on being informed that John, earl of Lincoln, ſon of John de la Pole, duke of Suffolk, and of Elizabeth, eldeſt ſiſter of Edward IV. had engaged in this conſpiracy. Lincoln was a nobleman of courage and capacity, and had formed very aſpiring views. The rigour of Henry towards the earl of Warwick, and his jealouſy of all the eminent perſons among the friends of the houſe of York, had filled him with apprehenſions, and he had retired to the court of the ducheſs dowager of Burgundy for ſafety.

That princeſs was deſcended from the houſe of York, and ſympathiſed in all the misfortunes which had attended her family. She reſolved to take advantage of the preſent revolt in favour of Simnel, and, if poſſible, to make Henry feel the weight of her reſentment. She accordingly ſent over to Ireland a body of two thouſand veteran forces, under the command of Swart, a brave and experienced officer. The earl of Lincoln and lord Lovel embarked with theſe forces, and joined Simnel. Elated with this unexpected reinforcement, and encouraged by the countenance of perſons of ſuch high condition, the Iriſh determined to invade England, where they flattered themſelves with being joined by all the partiſans of the houſe of York.

A. D. 1488. Henry was no ſooner appriſed of the intentions of the rebels, than he raiſed a conſiderable army to oppoſe them. The inſurgents landed near Foudrey, in Lancaſhire, and directed their march towards York; but finding themſelves diſappointed in the hopes they had formed of being joined by multitudes of the Engliſh, it was determined to give Henry battle the firſt opportunity. They were encamped on a riſing ground, at Stoke, a village near Newark, when Henry's army appeared. The inſurgents, marching down the hill, began the engagement with great fury; and the battle was maintained for three hours, with equal valour on both ſides; though the Iriſh were dreadfully galled by the arrows of the Engliſh, being wholly deſtitute of defenſive armour. The Engliſh, under the earl of Lincoln, and the Germans under Swart, made ſo noble a reſiſtance, that the greater part of Henry's vanguard was cut in pieces; but at length the valour of the royal army bore down all reſiſtance; and, after a bloody conflict, they obtained a complete victory. The earl of Lincoln, Lovel, and Swart, fell in the action, with four thouſand of their troops; but Simnel, and his tutor Simon, were taken priſoners. The latter being a prieſt, was condemned to cloſe impriſonment; but the former, as too contemptible to excite any apprehenſion in Henry, received a pardon, was made a ſcullion in the king's kitchen, and afterwards raiſed to the poſt of a falconer. Such was the iſſue of Simnel's attempt to perſonate the earl of Warwick; which, however ridiculous in itſelf, threw the whole nation into the greateſt confuſion.

After the battle was over the king proceeded to York, and in his progreſs diſcovered that the principal cauſe of this general diſcontent aroſe from the long delay of the queen's coronation. To obviate, therefore, this complaint, he returned to London in the beginning of November, and on the 25th of the ſame month the ceremony was performed with the uſual formalities, the duke of Bedford aſſiſting as high-ſteward on the occaſion.

A. D. 1489. In the beginning of this year a ſubſidy was granted by the parliament for aſſiſting the duke of Bretagne in a war lately commenced with France: all the counties paid it without murmuring, except the inhabitants of Yorkſhire, and the biſhopric of Durham, who, as old adherents to the intereſt of the houſe of York, were averſe to the preſent government, and not only refuſed compliance with the conditions of the tax, but engaged themſelves in open rebellion againſt the king. They were abetted by a popular incendiary called John Chamber, and chooſing for their leader Sir John Egremont, a zealous partiſan of the houſe of York, they avowed their rebellion, declaring that they would march to London, and give battle to the royaliſts.

Henry, on receiving intelligence of this inſurrection, diſpatched a body of troops againſt them under command of the earl of Surry, whom he had lately releaſed from the Tower*. That nobleman routed the inſurgents at the firſt onſet, and made John Chamber priſoner; but Sir John Egremont eſcaped, and croſſing the ſeas took refuge with the ducheſs dowager of Burgundy. The king, who followed the earl of Surry with another body of troops, proceeded to York, where he ordered John Chamber, with the principal accomplices, to be hanged, and granted a free pardon to the reſt of the inſurgents.

A. D. 1490. This year a rebellion broke out in Scotland againſt James III. at the inſtigation of his own ſon. The king had retired to the caſtle of Edinburgh, and ſolicited the aſſiſtance of Henry, who promiſed to ſupport him with a body of forces, notwithſtanding which the rebels prevailed, and his ſon James, at that time but fifteen years of age, was proclaimed king of Scotland; and in the month of July ambaſſadors were ſent to the Engliſh monarch to notify his acceſſion to the throne of that kingdom.

A. D. 1492. The war between France and Britany was this year terminated by a marriage between Charles and the ducheſs, than which nothing could be more unacceptable to Henry. He had long dreaded and foreſeen it; but, actuated by his prevailing paſſion avarice, he neglected to ſupport the Britons with a force that might have prevented a union ſo prejudicial to England. His chagrin ſtimulated him the more to revenge, as he piqued himſelf on the depth of his policy. A war with France was always flattering and agreeable to the Engliſh; and Henry immediately ſummoned a parliament to obtain ſupplies. He opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne, in which he told them that the king of France, grown inſolent with power, had treated the Engliſh with contempt, and refuſed to pay the tribute which Lewis XI. had ſtipulated with Edward IV. He mentioned the

* Previous to the releaſement of the earl, Henry went with his queen to the Tower, and ordering that nobleman to be brought before him, he ſternly demanded how he could take the part of ſo great a Tyrant as the late Richard; when the earl calmly replied, "that if the crown had been placed upon the head of a poſt, he would have preſerved his allegiance to it." This fra answer ſo greatly pleaſed the king that he forgave him, ordere him to be immediately releaſed, and received him into hi favour.

the victories of Creſſy, Agincourt and Poictiers, and ſaid he did not doubt of being equally ſucceſsful.

The parliament, allured by the temptation of effecting the conqueſt of France, not only adviſed him to engage in the enterprize, but alſo granted him the neceſſary ſubſidies with the greateſt alacrity. In conſequence of this Henry levied a conſiderable army, with which he embarked for France, and landed at Calais on the 6th of October. The lateneſs of the ſeaſon being conſidered as an indication that the war would ſoon be terminated, Henry replied, “ It is of little conſequence at what ſeaſon the invaſion is begun, as one ſummer will not be ſufficient for the reduction of France.” But notwithſtanding all his boaſts of conqueſt, he had, at that very time, (perhaps before he landed at Calais) begun a negotiation for a peace. In order, however, to ſave appearances, he laid ſiege to Boulogne; and then artfully engaged ſeveral perſons of diſtinction in his army to preſent a petition, requeſting him to accommodate his differences with France, on pretence that his allies were not in a condition to give him much aſſiſtance, and that it would be difficult to find ſubſiſtence for his troops during the winter. The French well knew that Henry wanted nothing but money; and Charles, who was very impatient of undertaking the conqueſt of Naples, was eaſily diſpoſed to liſten to terms of accommodation. Accordingly a peace was concluded and ſigned on the 3d of November; by the articles of which it was agreed, that Charles ſhould give Henry 745,000 crowns, beſides an annual penſion of 25,000 to himſelf and his heirs. This treaty excited much clamour among Henry’s ſubjects, who loudly exclaimed that he had fleeced his people for the maintenance of a war, which he had undertaken merely for the emolument of himſelf.

During the tranſactions of this year, Henry’s private enemies had been indefatigable in concerting meaſures for interrupting his tranquillity; and the ducheſs of Burgundy in particular meditated vengeance againſt him. Careleſs of the means employed to ſatisfy her reſentment, ſhe determined to raiſe up another impoſtor, in order to ſhake the throne of Henry. By means of her emiſſaries, ſhe propagated, or rather revived a report, that her nephew, Richard Plantagenet, duke of York, had made his eſcape from the Tower, when his elder brother was murdered by the cruelty of his uncle, and ſtill lay concealed in ſome ſecret retreat. She found that the report was received with pleaſure; and that the people entertained the greateſt expectations that he would ſoon make his appearance, and attempt to recover the throne of his anceſtors. It was now neceſſary to procure a youth proper for perſonating Edward, and a young Jew ſeemed to anſwer her moſt ſanguine wiſhes. He was the ſon of one Warbec, a Jew, who had been converted to chriſtianity, and whoſe buſineſs having called him to London in the reign of Edward IV. his wife was there delivered of a ſon. He was called Perkin, or Peter; and Edward, who was ſuſpected of carrying on a ſecret correſpondence with Warbec’s wife, was his godfather. The comelineſs of his perſon, his inſinuating manners, and the verſability of his genius, rendered him extremely well adapted to the part he was to act. He ſoon learned the leſſons neceſſary for perſonating the duke of York; but as the ſeaſon ſeemed not then favourable for appearing in the world, ſhe ſent him to Portugal, under the care of lady Brumpton, where he continued for ſome time.

As ſoon as the ducheſs found that a war between England and France was inevitable, ſhe determined to produce the impoſtor; and he was accordingly ſent over to Ireland, where he aſſumed the name of Richard Plantagenet. He wrote letters to the earls of Kildare and Deſmond, inviting them to join his party. The vulgar received him with open arms; and the ſtory of his eſcape from the cruelty of his uncle was ſoon ſpread over the whole kingdom, and procured him a prodigious number of adherents.

The French monarch, Charles VIII. imagined that this pretended prince might be of advantage to him during his war with Henry, and Perkin was accordingly invited to the court of France. He was there received with all the honours due to the heir of the Engliſh crown. A magnificent palace was aſſigned him, with a handſome penſion, and a guard for his perſon. Numbers of Engliſh gentlemen came to Paris, in order to offer their ſervice to Perkin, who now began to appear dangerous to the government. The countenance of the king of France gave great credit to a fiction extremely well calculated to pleaſe the people. But, on the concluſion of the peace with England, Charles found it neceſſary to forbid Perkin his court.

Perkin left France in the beginning of the year 1493, and retired to the court of the ducheſs of Burgundy, under pretence of craving her protection. That princeſs affected a total ignorance of his pretenſions, and ſeemed to examine every circumſtance with the moſt ſcrupulous anxiety. After many affected doubts, and the ſevereſt ſcrutiny, ſhe burſt into a tranſport of tenderneſs, embraced him as her nephew, the ſole heir of the Plantagenets, and the legitimate ſucceſſor of Edward IV. She even aſſigned him guards, and a magnificent equipage, and honoured him with the title of the “ White Roſe of England.” Many perſons of rank and condition came to her court from England, to aſſiſt him in his enterprize, and ſhare his fortune; and even Sir William Stanley, the lord chamberlain, who had been ſo inſtrumental in putting the crown upon the head of Henry, entertained the project of a revolt in his favour.

Theſe myſterious tranſactions threw the whole nation into a ſtate of uncertainty. The murder of the two princes had been always doubted, the infernal deed having been committed under the impenetrable veil of night and ſecrecy; and the protection given to Perkin by Charles of France and the ducheſs dowager of Burgundy, gave countenance to the impoſtor.

Henry now found that the utmoſt prudence and precaution were neceſſary to divert the force of the impending ſtorm. Could he have aſcertained the death of the real duke of York, the conſpiracy muſt have fallen to the ground; but that could not be effected, only two of the conſpirators being alive; and tho’ they agreed in the ſame ſtory, yet their teſtimony was not thought ſufficient to clear up the fact. Henry, however, found a clue, by means of his ſpies, which guided him through the labyrinth of this myſtery. He diſcovered the pedigree and adventures of Perkin, and traced the whole conſpiracy from its firſt formation. The ſtory was immediately publiſhed for the ſatisfaction of the nation; and he bribed Sir Robert Clifford himſelf, one of the chief perſons in the court of the pretended prince, to diſcover the ſecrets of his party.

Henry had no ſooner procured the neceſſary intelligence, together with the names of the principal conſpirators then in England, than they were arreſted, and being tried and convicted, were, as an example to others, immediately executed. But the trial of Stanley required more ſolemn preparations. His rank and former ſervices ſeemed to ſecure him againſt any accuſation and puniſhment. It was feared that the death of ſo illuſtrious a perſon would be attended with many inconveniences, unleſs his crime was apparent to the whole nation. The king was, however, determined that he ſhould not eſcape his vengeance. Clifford was directed to come over privately to England, and to accuſe Stanley before the council. The treacherous inſurgent obeyed. He threw himſelf at the king's feet while ſeated at the council-table, aſked pardon for his paſt offences, and offered to atone for them by any ſervices in his power. Henry told him that the beſt proof he could give of his penitence, and the only ſervice he could now render him, was to make a full confeſſion of his guilt, and to name his accomplices. Clifford immediately accuſed Stanley, who was preſent, as the chief abettor of the conſpiracy. Stanley himſelf could not diſcover more ſurpriſe than was affected by Henry on this occaſion. Clifford inſiſted upon his charge, and offered to lay before the council the whole proof of his guilt. Henry ſeemed to heſitate, but at laſt ordered Stanley to be ſent to priſon, and he was ſoon after tried and beheaded.

A. D. 1494. Theſe executions, and eſpecially that of Stanley, ſtruck the conſpirators with terror. They found that all their ſecrets were diſcovered, and abandoned the idol they had worſhipped to his fate. Perkin had no other reſource than his deſpair. He embarked from Ireland with his few followers, amounting to about 600, and appeared on the coaſt of Kent. But the people were not now diſpoſed to favour him: the whole account of his impoſture was known, and the late executions had taught the people caution. Perkin miſtruſting ſomething of this kind, landed a ſmall party only, in order to diſcover the true diſpoſition of the Kentiſhmen, who were drawn up with great regularity to receive him. His retainers met with a very friendly reception, and Perkin himſelf was invited to land; but the wary youth ſuſpecting the whole to be a deception, and that a deſign was formed to take him priſoner, refuſed to commit himſelf into their hands. Deſpairing of being able to make themſelves maſters of the impoſtor's perſon, the Kentiſh men took the whole party, conſiſting of one hundred and fifty perſons, priſoners. Theſe were all tried, condemned and executed; and their bodies hung upon gibbets along the coaſts, as a terror to others. Diſappointed in the reception he hoped to meet with, Perkin ſailed to Corke, but finding no countenance there, except among the very loweſt of the people, he was obliged to conceal himſelf in the bogs and foreſts of that country.

A. D. 1495. Henry now convoked a parliament, where the eſtates of all perſons convicted of having engaged in the ſupport of Perkin, were confiſcated; and the famous ſtatute was enacted, wherein it was declared, "that no perſon who ſhould by arms, or otherwiſe, aſſiſt the king for the time being, ſhould ever afterwards, either by courſe of law, or act of parliament, be attainted for ſuch an inſtance of obedience."

A. D. 1496. Perkin, being now weary of his confinement, and having no hopes of obtaining ſuccour in Ireland, determined to make application to the king of Scotland, who was a weak prince, and entertained no favourable diſpoſition towards England. He accordingly abandoned his retreat, and repaired to the Scottiſh court, where he was received with the utmoſt kindneſs and hoſpitality. James acknowledged him as the ſon of Edward IV. and appeared ſo thoroughly convinced of his being the real duke of York, that he rejected an alliance which was now offered him by Henry. He even married the young adventurer to his niece, the lady Catherine Gordon, one of the moſt beautiful and accompliſhed ladies of the age. At the ſame time he publickly declared that he would aſſiſt him with all his forces, in recovering the inheritance of his anceſtors; and it was agreed in the Scottiſh council to carry this deſign into immediate execution. A numerous army was accordingly aſſembled, under the command of the king in perſon, attended by the young adventurer. On their entering Northumberland, Perkin publiſhed a manifeſto, in which he inveighed bitterly againſt Henry, as an uſurper, a tyrant, and a murderer; and invited all his ſubjects to aſſiſt him in recovering the throne of his anceſtors.

Though this manifeſto was drawn up with great ſpirit and preciſion, yet it produced very little effect; the claim of Perkin was grown obſolete, and his being aſſiſted by the Scots rendered him an unwelcome viſitor to the Engliſh. James ſoon perceived that he had undertaken a taſk he was unable to perform; and, deſirous of repaying himſelf the expences of the expedition, ravaged Northumberland in the moſt cruel manner. Perkin pretended to be greatly affected with the miſeries of his plundered ſubjects, and remonſtrated ſtrongly againſt the proceedings of the army. But all his repreſentations were in vain. James told him, "That he was perſuaded his concern was only employed in behalf of his enemy, and that he was anxious to preſerve what would never belong to him." The depredations were accordingly continued without the leaſt intermiſſion, till advice arrived that a numerous army was advancing againſt them, when the Scots, fearful of the conſequence, retired with precipitation.

The Scottiſh invaſion furniſhed Henry with an opportunity which he was very fond of embracing, namely, that of extorting money from his ſubjects. Under pretence of carrying on the war with that kingdom, he ſummoned a parliament to meet on the 16th of January 1497, when he requeſted a ſubſidy, which they readily granted, amounting to 120,000l. with two fifteenths. His avarice, which was his ruling paſſion, rather than his neceſſity, induced him to ſolicit this exaction; and the people, often diſguſted with neceſſary taxes, were far from being diſpoſed to ſubmit to thoſe which were uſeleſs to the ſtate. The Corniſhmen, who ſtill preſerved ſome remains of the antient ferocity of their anceſtors, were highly exaſperated at being obliged to ſupport ſo unneceſſary a burden. They complained loudly againſt this impoſition, from which they conſidered themſelves exempted; as the northern counties had uſually repelled the incurſions of the Scots, without burdening the other parts of the kingdom. Michael Joſeph, a farrier of Bodmin, who was conſidered as the leader of the multitude, greatly increaſed the ill-humour of the people by the moſt inflammatory reflections on the proceedings of the government. He was joined by Thomas Flammoc, a lawyer, who had long been conſidered as the oracle of the neighbourhood. He perſuaded them, that they had no right to pay the tax, as the northern nobility were obliged, by the tenures of their eſtates, to defend the borders againſt the Scots; adding, that the only way to obtain redreſs was to deliver a petition to the king, and to ſecond it with ſuch force as would give it authority; avoiding, at the ſame time, every ſpecies of oppreſſion, in order to convince their fellow-ſubjects, that the good of the people had induced them to have recourſe to this method for procuring a redreſs of their grievances.

The populace, inflamed by theſe ſpeeches, flocked together from all parts of the country, armed with ſuch weapons as they could procure. Flammoc and Joſeph were choſen their leaders, and the rabble marched directly towards the capital. At Wells they were joined by lord Audley, a nobleman deſcended from an ancient family, but of a very reſtleſs and ambitious temper. Audley, by his authority, kept the inſurgents from committing the leaſt violence or diſorder during their march. When they reached Wincheſter, inſtead of continuing their route directly to London, as they at firſt intended, they marched into Kent, from a ridiculous notion, that the inhabitants of that country would join them in great numbers; but they ſoon found that their expectations were built on a chimerical foundation: not one of the Kentiſhmen would join their ſtandard. They were not, however, intimidated by this diſappointment; they continued their march to Blackheath, and encamped between Eltham and Greenwich.

The army intended to chaſtiſe the Scots being fortunately ready for action, was immediately ſent to ſuppreſs the inſurgents. The troops were divided into three bodies; the firſt commanded by the earl of Oxford, the ſecond by the king in perſon, and the third by lord d'Aubeney, a general in whoſe abilities and courage the ſoldiers placed the higheſt confidence. Lord Oxford was directed to poſt the left wing of his diviſion near Lewiſham, and to extend his right towards Foot's-Cray, in order to ſecure all the roads and defiles by which it was poſſible to eſcape in that direction. Lord d'Aubeney was ordered to march directly againſt the front of the rebels, extending his right wing towards the left of the earl of Oxford's diviſion. The king himſelf encamped in St. George's Fields, his troops forming a kind of body of reſerve. This excellent diſpoſition rendered it almoſt impoſſible for any of the rebels to eſcape, as they had no ſhipping to croſs the Thames, the only paſſage that was left open.

D'Aubeney advanced againſt the rebels about four in the afternoon, and attacked their advanced guard with the utmoſt fury: after a very ſmart conflict, he drove them from their poſt, and followed them ſo cloſe up the hill, that he gained the ſummit before any aſſiſtance could be ſent from the main body to oppoſe him. This advantage inſpired d'Aubeney with a kind of contempt for the enemy, tho' they were formidable for their numbers, and far from being deficient in valour. He charged them at the head of his men with great impetuoſity; but met with a reſiſtance he did not expect: his valour carried him too far, and he was taken priſoner.

Victory ſeemed now inclined to declare for the inſurgents; but lord Oxford falling in the critical moment on their rear, changed the fortune of the day; they could not ſtand the ſhock of theſe veteran forces, being wholly deſtitute both of horſe and artillery. Fifteen hundred of them were cut to pieces, and the reſt taken priſoners, with their leaders. Lord Audley was beheaded on Tower-hill;* but Flammoc and Joſeph were executed at Tyburn.† The reſt of the priſoners were diſmiſſed without any puniſhment, a favour which Henry's character gave them no reaſon to expect. Perhaps their inoffenſive behaviour pleaded ſufficiently in their favour; or perhaps he hoped to obliterate the remembrance of his former ſeverities by this inſtance of unuſual lenity.

The king of Scotland took advantage of this commotion in England. He made a ſecond invaſion in the northern counties, and meeting with no oppoſition, he ſat down before Norham caſtle. The earl of Surry commanded the few forces in thoſe counties; and as ſoon as the Corniſh rebellion was ſuppreſſed, Henry ſent the beſt of his troops to join that nobleman in Yorkſhire. With this reinforcement he advanced againſt the Scots, who immediately raiſed the ſiege, and retired with ſuch precipitation that the earl could not overtake them. He, however continued the purſuit; and made himſelf maſter of the ſtrong caſtle of Ayton, ſituated between Berwick and Edinburgh.

A negotiation was now entered into for a peace, but the conferences being rendered abortive, only a truce for a few months was concluded. The principal reaſon that prevented the peace from taking place between the two kingdoms, was James's refuſal to give up Perkin Warbec. But though he would not conſent to ſacrifice the perſon he had engaged to protect, he deſired him to quit his dominions. The unhappy fugitive was now reduced to a melancholy ſituation; and he had no other reſource than to return to Ireland, where he again reſided in a mere ſtate of obſcurity.

A. D. 1498. Notwithſtanding the great lenity Henry had ſhewn to the Corniſh rebels, yet they were far from being ſatisfied. They boaſted, that they owed not their pardon to Henry's clemency, but to his fear that their puniſhment would have rouzed the whole nation; the people being ready to take up arms againſt the government. Animated by theſe repreſentations, the people again aſſembled; and hearing that Perkin was in Ireland, it was agreed to invite him over, and place him at their head. The young adventurer liſtened to their propoſals, and having prevailed upon a few perſons to follow his fortune, he landed in Whitſand-bay on the coaſt of Cornwall. He repaired immediately to Bodmin, where, being joined by three or four thouſand men, he iſſued a proclamation, in which he aſſumed the title of king of England, by the name of Richard IV.

Unacquainted with diſcipline, and ſtrangers to the danger of ſupporting themſelves againſt the attacks of a regular army, they were perſuaded that their force was invincible, and reſolved to undertake the ſiege of Exeter, which they promiſed themſelves would fall an eaſy conqueſt to their arms. They carried this wild project into execution; but being deſtitute of artillery, and almoſt every other requiſite neceſſary for forming a regular ſiege, the aſſailants, who attempted to ſcale the walls, were repulſed in every attack.

While the rebels were thus employed in an attempt that exceeded their power, ſeveral of the nobility and gentry of Devonſhire, formed an aſſociation in defence of Henry's government, and raiſed forces in order to drive the inſurgents from the walls of Exeter. Henry alſo diſpatched the lord d'Aubeney at the head of four thouſand men, to the relief of that city; and followed himſelf with a more numerous army.

When Perkin underſtood that the king was marching againſt him with a conſiderable army, he was greatly intimidated; and raiſing the ſiege of Exeter, he retired to Taunton in Somerſetſhire. His army, when he lay before Exeter, conſiſted of about ſeven thouſand men, but many of theſe having joined him from the hopes of plunder, left him when he raiſed the ſiege.

The young adventurer perceiving that the number of his followers daily decreaſed, and that lord d'Aubeney was in full march to attack him, did not think proper to venture a battle. He fled with threeſcore horſe to the monaſtry of Beaulieu, in the New-Foreſt, where he and his retinue regiſtered themſelves, as perſons entitled to the benefit of the ſanctuary. Lord d'Aubeney was no ſooner informed of their flight, than he detached a party of three hundred horſe in purſuit of the fugitives; but finding they were already within the walls, he ſurrounded the aſylum, till he received further inſtructions from Henry. In the mean time the rebels, finding themſelves ſelves deſerted by their leader, ſubmitted to the mercy of the king, and received a pardon. The lady Catherine Gordon, wife of Perkin, fell into the hands of Henry, who treated her with a kindneſs that does him honor. He ſoothed her mind with many tokens of regard, placed her in a reputable ſtation about the queen, and aſſigned her a penſion, which ſhe enjoyed till her death.

The fate of Perkin, however, was not ſo eaſily determined; he had taken ſhelter in a ſanctuary which had never been violated. Some of the council adviſed the king to drag him from the altar by force, and inflict upon him the puniſhment he ſo juſtly deſerved for his temerity. But Henry thought the remedy too violent: he was unwilling to offend the whole body of the clergy, who conſidered theſe religious retreats as ſacred and inviolable. At the ſame time he was deſirous of convincing, even the moſt bigotted part of his people, that Perkin was an impoſtor, which would effectually put an end to his pretenſions, without depriving him of his life. He therefore cauſed ſecret applications to be made to the young adventurer, offering him his pardon, if he would quit his ſanctuary, and deliver himſelf into the king's hands. Perkin, deſtitute of all aſſiſtance, liſtened to the propoſals; and after being conducted in a kind of mock triumph to London, was committed to the Tower.

This year 1498 concluded with a circumſtance which gave Henry no ſmall concern. On the 29th of December, a fire broke out in the king's palace at Shene, which burnt with ſuch violence, that in a few hours the building was entirely conſumed, with all the rich furniture. As Henry was very fond of that palace, he cauſed it to be rebuilt in a more magnificent manner, and gave it the name of Richmond from his title while earl, which name it has ever ſince retained.

A. D. 1499. While Perkin continued a cloſe priſoner in the tower, he inſinuated himſelf into the intimacy of four ſervants belonging to Sir John Digby, lieutenant of that fortreſs, and by their aſſiſtance opened a correſpondence with the unfortunate earl of Warwick, who had been confined in the ſame priſon. This correſpondence ſoon introduced confidence, and it was agreed to take the firſt opportunity of making their eſcape, though they perceived this could not be done without killing Sir John Digby. Had this deſign been effected, had Perkin, acknowledged by many to be the real ſon of Edward the fourth, been joined by an earl of Warwick, ſon to the duke of Clarence, and both eſcaped from the tower, it is probable they would yet have ſhaken the foundations of Henry's throne; but the invariable fortune of that monarch protected him; the deſign was diſcovered only a few hours before it was intended to have been executed.

Perkin was ſoon after brought to Weſtminſter-hall, where he was arraigned, condemned, and ſentenced to be hanged at Tyburn. Previous to the time fixed for his execution great intereſt was made to ſave him. His wife (niece to the king of Scotland) obtained audience of Henry, and, falling at his feet, in the moſt feeling terms, ſued for his pardon; but the king was inflexible, and Perkin ſuffered according to his ſentence. The mayor of Corke, who had been the conſtant companion of his fortunes, ſuffered with him.

Two only of Digby's ſervants, who were concerned in the above attempt, were executed; the other two were preſerved as witneſſes againſt the earl of Warwick, who a few days after was brought from the tower to take his trial before the earl of Oxford, created lord high ſteward of England for that purpoſe. There was perhaps never a greater ſtretch of law, than was made uſe of on this occaſion. As the earl had not been committed for treaſon, his attempt to eſcape could not be conſidered in that light. He therefore loſt his life by the artful inſtigations of Henry's creatures, who perſuaded him to confeſs the truth of his indictment, which was, his conſpiring with Perkin to raiſe a ſedition, and deſtroy the king. The poor earl, a ſtranger to the deceit of mankind, received ſentence of death, which the unrelenting monarch ſuffered to be executed upon him on Tower-hill, on the twenty-eighth of November; and with him periſhed the laſt male heir of the houſe of York.

This act of tyranny was thought, even by Henry himſelf, to ſtand in need of ſome apology; and it was accordingly pretended, that Ferdinand, king of Arragon, would not conſent to the marriage of his daughter with the prince of Wales, while any prince of the houſe of York remained alive. But this apology was far from ſatisfying the people: they exclaimed againſt the injuſtice of this cruel proceeding: they beheld with deteſtation a prince, who ſcrupled not to ſacrifice every principle of humanity to the dictates of an avaricious temper.

A. D. 1500. This year was uſhered in by a dreadful plague, which raged for ſome time with the moſt uncommon violence, upwards of 30,000 perſons being ſwept away by it in the city of London. Among thoſe who fell victims to its fury was cardinal Morton, archbiſhop of Canterbury, a prelate of great parts and experience in buſineſs; but ſo entirely devoted to the avaricious will of his maſter, and at the ſame time ſo fertile in deviſing oppreſſive methods to fleece the people, that he was beheld with deteſtation, and died without receiving the tribute of a tear.

A. D. 1501. This year was remarkable for the marriage of Arthur, prince of Wales, to the princeſs Catherine of Arragon; but the prince, who was then about ſixteen years of age, did not long ſurvive his nuptials; he died of a conſumption, and, it was ſaid, without conſummating his marriage. The king, unwilling to reſtore Catherine's dowry, which was two hundred thouſand ducats, obliged Henry, his ſecond ſon, whom he now created prince of Wales, to marry the princeſs, a diſpenſation from the pope being obtained for that purpoſe. A ſhort time after Henry married his eldeſt daughter Margaret, to James IV. king of Scotland; by which he formed a ſtrong alliance with that monarch.

A. D. 1502. Tho' Henry met with a very diſtinguiſhed loſs in the death of the archbiſhop of Canterbury, yet that did not divert him from his darling purſuit of heaping up riches. Avarice was always the ruling paſſion of his ſoul, and was now increaſed by age to an immoderate degree. He was already poſſeſſed of more perſonal riches than any other ſovereign in Europe; but his deſire of acquiſition ſeemed to increaſe in proportion as it was gratified. He now iſſued out commiſſions for impoſing fines and redemptions upon all perſons in the counties of Wilts, Dorſet, Somerſet, and Devon, that ſhould be found to have favoured the Corniſh rebels under lord Audley and Perkin Warbec. At the ſame time he iſſued orders to all the ſheriffs, to ſummon every gentleman poſſeſſed of forty pounds a year in land to repair to court, within a limited time, and receive the order of knighthood. Theſe oppreſſive methods procured him the hatred of his ſubjects, though this hatred was, by his great abilities, tinctured deeply with fear. All the powers on the continent courted his alliance; and all the malcontents of England were over-awed into a peaceful acquieſcence.

But the natural jealouſy of Henry ſtill encroached upon his repoſe. He was of a diſpoſition never to be eaſy under the ſmalleſt ground of apprehenſion, and an accident happened which greatly diſturbed his peace. Edmund de la Pole, ſecond ſon of Jo de la Pole, duke of Suffolk, and Elizabeth, ſiſter of Edward IV. was, on the death of his elder brother, conſidered as the next lineal heir to the crown, whenever the lines of Edward and of George duke of Clarence, ſhould become extinct. Edmund had claimed the inheritance of his title and eſtates on the death of his brother; but his extravagance having rendered him unable to ſupport the title of duke, he was obliged to reſign that dignity, and Henry, in conſequence of that ceſſion, allowed him to retain the lands of the earldom, with the dignity of earl of Suffolk. Edmund was of a very paſſionate diſpoſition, and happened, in one of his furious ſallies, to kill a man. He applied to the king for a pardon, which was not refuſed; but being little indulgent to perſons connected with the houſe of York, he obliged him to appear perſonally before the court of King's-bench, and plead his pardon like a common felon. Suffolk ſo highly reſented this affront, that he fled over to Flanders, and was protected by the ducheſs of Burgundy. Henry was alarmed at his retreat; he thought he ſaw a new pretender ready to diſpute his throne; and in order to prevent any deſign from being formed againſt him, he diſpatched ſome of his emiſſaries to Flanders, promiſing him every advantage he could deſire, if he would return. The offer was accepted: the earl came over to England, where he plunged into all his former exceſſes, to the ruin of his credit and fortune; and was at length obliged to return into Flanders.

A. D. 1503. Henry, ſtill jealous of Suffolk, endeavoured to prevail on him to return to England, but all his ſolicitations on that head proved ineffectual; and perſuaded that he was forming deſigns againſt the government, he had recourſe to the ſame artifice he had ſo ſucceſsfully uſed in the caſe of Perkin Warbec. He applied to Sir Robert Curſon, governor of the caſtle of Hammes, near Calais, to attempt the diſcovery of Suffolk's ſecret intentions. He accordingly abandoned his poſt, under pretence of diſaffection to the government, retired into Flanders, and offered his ſervice to the earl of Suffolk. That nobleman received him with particular marks of eſteem, formed a very intimate connection with him, and ſhewed him, in confidence, ſeveral letters he had received from his correſpondents, in which the meaſures of Henry were treated with great freedom. Curſon immediately informed Henry of the diſcoveries he had made, in conſequence of which the earl of Devonſhire, William de la Pole, brother to the earl of Suffolk, Sir James Tyrrel, and Sir James Winham, were taken into cuſtody, and the two latter were afterwards condemned and executed. The death of Tyrrel gave univerſal ſatisfaction, on account of his participation n the murder of the two young princes, ſons to Edward IV. Suffolk was, however, beyond the reach f Henry; but that nobleman, finding the ducheſs f Burgundy was now become indifferent with regard o the partiſans of the houſe of York, retired to the ourt of Philip, archduke of Auſtria, where he was eceived with the greateſt marks of reſpect.

A. D. 1504. The avaritious Henry dedicated his hole thoughts to the accumulating of riches, and pared no methods of acquiring them, however preudicial to his people. His principal agents in the excution of this buſineſs were, Sir Richard Empſon, nd Edward Dudley. The former was the ſon of a eve-maker, and by the boldneſs of his meaſures eneavoured to conceal the meanneſs of his birth; the tter was a perſon of fortune and family, as well as great abilities; circumſtances which render his emory ſtill more execrable, if poſſible, than that his partner in iniquity. The inſolences of theſe o miniſters were carried to that height, that they d not even obſerve the common forms of juſtice; they fleeced the ſubject with the moſt arbitrary licentiouſneſs. Such as refuſed tamely to yield up their property, were impriſoned, fined, and ſome of them executed, in conſequence of private trials, without any fair examination, or the verdict of a jury. Henry, who ſhared the fruits of this oppreſſion, covered the authors with the ſhield of his authority. Informers, ſpies, and other vermin of a ſimilar kind, filled every part of the kingdom; while Henry was deaf to the groans of the oppreſſed, and inſenſible to the reproaches of his people.

A. D. 1506. Henry's thoughts were diverted for ſome time from the oppreſſion of his people by an event which happened in Spain. Iſabella, queen of Caſtile, paid the debt of nature, and it was foreſeen that this incident would greatly affect the fortunes of her huſband Ferdinand king of Arragon. Henry's ſituation was, in ſome particulars, ſimilar to that of Ferdinand, and therefore he regarded the iſſue of theſe tranſactions as a precedent for himſelf. Joan, the daughter of Ferdinand by Iſabella, was married to the archduke Philip, and being, in right of her mother, heireſs of Caſtile, ſeemed entitled to diſpute with Ferdinand the preſent adminiſtration of that kingdom. It was of the utmoſt importance for Henry to ſupport the pretenſions of Ferdinand. He was very ſenſible that the greater part of his ſubjects were convinced of the ſuperiority of his wife's title to the crown; and he dreaded leſt the prince of Wales, who was every day advancing towards manhood, might be tempted by his own ambition, and the example of the archduke, to lay immediate claim to the crown.

Ferdinand, though ſo cloſely connected with Henry, ſoon found that it would be impoſſible for him to continue in the adminiſtration. His former exactions and impoſitions had rendered him very unpopular, and a reſolution was taken to declare Philip and Joan, king and queen of Caſtile. Philip therefore embarked with his conſort for Spain, on the ſixth of January; but being overtaken by a dreadful ſtorm, he was obliged to put into the harbour of Weymouth for ſafety. Spent with the fatigues of a turbulent voyage, the duke and his conſort went on ſhore to procure ſome refreſhment, contrary to the advice of his council, who ſtrongly oppoſed the reſolution.

Henry, being informed of this circumſtance, ſent the earl of Arundel to compliment them in his name; to aſſure them that he hoped ſoon to have the pleaſure of embracing them, and that, in the mean time, they might command in his dominions. Philip would willingly have declined the honour of an interview; but he well knew that he muſt not now depart without the king's conſent, and therefore ſet out immediately for the court, which was then at Windſor, where he and his conſort were received by Henry with all the marks of the moſt cordial friendſhip. But the Engliſh monarch was determined to draw ſome advantages from this fortunate event; and accordingly hinted to Philip, that as he had changed his condition, by accepting the crown of Caſtile, the treaty of commerce between England and the Low Countries ought to be renewed. No objections were made to this propoſal, and a new treaty was drawn up and ſigned by both princes.

Notwithſtanding this treaty was very advantageous to England, yet Henry was far more deſirous of ſucceeding in another attempt which regarded himſelf only. He had been very uneaſy at the reception the earl of Suffolk had met with at Philip's court, and was determined to employ the preſent opportunity of procuring that fugitive to be ſent back to his own country. Accordingly he complained to Philip, that his ſubjects found an aſylum in his dominions, particularly the earl of Suffolk. "I really thought," replied the king of Caſtiſe, "that a perſon of ſo little conſequence was incapable of giving you the leaſt uneaſineſs. But to convince you, that I am deſirous of giving you all the ſatisfaction in my power, I will baniſh him from my territories." "You will greatly increaſe the obligation," ſaid the king, "by carrying your complaiſance a little farther, and deliver Suffolk into my hands: I can then depend upon his ſubmiſſion and obedience." "If I grant your requeſt," ſaid Philip, I ſhall bring a ſtain of diſhonour upon us both. It will be ſaid that I was treated as a priſoner in your dominions." "Then there is no farther diſpute," replied Henry, "I will take all the diſhonour upon myſelf." Philip perceived that Henry was determined to carry his point, and therefore gave his conſent, on condition that no attempt ſhould be made againſt his life. Henry very readily agreed to this reſtriction, and even condeſcended to write a letter to the earl with his own hand; aſſuring the unfortunate exile, that he ſhould meet with the kindeſt reception in England. This invitation, added to that of Philip, who was perſuaded that Henry would make no difficulty of granting his pardon, produced the deſired effect. Suffolk returned to England; but on his appearance, was immediately committed to the Tower.

The king of Caſtile was now ſuffered to purſue his voyage to Spain, where he was joyfully received by the Caſtilians, and put in poſſeſſion of the throne. Soon after the arrival of this prince, Ferdinand ſaw his court a deſart; grandees, clergy, and people flocked to their young king and queen, and Ferdinand was obliged to put on an air of affection and complaiſance for his daughter and her huſband. An interview was held between them, when it was agreed that Ferdinand ſhould retire to Arragon, and reſign the government of Caſtile entirely into the hands of Philip and his conſort. But Philip died ſoon after, and Joan, his widow, falling into a deep melancholy, Ferdinand was again reinſtated in his authority, and governed till the day of his death, the whole kingdom of Spain.

A. D. 1507. Henry's attention was ſtill engroſſed in the accumulating of riches; and the oppreſſions of Empſon and Dudley became more flagitious than ever. Sir William Capel, who had been lord-mayor of London, was now proſecuted upon a frivolous charge of not having puniſhed a perſon who had paid him falſe money during the time of his mayoralty, and fined two thouſand pounds. He refuſed to pay ſo exorbitant a ſum, and was immediately ſent to the Tower, where he continued till the death of Henry. Laurence Aylmer, lord mayor of London, and his two Sheriffs, were alſo proſecuted upon charges equally frivolous, and each fined a thouſand pounds. But they imitating the example of Capel, were committed to the King's-bench priſon. Several other gentlemen were proſecuted in the ſame manner; ſo that it is no wonder the names of Empſon and Dudley became obnoxious to the people. By theſe iniquitous practices, Henry amaſſed the enormous ſum of two millions, ſeven hundred and fifty thouſand pounds, an amazing quantity in thoſe times. His rigid œconomy daily augmented this heap of wealth; and the more he advanced in years, the more deteſtable he became in the eyes of his ſubjects.

A. D. 1508. The avaritious Henry began now to perceive, that neither riches, power, nor ſucceſs, could ſecure him from the misfortunes incident to human nature. He had for ſome time laboured under a conſumptive diſorder, too inveterate to be conquered by the preſcriptions of the healing art, which had exerted all its powers in preſerving a life Henry was ſo unwilling to reſign. At length his diſorder became deſperate: he found his end was approaching. The thoughts of death effected what reaſon had attempted in vain. Henry entered deep into himſelf, and trembled at the gloomy proſpect that now opened before him. He now ſaw the wickedneſs and folly of accumulating riches by violence and extortion, and was deſirous of performing ſome actions that might recommend him to the mercy of heaven, and the forgiveneſs of men. He diſtributed large ſums in charity, and releaſed, at his own expence, all priſoners that were confined for debt under forty ſhillings. He then made his will, in which he ſtrictly enjoined his heir and ſucceſſor to make reſtitution of all that thoſe infamous agents of his oppreſſive avarice had unjuſtly taken from the people; and on the 22d of April, 1509, he expired at his favourite palace of Richmond, in the 53d year of his age and the 24th of his reign. He left his ſon Henry the crown of England, together with one million eight hundred thouſand pounds ſterling in ready money, beſides jewels and plate, all of which were depoſited in the vaults of his palace.

If we conſider this monarch either as a man or a king, we ſhall find him in ſome reſpects inferior to his predeceſſors; but at the ſame time it muſt be acknowledged that few of them poſſeſſed ſo many excellencies as hedid upon the whole. His reign was more advantageous to the nation than honourable to himſelf. He put a final period to the civil wars which had ſo long diſtracted the kingdom. He maintained order and regularity in the ſtate: he depreſſed the exorbitant power of the nobility; and by his firmneſs and intrepidity, together with the friendſhip and alliances he contracted with foreign princes, he became one of the greateſt monarchs in Europe. His reign, in ſome meaſure, humanized the ferocious manners of the Engliſh. He inherited a fund of good ſenſe, which was greatly improved by ſtudy and experience. His judgment was ſound, and his ſagacity remarkable. His prudence and valour ſurmounted every difficulty. Theſe ſhining qualities acquired him the eſteem of all the princes of Europe, and he was generally known by the appellation of the Engliſh Solomon. But his activity and firmneſs, his wiſdom, his love of peace, and his courage in war, cannot wipe away the ſtains which the odious vice of avarice left upon his memory.

Henry was in ſtature ſomewhat above the middle ſize: his perſon was ſtrait and handſome, and his limbs elegant and well proportioned, though extremely delicate and tender; his countenance was grave and melancholy; and his temper ſour and ſaturnine. He was very difficult of acceſs, but affable when once engaged in converſation, and irreſiſtibly eloquent and perſuaſive when he had any favourite point to gain.—He was buried with great pomp in the chapel built by himſelf in Weſtminſter-abbey, which has ever ſince retained his name, and has been the place of interment for all the ſucceeding ſovereigns of England.

This monarch had ſix children by his queen; but only three ſurvived him; one ſon, and two daughters.

1. Henry Tudor, born at Greenwich on the twenty-fourth of February, 1491, and ſucceeded his father by the name of Henry VIII.

2. Margaret Tudor, born on the twenty-ninth of November, 1489; firſt married to James IV. king of Scotland; and afterwards to Archibald Douglas, earl of Angus. She left children by both.

3. Mary Tudor, born in the year 1468; married firſt to Lewis XII. king of France, and after his deceaſe to Charles Brandon, duke of Suffolk.

The remarkable occurrences that happened in the reign of Henry VII. were as follow;

In his firſt year an epidemical diſtemper broke out in London, which ſwept away many thouſands of the inhabitants. This dreadful diſeaſe was, from the ſymptoms attending it, termed the Sweating Sickneſs, and is thought to have been the firſt time it appeared in the world.

In his ſecond year the cuſtom of the lord-mayor of London drinking to the Sheriffs was inſtituted by Sir Henry Collet, the then mayor, the manner of which was thus: Sir Henry took a cup of wine, and drank to John Percival his carver, who then waited at table, ſtanding bareheaded; the lord-mayor drinking to him and ſtiling him ſheriff of London for the enſuing year, ſo far made uſe of his privilege of election that way, as to deſire of Percival to put on his hat and ſit down at table: accordingly he ſat down, took on him the office of ſheriff, and was afterwards lord-mayor himſelf.

In his ninth year, on the twenty-eighth of April, Joan Boughton, a widow, was burnt in Smithfield, for hereſy and profeſſing Wickliff's opinions. This year wheat was ſold in London for four ſhillings a quarter; and Bourdeaux wine, or claret, for thirty ſhillings a hogſhead.

In the tenth year of his reign the body of one Alice Hackney, which had been buried one hundred and ſeventy-five years, ever ſince the beginning of the reign of Edward II. was accidentally dug up in the church of St. Mary Hill, London; the ſkin of the corpſe was whole, and the joints of the arms pliable.

In the ſeventeenth year of his reign, Sir John Shaw, then lord-mayor, firſt cauſed his brethren the aldermen to ride to the water-ſide, when he went to the Exchequer-bar to be ſworn: he was alſo the firſt that held the mayor's feaſt in Guildhall, which was before done at Mercers-hall, or Merchant-taylors-hall.

In the following year, on the eighteenth of January, the firſt ſtone of the chapel known by the name of Henry VII's chapel, was laid, within the monaſtery of Weſtminſter, by John Iſlip, the abbot; Sir Reginald Bray, knight of the Garter; Dr. Barnes, maſter of the Rolls; Sir Edward Stanhope and others aſſiſting at the ceremony. The charge of this building amounted to no more than fourteen thouſand pounds, if we may believe the lord Bacon.

In the ſame year the king gave the title of Merchant Taylors to the company of Taylors, of which he himſelf was a member, as ſeveral of his predeceſſors had been before him.

The colleges founded in this reign were, Chriſt's college and St. John's, in Cambridge, by Margaret, counteſs of Richmond, the king's mother; Jeſus college, in the ſame univerſity, by John Allcock, biſhop of Ely: Corpus Chriſti in Oxford, by Richard Fox, biſhop of Wincheſter; and Brazen Noſe college, by William Smith, biſhop of Lincoln.

It was likewiſe in the courſe of this reign that St. Paul's ſchool was founded by John Collet, dean of that cathedral.

SECTION II.

HENRY VIII.

FEW princes, perhaps, ever aſcended the throne of their anceſtors with greater eclat, or more diſtinguiſhed advantages, than did Henry VIII. f England, who, at the time of his acceſſion, was nly eighteen years of age. Amiable in his perſon nd addreſs, in the bloom of youth, bleſſed with uncommon talents, and poſſeſſed of immenſe treaſures, e ſaw himſelf at the head of a flouriſhing kingdom, here the arts and ſciences wanted only a liberal enefactor to promote their progreſs; and as the pubc tranquillity was ſecured by a long peace and powrful alliances, his people had already formed the oſt pleaſing expectations from his government. Nor this were they diſappointed; for no ſooner was he ated on the throne, than he ſhewed himſelf the reerſe of his father, by a liberality of temper that even ordered on profuſion, but at the ſame time, though ſome inſtances miſapplied, was fundamentally beficial to his ſubjects.

Young Henry, notwithſtanding his diſpoſition was oppoſite to that of his father, did not, however, ink proper to diſplace thoſe miniſters, who had rved with fidelity in the late reign. The members o formed his council were Warham, archbiſhop of nterbury, and chancellor; the earl of Shrewſbury, ward; lord Herbert, chamberlain; Sir Thomas ovel, maſter of the wards and conſtable of the ower; Sir Edward Poynings, comptroller; Sir enry Marney, afterwards lord Marney; Sir Thos Darcy, afterwards lord Darcy, Thomas Ruſſel ctor of laws, and Sir Henry Wyat.

The firſt important act of Henry's government was ually juſt and prudent, and tended to eſtabliſh his popularity in the hearts of his ſubjects. He iſſued a proclamation to encourage complaints againſt all who had made uſe of the royal authority to the prejudice of his ſubjects. The opportunity was embraced with avidity; the ſpies and informers, who had ſo long exerciſed an unbounded tyranny over the kingdom, now felt the weight of juſtice, and fell victims to the reſentment of the public. Empſon and Dudley, who had been ſo often loaded with execrations, were cited before the council, to anſwer for their conduct. But it was ſoon found, that however obnoxious they were rendered by their late conduct, they could not be condemned by the laws of their country. Empſon artfully obſerved, that the only crime of which both himſelf and Dudley were accuſed, conſiſted in their having enforced a ſtrict execution of the laws; that they had acted intirely in obedience to the king, to whom the execution of the laws was intruſted by the conſtitution; that it belonged not to them, who were merely inſtruments in the hands of the ſupreme power, what laws were recent or obſolete, expedient or hurtful, ſince they were all equally valid while they remained unrepealed by the legiſlature. The council perceived Empſon's arguments were unanſwerable, and therefore thought proper to commit thoſe obnoxious miniſters to the Tower, till a new accuſation could be formed againſt them. After ſome deliberation, it was determined to accuſe them of high-treaſon. It was ſaid, "That, conſcious of the popular odium incurred by their unjuſt proceedings, they had ſummoned their friends, while the late king lay on his death-bead, to conſult them on the meaſures neceſſary to be taken to ſecure them from the reſentment of the public." Theſe meaſures were conſtrued into a conſpiracy to ſeize the perſon of the new king, and to take up arms in defence of themſelves and their party. This ſtrange accuſation, however abſurd and improbable, was ſufficient to convict them of the crime laid to their charge, and they fell victims to the juſt reſentment of an injured people. They were kept in the Tower till the following year, when they were both beheaded on Tower-hill.

While the attention of the public was engaged in the perſecution of theſe wicked miniſters, the council were deliberating on a matter of much greater importance, namely, the king s conſummtaing his marriage with Catherine of Arragon, to whom he had been affianced during the life of his father. The biſhop of Wincheſter, a zealous prelate, and violently attached to the papal authority, ſtrongly ſupported the intereſt of the princeſs. Warham, archbiſhop of Canterbury, urged, that it was contrary to a poſitive command of the Deity himſelf, for a man to marry his brother's widow, and conſequently, that the pope's diſpenſation was invalid. Wincheſter, in oppoſition to this argument, urged the unlimited authority of Chriſt's vicar, and that the pope's diſpenſation was abundantly ſufficient. To this weak argument he added others of a much ſtronger tendency, founded on political motives. He repreſented the danger of forcing Ferdinand into an alliance with France, and of the two monarchs joining to reſent the affront offered to the king of Arragon in the perſon of his daughter, after ſhe had been ſo long affianced to Henry. He expatiated on the known virtue, modeſty, and noble diſpoſitions of the princeſs; her affection for the king, the large dowry ſhe brought, and the neceſſity of forming a cloſe alliance with Spain, in order to counterbalance the great power of France. Theſe conſiderations being weighed in the ſcale of political juſtice, determined the council, though contrary to the opinion of the primate, to adviſe Henry to complete the marriage. Accordingly, the nuptials were celebrated on the 7th day of June 1509; and they were crowned at Weſtminſter on the 24th of the ſame month.

Henry had hitherto proceeded with a ſtrict attention to the laws of juſtice and diſcretion, without diſcovering any of thoſe youthful extravagancies ſo dangerous in well regulated governments. He found himſelf maſter of more ready money, than perhaps all the reſt of the princes of Europe poſſeſſed, and his ſubjects ready to adore him; at the ſame time his mind was active, his paſſions were ſtrong, and his power almoſt unbounded. Theſe were circumſtances which gave the moſt terrible alarms to a council, compoſed of men, trained up under the late Henry, to auſterity, to gravity, to œconomy, and to a ſtrict conformity with the ſevereſt maxims of ſtate. It was in vain for them to attempt the taſk of diſguiſing Henry's ſituation from himſelf, by changing the nature of his ſtudies from books and diſputations, to men and politics. Henry refuſed all ſubmiſſion to their power. The more ſtrictly he had been confined under his late jealous father, the more he taſted the pleaſures of a court, and the ſweets of freedom. Warham, archbiſhop of Canterbury, aſſiſted by his piety, his wiſdom, his moderation, and candor, maintained the greateſt authority at the council; but he was a man of too much integrity to have any ſhare in the low intrigues practiſed by courtiers. The two perſons who moſtly contended for the king's favour, were Fox, biſhop of Wincheſter, ſecretary of ſtate, and lord privy ſeal, and Thomas earl of Surrey, treaſurer. The prelate, who had enjoyed great credit during the former reign, had acquired ſuch habits of caution and frugality as he could not eaſily lay aſide, and ſtill oppoſed by his remonſtrances, thoſe ſchemes of diſſipation and expence, which the youth and paſſions of Henry rendered agreeable to him. But Surry was a more artful courtier; and though few had borne a greater ſhare in the frugal politics of the late king, he knew how to conform himſelf to the humours of his maſter. None were ſo forward to promote that liberality, pleaſure and magnificence which now began to prevail in the court of the young monarch. He ingratiated himſelf by this dextrous conduct into the favour of Henry, he profited, as well as the other courtiers, by the laviſh diſpoſition of his maſter; and engaged him in ſuch a courſe of diſſipation and idleneſs, as ſoon rendered him entirely heedleſs of his own concerns, and willing to intruſt the adminiſtration of affairs entirely to the care of his miniſters. The immenſe treaſures amaſſed by the late king, were gradually diſſipated in the giddy expences of a thoughtleſs monarch. One party of pleaſure ſucceeded another: tilts, tournaments, and carouſals, were exhibited with all the magnificence of that age; and as the preſent tranquillity of the nation permitted the indulgence of every amuſement, buſineſs of a ſerious nature was very little attended to.

The biſhop of Wincheſter was ſo highly exaſperated at the conduct of the earl of Surry, that he determined to introduce ſome perſon to the king who might be a ſpy upon his actions. He pitched upon Dr. Thomas Wolſey, as a perſon well qualified to anſwer his purpoſe. Though this gentleman was of mean deſcent, yet he had been particularly diſtinguiſhed for his prudence, his talents and his learning. He had recommended himſelf by his addreſs to the late king, who had employed him with advantage in ſome difficult commiſſions. Wincheſter introduced him to Henry, and he was appointed almoner to his majeſty's houſhold. His inſinuating addreſs, his taſte for pleaſure, and his love of letters, ſo wrought on his royal maſter, that he ſoon obtained the moſt diſtinguiſhed favours, and at length became (as we ſhall ſee hereafter) little inferior in popularity to the king himſelf.

A. D. 1510. While the face of affairs in England wore the ſmiles of peace and feſtivity, that of the continent was deformed with alarms reſulting from the confederacy of different powers. A league had been formed at Cambray, between the pope, the emperor of Germany, and the kings of France and Spain, for ſtripping the republic of Venice of all her territories on the continent. This confederacy was planned by that warlike and impious pontiff Julius II. Forgetting the cares of religion, in order to encreaſe the power of the holy ſee, he ſcrupled not to involve Italy in all the horrors of war, and deluge, with chriſtan blood, the countries over which he preſided as vicar of the prince of peace.

The French ſoon reduced the Venetians to extremities, and recovered the territories claimed by the contracting princes. But the pope had no ſooner obtained poſſeſſion of the dominions he pretended to belong to the church, than he determined to break the league of Cambray, and reduce the power of Lewis, which he now conſidered as too formidable. In order to this, he endeavoured to excite the ſtates of Europe againſt the French monarch, and was particularly deſirous of engaging young Henry in his favour. He ſent that monarch a conſecrated golden roſe, a favour never beſtowed by the popes but on their moſt favourite princes. He entered into a treaty with the Swiſs cantons; and having thus formed ſo powerful a confederacy, he attacked the duke of Ferrari, an ally of France.

Lewis, who never imagined a deſign was formed for attacking his territories, made no preparations for repelling the attempts of the enemy; but determining not to abandon his ally, he ſent orders to Chamont his general, and governor of Milan, to ſupport the duke with all his forces. Chamont prepared immediately to obey the commands of his ſovereign, and hearing the pontiff was arrived at Boulogne, he reſolved to ſurprize him. He accordingly led his army towards the city, and had he not been amuſed with ſome of the pope's envoys, he would, in all probability, have put an end to all the projects of this enterpriſing pontiff; but inſtead of puſhing the ſiege with vigour, he liſtened to propoſals offered by Julius, which that artful churchman never intended to perform. This ſuſpenſion of hoſtilities furniſhed an opportunity for a body of Venetians to throw themſelves into the caſtle; and Chamont, being deſtitute of artillery ſufficient for taking the fortreſs, was obliged to abandon the enterpriſe.

A. D. 1511. Lewis, after trying every method he could project to bring about a treaty of peace with the imperious pontiff, at length determined to ſubdue him by force of arms, and to depoſe him in a council ſummoned to meet at Piſa. But no danger could intimidate the old pontiff: he laid ſiege to Mirandola in perſon; and though he was then ſeventy years of age, he mounted the trenches, viſited the works, encouraged the engineers, and entered the breach at the head of his forces. After a faint reſiſtance the enemy ſubmitted, and the pope made himſelf maſter of the place.

During theſe tranſactions Lewis was debating with his council, which met at Piſa, where a few cardinals, who were enemies to the pontiff, made their appearance. But this council proved an idle undertaking, while the papal war was carried on with great ſucceſs. Julius, without ſuſpending for a moment his military operations, fulminated anathemas againſt the biſhops and all the members that formed the council at Piſa.

A. D. 1512. The aſſiſtance of Henry was now ſtrongly ſolicited by both parties; but at length, by the inſtigation of Ferdinand king of Spain, uncle to Henry, he was induced to declare againſt France. The glory of ſerving the pope, and of conquering provinces, excited the ambition of the young monarch; and the parliament readily granted ſupplies for an enterprize that was agreeable to the people. Ferdinand, always attentive to his own intereſt, while he ſeemed to be acting for that of others, perſuaded Henry that it would be more for his advantage not to land his troops at Calais, but at Fonterabia, where he might eaſily make a conqueſt of Guienne, and where he promiſed to aſſiſt him with a Spaniſh army. But the real intention of Ferdinand was to turn this force to the acquiſition of the kingdom of Navarre. Julius had excommunicated John d'Albert, its preſent king, as an adherent to the council of Piſa; and the dominions of an excommunicated prince were an object worthy to excite the violence and rapacity of Ferdinand.

Henry, who ſuſpected not the deſigns of his uncle, agreed to the propoſal. The marquis of Dorſet was appointed general of the land forces, which were landed in the province of Guipuſcoa, about the middle of June. The Engliſh admiral, in his return, made ſeveral ſucceſsful deſcents on the coaſt of Britany, and being joined by a ſquadron of ſhips commanded by Sir Thomas Knivet, the depredations were continued with conſiderable advantages.

Alarmed at the attempts of the Engliſh, the French fleet of thirty-nine ſhips, was ordered to ſail from Breſt under the command of Primauget, an admiral of great courage and conduct. The two fleets ſoon after met, and a furious engagement enſued. At length Primauget's ſhip was ſet on fire, and determining not to periſh alone, he bore down upon the Engliſh admiral, and grappling with her, both ſhips ſoon became involved in the ſame inevitable deſtruction. This dreadful ſcene ſuſpended the action between the other ſhips; they were ſtruck with aſtoniſhment at ſo frightful a ſcene of horror and confuſion. After ſome time the French ſhip blew up, and the dreadful exploſion deſtroyed the Engliſh. This alarming cataſtrophe, in which above ſixteen hundred men periſhed, ſo affected both parties, that the engagement was not renewed; the French retired to Breſt, and the remaining part of the Engliſh continued cruizing in the Channel.

The Spaniſh forces, commanded by the duke of Alva, having joined the Engliſh, preparations were made for opening the campaign. But Dorſet, who little ſuſpected Ferdinand's intentions, was ſurprized to find, that inſtead of purſuing the conqueſt of Guienne, his army moved towards the frontiers of Navarre. The Engliſh general complained to Ferdinand, that inſtead of undertaking the ſiege of Bayonne, which would open a paſſage into Guienne, the forces had taken a different rout. Ferdinand replied, that as the king of Navarre was connected with France, he thought it would not be adviſeable to form the ſiege of Bayonne, till meaſures were taken for preventing that prince from cutting off their proviſions, by forming a camp between the ſea and the mountains of Navarre. Dorſet agreed to theſe propoſals, and an Engliſh officer was ſent to that prince to know his intentions. D'Albert declared that he would obſerve an exact neutrality, and give no obſtruction to the attempts of the Engliſh. Ferdinand pretended not to be ſatisfied with this anſwer, he inſiſted that the king of Navarre ſhould join the combined army, or deliver into his hands ſix of the moſt conſiderable places in his dominions, together with his eldeſt ſon as an hoſtage. The artful Spaniard well knew that theſe terms could not be complied with, and on the return of the meſſenger with intelligence that the propoſal was rejected, orders were ſent to the duke of Alva to invade Navarre, and reduce the whole kingdom to ſubjection. The Engliſh general now perceived the intereſts of his maſter were to be ſacrificed to the ambitious views of the Spaniard, and refuſed to aſſiſt in the reduction of Navarre. He retired to his camp at Fontarabia, reſolving there to wait for freſh orders from England. But even his inaction anſwered the views of Ferdinand. It kept the French army in awe; and by preventing Lewis from aſſiſting d'Albert, the kingdom of Navarre fell into the hands of Ferdinand. The ſeaſon was too far advanced, and the French had taken too many precautions in putting Bayonne in a proper poſture of defence, for Dorſet to think of making any progreſs in the reduction of Guienne: he returned to England without having had an opportunity of leading his forces againſt the enemy. Henry was highly diſpleaſed at the ill ſucceſs of the enterprize; and Dorſet found the utmoſt difficulty to convince him that the miſcarriage was entirely owing to the fraudulent deſigns of Ferdinand, who was now ſtiled in Spain, "the wiſe, the prudent;" in Italy, "the pious;" and in France and England, "the perfidious."

Though this war was attended only with diſgrace to the Engliſh arms, yet it ſerved greatly to weaken the ſtrength of France. Lewis was obliged to recall his troops for the defence of his own dominions, and by that means loſt all the conqueſts he might have otherwiſe obtained in Italy. The ambitious pontiff triumphed in the diſgrace of the French monarch; but he did not long enjoy his good fortune. He paid the debt of nature on the 21ſt of February, 1513, and was ſucceeded in the papal chair by John de Medici, under the appellation of Leo X. one of the greateſt princes that ever filled the pontifical ſeat. He was the patron of arts, and the friend of learning. Deſirous of attaching Henry firmly to his intereſt, he ſent him a veſſel loaded with hams and wine, the arrival of which filled the Engliſh with exultation, and excited their natural antipathy againſt France.

A. D. 1513. The Engliſh miniſtry now reſolved to raiſe a conſiderable army, in order to retrieve the martial glory of their country which had been ſo greatly injured in the late expedition in France. Hoſtilities were firſt commenced at ſea, but without any advantage to either of the contending princes. It was on the continent that the deciſive blows were intended to be ſtruck. The van of the army, conſiſting of eight thouſand men, was led by the earl of Shrewſbury, aſſiſted by the earl of Derby, the lords Fitzwalter, Haſtings, and Cobham, and Sir Rice ap Thomas, captain of the light horſe. This diviſion being landed at Calais, was ſoon followed by another body of ſix thouſand men, under the command of lord Herbert, chamberlain, attended by the earls of Northumberland and Kent, the lords Audley and Delawar, together with Carew, Curſon, and other gentlemen.

Henry now prepared to follow his forces; but before his departure, he cauſed the unfortunate earl of Suffolk, who was ſtill a priſoner in the Tower, to be beheaded. What reaſons induced him to commit this cruel action, is not abſolutely known. Some hiſtorians tell us, that it was in obedience to the dying commands of his father; while others think, that Henry, exaſperated at the conduct of his brother Edward de la Pole, who had accepted a command in the French ſervice, ſatiated his vengeance on the unhappy Suffolk.

About the middle of June Henry landed at Calais with the third diviſion of his army conſiſting of 12000 men. He was attended by the duke of Buckingham, and many others of the principal nobility. But he ſoon perceived the little reliance he ought to place on the promiſes of princes; for among all his allies, the Swiſs only performed the conditions of their engagements. The emperor Maximilian had promiſed to join them with a body of 8000 men; but though he had received from Henry 120,000 crowns for that purpoſe, he failed in his engagements. He made ſome atonement, however, to the Engliſh monarch, by joining him, in the Low Countries, with ſome German and Flemiſh ſoldiers, who were of great ſervice in giving an example of diſcipline to Henry's new-raiſed forces.

Before Henry landed at Calais, the earl of Shrewſbury and lord Herbert had formed the ſiege of Terrouenne, a town ſituated on the borders of Picardy. The garriſon, which conſiſted of not more than a thouſand men, commanded by Teligini and Crequi, made a noble defence. The town was, however, at laſt reduced to extremities, for want of ammunition and proviſions; and Lewis determined, if poſſible, to ſend a ſupply. Eight hundred cavalry were choſen for making this dangerous attempt, each of whom carried behind him a ſack of gun-powder and two quarters of bacon. Thus equipped, and headed by Fontrailles, they made a ſudden irruption into the Engliſh camp, ſurmounted all reſiſtance, and advanced to the foſſe of the town, where each horſeman threw down his burden. Then returning on a gallop, they again forced themſelves a paſſage with very little loſs.

Henry was determined to ſeek revenge for this inſult; and being informed that a large body of French horſe was approaching, he ordered ſome troops to paſs the Lis, and give them battle. The conteſt was ſoon decided. The French cavalry, though conſiſting chiefly of gentlemen who had behaved with the greateſt intrepidity in many deſperate encounters, were ſeized with ſuch an unaccountable panic, that they immediately betook themſelves to flight, and were purſued by the Engliſh. The duke of Longueville, Buſſi d'Amboiſe, Clermont, Imbercourt, the chevalier Bayard, and ſeveral other perſons of diſtinction, were taken priſoners in endeavouring to rally their forces. This action is ſometimes called the battle of Guienegaſte, but more frequently the "Battle of the Spurs;" becauſe the French that day made more uſe of their ſpurs than their ſwords.

Elated at this ſucceſs, Henry determined to inveſt Tournay, a place always incorporated with France, and the cradle of the French monarchy. The city was incapable of making any long defence, the garriſon being almoſt deſtitute of military ſtores and proviſions. Accordingly the place was hardly inveſted before the garriſon offered to capitulate. The terms were accepted, and Henry entered the city in triumph: Sir Edward Poynings was appointed governor, and the biſhop's ſee being then vacant, Henry conferred it on his favourite Wolſey, who immediately took poſſeſſion of the revenues, which were very conſiderable.

The ſeaſon not permitting of any further expedition, Henry embarked for England, whither he arrived about the middle of October, and was received in London amidſt the univerſal acclamations of his ſubjects.

While Henry was employed in reducing the towns of France, James IV. of Scotland, who had declared for Lewis, was ravaging the northern parts of Northumberland, at the head of 50,000 men; and made himſelf maſter of the caſtles of Norham, Etal, Werk, Ford, and other fortreſſes of leſs importance.

The earl of Surry, who commanded the Engliſh forces, marched into the northern counties to ſtop the ravages of the invaders. His army conſiſted of about 26,000 men, 5000 of which had been ſent over from the army in France. The Scots were encamped on the high grounds near Chiviot hills, in a very advantageous ſituation. The river Till ran in their front; nor could their camp be approached but by one narrow paſs, which was ſo ſtrongly defended as to render the attempt totally impracticable.

The earl of Surry, perceiving that it would be madneſs to attack the enemy in their preſent ſituation, diſpatched an herald to the Scottiſh monarch, offering to meet him in the plain of Milfield, appointing a day for the combat, and inviting him to try the valour of his forces on equal ground. But the anſwer he received was far from being ſatisfactory, and he determined to have recourſe to a ſtratagem, in order, if poſſible, to draw the Scots from their advantageous ſituation.

Accordingly, the next day, he made a feint of marching towards Berwick, in order to retaliate the ravages of the enemy, and cut off their proviſions. This motion occaſioned a council of war to be ſummoned in the Scottiſh camp, where an old nobleman, who had learned prudence from experience, adviſed James to return immediately to Scotland with his booty. The Scotch monarch, however, paid no attention to this prudent advice; but, on the contrary, determined to give battle to the Engliſh the firſt favourable opportunity. The army was accordingly put in motion, the huts in which the ſoldiers had been quartered were ſet on fire, and the Scots deſcended in diſorder from the hills. Surry obſerved the precipitate decampment of the Scottiſh army, and the ſmoke of the huts concealing his motions from the enemy, he paſſed the Till with his van-guard and train of artillery at the bridge of Twiſel, while the reſt of his army croſſed the ſtream at a ford in another part of the river.

James finding, by the motions of Surry, that a battle was inevitable, immediately drew up his army in three diviſions. The right was commanded by the earl of Huntley, aſſiſted by lord Hume; the left by the earl of Lenox and Argyle; and the center by the king in perſon: a fourth body under the earl of Bothwell, formed a corps de reſerve. The Engliſh army was divided into two lines: the main body of the firſt was led by lord Howard; the right wing by Sir Edmund Howard; and the left by Sir Marmaduke Conſtable. The main body of the ſecond line was commanded by the earl of Surry himſelf; the right wing by lord Dacres, and the left by Sir Edward Stanley.

In this poſition the armies approached each other, and met in Floudon field. The battle was begun by the earl of Huntley, who charged with ſuch fury, that he broke the left wing of the Engliſh, and drove them off the field. But the ſame ſucceſs did not attend the other commanders: they could not ſupport the ſhock of the Engliſh; and Huntley at his return found the Scottiſh army in great diſorder. Elated with the ſucceſs of the wing commanded by Huntley, the diviſion under Lenox and Argyle, had broke their ranks, and notwithſtanding the remonſtrances of La Motte, the French ambaſſador, had ruſhed headlong on the enemy, imagining themſelves ſure of victory. But they ſoon found their miſtake. Sir Edward Stanley's diviſion ſtood firm; while Dacres, who commanded in the ſecond line, wheeling about during the action, attacked them ſo furiouſly in he rear, that they could not ſuſtain the ſhock; the geater part of them were cut to peices, and the reſt eſcaped by a diſorderly flight. This misfortune did not, however, intimidate the diviſions under the king nd Bothwell. Animated by the valour of their eaders, they ſtill made head againſt the Engliſh; nd forming themſelves into a circie continued the ngagement till night put an end to the ſlaughter. The ſlain on both ſides appeared nearly equal, being bout five thouſand men: but the morning ſoon diſovered that there was a material diſparity. The Engliſh had loſt very few officers, while the whole ower of the Scottiſh nobility were ſlain. The king imſelf was miſſing; but whether he fell by the ſword f the Engliſh, or by the poniard of an aſſaſſin, is not nown. A body ſuppoſed to be that of the Scottiſh onarch, was found among the dead, and conveyed o London in a leaden coffin, where it remained ome time unburied, as James lay under the ſentence f excommunication, on account of his confederacy ith France, and oppoſition to the Holy See. Henry owever, obtained his abſolution from the pontiff, nd the body was accordingly interred.

James had made a will before he took the field, by hich, on his demiſe, his queen, Margaret was ade regent during the minority of his eldeſt ſon, ho was but two years old at the time of his father's eath. He was immediately acknowledged king, by e name of James V. and the queen-mother, who as ſiſter to Henry, intreating that monarch not to urſue the war during her regency, he readily comied with her requeſt, ordered the earl of Surry to ithdraw his forces, and concluded a peace with cotland.

A. D. 1514. A parliament being called in Januy, the king made ſeveral conſiderable promotions nong his nobility. He created the earl of Surry uke of Norfolk; Charles Brandon duke of Suffolk; harles Somerſet, lord Monteagle. Margaret of ork, daughter to the duke of Clarence, obtained e title of counteſs of Saliſbury, as heireſs to her other the earl of Warwick, who was beheaded by nry VII. and Wolſey, who was both the favourite and miniſter of Henry, was promoted to the biſhoprick of Lincoln.

The great ſucceſs Henry had obtained over his enemies made Lewis deſirous of ſheathing the ſword of deſtruction by an honourable peace, and thereby reſtore peace and tranquillity to his kingdom. In order to effect this he appeaſed pope Leo X. by renouncing the council of Piſa, which had been tranſferred to Lyons; and the pontiff, in return, took off the excommunication that had been denounced againſt him and his kingdom.

Henry was far from being averſe to a peace; the perfidious conduct of his allies had convinced him that they were more intent on promoting their own intereſts, than in fulfilling their promiſes. A negotiation was therefore opened between the two princes, and a peace ſoon after concluded on the following conditions: That Tournay ſhould remain in the hands of the Engliſh; that Henry ſhould receive a million of crowns, being the arrears due by treaty to his father and himſelf; and that Lewis ſhould marry the princeſs Mary, Henry's ſiſter, who ſhould bring four hundred thouſand crowns, as her portion, and enjoy as large a jointure as even the former queen of France, who was heireſs of Britany. It was alſo ſtipulated, that the two princes ſhould mutually aſſiſt each other with troops in caſe either of them ſhould be attacked by an enemy. The princeſs Mary, one of the moſt beautiful and accompliſhed woman of the age, was then in her twentieth year and Lewis in his fifty-ſixth. He met her at Abbeville, where the nuptials were celebrated with the utmoſt magnificence: but his paſſion for this amiable princeſs coſt him his life. His conſtitution was too much impaired to withſtand the exceſſes of pleaſure into which he plunged. He died in leſs than three months after his marriage, and left his people to bewail his loſs with the tears of affection. He was ſincerely beloved by his ſubjects, and deſervedly acquired the honourable appellation of "Father of his country."

Lewis was ſucceeded by Francis I. a young prince of the moſt diſtinguiſhed talents, who immediately renewed the treaty with Henry. The young dowager Mary, three months after the death of her huſband, was married to Charles Brandon, duke of Suffolk. This ſhe did without the conſent of her brother, who, when he heard of it, for ſome time expreſſed great diſapprobation, but was at length reconciled, and re-admitted them into his favour.

A. D. 1515. In the beginning of this year the ſee of York becoming vacant by the death of its late poſſeſſor, Henry beſtowed it on his favourite Wolſey, who now in fact governed the kingdom, though he affected only to follow the inclinations of Henry. He ſeemed to be only the companion of his maſter's pleaſures, but held in reality the reins of government. Preferments were heaped upon him with unbounded profuſion. He was not only archbiſhop of York, but alſo biſhop of Durham and Lincoln, and farmed, on very eaſy terms, the biſhoprics of Bath, Worceſter, and Hereford, which were enjoyed by Italians who reſided abroad. He ſoon after obtained a cardinal's hat, which augmented at once his pride and oſtentation. His houſhould was compoſed of eight hundred perſons, among whom were ſeveral of the nobility. He was the firſt clergyman who wore ſilk and gold. But ſtill his ambition was not ſatisfied; he wanted the great ſeal of England, then in the hands of Warham, archbiſhop of Canterbury. The primate was a perſon of great prudence and conduct; he had never engaged in any court intrigues; nor even gave offence to any party. Wolſey therefore did not attempt to deprive him of his poſt of chancellor, which perhaps he could not have effected, but took every opportunity of mortiſying him, in order to provoke him to reſign.

Warham remonſtrated with Wolſey on his conduct, but without effect; and being of a peaceable diſpoſition, he choſe rather to retire to his ſee, and employ himſelf wholly to the duties of his office, than remain at court, where he was every day affronted. Accordingly he reſigned the great ſeal into the hands of Henry, who, two days after, committed it to the cuſtody of Wolſey. Fox, biſhop of Wincheſter, who had ſo long directed the affairs of government, and even introduced Wolſey to the king's favour, could not bear to find himſelf neglected. He accordingly obtained leave to retire to his biſhopric, and at leaving the council-board he told the king, that "he hoped he would not ſuffer the ſervant to be greater than the maſter." "Fear not, my good lord biſhop," replied Henry, "it ſhall be my care that ſubjects ſhall obey, and not command."

A. D. 1516. During this year ſeveral commotions happened among the princes on the continent; but they were not productive of any thing remarkable, except a compleat victory obtained by the French monarch over the Milaneſe, which put an end to the diſpute, and a treaty of peace was concluded between the contending parties.

A. D. 1518. This year is remarkable for giving riſe to thoſe religious diſputes which afterwards produced the reformation. Martin Luther, an Auguſtin friar, and profeſſor of divinity at Wirtemberg in Germany, ſtimulated to revenge by the conduct of the pope, exclaimed loudly againſt the church of Rome. He was a perſon of great learning, genius and ſpirit, inflexible and opiniative; and there was no want of abuſes whereon to found his invectives. A prodigious number of vain and ſuperſtitious ceremonies had been introduced into the exerciſe of religion: divinity was corrupted with ſubtilties: the clergy were given up to indolence and pleaſure; and the court of Rome had been guilty of numberleſs frauds and uſurpations. Religion, often proſtituted, had become a cloak for the moſt ſordid rapacity, and the moſt unpardonable ambition. An inceſſant cry of reformation reſounded from all quarters, and Luther knew how to take advantage of it. He, however, confined himſelf, in his firſt writings, to expoſe the doctrine of indulgences, and, perhaps, had then no other deſign. But he went farther than he at firſt intended, as is the caſe in diſputes, and in almoſt all tranſactions. He exhorted all princes to throw off the papal yoke, and railed bitterly againſt private maſſes. His writings, full of zeal and fury, ſpread over Europe; and were the more attended to, as he ſupported his opinions from ſcripture and other antient writings of the chriſtian church. The doctrines he inculcated were flattering to the princes of Europe, becauſe they furniſhed them with a pretence for throwing off the pope's authority, and for enriching themſelves with the wealth of eccleſiaſtics.

The dominions in Germany, ſupported by the pope's nuncios, cauſed Luther's books to be publickly burnt. The pontiff thundered out a new bull againſt him; but Luther, now protected by the princes of Germany, was not to be intimidated; and he ordered the pope's bull and the decretals to be burnt in the public market-place of Wirtemberg.

While theſe religious diſputes prevailed with great violence in Germany, the Engliſh were cultivating with avidity the bleſſings of peace. The arts found encouragement; trade was improved; manufactures were carried on with ſucceſs. Cardinal Wolſey made the nobleſt uſe of his power; he exerted it for the good of his country. His poſt of chancellor placed him at the fountain of juſtice, and never was it better adminiſtered. He was particularly careful to puniſh perjury, the worſt of crimes: he was a firm ſupporter of the poor, and enforced ſeveral excellent laws for the protection of the mercantile and induſtrious part of the people. We have already obſerved, that he was a great friend to literature. At this time the Engliſh had very little learning, and were wholly deſtitute of taſte. Wolſey ſaw this, and laboured aſſiduouſly to improve the one, and introduce the other. He ſpared no pains to diſcover perſons of literary accompliſhments, nor thought any reward too great to beſtow upon them. He employed no miniſters but ſuch as were ſcholars; and under his adminiſtration the dignified offices of the law, the church, and the ſtate, were filled with men whoſe literary merit was their only recommendation. He alſo founded lectures at Oxford for the improvement of learning; and Henry very readily gave his countenance to the noble and patriotic views of his favourite.

A. D. 1519. Wolſey's attention to the purſuit of literature was greatly interrupted in the beginning of this year by the death of the emperor Maximilian. Francis I. of France, and Charles V. of Spain, declared themſelves candidates for the imperial throne. Theſe competitors were worthy of each other: the former was diſtinguiſhed by his candour, his generoſity and his valour; the latter by his prudence, his diſcretion and his policy. Henry, by the advice of Wolſey, uſed all his intereſt to ſupport the election of Charles, who was grandſon to the deceaſed emperor; and by his aſſiſtance he was choſen by a majority of only one voice.

A. D. 1520. Though the French monarch could not but be diſpleaſed at the interpoſition of Henry in favour of Charles, yet he was deſirous of gaining his friendſhip and confidence; and in order to effect this he ſolicited an interview with him near Calais. Wolſey, fond of diſplaying his riches, magnificence and power, ſeconded the requeſt of the monarch; and Henry, who was equally fond of pomp and honour, conſented to the propoſal. Charles was alarmed at this intended interview, and determined, if poſſible, to prevent its conſequences: but he well knew, that unleſs he could gain Wolſey over to his intereſt, all his attempts to procure the favour of Henry would be in vain. The cardinal now directed all the affairs of government; he had no competitor in the cabinet. Nor was his pomp leſs remarkable than his power: he celebrated maſs with all the ſtate and magnificence of the Roman pontiff: he was ſerved by biſhops; and even earls and dukes preſented him with the water and the towel. His dreſs was ſuperbly magnificent: he wore regal veſtments; his ſhoes were of ſilver gilt, ſet with pearls and precious ſtones. When he went abroad, two large croſſes of maſſy ſilver, the legatine and that of York, were carried before him by two tall prieſts; together with two pole-axes, two pillars of maſſy ſilver, golden cuſhions, and a train of ſtately horſes. Nor was he content with the great power, wealth, and authority he enjoyed in England, while there was one degree of eccleſiaſtical dignity to which he had not attained. He already began to concert meaſures for obtaining the papal throne. He eſtabliſhed a legatine court, whoſe arbitrary authority reſembled that of the inquiſition. Though remarkable himſelf for the licentiouſneſs of his manners, he became a rigid reformer of the actions of the laity; and what is, perhaps, ſtill more ſingular, he joined with him, as a judge in that court, a man whom he himſelf, as chancellor, had condemned for perjury. The whole kingdom dreaded his power; and his vanity roſe to ſuch a height, that he conſidered even the archbiſhop of Canterbury as far beneath him. That prela having wrote a letter to him, in which he ſubſcribed himſelf, "Your loving brother," Wolſey complained of his preſumption. The primate, when informed of the offence he had given, ſaid coolly, "Know ye not that this man is intoxicated with proſperity?" But deſpotic exertions, when applied againſt the liberty of men's lives and manners, are particularly offenſive. The complaints of the people at laſt reached the ears of the ſovereign: he diſcovered his diſſatisfaction, and Wolſey ſet bounds to his authority: the deciſions of his court were made with more care and leſs oppreſſion to the parties.

While Henry was at Canterbury, in his way to France, Charles landed at Dover; intimation of which being given to the king, he immediately diſpatched Wolſey to compliment him on his arrival. The next day Henry met Charles in perſon, and conducted him to Canterbury, where he was entertained with the utmoſt pomp and ſplendor.

Charles paid his court to Wolſey in the moſt artful manner; and promiſed him his aſſiſtance in procuring the papacy whenever there ſhould happen a vacancy in the pontifical throne. There was, however, little appearance of this promiſe being claimed. Leo X. was a young man, and likely to fill the chair of St. Peter, when Wolſey was no more. It ſoothed, however, the ambition of that powerful prelate, who, in conſequence, devoted himſelf to Charles's intereſt.

As ſoon as Charles took leave of Henry, the latter immediately went over to Calais, with his queen and the whole court. Francis, attended in the ſame manner, came to Ardres, a ſmall town a few miles diſtant from Calais. The interviews were at firſt carried on with remarkable precaution; the number of guards on each ſide were carefully counted, and every ſtep was ſcrupulouſly meaſured and adjuſted. Francis, whoſe ſoul was above diſtruſt, determined to break through ſuch idle ceremonies: he viſited the Engliſh monarch without guards or attendants; and Henry, diſdaining to be excelled in ſo noble an inſtance of confidence, followed the example. From that moment they viſited each other without the leaſt ceremony; a generous diſdain of ſuſpicion ſupplied the uſe of precaution. They paſſed their time in feaſts and tournaments, where they reſpectively diſtinguiſhed themſelves by their dexterity and addreſs in thoſe martial diverſions.

Notwithſtanding Charles received daily information from the cardinal of what paſſed at this interview, yet he was very uneaſy with reſpect to the event. He therefore came to Gravelines, which Henry was no ſooner informed of than he immediately took his leave of Francis, and went to pay him a viſit, when the moſt cordial aſſurances of friendſhip and eſteem paſſed between the two monarchs. After ſtaying three days at Gravelines, Henry embarked for England, and Charles proceeded to Aix-la-Chapelle, where he was crowned emperor with great ſolemnity on the 23d of October.

A. D. 1521. The face of affairs in the beginning of this year ſeemed to threaten all Europe with a atal war. The violent perſonal emulation and poliical jealouſy which ſubſiſted between the new emperor nd the French king ſoon broke forth into action. heſe two princes invaded the dominions of each other ith numerous armies; and, after having gratified eir ambition by ſome petty conqueſts, and glutted eir revenge by committing the moſt dreadful ra-ges and devaſtations, they preferred their comaints to the king of England, as the moſt proper erſon to decide the difference between them.

In conſequence of this, conferences were opened Calais, and Wolſey was appointed to officiate as ediator between the contending monarchs. Charles, o depended on the favour of Wolſey, demanded poſſeſſion of Burgundy, and required to be free from the homage which his anceſtors had paid for Flanders and Artois. The emperor well knew that theſe propoſals would be rejected; he made them with that intention, and, it is ſaid, with the approbation of Wolſey. But however that may be, the conferences were broke off, and the cardinal himſelf ſoon after made a journey to Bruges, where he was received by the emperor with the ſame ſtate, magnificence and reſpect, as if he had been the king of England himſelf. And he concluded, in the name of his maſter, an offenſive alliance with the pope and the emperor againſt France.

Thus ended this ſecret negotiation (for it can be called no other) between Wolſey and Charles; and thus was Henry wrought upon to declare himſelf the enemy of Francis without the leaſt provocation, and contrary to all the rules of ſound policy, conſidering the increaſing power of the emperor, which it was his intereſt to balance.

Wolſey, having ſettled matters on ſuch a footing as he thought moſt for his own intereſt, returned to England about the latter end of the year; ſoon after which he meditated the deſtruction of the duke of Buckingham. He had long borne that nobleman a grudge, on account of his having not only made free with his character in public converſation, but having offered him ſome perſonal affronts: in particular, it is ſaid, that the duke one day holding the baſon to the king, ſoon after his return from France, the cardinal, when the king had waſhed, dipped his hands in the ſame water, upon which the duke, enraged at his inſolence, threw the water into his ſhoes: the cardinal, fired with indignation, told him, in a threatening tone, that he would ſit upon his ſkirts: the duke, in order to expoſe the cardinal's malice to the king, came the next day to court richly dreſſed, but without any ſkirts to his coat: the king aſking him what he meant by appearing in that faſhion? he repeated the cardinal's threats, with the occaſion of them, adding, that he thus equipped himſelf to baulk the cardinal of his intention, for that now he could not ſit upon his ſkirts.

This jeſt, however, proved fatal to the duke, for from that inſtant Wolſey vowed his deſtruction. He began to effect his intended purpoſe by depriving the duke of his two beſt friends, namely, the earl of Northumberland his father-in-law, and the earl of Surry his ſon-in-law; the former of whom he cauſed to be put under arreſt on account of ſome matter in law concerning a wardſhip; and the latter he ſent into an honourable baniſhment by making him lord-lieutenant of Ireland. The duke being thus alone, the cardinal gained over one Knevet, a retainer of the duke's, but who, upon being diſcharged his ſervice for ſome miſdemeanor, was now his mortal enemy. This fellow accuſed his maſter of ſaying in private company, that, ſhould the king die without iſſue, he would lay claim to the crown, as the deſcendant of Anne of Glouceſter, grand-daughter of Edward III. and that, ſhould he ever aſcend the throne, he would puniſh Wolſey in the moſt exemplary manner. He alſo ſaid, that the duke correſponded with one Hopkins, a monk in the priory of Hinton, who pretended to the gift of prophecy, and flattered the duke with aſſurances of his ſucceeding to the crown of England.

Wolſey now thought he had got ſufficient matter for an accuſation, which he ſo aggravated to the king, that orders were inſtantly iſſued for apprehending the duke, who, on the 15th of April, was committed to the Tower. A ſhort time after he was tried by his peers in Weſtminſter-hall, and found guilty of the crimes laid to his charge. He made a long and vigorous defence; but his fate was determined, and he was condemned to death. Great intereſt was made to ſave him, but without effect; for, on Friday the 17th of May, he was beheaded on Tower-hill. His death was greatly lamented by the people, who imputed it wholly to the implacable reſentment of the cardinal.

The religious diſputes in Germany ſtill continued, and ſeveral of the princes had already declared in favour of Luther's reformation. England alſo, where there were ſtill a great many Lollards, who inculcated nearly the ſame tenets, would have followed the German princes, had not the government firmly oppoſed the doctrines of the Wirtemberg profeſſor. Capricious fate, which ſports with the affairs of the world, ſo ordered it, that Henry himſelf ſhould be engaged in this diſpute. He had been ſtrictly educated in an attachment to the court of Rome, and had contracted an averſion to Luther, becauſe he had ſpoken diſreſpectfully of Thomas Aquinas, his favourite author. Vanity and reſentment, more than zeal for religion, induced Henry to become an author, and to combat the doctrines of the German monk. The book was ſoon finiſhed and ſent to Rome, where it was received with rapture by the pope, who beſtowed the title of "Defender of the Faith" upon Henry and his ſucceſſors.

Luther, who made no difference between noble and ignoble writers, ſoon wrote an anſwer to Henry, and treated him with all the acrimony of ſtile, to which, in the courſe of his diſpute, he had been ſo long accuſtomed. The controverſy now became more illuſtrious by Henry's entering the liſts; it engaged ſtill more the attention of mankind; and the Lutheran party acquired daily new converts in every part of Europe. It became a matter of competition to inſult, with moſt indecency, the pope and the church. They called the pontiff antichriſt, denominated his communion the ſcarlet whore, and gave to Rome the appellation of Babylon; expreſſions, which, however applied, were to be found in the ſcriptures, and therefore better calculated to act on the ignorant multitude than the moſt ſolid arguments.

On the firſt of December this year died pope Leo X. in the 46th year of his age, and the ninth of his pontificate. He was a prince well qualified by his ſound judgment, moderation and temper, to have retarded the progreſs of the reformation, which now made its way with haſty ſtrides. He was ſucceeded in the papal throne by Adrian VI. who had been tutor to Charles, the preſent emperor. This pontiff was a perſon of great integrity, candour, and ſimplicity of manners; but the prejudices of the reformers were ſo violent againſt the church, that he rather hurt the cauſe by his imprudent exerciſe of thoſe virtues.

A. D. 1522. Wolſey had entertained great hopes of being at this time choſen pontiff; and had actually, at different ſcrutinies, nine, twelve, and nineteen voices. However, though he loſt his election, yet the advanced age, and numerous infirmities of Adrian, ſtill gave him hopes that he ſhould ſoon be able to ſatisfy his ambition. The emperor never intended to place Wolſey in St. Peter's chair. He was deſirous of having a pope who would be wholly at his devotion; and he was too well acquainted with the imperious temper of the cardinal to think he would ever be ſubmiſſive to the will of any perſon whatever. But in order to diſſipate the chagrin of that haughty miniſter, he paid a new viſit to the court of England; where, beſides flattering the vanity of the king and cardinal, he repeated to Wolſey all the promiſes he had formerly made him of ſeconding his pretenſions to the papal throne. The inſinuating addreſs of Charles produced the deſired effect: Wolſey concealed his reſentment, the late treaty was renewed, and it was determined in the Engliſh council to declare war againſt France.

Accordingly, Clarencieux, king at arms, was ſent to the French court, with a declaration, that his maſter looked upon Francis as the firſt aggreſſor, and therefore found himſelf under a neceſſity of taking part with the emperor. The bloody ſtandard of war was now diſplayed; the ambaſſadors on both ſides were recalled; the effects of the merchants were ſeized in both countries; and Henry fitted out a ſtrong fleet for making prizes of the enemy's ſhips, and protecting the Engliſh commerce. The command of this fleet was given to the earl of Surry, who was now made lord high admiral of England; and the emperor alſo created him high admiral of his dominions.

A. D. 1523. About the middle of June Henry ſent over a conſiderable army to Calais, under the command of the duke of Suffolk, who, on his arrival at St. Omer's, was joined by 3000 foot and 500 horſe in the imperial ſervice. It was now determined to march along the banks of the Somme, and, if poſſible, to provoke the enemy to a deciſive engagement: but the French had learned prudence from paſt misfortunes; they contented themſelves with haraſſing the van of the Engliſh army with flying parties; and depended on the ſtrength of their frontier garriſons, and the advanced ſeaſon of the year, to prevent the Engliſh from taking up their winter quarters in their country.

In this they were not deceived: for though the duke of Suffolk made himſelf maſter of Bray, Montdidier, Roye, and ſeveral other conſiderable places, and even advanced within eleven leagues of Paris, yet he found it would be impoſſible for him to canton his troops in the places he had conquered, as the duke of Vendome lay in Paris with a large body of troops, and the marſhal Tremouille was forming another army by draughts from the garriſons of Picardy. He was therefore obliged to return to Calais, in order to put his army into winter quarters; but before he reached that fortreſs, many of his ſoldiers periſhed by the inclemency of the weather. In conſequence of this retreat, moſt of the places he had taken during the campaign fell again into the hands of the French. Nor had Charles any better ſucceſs in the attempt he made, at the ſame time, upon Gaſcony. His forces inveſted Bayonne; but the French general, Leutrec, made ſuch a noble defence, that Charle's troops, after ravaging the adjacent country, were obliged to abandon the enterprize.

The French were ſo animated at theſe miſcarriages, that they exerted themſelves with all their might againſt the powerful alliance that was formed againſt their country; and, in all probability, Francis would have been able to have ſupported himſelf againſt all the efforts of his enemies, had not the conſtable of Bourbon, the moſt able of all his generals, perſecuted by the hatred of the ducheſs of Angouleme, the king's mother, ſacrificed to his reſentment his duty and the love of his country, and entered into the ſervice of Charles V. He was immediately created generaliſſimo of the emperor's armies, and marched into the duchy of Milan, which the French had again invaded under admiral Bonnivet, his greateſt enemy. A general thoroughly acquainted with the French troops, their ſtrength and weakneſs, muſt have been of conſiderable advantage to Charles: but there were other circumſtances ſtill more in his favour. Moſt of the princes of Italy were in his intereſt. The people hated the French government; and he was aſſiſted by ſome of the moſt able and diſtinguiſhed generals in Europe.

Bonnivet croſſed the Alps at the head of thirty-three thouſand men, and made himſelf maſter of Novaro, and ſome other places of leſs importance in Italy; and had he marched directly to Milan, he might, perhaps, have recovered that city for his maſter; but he loſt ſo much time in treating with the inhabitants, that the conſtable of Bourbon had an opportunity of putting the place into a poſture of defence. The reſt of the campaign was ſpent in ſeveral fruitleſs attempts upon Cremona, and other places, none of which he was able to reduce. The Italian generals ſaw his inabilities, and took care to cut off his proviſions; ſo that Bonnivet was obliged to retire into Piedmont, where he put his army into winter quarters.

While theſe things were tranſacting, pope Adrian VI. paid the debt of nature; and Clement VII. of the Medicean family, was elected in his place, by the intereſt of the imperial party. Wolſey was now convinced of the inſincerity of the emperor; and juſtly concluded, that he muſt never hope to mount the papal throne by his intereſt. He, however, diſſembled his reſentment, congratulated the new pope on his election, and applied for a continuation of the legatine powers he had enjoyed under the two laſt pontiffs. Clement well knew the neceſſity of maintaining the friendſhip of this imperious miniſter, and not only granted his requeſt, but ſent him a commiſſion for life; a very unuſual conceſſion, and by which Wolſey obtained the whole papal authority in England. He, however, made a noble uſe of this extenſive power. He erected two colleges, one at Oxford, and another at Ipſwich. He invited learned men from every part of Europe, to fill the chairs of theſe colleges: and, in order to beſtow endowments on them, he ſuppreſſed ſome of the leſſer monaſteries, and diſtributed the monks into other convents. Theſe proceedings were countenanced at Rome, there being now an immediate neceſſity for learned men to defend the church againſt the forcible attacks of the reformers.

A. D. 1524. Francis, who had been hitherto ſucceſsful in Italy, imprudently ſent off a large detachment from his army, under the command of the duke of Albany, towards Naples; while Pavia, which he had ſome time inveſted, being well provided for defence, the imperial generals flattered themſelves with having, from this circumſtance, an opportunity of attacking the French at a very conſiderable advantage. The arrival of the duke of Bourbon, with a numerous army, determined them to raiſe the ſiege; and they attacked the French with ſuch courage, reſolution and conduct, that the troops of Francis were entirely routed, and himſelf taken priſoner, after having eminently diſtinguiſhed his perſonal valour. He was immediately carried to the ſtrong caſtle of izzighitone, where he remained for ſome time under the care of Alvazon, the Spaniſh governor, who treated him with the greateſt reſpect.

A. D. 1525. The captivity of the French monarch produced a ſudden change in the politics of England. As he was reduced to the very brink of ruin, and the emperor become ſo formidable as to threaten the general liberties of Europe, Henry determined to abandon the cauſe of the latter, and eſpouſe the intereſt of the former.

Thus prompted by his own inclination, and the advice of the cardinal, who was deſirous of revenging on Charles the ill offices he had done him in the affair of the papacy, he imparted his ſentiments to the ducheſs-regent of France, (mother to the captive monarch) who ſending her ambaſſadors to the court of London, a treaty of peace and alliance was mutually ſigned by the two parties on the 30th of Auguſt.

The natural conſequence of this alliance was, a war with the emperor; but as the treaſury was almoſt exhauſted, Henry committed the care of recruiting to Wolſey, who, inſtead of calling a parliament, where he expected a repulſe, iſſued a decree in the king's name, for levying through the whole kingdom, one ſixth of all the lay revenues, and one fourth of thoſe belonging to the clergy. This tax was conſidered as ſuch a violent encroachment on the liberty of the ſubject, and ſuch a flagrant violation of Magna Charta, that it produced a dreadful clamour in every part of the nation, and it was feared a rebellion would be the conſequence. Henry, when informed of this alarming ferment, diſowned the meaſure, declaring, "That no neceſſities of the crown ſhould make him attempt the raiſing of money any other way than by the people's conſent in parliament."

The cardinal, diſappointed in this attempt, had recourſe to the old method of benevolences, which he imagined would appear leſs odious to the people. But he was deceived; it occaſioned very lound complaints and remonſtrances. The more illegal the impoſts he levied, the more the ſufferers were enraged. They regarded them not as neceſſary ſupplies for the ſtate, but as violent and tyrannical exactions. A lawyer having obſerved, that all benevolences had been aboliſhed by act of parliament in the reign of Richard III. it was anſwered, that Richard was an uſurper, that his parliaments were factious aſſemblies; and that his ſtatutes were of no force againſt a legal king. The judges who were conſulted on this occaſion, went ſo far as to affirm, that the king could by commiſſion, exact whatever ſums he pleaſed. This deſpotic maxim was not, however, admitted by the people; they had recourſe to arms; and Henry had no better method of ſuppreſſing the inſurgents, than by granting them a general pardon.

Henry ſeems to have been hitherto unacquainted with the meaſures of the cardinal, and to have imagined that the people were happy and contented under his adminiſtration; but the clamours and frequent inſurrections which had happened in conſequence of the late attempts to oppreſs the ſubject having convinced him to the contrary, he was highly incenſed againſt his favourite, who was obliged to have recourſe to the moſt humble and abject ſubmiſſion to appeaſe the wrath of his maſter. He produced his will, in which he had left all his riches to the king, and laboured to convince him that what he did was to promote his honour, and would prove in the end highly advantageous. At the ſame time he made him a preſent of his ſtately palace at Hampton-court, in return for which the king granted him his letters patent for the founding his college at Oxford.

A. D. 1526. Notwithſtanding the interpoſition of almoſt all the powers in Europe, in behalf of the captive Francis, yet he did not obtain his liberty till the middle of March, after ſigning a treaty very advantageous to the emperor. But he no ſooner reached his own dominions than he diſclaimed the whole agreement as compulſive. He determined, if poſſible, to be revenged on Charles; to effect which he concluded an alliance with Clement VII. the Venetians, and the principalities of Italy; a confederacy of which the king of England was declared the protector.

Charles, irritated at this league, determined to take ample vengeance on thoſe allies that had deſerted him in the time of danger; particularly the Roman pontiff, who, though he had chiefly owed his election to the good offices of the emperor, had ſo ungratefully abandoned the intereſt of his benefactor. He accordingly ordered the duke of Bourbon to advance towards Rome, and attack the pope in his capital. Bourbon executed the emperor's commands with the greateſt bravery and conduct, but was killed as he was mounting a ladder to ſcale the walls. His death inſpired his followers with fury and revenge. Rome taken by aſſault, was pillaged, and became a ſcene of the moſt ſhocking barbarities. That renowned city never ſuffered more, even from barbarians, than now from the hands of Chriſtians. Whatever was reſpectable in modeſty, whatever was ſacred in religion, ſeemed only to increaſe the brutality of the ſoldiers. The pope himſelf was taken priſoner, and treated with every indignity. When intelligence was brought the emperor of the ſucceſs of his arms againſt the Roman capital, he affected the utmoſt ſorrow, put himſelf and his whole court into mourning, and ordered prayers to be offered up for the deliverance of the pope. But the artifice was too groſs to impoſe even upon the ignorant and ſuperſtitious multitude.

The caſe was very different with Francis and Henry: they were extremely concerned for the misfortunes of the pontiff, and determined to carry their arms into Italy. Wolſey himſelf, by order of Henry, croſſed the ſeas to have an interview with Francis; who met him at Amiens; where it was ſtipulated, that the duke of Orleans ſhould marry the princeſs Mary: and as it was apprehended that Charles would immediately ſummon a general council, they both agreed not to acknowledge it, but to govern the churches in their reſpective dominions by their own authority, during the pope's impriſonment. Soon after, a new treaty was negotiated between the two monarchs; by which Henry renounced his antient pretenſions to the crown of France; and Francis, in return, bound himſelf and his ſucceſſors to pay annually the ſum of fifty thouſand crowns.

During theſe tranſactions on the continent Henry's attention was engaged in an affair of the moſt important nature. His conſort Catherine of Arragon, who was ſix years older than himſelf, had loſt his affection, and he now formed the reſolution of obtaining a divorce. She was the daughter of Ferdinand and Iſſabella, (king and queen of Spain) and aunt to Charles V. She had been married to Henry eighteen years, and brought him three children; one of whom, the princeſs Mary, afterwards queen of England, was ſtill living. The queen could neither be reproached with bad conduct, nor even with that peeviſh temper which ſo frequently accompanies female virtue. But all her gentle and amiable accompliſhments could not fire a heart devoted to pleaſure. She had been firſt married to prince Arthur, elder brother to Henry; and upon his death, ſhe was betrothed to him. This marriage had always been conſidered as illegal by moſt of the foreign ſtates; had been ſtrongly oppoſed as ſuch by Warham archbiſhop of Canterbury; and his opinion had been confirmed by the two houſes of Convocation. Theſe authorities ſtrengthened Henry's ſcruples; and it was thought that the pope had no power to diſpenſe with a poſitive law of the Deity.

Henry now became anxiouſly ſolicitous to convince himſelf of the illegitimacy of his marriage. The great progreſs he had made in caſuiſtical divinity enabled him to examine the queſtion thoroughly. The celebrated Thomas Aquinas, whoſe authority was great in the church, and abſolute with Henry, had treated of that very caſe, and expreſly declared againſt the lawfulneſs of ſuch marriages. "The prohibitions (ſays that famous caſuiſt) contained in Leviticus, and among the reſt, that of marrying a brother's widow, are moral, eternal, and founded on a divine ſanction; and though the pope may diſpenſe with the rules of the church, the laws of God cannot be ſet aſide by any authority leſs than that which enacted them."

From theſe arguments Henry was convinced that his marriage was unlawful; and an incident now happened which prompted him to perſevere in procuring a divorce from Catherine. Anne Boleyn, a young lady celebrated for her beauty and mental accompliſhments, had been lately created maid of honor to the queen, and ſoon acquired an entire aſcendency over the affections of Henry. He endeavoured, by every means he could project, to ſeduce her, but the virtue or ambition of Anne reſiſted all his arts; and the king perceiving that there was no other method of gratifying his paſſion, determined to make her his partner in the throne.

A. D. 1528. Henry was little aware of the many obſtacles that would oppoſe his intended purpoſes. Before any advances could be made it was neceſſary that the bull of pope Julius ſhould be annulled at Rome; a proceeding which no pontiff would readily be willing to adopt. Clement, though ſtill a priſoner to Charles, was deſirous of procuring the favour of Henry, who was alone able to aſſiſt him in his diſtreſs: he therefore liſtened to the propoſals of that monarch, and ſeemed willing to annul the bull of his predeceſſor. He granted a commiſſion to Wolſey to examine, as legate, the validity of the marriage, and promiſed to expedite a bull of divorce. But Clement, with all his dexterity and addreſs, wanted intrepidity, firmneſs, and integrity. Charles V. diſcovered his intention; and threatened, if he favoured the Engliſh monarch, to ſummon a general council, and cauſe him to be depoſed. At the ſame time, he flattered him with the hopes of re-eſtabliſhing his family in the dutchy of Florence, if he complied with his deſires. The offers and threatenings of Charles were two powerful for Clement to withſtand: he granted a new commiſſion, in which cardinal Campeggio was joined with Wolſey, for trying the validity of the kings marriage. But he could not be induced to promiſe, that he would not recall this commiſſion. Campeggio artfully protracted his departure for England; and when he arrived there with a bull in the ſtyle requeſted by Henry, he refuſed to communicate it to any perſon except the king and Wolſey.

A. D. 1529 As this bull could not be executed till the marriage was pronounced illegal, a court was appointed to be held in Blackfriars for the trial of the cauſe, and the king and queen were cited to appear on the 18th of June. Wolſey, as a proof of his impartiality, allowed Campeggio to preſide, though he himſelf was a ſenior cardinal.

On the day appointed the king and queen attended, when Henry being called, readily anſwered to his name; but the queen, inſtead of anſwering to her's, roſe from her ſeat, threw herſelf at the feet of her huſband, and addreſſed him in the moſt pathetic terms. She began with obſerving, that ſhe was a ſtranger in his dominions, deſtitute of friends, of counſel, of aſſiſtance; expoſed to all the injuſtice which her enemies were pleaſed to heap upon her. She told him, that her conduct, ever ſince their marriage, had been irreproachable; and proteſted, that he had received her a virgin to his bed. She added, that in eſpouſing him, ſhe had followed the advice of thoſe able princes, Henry VII. and Ferdinand the Catholic. She expreſſed her ſuſpicion of the legates, appealed from them to the pope; and after making the king a low reverence, ſhe left the court, nor would ſhe ever after appear before the legates.

Henry did not attempt to reproach her with any crime: on the contrary, he declared that ſhe had ever been a dutiful and affectionate wife, and that the whole tenor of her behaviour had been conformable to the ſtricteſt rules of probity and honor. But he ſtill inſiſted on the ſcruples with which he had been agitated. He mentioned the confirmation of her marriage with his brother Arthur; declared his doubts of the validity of pope Julius's diſpenſation; and expreſſed his deſire that the court might give judgment according to the rules of equity and religion.

As ſoon as the king had finiſhed his ſpeech, the legates proceeded in their commiſſion, and firſt examined into the proofs of the conſummation of Arthur's marriage with Catherine. And it muſt be owned by every impartial enquirer, that the fact was eſtabliſhed as far as the nature of the tranſaction would admit of proof. Every perſon now expected that the ſentence of divorce would be ſoon pronounced, but that moment was ſtill at a great diſtance. Campeggio ſpun out the trial, till he received his final inſtructions from Rome; when he burnt the decretal bull, and declared that the cauſe was removed to Rome.

This event induced Henry to ſuſpect Wolſey of treachery, and from that moment we may juſtly date the fall of that powerful miniſter. Both the emperor and Catherine made the utmoſt efforts to ruin him in the king's opinion: they were at great pains to propagate reports, by means of their agents, wholly calculated to accompliſh his deſtruction. The dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk, at the head of a powerful party, exerted all their influence to ſupplant him in the royal favour, and embraced every opportunity of miſrepreſenting his actions. But, perhaps, all their endeavours, added to the envy and malignancy of the world, would not have been ſufficient to have effected his diſgrace, without the powerful aſſiſtance of Anne Boleyn, who had now gained an entire aſcendency over the mind of her royal lover.

It was generally expected that the diſgrace of the cardinal would have immediately followed the removal of the cauſe to Rome; but in this the people were deceived. Henry had ſo much command over his paſſion, as not to intimate any diſlike to the proceedings of his miniſter; but Campeggio had no ſooner received his audience of leave, than Henry, in order to divert the chagrin reſulting from his diſappointment, made a progreſs through ſeveral of the counties adjacent to his capital, without taking the cardinal with him. From this neglect Wolſey prognoſticated that his fall was at no great diſtance. He, however, ſtill continued to diſcharge the duties of his office; and obſerving no alteration in the behaviour of the courtiers towards him, he began to flatter himſelf that his diſgrace was not abſolutely determined. But his enemies, with Anne Boleyn at their head, had ſo prepoſſeſſed the king, during his abſence, againſt the miniſter, that on his return to London, the dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk, both ſworn enemies to Wolſey, were ſent to demand the great ſeal, which Wolſey thought proper to refuſe, aſſerting, that he held it by patent during his life. The next day they returned with orders under the king's ſignet, and Wolſey immediately delivered the ſeal into their hands. The king immediately gave it to Sir Thomas More, a man of letters, virtue, and integrity. Wolſey was ordered to retire from York palace, which, though it belonged to the archiepiſcopal ſee, was ſeized by Henry, and became afterwards the reſidence of the kings of England, under the title of Whitehall. A cupboard of maſſy gold, a thouſand pieces of holland, which had belonged to him, with all his rich furniture, were converted to the king's uſe. Wolſey immediately diſmiſſed his numerous retinue, and retired to Eſher, a country ſeat he poſſeſſed on the banks of the Thames.

Though Henry was deſirous of ſuſpending the blow which overwhelmed his favourite, yet the enemies of that miniſter, particularly Anne Boleyn, ſo exaſperated the king againſt him by falſe accuſations, that he gave him up to the proſecution of the parliament. The houſe of lords preſented an accuſation againſt him conſiſting of forty-four articles; but they were all ſo vague and indeterminate, that the Commons rejected the bill. Thomas Cromwell, formerly one of his domeſtics, defended him in that aſſembly with a force and courage which, inſtead of hurting his fortune, as might have been expected, laid the foundation of that favour which he afterwards enjoyed with the king. True merit ſometimes acquires an aſcendancy over vicious minds. But the oppoſition of the Commons was not ſufficient to divert the dreadful ſtorm that threatened to overwhelm this once powerful miniſter. He was condemned, on pretence of his having ſolicited bulls from Rome, though the king had given his conſent to that meaſure; and the cardinal was never able to recover from this diſgrace: he fell a ſacrifice to the envy and malevolence of his enemies. The king, however, would not ſuffer this proſecution to be carried to extremities: he even granted him a pardon for all offences; reſtored him part of his plate and furniture; and continued, from time to time, to intimate, that he ſtill entertained for him his former affections.

Henry had now but little hopes of ſucceeding in his ſolicitations for a divorce from Rome. The policy of Clement VII. and the intrigues and power of Charles V. had abundantly convinced him that every attempt of that kind would prove abortive. A treaty had been lately concluded between the emperor and the pope, and another between the former and the French monarch. Theſe treaties reſtored peace to Italy, and Clement no longer depended on Henry's aſſiſtance. It was therefore neceſſary to have recourſe to ſome other expedient, or drop all thoughts of obtaining a divorce from Catherine. Dr. Thomas Cranmer, a fellow of Jeſus College, Cambridge, diſcovered a method which ſeemed to promiſe the removal of every difficulty. He propoſed to conſult all the univerſities of Europe with regard to this controverted point; alledging, that if they agreed to approve the king's marriage with Catherine, his Majeſty's ſcruples muſt ceaſe of courſe: if they condemned it, the pope would find it difficult to reſiſt the opinion of all the learned, when joined with the ſolicitations of ſo great a monarch. Henry was highly delighted with this propoſal, and determined to carry it immediately into execution. He alſo found, upon inquiry, that Cranmer was a perſon of acknowledged piety, learning, and moderation, and therefore determined to have him near his perſon. Accordingly he ſent for him to court, entered into converſation with him, and conceived ſo high an opinion of him, that he ever after conſulted him in all caſes of importance.

A. D. 1530. The advice of Cranmer had the deſired effect. The univerſities were conſulted, and thoſe of Paris, Orleans, Bourges, Thoulouſe, Angiers, Venice, Ferrara, Padua, Bologne, Oxford and Cambridge pronounced a deciſion agreeable to his wiſhes. They maintained, "That the marriage of a perſon with his brother's widow was contrary to the divine law; and, conſequently, could not be authoriſed by any diſpenſation."

This deciſion, however, had not any effect on the court of Rome: they ſtill refuſed to liſten to Henry's remonſtrances. A ſpirited letter was therefore written to the pope, ſigned by the principal prelates and nobility of England; in which, after mentioning the many good offices which the king had formerly done for his Holineſs, the judgment of ſo many learned univerſities, and the little regard he had paid to all theſe weighty conſiderations; they plainly told him, "that if he continued to amuſe and deceive the Engliſh monarch in the affair of the divorce, they would renounce their connections with the ſee of Rome, and do themſelves that juſtice which they had ſo long demanded in vain from his Holineſs."

While theſe things were tranſacting, Wolſey ſtill continued in privacy at his country-ſeat at Eſher, which he had received from Henry in return for Hampton-court. He had been reinſtated in the revenues of his archbiſhopric, and thoſe of the ſee of Wincheſter; and even entertained hopes of again recovering the king's favour. The courtiers were alarmed, and procured an order for him to remove to his archiepiſcopal ſee. He immediately obeyed, and retired to Cawood in Yorkſhire, where he applied himſelf ſtrictly to execute the duties of his eccleſiaſtical charge. Nor did he labour in vain. The aſſiduity with which he diſcharged his paſtoral duties, his charity to the poor, his hoſpitality, and the obliging reception he gave to all who viſited him in his retreat, ſoon gained him the love and eſteem of all orders of men in the neighbourhood of his reſidence.

Wolſey was not, however, long ſuffered to enjoy this happineſs unmoleſted. The earl of Northumberland and Sir Peter Walſh were ſent down to arreſt him for high-treaſon, and to conduct him to London. No reſpect was paid to his eccleſiaſtical character; the privileges of the church were no longer regarded. He made no oppoſition to the royal orders; but immediately ſet out for London with ſome degree of chearfulneſs. They were met upon the road by Sir William Kingſton, conſtable of the Tower, at the head of a party of the guards. But the cardinal, partly by the fatigues of his journey, and partly by the great anxiety of his mind, was ſeized with a diſorder which ſoon turned to a dyſentery; ſo that he reached Leiceſter-abbey with the utmoſt difficulty. He perceived his diſſolution was approaching; and told the abbots and monks, who advanced to receive him with great reſpect, that he was come to lay his bones among them. He was immediately carried to his bed, from which he never more aroſe. The folly of ambitious purſuits, and the vanity of human grandeur, now appeared in their genuine colours; and he ſincerely regretted the time he had ſpent in aſſiduouſly ſtudying the headſtrong paſſions of an ungrateful prince. "Had I," ſaid he, "ſerved my God as diligently as I ſerved my king, he would not have forſaken me in my grey hairs." With theſe reflections Wolſey paid the debt of nature on the twenty-third of November, in the ſixtieth year of his age; and was interred, at his own requeſt, in the chapel of Leiceſter-abbey.

This great miniſter exhibits a ſtriking example of the folly and weakneſs of thoſe who miſtake the paths of ambition for the paths of happineſs. His character has been loaded, perhaps unjuſtly, with the moſt violent reproaches. Great allowances ſhould certainly be made for the obſtinacy and violence of Henry's temper: Wolſey was often obliged to purſue meaſures his better judgement condemned. His ſucceſſors could not hold the helm of government with ſo ſteady a hand: they were far more criminal than the cardinal. The ambition he entertained of filling St. Peter's chair proceeded, perhaps, in part at leaſt, from a deſire he entertained of being ſerviceable to his country in that important ſtation. Henry himſelf, when informed of the death of the cardinal, regretted his loſs, and ſpoke of him in the moſt favourable terms: and it ſhould be remembered, that a miniſter who is odious to the nation he governs, cannot be tranſmitted in very favourable colours to poſterity.*

A. D. 1532. The meaſures Henry had for ſome time purſued clearly evinced his intentions of eclipſing the power of the Roman pontiff in England. At his inſtigation the parliament, which met in the beginning of this year, paſſed an act againſt levying the annates, or firſt fruits, a tax hitherto paid to the pope for granting bulls to the new prelates. This ſtatute declared, "That the kingdom was impoveriſhed by the great ſums paid to the Roman pontiff; that, ſince the ſecond year of the late reign, above one hundred and ſixty thouſand pounds had been ſent to Rome on account of annates or firſt-fruits, palls and bulls for biſhoprics: that the annates had been originally deſigned as a contribution for ſupporting a war againſt the infidels; but as they were not applied to that purpoſe, it was decreed, that they ſhould not be paid for the future: that no more than five per cent. of the annual revenue ſhould be given for the bulls of the biſhoprics: that if the pope ſhould refuſe to grant them upon theſe terms, the biſhop elect ſhould be preſented by the king to the metropolitan of the province, in order to be conſecrated; but ſhould the metropolitan refuſe conſecration, on pretence of wanting palls and bulls, two prelates appointed by the king ſhould perform the ceremony, and the elect ſhould then be conſidered as lawfully conſecrated. The parliament, however, at the ſame time, declared, that the king ſhould be at liberty to annul or confirm this act, within a limited time; and if, in that interval, he ſhould compromiſe his difference with the court of Rome, it ſhould obtain the force of a law; but ſhould the pope, on account of this act, endeavour to diſturb the peace of the kingdom with the ſentences of excommunication and interdict, theſe cenſures ſhould be utterly diſregarded. All eccleſiaſtics were forbid to receive or publiſh ſuch cenſures, and enjoined to celebrate divine ſervice in the ſame manner as if they had never been iſſued."

* The character of this celebrated perſonage is thus drawn by a maſterly pen: "His manner had a ſtriking reſemblance of merit, while it breathed the very ſoul of impurity. He could, at once, prompt to virtue and to vice; and he opened his houſe as a mart of luſt and exceſs for gratifying the paſſions of his young prodigal maſter. His learning was rather elegant than deep; and his ſtate was more arrogant than graceful. With the grave he was ſevere; with the lewd he was laſcivious. His rivals, like under-wood beneath a baleful ſhade, ſhrunk and ſhrivelled up as his credit grew, and his deſigns proſpered. He was equally rapacious as profuſe. In proſperity elate, in adverſity dejected; under equal circumſtances, impatient; in doubtful ones intrepid. Of his ſuperiors, envious; towards his competitors, ſevere; but eaſy to his inferiors, from a principle, not of humility, but of pride, being deſirous of ſeeing his own ſlaves the maſters of others. It coſt him more to preſerve the appearances, than it would have done to have practiſed the duties of religion. Though crafty, he choſe to over-bear; and though venal, he was generous. He was guarded on all ſides but on that of vanity, which was the gap through which thoſe calamities poured, that afterwards deluged his fortunes. He knew how to entice by friendſhip, and to retain by politeneſs; his purſe was open, his intereſt was ready, to all who were willing or able to ſerve his purpoſes. He could accommodate himſelf to every diſpoſition, and, thereby, (maſter of thoſe with whom he dealt) he deceived the worthy, he attracted the abandoned. With him vanity produced more noble effects than virtue did in others. From his firſt introduction to court, his great principle was to reign in the cabinet; but he drove the chariot of government over precipices which, at laſt, diſmounted his ambition. For his abilities raiſing him from the ſhambles to the church, (he having been originally only the ſon of a butcher at Ipſwich in Suffolk) from the church to the cabinet, he ſought to riſe from the cabinet to the popedom, a ſtate then more revered than was the ſovereignty itſelf."

The dark and light ſhades of this great man's portraiture are finely delineated by our immortal poet Shakeſpear, in the ſpeeches which he reſpectively puts in the mouths of queen Catherine and Griffith her gentleman uſher. His blemiſhes are thus depicted by the queen:

——————he was a man
Of an unbounded ſtomach, ever ranking
Himſelf with princes. One that by ſuggeſtion
Ty'd all the kingdom; Simony was fair play,
His own opinion was his law. I'th' preſence
He would ſay untruths, and be ever double
Both in his words and meaning. He was never,
But where he meant to ruin, pitiful.
His promiſes were, as he then was, mighty;
But his performance, as he now is, nothing;
Of his own body he was ill, and gave
The clergy ill example.

In anſwer to this Griffith thus deſcribes his merits:

———————This Cardinal,
Though from an humble ſtock, undoubtedly
Was faſhioned to much honour. From his cradle
He was a ſcholar, and a ripe and good one;
Exceeding wiſe, fair ſpoken, and perſuading;
Lofty and ſour to them that lov'd him not;
But to thoſe men that ſought him, ſweet as ſummer.
And though he were unſatisfied in getting,
Which was a ſin, yet in beſtowing,
He was moſt princely; ever witneſs for him
Thoſe twins of learning, that he raiſed,
Ipſwich and Oxford; one of which fell with him,
Unwilling to outlive the good that did it.
The other, though unfiniſhed, yet ſo famous,
So excellent in art, and ſtill ſo riſing,
That Chriſtendom ſhall ever ſpeak his virtue.
His overthrow heap'd up happineſs upon him;
For then, and not till then, he felt himſelf,
And found the bleſſedneſs of being little.
And to add greater honours to his age
Than man could give him; he dy'd fearing God.

The whole nation were now convinced that Henry's intention was to marry Anne Boleyn; and either force the pope to agree to his meaſures, or withdraw his obedience from the holy ſee. The chancellor, Sir Thomas More, a man of ſtrict virtue, incapable of making his religion ſubmiſſive to his intereſt, and, at the ſame time, too much a philoſopher to be over ſolicitous to advance his fortune, begged leave to reſign the ſeals, and retired from that elevated ſtation with more joy than an ambitious perſon would have felt in being placed in that exalted ſeat of power. Soon after Sir Thomas More's reſignation, Warham, archbiſhop of Canterbury, paid the debt of nature; an event which gave Henry no ſmall ſatisfaction, as he flattered himſelf he ſhould now eaſily procure the affair of his divorce to be determined in his own dominions. For though the deceaſed prelate was convinced that Henry's marriage with Catherine was unlawful, yet he was too much devoted to the ſee of Rome to do any act, or exert his own authority in oppoſition to the papal power. The king named for his ſucceſſor Dr. Thomas Cranmer, and he was ſoon after placed in the archiepiſcopal chair.

A. D. 1533. Henry had exerted his utmoſt influence to prevail upon Catherine to withdraw her appeal from Rome; but all his attempts proving abortive, and a treaty of offenſive alliance being concluded with Francis I. he privately married Anne Boleyn about the middle of January. Her father, mother, and brother, together with her uncle the duke of Norfolk, and archbiſhop Cranmer, were preſent at the ceremony.

The new queen ſoon becoming pregnant, Henry, to preſerve her reputation, publickly owned his marriage. This circumſtance rendered it neceſſary that Catherine's divorce ſhould now be finiſhed; and it was determined in the council, that the archbiſhop ſhould pronounce the ſentence. Accordingly Cranmer repaired to Dunſtable, in the neighbourhood of which the queen reſided, and cited Catherine to appear. As ſhe took not the leaſt notice of the citation, ſhe was declared contumacious, and the primate proceeded to the examination of the cauſe. The evidences of Arthur's conſummation of his marriage were produced; the opinions of the univerſities were read; together with the judgment pronounced two years before by the convocations of Canterbury and York: and after theſe preparatory ſteps, Cranmer annulled the king's marriage with Catherine, as unlawful. He alſo, by a ſubſequent ſentence, ratified the king's marriage with Anne Boleyn, who was ſoon after publicly crowned with the greateſt pomp and ceremony. On the ſeventh of September, ſhe was ſafely delivered of a daughter, who received the name of Elizabeth, and afterwards ſwayed the ſceptre of England.

No ſooner did the intelligence of theſe tranſactions reach the court of Rome, than the whole conſiſtory was in the moſt violent ferment. The cardinals of the imperial faction urged the pope to launch the dreadful bolt of excommunication againſt the Engliſh monarch; but the pontiff could not be prevailed upon to proceed any farther than to threaten Henry with that ſentence, if he annulled not the criminal acts he had committed within a limited time. The mediation of Francis I. who had entered into a negotiation with Clement for the marriage of his ſecond ſon, the duke of Orleans, with Catherine of Medicis, the pope's niece, ſeemed, however, likely to produce an accommodation. Henry was prevailed upon to ſubmit his cauſe to the holy ſee, provided the cardinals of the imperial party were excluded from the Roman conſiſtory during his trial; and the pope was diſpoſed to gratify his deſire. A day was even appointed for the return of the meſſenger with Henry's definitive anſwer; but the courier who carried the king's acquieſcence in writing, was detained by accident beyond the limited time. In vain did the biſhop of Paris requeſt the pope to wait a few days for the meſſenger: Clement was ſo highly exaſperated, that he would liſten to no remonſtrances. He entered the conſiſtory enflamed with anger; and, with a precipitation fatal to the power of the Roman ſee, pronounced the legitimacy of Henry's marriage with Catherine, and declared him excommunicated if he refuſed to obey the ſentence. Two days after, the meſſenger arrived; but the evil was not to be redreſſed. The obedience of England, one of the richeſt jewels in the papal crown, was loſt by this haſty deciſion. A kingdom the moſt devoted of any in Europe to the apoſtolical ſee, was become its irreconcileable enemy.

A. D. 1534. The parliament met on the 15th of January, when the principal buſineſs done was, to enact laws wholly ſubverſive of the papal authority. They had already proſcribed all appeals to Rome, and all the rights and regulations of the apoſtolic chamber. The people had for ſome years been perſuaded, that a general council was far ſuperior to the Roman pontiff; it was now publicly maintained, that the pope was only a biſhop, and that his power extended no farther than the limits of his own dioceſe. The people, the parliament, and even the clergy, adopted this opinion. The ſtatute of Henry IV. againſt heretics was moderated. By another ſtatute it was declared, that no ſynod or convocation of the clergy ſhould be aſſembled without the king's permiſſion; that his majeſty ſhould nominate ſixteen perſons from the parliament, and as many from the clergy, to examine the canons and conſtitutions of the church, with a power to aboliſh ſuch as were uſeleſs, and confirm thoſe that were neceſſary. The parliament next confirmed the ſtatute againſt annates: it was enacted, "That for the future the pope ſhould have no ſhare in the election or confirmation of biſhops; but that, when a ſee became vacant, the king ſhould ſend to the chapter a congé d'elire, or licence, to elect a new biſhop; and if the election ſhould not be made in twelve days after the date of the licence, the right of chuſing ſhould fall to the king: that the biſhop elect ſhould ſwear fealty to his majeſty: that no perſon ſhould preſume to apply to the biſhop of Rome for bulls, palls, or any other religious purpoſe: that Peter's-pence, together with all procurations, delegations, bulls, and diſpenſations, iſſued by the court of Rome, ſhould be entirely aboliſhed; that the archbiſhop of Canterbury ſhould be empowered to grant ſuch diſpenſations as were conſiſtent with the law of God, provided that part of the money thence ariſing ſhould be paid unto the king's exchequer: that all religious houſes, whether exempted or non-exempted, ſhould be ſubject to the viſitation of the archbiſhop: that the king's marriage with Catherine ſhould be deemed null and void; and that the ſucceſſion ſhould be ſettled upon the iſſue of his lawful wife Anne, whether male or female."

The ſame parliament alſo paſſed an act of attainder againſt Elizabeth Barton, commonly called "The Holy Maid of Kent," a native of the pariſh of Aldington, who had been employed by certain eccleſiaſtics to raiſe diſturbances in the kingdom. This woman had been long ſubject to hyſteric fits, during which her body was thrown into unuſual convulſions, and ſhe frequently uttered many ſtrange and incoherent expreſſions; whence the ignorant and credulous multitude were induced to believe that ſhe ſpoke by the inſpiration of heaven. The party who ſtill ſupported the pope's authority, conſidered this perſon as a proper inſtrument to gain proſelytes to their party, and condemn the methods that had been taken to procure the divorce. They, however, waited till the belief of her having an immediate intercourſe with heaven was eſtabliſhed with the people. This being effected, they taught her to declaim againſt the new doctrines, which ſhe called hereſy; againſt innovations in eccleſiaſtical government, and againſt the king's divorce from Catherine. She even at laſt had the boldneſs to aſſert, "that if the king proſecuted his divorce, and married another woman, he ſhould not wear the crown a month longer, but ſhould die the death of a villain." Henry, for ſome time, neglected to take any notice of this woman; he conſidered her pretended prophecies as the effects of a diſtempered brain, and which would be diſregarded as ſoon as they ceaſed to be a novelty. But finding that ſhe was ſupported, not only by the monks, but alſo by the pope's agents in England, he reſolved to proceed againſt her with the utmoſt ſeverity. Both the maid herſelf, and her accomplices, were accordingly examined in the Star-chamber, where they readily confeſſed all the particulars of their guilt; in conſequence of which they were committed to the Tower, and ſoon after hanged at Tyburn. The detection of this impoſture tended greatly to injure the credit of the eccleſiaſtics, eſpecially the monks, who now became the objects of Henry's reſentment.

While theſe things were tranſacting, intelligence of the excommunication fulminated by Clement reached England, and added greatly to the general ferment. The appeal of the king to the general council of the clergy was affixed to all the gates of the churches. The convocation declared, that the biſhop of Rome had no authority in England; and that the power which he and his predeceſſors had hitherto exerciſed there, was nothing more than an uſurpation tolerated by its kings. Thus was the church of England ſeparated from the authority of the Roman ſee; and all ſubjection to the pope totally annihilated!

As ſoon as the parliament roſe, Henry ſent commiſſioners through the whole kingdom, to adminiſter the oath of allegiance and ſucceſſion to all his ſubjects; and Fiſher, biſhop of Rocheſter, and Sir Thomas More, refuſing to take it, were committed to the Tower.

But though Henry had renounced the pope's authority, he was far from being a friend to the reformers. Their tenets were, however, embraced by great numbers of the Engliſh, and all ranks of men were diſpoſed to favour their attempts to remove many of the ſuperſtitious practices from the public worſhip. The king's book againſt Luther had done him honour with the Catholics; and the anſwer of that reformer, who treated him with a ſovereign contempt, failed not to wound his vanity. He did not, therefore, abandon the tenets of the Roman church, though he denied the authority of the pontiff. His miniſters and courtiers knew not which religion to adopt; they wavered between both, and ſeemed extremely cautious of declaring their real opinions. The duke of Norfolk, and Gardiner, biſhop of Wincheſter, who were firmly attached to the antient religion, though they pretended to acknowledge the king's ſupremacy, uſed every method in their power to exaſperate Henry againſt the reformers. On the other hand, the new queen, with archbiſhop Cranmer, and ſecretary Cromwell, who were friends to the proteſtants, artfully excited his reſentment againſt the Holy See, while they themſelves profeſſed the eſtabliſhed faith. Thus the profeſſors of both religions were equally ſubject to perſecution. It was as criminal to acknowledge the pope's ſupremacy as to embrace the tenets of Luther; and Henry alike condemned to the flames thoſe who ſpoke in favour of the Roman pontiff, and thoſe who declared for the reformed religion. In particular, he now ordered the prior of the Carthuſian monks, the prior of Hexham, Benaſe, a monk of Sion College, and John Haile, vicar of Iſleworth, together with three monks of the Charter-houſe, to be hanged and quartered for denying his ſupremacy, which ſentence was executed with full rigour at Tyburn on the 18th of July.

The reformers alſo, at the ſame time, felt the weight of Henry's violent hand. The ſpirit of liberty cheriſhed by that whole ſect alarmed the rapacious monarch, and he was determined to employ perſecution and violence againſt them; but he ſhould have remembered, that the zeal of ſectaries is always increaſed by oppoſition. A gentleman of the Temple, and a clergyman, having embraced the doctrines of the Reformation, were ſeized by the government, and put to the torture. Their ſufferings proved too ſtrong for their zeal; they abjured the tenets of Luther, and were ſet at liberty. But feeling afterwards the deepeſt compunctions for their timidity, they boldly preached againſt the ſuperſtitions of the eſtabliſhed religion, and were condemned to the flames. It was expected by their enemies, that they would again recant when brought to the ſtake; but they were miſtaken: they ſuffered with the moſt unſhaken intrepidity; and even in the midſt of their torments, gloried in the tenets they had before inculcated. Another diſciple of the reformers, when ſurrounded with the flames, embraced, with a tranſport of joy, the faggots which were to put a period to his life. It was not, indeed, eaſy to avoid the danger of incurring the king's diſpleaſure; his miſplaced zeal conſidered the moſt innocent actions as heretical. To teach children the Lord's prayer in the vulgar tongue, to read the tranſlation of the New Teſtament, to ſpeak againſt pilgrimages, and to neglect the faſts of the church, were conſidered as highly criminal, and puniſhed with the utmoſt ſeverity.

A. D. 1535. Theſe perſecutions at length reached Fiſher, biſhop of Rocheſter, and Sir Thomas More, who ſtill continued priſoners in the Tower, and were now ſingled out for a terror to the boldeſt oppoſers of the king's meaſures. Henry was determined they ſhould renounce the pope, and acknowledge his marriage act and ſucceſſion, as eſtabliſhed by parliament. The pope thought to ſave Fiſher's life by ſending him a cardinal's hat, while matters were preparing for his trial; but in this he only gave Henry the ſatisfaction of bringing a cardinal to the block; for Fiſher refuſing to take the oath of ſupremacy, a commiſſion was made out for trying him by his peers, for miſpriſion of treaſon in the caſe of the Maid of Kent, and alſo for denying the king's ſupremacy; and on the 17th of May he was tried before the lord-chancellor, the duke of Suffolk, with ſome other lords and all the judges, who found him guilty, and he was ſentenced to be beheaded on Tower-hill. He received the notice of his execution with great compoſure of mind in the morning before he was beheaded; and when he came to the block, after a ſhort prayer in favour of popery, and praying for the king, and that God would bleſs him with good counſel, he calmly reſigned his neck to the executioner on the 22d of June. He had the character of a learned and devout man, but was naturally very obſtinate, and much addicted to the ſuperſtition of his education.

The ſame oath of ſupremacy, for the rejecting of which Fiſher loſt his head, being alſo tendered to Sir Thomas More, he refuſed to take it likewiſe, for which he was tried by the ſame court, and loſt his head on Tower-hill the firſt day of July following. Henry was greatly reproached on account of the death of this man, who was univerſally eſteemed for his virtue, and admired for his wit and pleaſantry,[*] which did not forſake him even in his laſt moments; and he died with an unconcern that in others would have appeared to be levity, but in him was nature.

Theſe executions were followed by freſh injunctions iſſued by the king to all archbiſhops and biſhops, for enforcing the doctrine of the king's ſupremacy: a declaration was alſo ſent them by ſecretary Cromwell to the ſame effect, which they were ordered to read from the pulpit; nor does it appear that one prelate refuſed to comply with theſe orders, ſo much did they ſtand in awe of Henry's fiery and vindictive temper: and this ſeems to be the period from whence may be dated the king's reſolution to govern by force and abſolute power.

Paul III. who had lately ſucceeded Clement VII. in the papal chair, had flattered himſelf with being able to reconcile Henry to the Roman ſee. He had always favoured Henry's cauſe before his advancement to the papacy, and even gained the friendſhip of that capricious monarch. Senſible of the loſs the apoſtolic ſee muſt ſuſtain by a breach with England, he was very deſirous of putting a friendly period to this alarming diſpute. A negotiation was accordingly opened, and ſeemed to promiſe a favourable iſſue, when the news of Fiſher's execution re-kindled the rage of the ſacred college. A cardinal put to death in defence of the rights of the holy ſee merited the ſevereſt vengeance, and the pontiff haſtened to fulminate the thunders of the Vatican. Henry was cited to appear at the pope's tribunal, with all his adherents, within ninety days; and in caſe of diſobedience, the king was declared to be excommunicated, and his marriage with Anne Boleyn illegitimate; his ſubjects were freed from all oaths of allegiance; his kingdom was given up to the ambition of the firſt invader; and his leagues with all Catholic princes were diſſolved. Paul, however, thought proper to delay the publication of theſe cenſures till it ſhould appear that an accommodation with England was abſolutely deſperate; and till Charles V. at this time greatly preſſed by the Turks and the proteſtant princes of Germany, ſhould be in a condition to execute the violent meaſures of the conſiſtory.

Henry was not in the leaſt intimidated by the threatnings of the pope: the thunder of the Vatican was no longer terrible to the Engliſh. He feared not the attempts of Charles, who had a formidable barrier againſt him in the German princes. To theſe Henry ſent ambaſſadors, propoſing an union of intereſt; but as they ſuſpected his ſincerity, no alliance was concluded between them.

A. D. 1536. In the beginning of this year the unhappy queen Catherine was ſeized with a dangerous diſtemper at Kimbolton in Huntingdonſhire, which put a period to her life and misfortunes on the 29th of January, in the 50th year of her age. A ſhort time before ſhe expired, ſhe wrote a very affecting letter to the king, to whom ſhe gave the appellation of "her moſt dear lord, king and huſband." Henry appeared greatly touched at reading this letter, and even dropped ſome tears at the remembrance of a woman whoſe virtues deſerved a better fate. Queen Anne, however, did not behave with even due decorum on this occaſion: ſhe rejoiced openly at the death of Catherine, and ſeemed to take pleaſure in communicating her ſatisfaction to the public, little ſuſpecting that her own fate was ſo near at hand. The remains of the unfortunate Catherine were depoſited in the abbey church of Peterborough, which Henry afterwards converted into an epiſcopal cathedral.

Henry now determined to take a ſevere revenge for all the affronts he had received from the monkiſh clergy. That numerous body of men, knowing their power was ſo cloſely connected with the Roman ſee, that they muſt ſtand or fall together, exerted all their influence to depreciate the Reformation, and loaded Henry with the moſt attrocious crimes. They declaimed, with the utmoſt violence, againſt the followers of Luther; while the religioniſts, in their turn, imputed to the monks thoſe frequent faſts which oppreſſed the induſtrious to inrich the idle; thoſe ſuperſtitious rites of devotion which were often conſidered as more meritorious than a diſcharge of the moral duties; thoſe vain ſubtilties which adulterated theology; and that captious caſuiſtry which tyrannized over the reaſons and conſciences of men. But, perhaps, the revenues of the convents had inſpired him with a deſire of being maſter of their riches. He was, however, fearful of the conſequences that might reſult from this attempt, as religious retreats had ſo long been been conſidered as ſacred and inviolable. A council was therefore ſummoned, where the affair was reſolved, that a general viſitation ſhould be made of all the monaſteries; that a ſtrict inqueſt ſhould be taken of all their titles and revenues; and that the morals of the religious, and the regulations obſerved in each order, ſhould be cloſely inſpected. Cromwell was created vicar-general, and inquiſitor-general of all the monaſteries, and other privileged places. The viſitation was accordingly performed, and the report of the viſitors was publiſhed for the ſatiſfaction of the people.

[*] The following circumſtances will evince the ready turn of wit, as well as fondneſs for humour, with which this gentleman was poſſeſſed. When he was firſt committed to the Tower, on his entrance, the gentleman porter aſking for his fee, which is the upper garment, Sir Thomas took off his cap to give him, aying, "This is the uppermoſt garment I have." But that ot ſufficing, he pulled out a handful of angels, which he gave o the officer. A knight who was in his company, ſaid, "He as glad to find he was ſo full of angels." "Yes, replied Sir Thomas, I always love to have my beſt friends about me." Af-er he had been cloſe priſoner for ſome time, his books were all aken from him, on which he ſhut up all the windows of his oom; and being aſked why he did ſo? "It is time, ſaid he, to ut up ſhop, when the ware is all gone." On the day of his xecution, as he was mounting the ſcaffold, he ſaid to one of e officers, "Friend, help me up, and when I come down, let e ſhift for myſelf." When the executioner aſked him forgiveſs, he readily anſwered, "Why man, thou haſt never offend-d me, but my neck is ſo ſhort that you will have no credit in tting it off." When he laid his head down upon the block, ving a long grey beard he ſtroked it, and ſaid to the execu-ner, "I pray you let me lay my beard over the block, leſt you uld cut it; for, though you have a warrant to cut off my ad, you have none to cut off my beard."

To the above particulars relative to this gentleman, it may t be improper to add the following:

On his examination in the Tower, it being demanded if he approved of the act of Supremacy, his anſwer was, "This queſtion is like a two-edged ſword; if I anſwer one way it will deſtroy my body; and if the other way, my ſoul." But what particularly deſerves to be remembered of him is, that while he executed the high office of lord chancellor, his expedition in determining cauſes was ſuch, that one day when he called for the next cauſe, it was anſwered, "There are no more to be heard." This circumſtance, together with his accuſtomed attention to the expeditious diſcharge of all cauſes belonging to his court, gave riſe to the following lines, which, after his death, appeared in moſt of the public prints:

When More ſome years had chancellor been
　　No more ſuits did remain,
The ſame ſhall never more be ſeen
　　Till More be there again.

He was born in Milk-ſtreet, in the city of London, in the year 1480. When he had paſſed through the Grammar ſchools, he was ſent to Oxford, and afterwards entered at Lincoln's-inn to ſtudy the municipal laws of the nation. He was called up to the bar, but although he made a very conſiderable figure as a lawyer, yet the claſſic authors were his greateſt favourites. He was the author of ſeveral works, but his moſt celebrated peice is that called Utopia, which has been tranſlated into Engliſh by Biſhop Burnet.

As ſoon as the parliament met, an act was paſſed for the diſſolution of the leſſer monaſteries, the preamble to which ran thus: "That ſmall religious houſes, under the number of twelve perſons, had been long and notoriouſly guilty of the moſt abominable vices, and conſumed and waſted the church lands belonging to them: that for above two hundred years, many viſitations for reforming theſe abuſes had been made without ſucceſs, their vicious methods of life daily increaſing; ſo that unleſs the ſmall houſes were diſſolved, and the religious diſtributed into the greateſt monaſteries, no reformation could be expected." It was therefore declared, that all houſes, whoſe revenues did not exceed two hundred pounds a year, ſhould be ſuppreſſed, their revenues converted to better uſes, and the religious compelled to reform themſelves.

No ſooner was this act paſſed, than orders were iſſued, that all nuns and friars under twenty-four years of age ſhould be immediately diſmiſſed and abſolved from their vows; and that all others above that age ſhould have free liberty to leave their houſes and retire wherever they pleaſed. No leſs than three hundred and ſeventy-ſix of theſe leſſer monaſteries were thus diſſolved; and their revenues, which amounted to thirty-two thouſand pounds a year, were given to the king, together with their goods, chattels, and plate, computed at one hundred thouſand pounds.

While the parliament was engaged in paſſing an act for ſuppreſſing the leſſer monaſteries, the convocation deliberated upon a propoſition of the utmoſt importance to the reformers. This was a new tranſlation of the Bible. Tindal, ſome years before, had publiſhed a verſion of the ſcriptures; but it being found, upon examination, to be inaccurate and unfaithful, it had been committed publicly to the flames by order of the government. It was therefore now propoſed to publiſh a new tranſlation, which ſhould be free from thoſe objections. This motion was ſtrongly oppoſed by the popiſh party, and as warmly ſupported by the friends of the Reformation, who conſidered it as the only means of diſcovering to the people the many errors and ſuperſtitious abſurdities of the church of Rome. After a long conteſt, the motion was carried, and a new tranſlation of the Scriptures was ordered to be made by perſons eſteemed capable of executing ſo arduous a taſk.

The reforming party, however, now received a conderable injury from the loſs of one of their greateſt advocates. Anne Boleyn, who had ſo long continued her aſcendancy over the heart of Henry, had now loſt the power of pleaſing. Jane Seymour, one of the maids of honour to the queen, and a lady of ſingular beauty and merit, had inſpired him with a new paſſion, and he was determined to ſacrifice every thing to the gratification of his appetite. Anne was of a lively and gay diſpoſition; and, though ſtrictly virtuous, ſhe was not ſufficiently careful in her behaviour. She had been bred at the court of France, and contracted the eaſy carriage ſo familiar to that ſprightly people. Calumny converted her imprudence into vice; and the Auſtrian party, who had been exaſperated at the divorce of Catherine, improved the report, to render the king ſuſpicious of her virtue. The viſcounteſs Rochford in particular, (who was wife to the queen's brother, and a woman of the moſt abandoned character) pretended that her own huſband carried on a criminal correſpondence with his ſiſter; beſides which ſhe aſſerted, that Anne had likewiſe granted favours to Henry Norris, groom of the ſtole, Weſton and Brereton, gentlemen of the king's bed-chamber, together with one Mark Smeton, a muſician. This information fired Henry's breaſt, who was alſo not a little chagrined at an accident which befel the queen ſome time before, of her being delivered of a dead child.

Nothing, however, material tranſpired till the firſt of May, when a tilting match was held at Greenwich, in which the lord Rochford was chief challenger, and Henry Norris the principal antagoniſt. During the diverſions the king obſerved her majeſty drop her handkerchief, which one of the ſuſpected perſons took up, and uſed to wipe his face. To a mind prepared like Henry's, this accident, which though, in all probability, entirely caſual, was a demonſtration of his wife's infidelity. Accordingly, all on a ſudden the diverſions were broke up, and Henry, without taking notice of the queen or her court, with no more than ſix perſons in his retinue, abruptly quitted the place, and retired to his palace at Weſtminſter.

The queen immediately followed, and on her arrival at the palace was met by the duke of Norfolk, and ſome other lords of the council, who ſignified to her, that it was his majeſty's pleaſure ſhe ſhould be confined to her chamber. At the ſame time the lords Rochford and Norris were committed to the Tower, as were Brereton, Weſton, and Smeton. The next day the queen was conducted to the ſame priſon by the duke of Norfolk and other lords, who reſigned her into the cuſtody of Sir William Kingſton, conſtable of the Tower; and a commiſſion was made out for trying her on the twelfth of May in that place, the duke of Norfolk being appointed lord high-ſteward on that occaſion, with twenty-ſix other peers. The charges brought againſt her were of the moſt deteſtable nature, viz. "That ſhe had procured her brother, and the four other perſons in cuſtody, to lie with her; and that ſhe had made each of them believe that he had the preference above all mankind in her heart; and that ſhe had ſaid to each of them, that the king never had her heart." Smeton had, by fair promiſes, been brought to confeſs, that he had thrice carnal knowledge of her; but it was not thought proper to confront him with her; nor, indeed, could he be an evidence, as he had been condemned three days before to ſuffer, notwithſtanding his aſſurances of pardon upon confeſſion. The only thing that appeared in relation to her brother the lord Rochford was, his laying his hand on the queen's bed while he whiſpered to her; an action done before company, and warranted from the near relationſhip between them. In ſhort, to the eternal infamy of her judges, ſhe was condemned without its being ever known upon what evidence her ſentence was grounded; and the nineteenth of May was the day appointed for her execution, which was that of being burnt or beheaded, at the king's pleaſure.

Henry, not ſatisfied with this act of ſeverity, inſiſted on being divorced from her before her death, and archbiſhop Cranmer was ſent to the Tower, and received her confeſſion of pre-contract, or promiſe of marriage, between the lord Henry Piercy (then earl of Northumberland) and herſelf, before that ſhe had made with the king; upon which the archbiſhop pronounced, according to the rules of canon law, the ſentence of divorce. It was probably a tenderneſs for her daughter, (afterwards the famous queen Elizabeth) that induced her to make this confeſſion, for the earl of Northumberland proteſted, in the moſt ſolemn manner, that no ſuch contract had ever paſſed between them. It was, however, expected that ſhe would have defended her innocence when about to die, but the ſame motives ſeem to have operated even then, as ſhe feared every thing for her daughter from the ſavage temper of the king, ſhould ſhe expoſe him too much. Accordingly, on the day of her execution, when ſhe came on the ſcaffold, ſhe made no reflections on the hardſhips ſhe had ſuſtained, nor ſaid any thing touching the grounds on which ſentence had been paſſed upon her; ſhe only deſired "that every body would judge the beſt," acknowledged her obligations to the king, prayed for him, and entreated the ſpectators to do the ſame for her; and then ſubmitting her neck to the fatal ſtroke, her head was ſevered from her body at one blow, by an executioner who had been ſent for from Calais on account of his remarkable dexterity in the bloody profeſſion.—Her body was privately interred in the Tower.

The lord Rochford was tried and condemned at the ſame time with the queen his ſiſter, and, together with the other four gentlemen, ſuffered death three days before her; all of them, Smeton excepted, declaring, at the place of execution, the queen's and their own innocence of the facts for which they ſuffered.

Thus fell the celebrated Anne Boleyn, who had ſo long reigned ſovereign of Henry's affections. Her unhappy fate was deplored by the people, who conſidered her as the innocent victim of her huſband's inordinate paſſion. If this opinion needed any confirmation, the behaviour of Henry himſelf was ſufficient for that purpoſe. He married the lady Jane Seymour the very next day after her execution, ſo eager was he to ſatisfy his brutal appetite. His obdurate heart was not the leaſt affected by the bloody cataſtrophe of a perſon who had for ſeveral years been the object of his moſt tender affections. Nor was he ſatisfied with his ſanguinary action: he cauſed his marriage with Anne to be declared illegal, under pretence of a precontract of marriage with the earl of Northumberland; by which cruel proceſs, Elizabeth, her daughter, as well as Mary, the daughter of Catherine, became illegitimate.

The princeſs Elizabeth was about three years of age when her mother fell a ſacrifice to Henry's jealouſy. She had been hitherto ſtiled princeſs of Wales, but was now diveſted of that title. The princeſs Mary, whom he had treated with great ſeverity on account of her tender attachment to her mother, and her refuſing to renounce the pope's ſupremacy, was now perſuaded by the Romiſh party to attempt a reconciliation with her father. Accordingly ſhe ſubſcribed to the king's ſupremacy, renounced the authority of the biſhop of Rome, and acknowledged the illegality of her mother's marriage, in order the more effectually to remove the princeſs Elizabeth from the king's preſence and affections. But Henry, though he was reconciled to Mary, continued his affection to Elizabeth; and cauſed her to be educated at court with all the care and tenderneſs of a father.

On the 8th of June a new parliament met at Weſtminſter, when a ſtatute was paſſed, which confirmed the late queen's divorce, declared the children by the king's two firſt marriages illegitimate; and adjudged the crown, after his deceaſe, to the iſſue of his preſent queen, or any other perſon he might marry after her death. At the ſame time, they gave Henry full power to ſettle the mode of ſuch ſucceſſion, either by will, or letters patent under the great ſeal; and pronounced all thoſe who maintained the validity of his two former marriages guilty of high-treaſon.

An univerſal commotion now prevailed throughout the kingdom on account of the ſuppreſſion of the leſſer monaſteries; and the pope having repeated the ſentence of excommunication againſt Henry, laid the kingdom under an interdict, and forbid his ſubjects to pay him any obedience. The monks exerted all their influence to perſuade the people that they were under an indiſpenſable duty of taking up arms againſt a prince who had trampled under foot all their civil and religious liberties. The ignorant multitude eagerly liſtened to theſe inſinuations; they had been always taught to conſider as ſacred what was now devoted to deſtruction. Upwards of twenty thouſand men aſſembled in Lincolnſhire, under the command of Thomas Mackerel, prior of Barlings. This undiſciplined multitude publiſhed their grievances in a petition to the king; complaining of the ſuppreſſion of the monaſteries, the ſubverſion of the antient religion, the eſtabliſhing new tenets, &c. Henry ſent an anſwer to this petition; and diſpatched the duke of Suffolk, at the head of a ſmall body of troops, to reduce the inſurgents to obedience. But they were in no condition to contend with regular forces; and on being promiſed a pardon, readily diſperſed.

This peace, however, was but of ſhort continuance. The prieſts renewed their practices for animating the people to a revolt; and ſoon collected a numerous body of men, who were perſuaded that religion itſelf depended upon their defending the antient ſuperſtitions of the church. The duke of Norfolk was ſent at the head of 5000 troops to quell the inſurgents; but by putting the martial law into ſtrict execution againſt every one who refuſed to take the oath of ſupremacy, he, inſtead of leſſening, increaſed the diſorders. Two gentlemen, Muſgrave and Treby, putting themſelves at the head of eight thouſand peaſants, made an unſucceſsful attempt on Carliſle, and were afterwards entirely routed by the duke of Norfolk. Muſgrave made his eſcape; but Treby, with about ſeventy of his followers, being taken priſoners, were all hanged on the walls of Carliſle.

A. D. 1537. Henry had been now ſo accuſtomed to ſlaughter, by frequent executions, that he ſeemed to delight in blood. He ordered Thomas Fitzgerald, ſon to the late earl of Kildare, and five of his uncles, who had ſuffered a long confinement in the Tower for an inſurrection in Ireland, to be executed, in order to intimidate the people, who ſeemed ripe for a revolt. But Stephen Fitzgerald, the earl's youngeſt ſon, eſcaped to the continent, and retired to cardinal Pole, who made uſe of him in the deſigns he had formed of recovering England to the obedience of the Holy See.

On the 12th of October the queen was delivered of a prince at Hampton Court, to the inexpreſſible joy of Henry in particular, and the nation in general. He had now obtained the object of his moſt ardent wiſhes: he was bleſſed with a ſon, the undoubted heir of all his dominions: but his ſatisfaction was greatly leſſened by the death of the queen, which happened ſoon after her delivery. She was the moſt beloved of all his wives, and highly celebrated for her humble deportment, her goodneſs and her affability. The young prince was baptized by the name of Edward, and three days after declared prince of Wales, duke of Cornwall, and earl of Cheſter. At the ſame time the queen's brother, Sir Edward Seymour, was created earl of Hertford; Sir William Fitzwilliams, earl of Southampton; and Sir William Paulet, lord St. John.

A. D. 1538. Henry's power and authority were greatly ſtrengthened by the birth of a prince: his ſubjects paid him reſpect through fear, and the greateſt princes of Europe courted his friendſhip. The monks were the only people of whom he had the leaſt diſagreeable apprehenſion; and he was determined to eclipſe the probability of their being ever able to give him any future diſturbance, by a total abolition of all the monaſteries throughout the kingdom.

To effect this he procured addreſſes from the two univerſities; wherein the pernicious nature of religious houſes, which harboured only a multitude of lazy drones and ſwarms of impoſtors, were fully diſplayed, and the king requeſted to remove ſo great an evil. A viſitation was accordingly appointed, and the viſitors were particularly enjoined to enquire into the impoſtures that had been practiſed to draw the people into ſuch exceſſive adoration as had been paid to their images, relics and other miraculous productions. Nor was the enquiry deſtitute of ſucceſs; ſeveral aſtoniſhing diſcoveries were made, which tended greatly to leſſen the authority of the Romiſh prieſts in the eyes of the people.

One of the moſt ſingular inſtruments of deception was found at Boxley in Kent. It was a remarkable crucifix, held in the higheſt veneration, and diſtinguiſhed by the appellation of the Rood of Grace. It had been often ſeen to move, to bend and raiſe itſelf, ſhake its head, hands and feet, roll its eyes, and move its lips. On removing the image it was diſcovered that the whole was effected by certain ſprings concealed in the body, which was hollow from the wall againſt which it was placed. This inſtrument of religious deception was brought to London, and the whole contrivance exhibited to the people at St. Paul's Croſs by Hilſey biſhop of Rocheſter, who, after preaching a ſermon ſuitable to the occaſion, committed the idol to the flames.

It is little to be wondered at that diſcoveries like theſe ſhould raiſe a general indignation among the people. The authors of ſuch ſcandalous abuſes were deteſted; the monaſteries were conſidered as infamous; and the crimes of a few were extended to the whole body of the religious.[*] This gave Henry the advantage he deſired; and the monks, convinced that it would be madneſs to make any oppoſition, ſurrendered their monaſteries, and many of them received penſions for their ſubſiſtence. No leſs than five hundred and forty-five monaſteries were diſſolved, twenty-eight of which had abbots, who enjoyed ſeats in parliament. Ninety colleges were demoliſhed in the ſeveral counties; two thouſand three hundred and ſeventy-four chauntries and free chapels; and one hundred and ten hoſpitals. The whole annual revenue of theſe eſtabliſhments amounted to one hundred and ſixty thouſand one hundred pounds.

Whilſt Henry was thus employed in demoliſhing the baſis of ſuperſtition, it could not be ſuppoſed he would overlook the moſt famous and reſpected of all inſtruments of popiſh idolatry, the ſhrine of St. Thomas of Canterbury. Becket was indebted, for the honour of being ranked among the ſaints, to the vigorous efforts he had exerted in defence of the authority of the Holy-See; and a ſaint of that character muſt be highly obnoxious to Henry, who was determined to aboliſh the power of the Roman pontiff in England. He could not bear the thought, that ſuch a furious and obſtinate rebel to his prince ſhould be held in the higheſt veneration by the people, his tomb frequented by pilgrims, and enriched with ſuperb preſents. It was not uncommon, in theſe times, to carry on proceſſes againſt the dead, and Henry availed himſelf of the practice. The life of Becket underwent a ſtrict examination; his actions were condemned by the generality of the people; and the miracles pretended to be wrought at his tomb were proved to be forgeries. His name was therefore ordered to be eraſed out of the Calendar, the office compoſed for his feſtival expunged from the Breviary, his bones to be burnt, and his aſhes diſperſed by the winds. The rich ſhrine of the ſaint had alſo attracted the rapacity of Henry, who converted the whole to his own uſe. Among the ſpoils was a diamond eſteemed the moſt valuable in Europe. It was a preſent from Lewis VII. of France, who made a pilgrimage to the ſhrine of St. Thomas. This jewel was, by Henry's orders, ſet in a ring, and worn afterwards by that monarch. At the ſame time, Henry, in order to reconcile the people to theſe innovations, eſtabliſhed ſix new biſhoprics, gave large donations to his courtiers, and ſettled ſalaries on the abbots and monks.

As ſoon as the court of Rome received intelligence of theſe proceedings in England, that city was filled with ſatires and libels againſt the perſon of Henry. Cardinal Pole's ſtyle was eaſily diſtinguiſhed in theſe invectives, which were ſoon diſperſed over all Europe. Henry, whoſe vanity and ſanguinary diſpoſition daily increaſed, determined to revenge the inſult. The cardinal himſelf was beyond his power; but ſeveral gentlemen of diſtinction, among whom were his two brothers, were arreſted, as his accomplices in a conſpiracy againſt the king's life; and all of them were executed, except Sir Geoffrey Pole, who was pardoned on account of his having diſcovered all he knew of the cardinal's intentions.

The pope had hitherto ſuſpended the bull of excommunication formerly paſſed againſt Henry, in hopes of being one day able to accommodate his difference with that monarch: but finding that the late proceedings in England had rendered a reconciliation impoſſible, he publiſhed the bull with great ſolemnity, and endeavoured to excite the neighbouring powers againſt a prince whom he conſigned to deſtruction.

Henry, however, was not to be intimidated. He knew that the thunder of the Vatican had loſt its force; and that the cultivation of reaſon had removed a corner of the veil which ignorance and ſuperſtition had formed to conceal the rays of truth from the eyes of mankind. He therefore ſet the pope's power at defiance; and enacted a new oath from the clergy, by which they renounced the authority of the Roman pontiff. The new tranſlation of the Bible was alſo now finiſhed, and preſented to the king by Cromwell, who was perſuaded that nothing could ſo effectually eradicate the popiſh ſuperſtition as a free toleration of the ſcriptures in the vulgar tongue. But Henry, who halted half way between the Catholics and the Proteſtants, would not permit an indiſcriminate uſe of the ſcriptures; he would only allow a copy of the tranſlation to be depoſited in each pariſh church, where it was ordered to be fixed by a chain; and took care to inform the public by proclamation, "That this indulgence was not the effect of his duty, but of his goodneſs and liberality to them; who therefore ſhould uſe it moderately, for the increaſe of virtue not of ſtrife: and ordered, that no man ſhoul read the bible aloud, ſo as to diſturb the prieſt while he ſang maſs, nor preſume to expound doubtful paſſages without the advice of the learned." This indulgence was, however, conſidered as a great acquiſition by the friends to the Reformation; eſpecially as they obtained a royal warrant, enjoining the clergy to read the Lord's Prayer, the Creed, and the Ten Commandments, in Engliſh. At the ſame time they were ordered to recommend good works; and to teach the people, that relics, roſaries, and other ſuperſtitious trifles were unneceſſary to ſalvation.

[*] A late celebrated hiſtorical writer, in ſpeaking of the general ſuppreſſion of religious houſes by Henry VIII. obſerves, "that he might with equal propriety have ſuppreſſed all the inns in the kingdom, becauſe ſome few were receptacles for the vicious and abandoned."

Although Henry had proceeded with ſuch animoſity againſt the Roman pontiff, yet he prided himſelf on his zeal for the catholic faith: he was even ambitious of defending it by diſputation, as well as by perſecution; and the doctrine of the real preſence, or that of Tranſubſtantiation, (the moſt incomprehenſible of all the dogmas in the Romiſh religion) was the point he maintained with the greateſt obſtinacy. One Lambert, a ſchoolmaſter of London, had ventured to doubt of the real preſence; and being cited to appear before the biſhops, he appealed to the king. Henry was charmed with having ſo fine an opportunity of diſplaying his theological talents. He thought it no derogation from his dignity to hold a public diſputation with that reformer. Notice was accordingly given that the king intended to enter the liſts againſt Lambert, and ſcaffolds were erected in Weſtminſter-hall for the accommodation of the audience. The king himſelf appeared in the enſigns of majeſty ſeated upon his throne, having the prelates on his right hand, and the temporal peers on his left.

The biſhop of Chicheſter, who opened the conference, informed the ſchoolmaſter, that the king had taken the preſent opportunity of convincing him of his errors; adding, that if he ſtill continued to perſevere in his heretical opinions, he muſt expect the ſevereſt puniſhment. Lambert defended his opinion with great intrepidity; but the king, aſſiſted by ten biſhops, who all engaged in the diſpute, (if indeed ſo partial a conteſt deſerves the name) effectually confounded the diſputant, after the conference had laſted five hours. But though confounded and reduced to ſilence, he was not convinced: and when the king aſked him whether he would live or die? Lambert replied, that he threw himſelf entirely on his majeſty's clemency. The king replied, that he protected not heretics, and he muſt either abjure his opinions or periſh. Lambert choſe the latter, and died with the utmoſt intrepidity amidſt the moſt dreadful torture.

A. D. 1539. Henry was ſo intoxicated with the praiſes that had been laviſhed on him on account of his diſpute with Lambert, that he exacted, with more violence than ever, a ſubmiſſion to his religious ſentiments. To think different from him on theological ſubjects was equal to committing a capital crime; and he took the advantage of the ſervility of his parliament, to make his own opinion the ſtandard of orthodoxy in England. The chancellor informed the two houſes, that it was his majeſty's deſire to extirpate from his kingdom all diverſity of opinion with regard to religion; and a committee was immediately appointed to draw up a bill for effecting that purpoſe. But it was ſoon found that ſuch a diverſity of ſentiments prevailed among the members of the committee that there were no hopes of their ever making a report. A bill was, therefore, drawn up, either by Henry himſelf, or ſome member of the privy council, and preſented to the houſe, where it was paſſed into a law. It was called "The bill of the Six Articles," or, as the proteſtants juſtly termed it, "The Bloody bill." By this law the preſence in the euchariſt; communion in one kind; the perpetual obligation of vows of chaſtity; the celibacy of eccleſiaſtics; the utility of private maſſes; and the neceſſity of auricular confeſſion, were eſtabliſhed. Whoever denied the real preſence was ſubjected to death by fire; nor was he even admitted to abjure his error. The puniſhment of the other articles was alſo remarkably ſevere; for though abjuration was admitted, the offender was puniſhed by the confiſcation of goods and chattles, and impriſonment. Thoſe who continued obſtinate, or who relapſed, were capitally puniſhed. The clergy, who ventured to marry were alſo ſubject to death; and fines and impriſonment were inflicted on all thoſe who refuſed to confeſs themſelves, or to receive the euchariſt at appointed ſeaſons. It is difficult to conceive the idea of regulations more unjuſt and ſevere. Cranmer alone had the courage to oppoſe this bill; but when it was paſſed into a law, he immediately ſeparated himſelf from his wife, and Henry was ſatiſfied with this proof of his ſubmiſſion. Latimer and Shaxton threw up their biſhoprics on account of this act, and being accuſed of having ſpoken againſt it, were committed priſoners to the Tower.

The parliament alſo paſſed an act, whereby the king was empowered to nominate any number of biſhops, ſees for biſhops, and cathedral churches, as he thought proper, and to endow them with ſuch poſſeſſions as he might judge convenient. an act was likewiſe paſſed, by which the parliament inveſted in in the crown all the abbey-lands, upon the falſe pretence, that the ſurrenders made by the abbots, priors, and ſuperiors, had been "without conſtraint, of their own accord, and according to the due courſe of common law." Nor did any of the mitred abbots, who ſtill kept their ſeats in the Houſe of Peers, enter any proteſt againſt this ſtatute; though it was ſufficiently known that arts of all kinds had been employed; that every motive, calculated to work upon the frailty of human nature, had been ſet before them; and that it was at laſt with the utmoſt difficulty thoſe dignified eccleſiaſtics agreed to a conceſſion, which moſt of them regarded as deſtructive of their intereſts, as well as ſacrilegious and criminal in itſelf.

By the ſlaviſh conceſſion of the parliament Henry's will was now become the law of the land; and both the Proteſtant and Popiſh parties cultivated his favour with the moſt abject ſubmiſſion. Bonner, lately made biſhop of London, though in ſecret a zealous partizan of the pope's authority, found means, by the moſt profound diſſimulation, to obtain letters patent for enjoying both the ſpiritual and temporal revenues of his ſee during the king's pleaſure: and Gardiner, a biggotted ſon of the Romiſh church, maintained his influence by the moſt extravagant ſubmiſſion.

Theſe prelates encouraged the Catholics to be extremely vigilant in informing againſt all who refuſed to ſubſcribe to the ſix articles; and no leſs than five hundred perſons were ſoon thrown into priſon. But though Cromwell and Cranmer had not intereſt enough to prevent the act from paſſing, they were able, for ſome time, to elude its execution: they even remonſtrated againſt the cruelty of puniſhing ſo many delinquents, and obtained permiſſion to ſet them at liberty. Thus the uncertainty of Henry's temper gave each party an opportunity of triumphing in their turn. The law of the ſix articles, which ſeemed intended to extirpate the reformed religion, was ſoon followed by a general permiſſion for every one to have the new tranſlation of the Bible in his family; a conceſſion regarded by the Proteſtants as a deciſive victory over the Catholics.

Henry had for ſome time intimated his intentions of entering into a new marriage. Cromwell now thought it a convenient opportunity of ſtrengthening his party by recommending to the king a proteſtant princeſs. He accordingly propoſed Anne, daughter to the duke of Cleves, and the younger ſiſter to the ducheſs of Saxony. The king was ſo well pleaſed with the propoſal, that he immediately ſent over Cromwell to negotiate the treaty of marriage. The famous Hans Holbein was ordered to draw the lady's picture, which he did in ſo flattering a manner, that when Cromwell preſented it to Henry, he became enraptured with her perſon, and pleaſed himſelf with expectations of the moſt diſtinguiſhed enjoyments. In ſhort, the negotiation went on ſo briſkly, that the match was concluded in a few weeks, and the earl of Southampton was ordered to go with a fleet of fifty ſhips to bring over the new queen, who landed in England about the middle of December.

The union of this princeſs with Henry would, in all probability, have totally fruſtrated the attempts of the popiſh party for the future, had ſhe anſwered the beauty and great character given of her by her friends; but when the king, all impatience to ſee his conſort, of whom he had entertained ſo high an idea, beheld her on her arrival at Rocheſter, whither he went for that purpoſe, he was ſo diſappointed, that he is ſaid to have ſwore in a rage, "that they had brought over a Flanders mare to him." But however groſs and indelicate his expreſſions might be, his behaviour was more decent, for the next day he made her a private viſit. This lady is generally allowed to have poſſeſſed a great ſweetneſs of temper; but as her perſon was far from being delicate, as ſhe had a maſculine turn and floridneſs of features, could ſpeak nothing but German, which Henry did not underſtand, and was extremely defective in all the winning graces of behaviour and converſation, he conceived an utter averſion to her, and even then would abruptly have broken off the match, had not his affairs at home required the friendſhip and alliance of the German princes her relations. Theſe conſiderations, which were ſtrongly urged by Cranmer and Cromwell, made the king at length conſent to proceed in the marriage, but with ſo viſible a reluctance, that Cromwell and his party dreaded the conſequences.

A. D. 1540. The marriage was accordingly celebrated on the 6th of January; but it ſerved only to encreaſe Henry's diſlike into downright loathing. He told Cromwell the next morning, that he ſuſpected the queen was no maid, and that he could never conquer his averſion to ſo diſagreeable a partner.

The parliament meeting on the 12th of April, Cromwell opened the ſeſſions with a ſpeech, in which he informed the two houſes, that the king, in order to terminate all diſputes about religion, had appointed commiſſioners to examine the ſix articles, that a ſtandard of faith might be eſtabliſhed upon the word of God alone; and that after the truth ſhould be thus made known to his people, he was reſolved to puniſh, with the utmoſt ſeverity, all thoſe who ſhould preſume to prefer their own opinions to the eſtabiſhed articles of belief. Theſe commiſſioners, being approved by the parliament, received orders to begin their enquiry without delay; and in the mean time the king created Cromwell earl of Eſſex.*

The time, however, was now come when this faithful miniſter was to taſte the bitter cup of adverſity. The king's marriage with Anne of Cleves had been principally effected by him; and though the king had ſo lately conferred favours on him, yet he was ſecretly diſguſted on that account, and now treated him with a viſible indifference. The duke of Norfolk and Gardiner (who were inveterate foes to Cromwell) obſerved this prognoſtic of the miniſter's fall, and determined to improve it. They well knew, that he was hated by the nobility, becauſe they ſaw themſelves eclipſed at court by a perſon of mean extraction; that he was odious to the catholics, becauſe they regarded him as a ſworn enemy to the church of Rome; and that he was ſuſpected by the proteſtants of having betrayed their intereſt through timidity. They did not, however, think it prudent to attack him abruptly, but to have recourſe to ſtratagem. They introduced Catherine Howard, a beautiful young lady, and neice to the duke of Norfolk, at court. The king was highly pleaſed with Catherine; and Gardiner, at once the pander and the prieſt, made frequent entertainments at his own houſe for the royal lover and his miſtreſs. The ſtratagem ſucceeded; and Henry was ſo pleaſed with his miſtreſs, that he offered to make her his partner in the throne.

Norfolk and Gardiner now acquired the higheſt credit in the cabinet, and made uſe of the vileſt inſinuations to ruin the miniſter. They repreſented to Henry, that the nation in general was diſſatisfied with his adminiſtration, and perſuaded that Cromwell had abuſed his majeſty's confidence. They added that as theſe complaints and murmurings chiefly regarded religion, it would be prudent to ſatisfy the people by examining his conduct ſtrictly, and even, if neceſſary, to ſacrifice him in order to procure the tranquillity of the kingdom. Henry, who was exaſperated againſt Cromwell, readily liſtened to theſe inſinuations, and it was determined that the miniſter ſhould fall a victim to the reſentment of the public.

This reſolution, however, was kept ſo ſecret, that, not ſuſpecting any danger, the deſtined victim came to the council-board on the 13th of June, where the duke of Norfolk, by Henry's order, arreſted him for high treaſon; in conſequence of which he was committed priſoner to the Tower, where he experienced the common fate of all degraded miniſters. He was no ſooner ſeized than forſaken by all his friends except Cranmer, who alone ventured to write to the king in his favour, though to no purpoſe; for the unfortunate Cromwell, without being heard in his own defence, was, by a bill of attainder, found guilty of divers hereſies and treaſons, and condemned to ſuffer death as the king ſhould think proper to direct.

While Cromwell was under this woeful ſentence Henry determined to procure a divorce from Anne of Cleves. He found no difficulty in obtaining a deciſion from the convocation in his favour. It was ſaid that there had been a pre-contract between the queen and the marquis of Lorrain; that the king had not "inwardly" given his conſent, and that he had never conſummated his marriage. Theſe objections were certainly very frivolous, but as the queen made no oppoſition, they were thought ſufficient, ſentence was pronounced for a diſſolution of the marriage, and the deciſion of the clergy was ratified by the parliament. The queen expreſſed no diſſatisfaction. She was ſatisfied on being informed, that the king, would, by letters patent, declare her his adopted ſiſter, and give her precedence before all the ladies of England, except his own wife and daughters; that an eſtate of three thouſand pounds a year ſhould be allotted for her maintenance; and ſhe might either live in England, or return to her own country. She choſe the former, and was even prevailed upon to to write a letter to her brother, the duke of Cleves, informing him, that ſhe had been treated in the moſt tender and generous manner by the king, though ſhe could not have him for her huſband; and conjuring him not to break the harmony that ſubſiſted between the two courts, on account of any thing that had happened to her in England. Thus was the marriage with Anne of Cleves diſſolved on the moſt frivolous pretences that ever were urged before any court of juſtice.

* During this ſeſſion the order of Kights of St. John of Jeruſalem was ſuppreſſed, on account of their dependence on the pope and the emperor, and all their effects in England and Ireland confiſcated for the uſe of the king, who allotted 3000l. yearly for their maintenance. About this time alſo Henry put three hoſpitals, namely, thoſe of Bridewell, St. Bartholomew and St. Thomas, into the hands of the city of London.

As Cromwell's execution had been poſtponed on account of the king's divorce, he was in ſome hopes of obtaining his pardon, and the more, as having written the king a very ſubmiſſive letter, with which his majeſty was ſo moved, that he cauſed it to be thrice read over to him; but the ſolicitations of Norfolk and Gardiner rendered the endeavours of the priſoner or his friends fruitleſs. On this occaſion Cranmer was the only perſon who diſcharged the part of a true friend: he wrote a very pathetic letter to Henry, interceding for the unhappy Cromwell, declaring his firm belief of his innocence from any diſloyal meaning, and even went ſo far as to wiſh that Henry might find another counſellor equal to him in capacity, diligence and fidelity; but the fallen favourite's ruin being reſolved on, the king ſigned a warrant for beheading him on the twenty-eighth of July.

When he was brought to the ſcaffold on Tower-hill, his regard for his ſon hindered him from expatiating upon his own innocence: he thanked God for bringing him to that death for his tranſactions; he acknowledged his offences againſt God and his prince, who had raiſed him from a low degree; confeſſed that he had been ſeduced, but that now he died in the catholic faith. He then deſired the ſpectators to pray for the king, the prince, and for himſelf; and having ſpent a little time at his own private devotion, ſubmitted his neck to the executior, who mangled him in a moſt ſhocking manner. The care he had taken in his laſt moments to ſay nothing that might offend the king, turned to the advantage of his ſon Gregory, who was, a few months afterwards, created a peer, by the title of Lord Cromwell*.

A few days after the death of Cromwell, Henry gave a terrible inſtance of that cruelty which ſeemed now to have taken poſſeſſion of his ſoul. Papiſts and Proteſtants were equally the objects of his infernal paſſion: they both ſuffered for the tenets of their religion. The former denied the king's ſupremacy, and the latter the real preſence in the ſacrament; both were contrary to the religious eſtabliſhment of Henry, and therefore both equally ſubject to puniſhment. Dr. Barnes, Thomas Gerard, a reforming miniſter, and William Jerome, vicar of Stepney, were condemned to the ſtake for hereſy; but they did not ſuffer alone, three bigotted catholics ſhared the ſame fate, and periſhed in the ſame flames, for denying the king's ſupremacy; and to increaſe the abſurdity of this indiſcriminate cruelty, they were drawn to the place of execution on three hurdles, a papiſt and a proteſtant on each. Barnes diſcuſſed theological queſtions even at the ſtake; and as the debate between him and the ſheriff turned upon the invocation of ſaints, he ſaid, that he doubted whether the ſaints could pray for us; but if they could he hoped, in half an hour, to be praying for the ſheriff and all the ſpectators. This promiſcuous puniſhment of proteſtants and catholics gave occaſion to a foreigner, then in England, to ſay, That it was of no conſequence whether they were for or againſt the pope, ſince both loſt their lives for their opinions.

On the 8th of Auguſt Catherine Howard (to whom the king had been ſome time privately married) was publickly declared queen of England. By this marriage the popiſh intereſt was ſtrengthened, and that party made a ſtrong puſh at Cranmer; but the king's affection for him was ſo riveted, that their endeavours proved abortive.

A. D. 1541. It is little to be wondered at that Henry's deſpotic cruelty ſhould have excited the general hatred of the people; they conceived an abhorrence for the author of ſuch deteſtable proceedings, and ſome alarming ſymptoms of an inſurrection appeared in ſeveral parts of the kingdom. The king's ſuſpicion fell upon cardinal Pole; and this was to him a ſufficient reaſon for putting the counteſs of Saliſbury, the mother of that prelate, to death. She was the laſt of the Plantagenet race, and venerable both for her age and her virtues. She was led to the place of execution; but even in thoſe diſtreſsful circumſtances ſhe did not loſe her courage. She refuſed to ſubmit to a ſentence pronounced without a trial; and, running about the ſcaffold, ſhe told the executioner, that if he would have her head, he muſt win it in the beſt manner he could. Nor was it till after he had aimed many blows at her neck, that he at laſt gave her the finiſhing ſtroke. The fate of this unhappy princeſs drew tears from all the beholders; nor was there ſcarce a ſingle perſon who did not lament her cruel and untimely diſſolution.

* Thomas Cromwell was born at Putney, in Surry; his father was only a country blackſmith, but he being bleſſed with a ſprightly genius and a ready capacity to learn languages, acquired ſo great reputation in the art of war under the duke of Bourbon, whom he accompanied at the ſacking of Rome in 1527, and ſkill in the modern tongues, and intereſts of the ſtates through which he travelled, as, upon his return, recommended him to the favour of the king. Mr. Cromwell ſoon improved the royal patronage to his own advantage, for the king, who took pleaſure in raiſing men of low birth to great honours, being highly ſatisfied with the management of the affairs committed to him, declared him a privy-counſellor and maſter of the jewel-houſe, in 1531; and next year raiſed him to be clerk of the hanaper, and chancellor of the exchequer. In 1534, he was appointed principal ſecretary of ſtate and maſter of the Rolls; and in 1535, he was created vicar-general over all the ſpiritualities under his majeſty as ſupreme head of the church. On the ſecond of July 1536, he was ſworn in lord-keeper of the privy-ſeal; and on the ninth of the ſame month was advanced to the dignity of a baron of England, with the ſtyle and title of lord Cromwell, baron of Oakham, in the county of Rutland. In 1540, on the 17th of April, he was created earl of Eſſex, and ſoon after made lord high-chamberlain of England.——His chief fault was obſequiouſneſs to the king's pleaſure, the effect of an inordinate zeal for his maſter's ſervice: in other reſpects he is ſcarce ſufficiently to be admired for his prodigious parts, excellent judgment, infinite application to buſineſs, wonderful dexterity in managing affairs, great moderation in the exerciſe of his authority, calmneſs of temper in his dealings with all perſons, and, (under provocations ſufficient to ruffle the ſedateſt,) an uncommon generoſity and nobleneſs of mind, notwithſtanding the meanneſs of his extraction; and for an unexampled condeſcenſion in the height of his pomp, vouchſafing to take notice of his old acquaintance, and ſhew his gratitude for favours received.——As a proof of the juſtneſs of this laſt part of his character, it may not be improper to recite the following circumſtance:

While he was abroad in a military character, in a very low ſtation, he fell ſick, and was unable to follow the army. He was obſerved one day by an Italian merchant to walk very penſive, and had all the appearance of penury and wretchedneſs. The merchant enquired of him the place of his birth, and fortune; and upon converſing with him was ſo well pleaſed with the account he gave of himſelf, that he ſupplied him with money and credit to carry him to England. It happened ſome years after (when Cromwell had attained the moſt diſtinguiſhed honours from his ſovereign) that this Italian merchant's circumſtances decayed, and he came to England to ſolicit the payment of ſome debts due to him by his correſpondents; who finding him neceſſitous, were diſpoſed to put him off, and to take the advantage of his want, to avoid payment. This not a little embarraſſed the foreigner, who was now in a ſituation forlorn enough. As chance would have it, lord Cromwell, then earl of Eſſex, riding to court, ſaw this merchant walking with a dejected countenance, which put him in mind of his former ſituation. He immediately ordered one of his attendants to deſire the merchant to come to his houſe. His lordſhip aſked the merchant whether he knew him? He anſwered, No. Cromwell then related the circumſtance of the merchant's relieving a certain Engliſhman; and aſked if he remembered it? The merchant anſwered, that he had always made it his buſineſs to do good, but did not remember that circumſtance. His lordſhip then enquired the reaſon of his coming to England; and upon the merchant's telling him the ſtory, he ſo intereſted himſelf, as ſoon to procure the payment of all his debts. Cromwell then informed the merchant, that he was himſelf the perſon he had thus relieved; and for every ducat which the merchant had given him, he returned to the value of an hundred, telling him that this was the payment of his debt. He then made him a munificent preſent, and aſked him whether he choſe to ſettle in England or return to his own country? The foreigner choſe the latter, and returned to ſpend the remainder of his days in competence and quiet, after having experienced in lord Eſſex, one of the moſt diſtinguiſhed inſtances of generoſity and gratitude.

Henry had been ſo often alarmed at the frequent inſurrections of the popiſh faction in the northern counties, that he now determined to viſit thoſe parts in perſon, in order, if poſſible, to terminate theſe diſorders, by puniſhing, with the utmoſt ſeverity, all who had preſumed to diſturb the tranquillity of the kingdom. The inhabitants were no ſtrangers to his cruel diſpoſition, and therefore wiſely determined to avoid his vengeance, by offering him a conſiderable ſum of money. Henry accepted of the commutation, and deſiſted from carrying his deſigns into execution.

Before Henry left London, he had diſpatched Sir Ralph Sadler into Scotland, to propoſe an interview with James V. who agreed to meet Henry at York, in order to concert meaſures for the peace of both kingdoms, But at the inſtigation of his queen, and the principal part of the Scotch nobility, he was prevailed on to alter his reſolution. He therefore, after delaying his journey for ſome days, ſent excuſes to Henry, who waited for him at York. The Engliſh monarch was irritated at this diſappointment, and vowed the moſt ſevere revenge; but an event, which happened ſoon after his departure, obliged him to poſtpone the execution of his intentions.

During Henry's ſtay at York, a perſon named Laſcelles informed the archbiſhop of Canterbury, that the queen, in the former part of her life, had been little better than a common ſtrumpet. He offered to confirm his information by the evidence of his ſiſter, who had lived as a ſervant in the old ducheſs of Norfolk's houſe, where the queen had been educated, and where ſhe had carried on a criminal intrigue with Derham and Mannock, two menial ſervants. Struck with this intelligence, which it was dangerous either to conceal or diſcover, Cranmer communicated it to the chancellor and the earl of Hertford, and requeſted their advice with regard to the moſt prudent method of proceeding in ſo delicate an affair. They knew that Henry, though extremely ſcrupulous in every particular that regarded his honour, was captivated by the youth, beauty, and agreeable diſpoſition of Catherine. He had even put up a prayer in his chapel, returning thanks to heaven for the felicity he enjoyed in the conjugal ſtate; and had deſired the biſhop of Lincoln to compoſe a form of thankſgiving for that purpoſe. But notwithſtanding theſe demonſtrations of the king's eſteem for Catherine, it was reſolved that the matter ſhould not be buried in ſilence, and that the primate himſelf was the moſt proper perſon to diſcloſe it to his majeſty. Cranmer, unwilling to ſpeak upon ſo delicate a ſubject, wrote a narrative of the whole proceeding, and ſent it by a ſpecial meſſenger to the king. It is impoſſible to expreſs the ſurprize and confuſion of Henry when he received the archbiſhop's relation of the queen's infamous conduct; but, at the ſame time, he thought himſelf ſo fully convinced of his conſort's fidelity, that he at firſt gave no credit to the information, and declared that he looked upon the whole as a malicious forgery; but as he could not reſt till he knew the certainty of the matter, he ordered it to be enquired into with ſuch precautions as might preſerve the queen from any ſcandal, ſhould ſhe be found innocent. It was therefore reſolved, that the lord privy-ſeal ſhould examine Laſcelles. This he accordingly did, and found him ſteady in his information. The ſiſter of Laſcelles was next examined, and ſhe confirmed the teſtimony of her brother by undeniable evidence. It was now thought neceſſary to arreſt Derham and Mannock, which was eaſily done, as they had not the leaſt ſuſpicion of their danger. They both confeſſed repeated acts of impurity with the queen before her marriage; and it was proved, that ſhe had ſince entertained one Culpepper a whole night in her bed-chamber, and had at different times made him very conſiderable preſents.

When Henry received the report of theſe examinations, his grief and diſtraction deprived him of ſpeech; and he could only vent his diſtreſs by a torrent of tears. He appointed the primate, the chancellor, the duke of Norfolk, the earl of Suffolk, and the biſhop of Wincheſter, to interrogate the queen on this ſubject. She at firſt denied the charge; but finding her illicit amours were fully diſcovered, ſhe confeſſed the whole to the archbiſhop, who wrote the narrative from her mouth, and ſhe ſigned it with her own hand.

A. D. 1542. Henry was now convinced of the infidelity of his queen, and determined to take a ſevere revenge on her and her accomplices. A parliament, (the uſual inſtrument of Henry's tyranny) was immediately ſummoned; and the queen's confeſſion being laid before them, they preſented an addreſs to his majeſty, in which, after entreating him not to be concerned at this untoward misfortune, to which all men are ſubject, they deſired leave to frame a bill of attainder againſt the queen and her accomplices. They received a gracious anſwer; and proceeded immediately to attaint of high-treaſon the queen, and the counteſs of Rochford, who had conducted her ſecret amours; and in this act both Derham and Culpepper were included. They alſo paſſed a bill of attainder for miſpriſion of treaſon againſt the old ducheſs of Norfolk, Catherine's grandmother, lord William Howard and his lady, the counteſs of Bridgewater, and nine other perſons; becauſe they were acquainted with the queen's illicit amours, and did not make the neceſſary diſcovery before her marriage.

Under this tyrannical government the ties of natural affection became crimes; and it was expected that relations ſhould expoſe the ſecret failings of each other. Nor were the parliament aſhamed to aſſiſt the fury and madneſs of the king. They paſſed an act, whereby it was declared, that any perſon who knew, or vehemently ſuſpected any guilt in the queen, and did not, within twenty days, reveal it to the king or council, ſhould be guilty of treaſon; and that if the king married any woman who had been incontinent, taking her for a true maid, ſhe ſhould be guilty of treaſon, unleſs ſhe revealed her guilt previous to her marriage.

In conſequence of this act, the queen and lady Rochford were beheaded the twelfth of February upon Tower hill. The queen confeſſed her miſconduct in the former part of her life; but endeavoured to perſuade the world, that ſhe had never tranſgreſſed the rules of virtue ſince her marriage with the king. Lady Rochford found very little pity from the ſpectators: her execution was conſidered as a judgment from heaven for her having been the principal cauſe of the death of Anne Boleyn, and that of her own huſband; and this notorious inſtance of her profligate life tended greatly to clear their characters in the opinion of the world. The dutcheſs dowager of Norfolk, and the other perſons attainted of miſpriſion of treaſon, were pardoned. Derham was hanged, and Mannock was got off by forfeiting his eſtate, which was very conſiderable.

This diſagreeable affair being ended, Henry now determined to revenge the affront he had received from the Scottiſh monarch. He publiſhed a manifeſto, in which he reproached James with the breach of his promiſe, with having afforded an aſylum to ſeveral Engliſh rebels, and with retaining ſome territories which belonged to England. He alſo revived the old claim of the dependence of the crown of Scotland, and ſummoned James to do homage for his kingdom.

The Scottiſh monarch made no anſwer to this declaration; but employed his whole attention to raiſe an army, in order to diſappoint the ambitious deſigns of Henry. His reſentment was greatly increaſed by the French ambaſſador, who had brought with him conſiderable ſupplies of men and money, and was extremely laviſh of the promiſes he made in the name of his maſter, of effectual aſſiſtance and ſupport.

Henry, having raiſed an army of 30,000 men, gave the command of them to the duke of Norfolk, who rendezvouſed his forces at Newcaſtle. The earl of Southampton was appointed to command the van; but he died at Newcaſtle, univerſally regretted for his bilities as a ſtateſman, and his approved courage and prudence as a general.

On the 20th of October, the Engliſh army entered Scotland, and were met by a herald from James, ho expoſtulated with the duke of Norfolk on the in-uſtice of invading the kingdom before any declara-ion of war had been publiſhed. But his remon-trances were in vain: the Engliſh general ravaged all he country bordering on the Tweed, and retired to erwick on account of the ſeverity of the weather. he earl of Huntley had indeed been ſent by James, t the head of ten thouſand men; but his forces were far inferior to the Engliſh, that he was obliged to ct wholly on the defenſive.

The Scottiſh monarch, however, was far from eing terrified. He levied an army of fifteen thou-nd men; and being joined by the earl of Huntley ith a train of artillery, he determined to invade ngland on the weſtern ſide of the Solway Frith. mes repaired thither in perſon; but as ſoon as every ing was ready for croſſing into England, he left the my under the command of his favourite, Oliver nclair, who was hated by the Scottiſh nobility. e conſequences of ſo imprudent an action were on apparent. The officers choſe to ſacrifice their g, their country, and their own honour, rather n ſerve under a perſon they deteſted. Accord-ly, when Sinclair read his commiſſion at the head the army, the nobility retired from their poſts; the ſoldiers following their example, threw down ir arms, ſo that the uproar and confuſion became eral through the whole army. A body of five dred Engliſh forces, under the command of Sir omas Wharton, who hovered round the Scottiſh p to obſerve the motions of the enemy, perceiving diſorder that prevailed among their ranks, attacked n with ſo much fury, that they ſought their ſafety precipitate flight. The earls of Caſſils and ncairn, the lords Maxwell, Fleming, Somerville Gray, the general Sinclair, with about two hun-gentlemen, and eight hundred common ſoldiers, taken priſoners, and all their artillery and age fell into the hands of the Engliſh.

his action, or rather rout, happened at Solway , in the neighbourhood of Carliſle. James was at Caerlaveroc, where he received the alarming ligence of the defeat and diſſipation of his army handful of Engliſh forces. He could not ſup-the diſgrace: his rage and regret ſo affected his , that he repaired immediately to his bed, and ſoon after expired, in the flower of his age. Before his death, news arrived that his queen was ſafely delivered; on which he aſked, with ſome emotion, whether ſhe had brought him a ſon or a daughter? Being told the latter, he turned about in his bed, and exclaimed, "How many miſeries await this poor kingdom! Henry will be maſter of it, either by arms or by marriage."

The death of James, and the birth of a daughter, heireſs of a kingdom whoſe friendſhip was of ſo much importance to England, gave a new turn to the deliberations in the Engliſh council. It was now determined not to drive the Scots to deſpair, by taking the utmoſt advantage of the late victory: on the contrary, a ſcheme was formed for uniting the two kingdoms by a marriage between Edward prince of Wales and the young queen of Scotland. The Scottiſh priſoners were accordingly interrogated on this ſubject; and as they were well diſpoſed to encourage the contrivance, they were all ſet at liberty, on condition of their promiſing to return to London, if the project ſhould become abortive.

A. D. 1543. The great ſucceſs of Henry's arms againſt the Scotch ſo pleaſed the parliament, (which met on the 22d of January) that they granted him a conſiderable ſubſidy. They afterwards paſſed an act for permitting the nobility, gentry, and merchants, to have Engliſh bibles, and other religious books mentioned in the ſtatute, in their houſes, for the inſtruction of their families. This act, which was procured by the influence of Cranmer, contained a clauſe, which mitigated the puniſhment of thoſe who ſhould be found guilty of hereſy; but the king was empowered either to repeal or ſuſpend the force of the act whenever he found it expedient.

When the Scottiſh priſoners returned to their own country they found it involved in the greateſt confuſion. James Hamilton, earl of Arran, was, after the infant princeſs, the next heir to the crown. He was a nobleman of a weak capacity, of a peaceable diſpoſition, and a friend to the Reformation; but not at all adapted to hold the helm of government in theſe tempeſtuous times. The friends of the reformed religion, who were now pretty numerous in Scotland, exhorted him, however, to claim the regency, by virtue of his proximity of blood. Arran liſtened to their importunities, and reſolved to demand it at the meeting of the next parliament. He was powerfully oppoſed by the popiſh faction, at the head of whom was Cardinal Beaton, archbiſhop of St. Andrews, and primate of Scotland; a prieſt of unpopular manners, a zealous Roman Catholic, and of a perſecuting ſpirit. He publiſhed the will of the late monarch ſoon after his death, by which that prince had left the government to him, in conjunction with the earls of Argyle, Huntley, and Murray. By virtue of this inſtrument, which is ſaid to have been forged by that ambitious churchman, he took poſſeſſion of the government; and having joined his intereſt with that of the queen-dowager, ſiſter to the duke of Guiſe, he obtained the conſent of the convention of the ſtates, and excluded the pretenſions of the earl of Arran.

The Cardinal, however, did not long enjoy the power he had thus uſurped. The return of the Scottiſh priſoners enabled Arran to make the moſt powerful oppoſition to the Cardinal's adminiſtration; and the nation being exaſperated at his forgery, the majority of the parliament declared in favor of Arran, and the cardinal was committed to priſon. A negotiation was immediately opened with Sir Ralph Sadler, the Engliſh anbaſſador, and a treaty of marriage was concluded; by which it was ſtipulated, that the queen ſhould remain in Scotland till ſhe was ten years of age; that ſhe ſhould then be ſent to England, in order to be educated; that ſix Scotch noblemen ſhould be ſent as hoſtages to Henry; and that Scotland, notwithſtanding its union with England, ſhould ſtill preſerve its laws and privileges. But Beaton, having found means to eſcape from priſon, excited the eccleſiaſtics againſt this treaty, and awakened the natural antipathy of the Scots againſt the Engliſh. The popiſh party were indefatigable in perſuading the people that an union with England muſt be productive of their own ſlavery. Their endeavours had the deſired effect; the Engliſh ambaſſador was inſulted by the populace, and the regent had no longer any power to protect him.

Perſuaded that theſe violent proceedings muſt occaſion a rupture between the two kingdoms, Sadler ſummoned the priſoners to return to England, purſuant to their engagements; but all of them refuſed to obey, except Gilbert Kennedy, earl of Caſſils, who preferred his honour to his liberty. Henry was ſo pleaſed with this noble behaviour, that he received him with great marks of eſteem, loaded him with preſents, and gave him his liberty without ranſom. Beaton was not at all diſpleaſed at this refuſal of the priſoners, though it reflected diſgrace upon their country. He well knew that they muſt now depend wholly on the government for ſupport, and oppoſe the Engliſh with all their power. A war was now expected between the two kingdoms, and Francis engaged to ſupport the intereſt of Scotland.

Matthew Stewart, earl of Lenox, had been for ſome time, and was ſtill at the French court; and Francis being informed that he was engaged in an antient and hereditary enmity with the family of Hamilton, by whom his father had been murdered, propoſed that he ſhould viſit his native country, and join in ſupporting the cardinal and the queen-mother; promiſing, that a ſupply of money, and, if neceſſary, even military ſuccours, ſhould be ſent after him. He was alſo flattered with the hopes of eſpouſing the queen-dowager; and in caſe of the death of Mary, the infant princeſs, of aſcending the Scottiſh throne in preference to the earl of Arran, whoſe legitimacy was liable to ſome objections.

Tempted by theſe alluring proſpects, Lenox returned to Scotland, and, on his arrival, exerted all his intereſt for breaking off the marriage treaty. He aſſembled a conſiderable number of forces, in order to wreſt the young queen from the hands of the regent; who being unable or unwilling to contend with his enemies, agreed to an accommodation. This important point being gained, the queen and the cardinal, who had now no farther occaſion for the aſſiſtance of Lenox, deſired Francis to recall him; but the earl, informed of their deſign, withdrew to his caſtle at Dumbarton, and the following year threw himſelf into the arms of the Engliſh.

Exaſperated at the conduct of Francis relative to Scotland, Henry determined to break off his alliance with that monarch, and to conclude with the emperor an offenſive and defenſive league againſt France. He therefore ſent a meſſage to Francis, requiring him to renounce his alliance with the Turks, and to make reparation for the damage the infidels had done in Chriſtendom. Francis refuſed to comply with this haughty demand, in conſequence of which Henry immediately declared war againſt that monarch.

During theſe tranſactions a circumſtance happened that ſeemed to promiſe the moſt diſtinguiſhed advantages to the cauſe of the Reformation. The king, on the 12th of July, married Catherine Parr, widow to Neville, lord Latimer; a woman of great virtue and prudence, and well affected to the reformed religion. The new queen, however, had the mortification to find that the perſecutions againſt the reformers were not yet at an end; for, a few days after her marriage, Anthony Perſonne, a prieſt; Robert Teſtwood, a ſinging-man, and Henry Fulmer, a taylor, were, at the inſtigation of Gardiner, biſhop of Wincheſter, burnt at Windſor, for reading the writings of the reformed. At the ſame time the biſhop's own ſecretary was executed for denying the king's ſupremacy.

A. D. 1544. In the month of January Henry convoked a parliament, who paſſed an act for regulating the pre-eminence of thoſe who might lay claim to the throne. Prince Edward and his poſterity held the firſt rank; the next was placed in the preſent queen, or any future wife; the third was aſſigned to the princeſs Mary and her iſſue; and the fourth to Elizabeth and her children. But to convince theſe princeſſes, that this diſtinction was the abſolute effect of their father's indulgence, the act ſubjected them to any conditions he might think proper to impoſe. By a clauſe in this ſtatute all ſubjects were obliged to take a new oath, renouncing the papal authority, on pain of incurring heavy penalties, which were alſo decreed againſt all thoſe who ſhould violate any article contained in this act of parliament.

During this ſeſſion, the title of king of England, France and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, and Supreme Head of the Anglican and Iriſh Churches was for ever united to the crown of England.

In the ſpring of this year, Henry ſent a fleet and army to invade Scotland. The fleet amounted to near 200 ſail, and had on board a body of ten thouſand men. Dudley, lord Liſle, commanded the navy, and the earl of Hertford the land forces. The troops were landed in the neighbourhood of Leith; and, after defeating a ſmall body that oppoſed their landing, they took that town, and thence advanced to Edinburgh, the gates of which were ſoon forced; and the city, after being pillaged by the ſoldiers, was ſet on fire. The regent and the cardinal being in no condition to oppoſe ſo great a force, retired to Stirling. No oppoſition being made to the Engliſh, they continued their ravages, burnt Haddington and Dunbar, and retired into England, having loſt only forty men in the whole expedition. This incurſion has been cenſured as ill-concerted: for it is ſaid, if Henry intended to ſolicit an alliance, he behaved with too much violence; and if he meant to make a conqueſt, he neglected to improve his ſucceſs. It may, however, be obſerved, that having, in conjunction with the emperor, formed the project of an invaſion of France, he was ſolicitous of employing hi whole force on the continent.

The plan formed by theſe two powerful princes was to invade France at the head of an army of abo one hundred thouſand men; and it was agreed t march directly to Paris, without entering upon an ſiege, and thence proceed to the entire conqueſt o the kingdom. Had this plan been executed, Franc would, in all probability, have been ruined; b forunately for the French monarch, the emperor, the head of an army of ſixty thouſand men, h taken the field before Henry landed at Calais; a not to loſe time while he was waiting for his con derate, Charles inveſted Luxembourg, and ſoon ma himſelf maſter of the place. He thence proceed to Commercy on the Meuſe, which ſoon ſurrend ed. Ligny met with the ſame fate; but St. De on the Marne, which he next beſieged, made brave reſiſtance, under the command of Sancer the governor.

During theſe tranſactions Henry landed at Ca at the head of thirty thouſand men, accompanied the dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk; the earls of A rundel, Oxford and Surrey; the lords St. J Ferrers, Montjoy, and Grey of Wilton; Sir A thony Brown, Sir Francis Bryan, and a great n ber of the moſt opulent perſons in the kingdom. Soon after his arrival he was joined by the count de Buren, admiral of Flanders, with ten thouſand infantry and four thouſand horſe.

Henry finding the emperor employed in taking places, imitated his example, and inveſted Montreuil and Boulogne, the latter of which ſurrendered on the 26th of July. Theſe ſieges neceſſarily produced delays; and Charles finding the ſeaſon conſiderably advanced; and that the ſcheme for ſubduing France was likely to prove abortive, concluded a ſeparate peace with Francis. In conſequence of this treaty, the count de Buren withdrew his forces from the Engliſh army, and Henry was obliged to raiſe the ſiege of Montreuil, and return to his own kingdom, after having levied a great expence on the nation for acquiſitions neither honorable to himſelf or advantageous to his kingdom.

A. D. 1545. Francis was determined to make one grand effort againſt England. He had employed all the laſt winter, and great part of this ſpring, in making preparations for the recovery of Boulogne, and a deſcent on the Engliſh coaſt. He had fitted out one hundred and fifty large ſhips of war, with ſixty of a ſmaller ſize, and brought twenty-five gallies from Marſeilles to Havre de Grace. They ſailed early in the month of July; and on the 18th of the ſame month advanced towards the Engliſh fleet, then riding at St. Helens. Here a cannonade began which laſted ſeveral hours, but with very little effect, the art of gunnery being then in its infantcy, and the guns and tackle very ill adapted for the intended purpoſes. Finding their attempt to deſtroy the Engliſh fleet abortive, they made a deſcent on the Iſle of Wight, and committed the moſt dreadful ravages, but being repulſed by the militia of the country, they fled to their ſhips, which ſoon after ſailed for France.

In the mean time Francis was exerting all his efforts to take Boulogne; and though he had an army of 200,000 men, yet his endeavours proved abortive. All he could do was, to ravage the little territory of Oye, from whence the garriſon of Calais uſed to have heir forage and proviſions; after which he retired to Amiens, and their took up his winter quarters.

A. D. 1546. Henry having obtained the neceſſary ubſidies from his parliament, made freſh preparations or carrying on the war with France; but an accident appened at the opening of the campaign, which ave very little hopes of ſucceſs to the Engliſh. The arl of Surry, who commanded the Engliſh forces in Boulogne, attempted to intercept a convoy of provi- ons going to the fort of Outre Eau, which the rench had built at the mouth of the port; but was bliged to return with ſome loſs, without effecting his urpoſe. This was followed by a more conſiderable efeat. The earl, not the leaſt intimidated by his te unſucceſsful attempt, attacked the Marſhal de iez, who was conducting a much larger convoy. ut fortune again declared for the French: the ngliſh general was routed, with the loſs of about eight ndred men on the ſpot, (among whom was Sir Ed- ard Poynings) and one hundred and twenty taken iſoners.

Henry, whoſe animoſity againſt Francis was neither olent nor perſonal, began now to think of liſtening terms of accommodation with the French monarch. e had ſufficiently gratified his capricious humour by e ſhort war he had carried on againſt Francis; and ving reaſon to apprehend, from his great increaſe corpulency, and viſible decay of ſtrength, that his d was approaching, he was deſirous of finiſhing a arrel, which might prove dangerous to the king- m during the minority of his ſon. Francis, like- ſe,on his part, was not averſe to an accommodation h England, becauſe, having lately loſt his ſon the duke of Orleans, he was afraid that Charles ſhould again attack him at a time when he might be unprovided both with men and money to make a ſuitable defence.

Each being thus deſirous of terminating the quarrel, commiſſioners were appointed, who met at Campe (a place between Ardres and Guiſnes) on the 7th of July, where a peace was concluded on the following conditions: That the king of France ſhould pay regularly the penſion ſettled by former treaties. That Francis ſhould pay in eight years the ſum of two millions of golden crowns, in conſideration of the penſion, as alſo the expence Henry had been at in reducing Boulogne. That Henry ſhould keep poſſeſſion of Boulogne, together with its territories, till the whole debt was diſcharged; when that place ſhould revert to its former poſſeſſor. And laſtly, that the Scots, as well as the emperor, ſhould be included in this treaty.

Thus Henry terminated a war which had coſt him above one million three hundred and forty-three thouſand pounds ſterling; and all he acquired in return was, only a bad ſecurity for a debt which did not amount to one third of the value.

Soon after the concluſion of the peace died Charles Brandon duke of Suffolk, and brother-in-law to the king. This nobleman was always a ſincere and powerful friend to Cranmer, was well affected to the reformation, and took every opportunity of ſupporting its profeſſors. He enjoyed the favours of Henry from his earlieſt youth, which affords one inſtance that the king was not wholly incapable of a cordial and ſteady friendſhip. Henry was ſitting in council when he was informed of Suffolk's death, and dropped a tear to his memory. At the ſame time he declared, that during the whole time of his correſpondence with that nobleman, he had never made any attempt to injure an adverſary, nor even ever whiſpered a word to the diſadvantage of any perſon whatever. He added, "Is there any of you, my lords, who can ſay as much?" This queſtion was only anſwered by that confuſion of countenance which is naturally excited from conſcientious guilt.

The death of Suffolk inſpired the popiſh party with the hopes of being able to ruin Cranmer. They well knew the king's paſſion for orthodoxy, and repreſented the primate as the principal cauſe of its making no greater progreſs. Henry, in order to ſee how far they would carry their malice, pretended to liſten to the accuſation, and deſired the council to enquire into Cranmer's conduct; promiſing, that if he was really the ſecret ſupport of hereſy, he would ſend him to the Tower, and bring him to condign puniſhment.

When Cranmer's enemies received this promiſe, they conſidered the primate's ruin as inevitable; and his old friends from mercenary motives, as well as the oppoſite party who were actuated by animoſity, began to treat him with diſreſpect. Among other mortifying inſtances of neglect, he was obliged to wait ſeveral hours with the ſervants at the door of the council-chamber before he could gain admittance; and on his being at laſt called in, they told him they had agreed to ſend him to the Tower. Unmoved by this threat, Cranmer told them that he was not obliged to ſubmit to their ſentence, and that he appealed to the king himſelf. This appeal had, however, no effect upon the council, who were determined on his deſtruction. The primate therefore produced a ring which Henry had given him as a pledge of favour and protection. Terror and confuſion now ſeized the whole party; and when they came before the king he reproved them in the harſheſt terms, and told them, that he was thoroughly acquainted with Cramer's merit, as well as with their envious and malicious ſpirit; adding, that he was determined to cruſh all their cabals, bals, and, ſince gentle methods were in vain, to teach them, by the ſevereſt diſcipline, a more dutifull concurrence in promoting his ſervice.

But though the king would not ſuffer any impeachment to be brought againſt his favourite Cranmer, he was not diſpoſed to ſhew the ſame lenity to others, who preſumed to entertain a different opinion from himſelf in matters of religion. The ſpirit of perſecution was far from being ſubſided: the good and the virtuous ſtill ſelt the fiery hand of a bigotted zeal. Among thoſe who ſuffered for their religious opinions was Mrs. Anne Aſkew, a gentlewoman of good birth and excellent parts, who was well known to many perſons at court, and had entered into a ſtrict connection with the queen. This lady, being convicted of denying the real preſence in the euchariſt, was condemned to the flames, and choſe to ſuffer death rather than purchaſe pardon at the expence of abjuring her faith. Chancellor Wriotheſley, who was a zealous papiſt, was ſent to examine her with regard to her patrons at court, and the great ladies with whom ſhe had been intimate. But this ſcheme proved abortive; ſhe refuſed to diſcover any of her friends: and though ſhe was put to the torture in the moſt cruel manner, ſhe ſtill continued reſolute in preſerving an inviolable ſecrecy. She was at length carried to the place of execution, and burnt alive, without having ſhewn the leaſt inclination to retract. Three other perſons ſuffered with her, and imitated her courage and conſtancy. All the arguments uſed by the biſhop of Saliſbury to prevail upon them to recant their errors were urged in vain. They maintained their tenets in the midſt of the flames, and ſeemed to glory in their ſufferings.

The queen, who had been the principal confidant of Anne Aſkew, happily eſcaped by the fidelity and reſolution of that lady; but ſhe ſoon after found herſelf in the utmoſt danger of falling a victim to the dogmatical zeal of her huſband.

Henry, who was now very corpulent, and of a bad habit of body, was afflicted with an ulcer in his leg, which threatened his life, and at the ſame time greatly increaſed the peeviſh and paſſionate temper to which he was always ſubject. The tenderneſs of Catherine was remarkable on this occaſion; ſhe attended him with the utmoſt aſſiduity, and uſed every method in her power to ſoothe his pains, and prevent thoſe dreadful guſts of humour ſo frequent and fatal in their conſequences. The king's favourite topic was theology, and Catharine was frequently obliged to diſcuſs the more abſtruſe tenets of religion with him. Whether her arguments were too ſtrong for the king to anſwer, or whether ſhe inadvertently dropt ſome expreſſions that ſhewed ſhe was attached to the Lutheran principles, is not abſolutely known; but the king was highly provoked at her preſuming to differ from him in any theological ſpeculation. He even complained to Gardiner of the queen's obſtinacy; and that furious prelate, pleaſed at having an opportunity of cruſhing the very head of the proteſtant party, perſuaded the king to order articles of impeachment to be drawn up, againſt his conſort. The chancellor ſeconded the arguments of Gardiner, and ſoon after brought the articles to be ſigned. Fortunately for Catherine, the chancellor dropped the fatal paper, which was found by one of the queen's party, and immediately put into her hands. Senſible of the danger to which ſhe was expoſed, ſhe determined, if poſſible, to avert the ſtorm by prudence and diſcretion. She accordingly went into the king's chamber, when his majeſty, as uſual, began with her on the topic of religion. He found ſhe affected to decline the ſubject, and expreſſed uncommon deference to his opinion, telling him that to his learning and judgment ſhe perfectly reſigned herſelf. "Not ſo, by St. Mary, replied Henry; you are become a doctor, Kate, to inſtruct us as we take it, and not to be inſtructed, or directed by us." The queen's anſwer was mild and prudent: ſhe ſaid, that ſuch profound ſpeculations were above her comprehenſion, and, in her opinion, very ill ſuited to the natural imbecillity of her ſex. She added, that though ſhe had often engaged in theſe ſpeculations, it was only to divert his pains, and profit by his inſtructions; that his elucidations had withdrawn the veil of obſcurity which ſhe had ſo long wiſhed to be removed, and to effect which ſhe had made uſe of arguments, though ſhe knew when ſhe urged them they were not concluſive. "And is it even ſo, ſweetheart, (replied Henry with great marks of tenderneſs) then we are friends again."

At the time this reconciliation happened, no perſon of condition was preſent, but lady Herbert, the queen's ſiſter; and it was ſo profound a ſecret, that the next day, while Henry and Catherine were walking in the palace garden, Gardiner appeared, with a party of guards, to arreſt the queen and convey her to the Tower. The king no ſooner ſaw the prelate approach, than he took him aſide, and was obſerved to ſpeak to him in a very angry tone of voice. The queen was greatly alarmed, eſpecially on overhearing the terms knave, fool, and beaſt frequently repeated. The prelate retired in confuſion, and the queen generouſly interpoſed to mitigate the paſſion of the king, who replied, "Poor ſoul! you know not how little that man is intitled to your favour."

The baſe part Gardiner acted on this occaſion ſtruck ſuch an impreſſion on the mind of the king, that he could never after bear the ſight of him; and though the biſhop ſought, by the vileſt adulation, to reinſtate himſelf in the king's fauour, yet all his endeavours proved abortive.

A. D. 1547. The diſgrace of Gardiner was followed by the perſecution of the duke of Norfolk and his ſon the earl of Surry; both of whom were ſtrong advocates for the catholic party, and the former was ſtrongly ſuſpected of having been principally concerned with Gardiner in the late attempt againſt the queen.

The duke of Norfolk was, by his birth, allied to the throne; and had diſtinguiſhed himſelf by a long ſeries of ſervices to the ſtate. He was uncle to two of Henry's queens, and always conſidered as the greateſt ſubject in the kingdom. He was an implacable enemy to the reformation, and had taken every opportunity to enforce the laws againſt it. The earl of Surry, ſon to the duke of Norfolk, was a young nobleman of great merit, but of very little diſcretion. Hurried away by his ambition, and exaſperated by ſome affronts he had lately received, he very imprudently irritated the peeviſh humour of Henry by ſome menacing expreſſions; and the king, perſuaded that he entertained views of marrying the princeſs Mary, determined to prevent the great power of his family from becoming formidable to the government during his ſon's minority. Both Norfolk and Surry were accordingly arreſted, and ſent to the Tower. Surry was accuſed of entertaining in his family ſome Italians, who were ſuſpected to be ſpies ſent by his holineſs; and of carrying on a correſpondence with cardinal Pole, becauſe one of his domeſtics had paid a viſit to that prelate in Italy: he was alſo ſuſpected of aſpiring to the crown, becauſe he quartered the arms of Edward the Confeſſor upon his eſcutcheon, though it was well known that both himſelf and his anceſtors had openly, during many years, and even by the approbation of the heralds, maintained that practice. But however frivolous the accuſations may now appear, they were then thought ſufficient to find him guilty. He was condemned by the lord-chancellor, who preſided at his trial, and was beheaded on Tower-hill on the 19th of January.

But it was not ſo eaſy to convict the duke of Norfolk: no ſuſpicion of a crime could be found to alledge againſt him, except his having once ſaid that the king was ſickly and could not hold out long, and that the kingdom was likely to fall into diſorders, thro' the diverſities of religious opinions. But Henry had recourſe to the ſureſt and moſt expeditious inſtrument of his tyranny. He aſſembled a parliament, and the houſe of Peers, without examining the priſoner, without evidence, or even the form of a trial, paſſed a bill of attainder againſt him, and ſent it down to the commons. It deſerves, however, to be remembered, that Cranmer, though the duke had been always his moſt inveterate enemy, refuſed to have any ſhare in ſo unjuſt a proſecution, and accordingly retired to his palace at Croydon in Surry. The Commons not being ſo expeditious in paſſing the bill as Henry expected, he ſent a meſſage to the houſe, requeſting that as Norfolk enjoyed the dignity of earl marſhal, the bill might be haſtened, that another might be appointed to officiate at the enſuing ceremony of inſtalling his ſon prince of Wales. This frivolous excuſe was, however, ſufficient for the obſequious commons. They paſſed the bill immediately, and the ſame day it received the royal aſſent, by commiſſioners appointed for that purpoſe. And Henry was ſo intent upon the death of this innocent nobleman, that he ſigned the warrant for his execution almoſt in the ſame hour, when heaven was pleaſed to put a period to his own exiſtence; and thereby ſpared his ſoul from any further load of actual, though not of intentional guilt.*

Though the hour of Henry's diſſolution appeared evidently at hand, yet none of his attendants had the courage to inform him of his dangerous ſituation, (an act having been paſſed in his reign, which rendered it capital for any perſon to foretel the king's death) leſt, in the violence of his paſſion, he ſhould cauſe the law, in all its rigour, to be executed on the author of ſuch friendly intelligence; eſpecially as his late treatment of the Howard family had demonſtrated his cruelty did not ſubſide as the ſprings of life decayed. At length Sir Anthony Denny ventured to diſcloſe the fatal ſecret, and exhorted the king to prepare for that awful change which was ſo near at hand, as his legs were already mortified. Henry, contrary to all expectation, thanked him for the information, and deſired that Cranmer might be ſent for; but before the archbiſhop arrived, the king was ſpeechleſs. The prelate beſeeching the king to give him ſome ſign of his truſting in God, through the merits of our Redeemer, he ſqueezed his hand with great fervency, and immediately after expired, on the twenty-eighth of January, in the fifty-ſixth year of his age, and the thirty-eighth of his reign.

Henry, a ſhort time before his death, had made his will, in which, purſuant to the power given by the parliament, he had ſettled the ſucceſſion to the crown of England in the following manner: Firſt, upon the prince of Wales and his poſterity. Secondly, upon the children of his preſent queen, or thoſe of any future marriage he might contract. Thirdly, upon the princeſs Mary and her iſſue, but with this expreſs condition, that ſhe ſhould marry with the conſent of the executors of his will. Fourthly, on the princeſs Elizabeth, with the ſame proviſo. Fifthly, upon the lady Frances Brandon, daughter to his ſiſter, the queen of France, by the duke of Suffolk. Sixthly, on the lady Eleanor Brandon, youngeſt ſiſter to Frances. Laſtly, in failure of all theſe, upon the next lawful heir. By another clauſe in his will he named the following ſixteen executors: The archbiſhop of Canterbury; the lord Chancellor; the earl of Hertford, uncle to young Edward; the lord St. John; the lord Ruſſel; the lord viſcount Liſle; Cuthbert Tonſtal, biſhop of Durham; Sir Anthony Brown; Sir Edward Montague; the chief juſtice Bromley; Sir William Paget; Sir Anthony Denny; Sir William Herbert; Sir Edward Watton; and his brother Dr. Watton. To the lords who were his executors he left five hundred marks, and to the commoners three hundred; and ordered his executors to pay all his debts. He made the prince of Wales heir to all his moveables, but ſtrictly charged him to be ſubject to the advice of his council till he was eighteen years of age. He left three thouſand pounds a year to each of his daughters, with ten thouſand pounds addition, as their whole fortune, if his executors thought proper. To the queen he left three thouſand pounds in plate and jewels, and a thouſand pounds in money. Another clauſe in his will ſufficiently ſuggeſted, that he was far from being ſettled with regard to his notions of religion: he left money for maſſes to be ſaid for delivering his ſoul from purgatory; and though he had deſtroyed all thoſe inſtitutions, eſtabliſhed by his anceſtors and others, for the benefit of their ſouls, and had even left the doctrine of purgatory doubtful in all the articles of faith he publiſhed during the latter years of his reign, yet he was determined to take care of the future repoſe of his own ſoul, by adhering to the ſafer ſide of the queſtion.

A reviſal of the reign and actions of Henry VIII. will afford the reader a more ſtriking diſplay of his character, than any ſummary we can poſſibly give at the cloſe of them. There we may obſerve the frailty of human foreſight, which is ſo prone to repreſent men and things to us, through a deluſive glaſs. Henry aſcended the throne, eſteemed for his affability, extraordinary ſtudy and generoſity; but theſe qualities gradually degenerated into moroſeneſs, pedantry, and profuſion. He ſoon evinced a moſt inſatiable avarice; to the gratification of which, he ſacrificed every laudible principle. He arrogated to himſelf a lawleſs dominion over the reaſon of others, and ſet himſelf up as chief arbiter in all religious diſputes.

He wreſted the ſupremacy from the ſee of Rome, rather from reaſons of ſtate and convenience, than motives of juſtice and conſcience. Affecting a ſuperiority to human nature, he became a ſtranger to its tendereſt emotions, and a ſlave to its impetuous paſſions. He never contributed to happineſs, of which he was not to partake; if, therefore, there are any traces of beneficence in his life, they aroſe, not from a view of alleviating the anxieties of others, but procuring repoſe for himſelf. His conduct, with reſpect to religion, ſtirred up many noiſy diſputants, while his bigotry and cruelty blaſted the fruits of free enquiry.

As he perverted law to the deſtruction of humanity, ſo he eſtabliſhed religion on the ruins of reaſon. He miſtook the impulſe of paſſion for the dictates of reaſon, and the dread commanded by power, for the reverence due to ſuperior judgment. But of all his foibles, his capricious amours are the moſt glaring; nor can we think it poſſible for any human being to read, without ſhuddering at the thought, of a man, in the character of a monarch, who having obtained poſſeſſion of the moſt deſirable object of his paſſion, could ſend her to the block, in order to pave the way for the gratification of a new, and unwarrantable deſire.

* The king happening to die the morning before that appointed for the execution of the duke, he therefore eſcaped the intended puniſhment; it being thought improper to ſtain with blood the commencement of a new reign, eſpecially as the ſentence was conſidered as unjuſt and tyrannical.

Nevertheleſs, Henry, though thus encircled with vices, may be deemed the ſtock on which were engrafted thoſe tender ſprigs that afterwards ſpread a grateful ſhade, and now afford an impenetrable ſhelter to the civil and religious liberties of mankind: but with reſpect to himſelf, as before hinted, he ſeems in this caſe to have been actuated by the impulſe of paſſion rather than the dictates of religion and conſcience; which affords us this important leſſon: That the great diſpoſer of all events frequently purſues means, to us the moſt apparently improbable, to execute his wiſe and benevolent deſigns.

Henry VIII. had iſſue as follows:

By his firſt wife, Catharine of Spain, he had two ſons, both of whom died infants. And a daughter named Mary, who ſucceeded her brother Edward to the throne of England.

By his ſecond wife, Anne Boleyn, he had the famous queen Elizabeth; and a male child, ſtill born.

By his third wife, Jane Seymour, he had a ſon named Edward, who immediately ſucceeded him on the throne.

By his three laſt wives, Anne of Cleves, Catharine Howard, and Catharine Parr, he had no iſſue.[*]

He had one natural ſon by Elizabeth, daughter of John Blount, widow of Sir Gilbert Taillebois. This youth, when ſeven years of age, was created knight of the garter, earl of Nottingham, duke of Richmond and Somerſet, and made lieutenant of all the king's forces north of the Trent. He was afterwards conſtituted admiral of England, and at laſt made lord-lieutenant of Ireland. He died on the 24th of July, 1536, in the 17th year of his age; and was buried at Thetford in Norfolk.

The moſt remarkable occurrences that happened during this king's reign are as follow:

In his ſecond year hats were firſt manufactured in London; before which both men and women wore cloſe knit woollen caps.

The date of the commencement of the royal or Engliſh navy, may be fixed from the 4th year of this king's reign, when the firſt navy-office was appointed, with commiſſioners to manage naval affairs; and a number of ſtout ſhips of war began to be permanently and regularly kept on foot by the crown.

In his ninth year the ſweating ſickneſs raged with the utmoſt violence throughout the kingdom, particularly in London. The effects were very ſudden, for it proved fatal in three hours after the patient was affected. It was computed that in ſome towns half, and in others one third, of the inhabitants, died of this dreadful diſtemper. It is remarkable, that this diſorder was peculiar only to Engliſhmen, many of whom being abroad at the time it raged in England, received the infection and died, though not a ſingle native was known to be the leaſt affected by it; from whence the foreigners called it Sudor Anglicus, or the Engliſh Sweat.

In the 12th year of this king's reign, muſkets were firſt generally introduced into the Engliſh army, and bows and arrows totally laid aſide.

In his 15th year there was ſo ſevere a froſt, that great numbers of people periſhed. Some loſt their fingers, others their toes, and many their nails.

The following year the plague raged ſo violently in London, that his majeſty removed to Eltham; the Michaelmas term was adjourned, and the city ſo much deſerted by its inhabitants, that the enſuing Chriſtmas was called the Still Chriſtmas. This year is alſo remarkable for the firſt voyage being made round the world, which was performed in a ſingle ſhip, part of a Spaniſh ſquadron, under the command of an officer named Picaro.

In his 18th year corn was ſo ſcarce all over the kingdom, that it produced a general famine, and many of the poorer ſort of the inhabitants of London periſhed through mere want. This dreadful calamity, however, was ſtopped by the interpoſition of his majeſty and the company of Hanſeatic merchants; the former ſupplying the city with 1000 quarters, and the latter importing large quantities from Dantzick.

In his 20th year one Richard Roſe, cook to the biſhop of Rocheſter, was boiled to death, in a cauldron of oil, in Smithfield, agreeable to his ſentence, for putting poiſon into ſome ſoup, by which ſixteen people, who had eat of it, died. It was intended for his maſter, who luckily eſcaped, owing to his being greatly indiſpoſed on that day.

In his 30th year the manner of caſting pipes of lead for conveying water under-ground, without uſing of ſolder, was firſt invented by Robert Brocke, clerk, one of the king's chaplains. Robert Cooper, goldſmith, was the firſt that made the inſtruments, and put the invention into practice.

The ſummer of the following year was ſo exceeding hot, that it produced a general drought throughout the kingdom: ſmall rivers were entirely dried up, and many cattle periſhed for want of water. The river Thames was ſo empty, that the ſalt water flowed above London-bridge, and continued ſo till the freſh water was increaſed by rain.

In his 34th year pins were firſt made in England before which the ladies uſed ſmall wooden ſkewers.

The following year an act of parliament was paſſed whereby preſſing for the ſea ſervice was made a criminal puniſhment. In conſequence of which one o the aldermen of London was preſſed, and ſent t ſerve on board the fleet in foreign parts, for refuſin to pay a tax levied on him by the king.

In his 37th year, on Tueſday in Eaſter-week William Foxley, pot-maker to the Mint of th Towe

[*] As the following poetical lines may be eaſily retained in the memory, they will ſerve as a memorial, by which the names, order of ſucceſſion, and fate of all Henry's wives will be readily recollected:

This king, who ne'er ſpar'd man in anger's guſt,
Or ſuffer'd woman to eſcape his luſt;
As paſſion fir'd him, or as caprice led,
Six ſeveral conſorts took from church to bed.
CATHARINE of ARRAGON, in youthful pride,
Became his firſt, and long remain'd his bride;
But other fancies captivating him,
Henry divorc'd her in a ſerious whim.
Short was his ſecond wife, ANNE BOLEYN's reign,
Who loſt her head to ſet him free again:
JANE SEYMOUR then ſucceeded as his bride,
And proving pregnant ſoon in child-bed dy'd.
To ANNE of CLEVES the fourth time he is wed,
Till a divorce expell'd her from his bed;
Then CATHARINE HOWARD his fifth wife became,
Who loſt her head for a licentious flame.
His ſixth wife, CATHARINE PARR, a widow brave,
Outliv'd the king, and ſaw him to his grave.

EDWARD VI.

Tower of London, fell aſleep, and could not be waked till the firſt day of next term, which was full fourteen days: and when he awoke, was found in all reſpects the ſame as if he had ſlept but one night; and lived in perfect health forty years after.

By a law paſſed during this reign, thoſe convicted of ſwearing falſely were puniſhed by having the letter F ſtamped on their faces with a red hot iron.

Henry VIII. was the firſt king of England who took the title of Majeſty, the ſovereigns before being addreſſed by the ſtile of, My Liege, Your Highneſs, or Your Grace.

SECTION III.

EDWARD VI.

THIS monarch was little more than nine years of age when he acceded to the throne of England. At the time of his father's death he was with his ſiſter Elizabeth at Hertford; from whence he was conducted by his uncle the earl of Hertford, and Sir Thomas Brown, to the Tower of London, where he was received by the council in a body, and proclaimed king by the name of Edward VI.

Henry VIII. by his will, had fixed the majority of the prince at the 18th year of his age, and appointed fixteen executors, to whom, during the minority, he committed the adminiſtration of public affairs, and the care of the king's perſon. And to theſe fixteen executors, in whom the whole regal authority was inveſted, were joined twelve counſellors, to aſſiſt with their advice as occaſion might require.

No ſooner, however, had theſe agents ſettled the form of government agreeable to Henry's will, than a change was propoſed. Some of them obſerved, that it would be very troubleſome for the people, and particularly for foreign miniſters, to be obliged to apply to ſixteen perſons of equal authority; and moved, that one ſhould be choſen amongſt them to be head and preſident, with the title of protector of the king's realm, and governor of his perſon.

Though this propoſal appeared not only reaſonable, but alſo neceſſary, to the majority of the regents, yet it was ſtrongly oppoſed by Wriotheſley the chancellor, a perſon of a very ambitious and active diſpoſition. He aſſerted that they had no power to depart from the tenor of the late king's will, authoriſed by an act of parliament. His remonſtrances, however, had no effect on the council; they determined to chooſe a protector, in order the more effectually to provide for the public tranquillity. No difficulty occurred with regard to the perſon proper for this exalted ſtation. Edward Seymour, earl of Hertford, maternal uncle to the king, and more intereſted in his preſervation as he had himſelf no pretenſions to the crown, was choſen to the office; but with this reſtriction: that though he ſhould enjoy all the exterior ſymbols of the royal dignity, he ſhould yet be bound, in the exerciſe of power, to follow the opinion of the majority of the regents, On his being appointed to this elevated ſtation, he was immediately created duke of Somerſet; and at the ſame time the chancellor was created earl of Southampton.

It had at firſt been reſolved that the coronation of he young king ſhould be performed on the 19th of February; but it was thought more proper to defer it ill the 20th, which was Shrove-ſunday, and the lord Ruſſel was appointed to act as lord-high-ſteward on e occaſion. Accordingly, the king, being conducted great ſtate from the Tower through the city, took p his lodgings in his palace of Weſtminſter on the 9th, and the next day was crowned with the uſual pomp and ſolemnity. The ceremony was performed by Cranmer archbiſhop of Canterbury, aſſiſted by other biſhops, and the principal nobility of the realm.

A ſhort time after the king's coronation, the lord-chancellor (notwithſtanding the mark of favour he had ſo lately received) diſplayed that natural enmity which had ſo long ſubſiſted in his heart againſt the protector; and he determined to make his ſtation as uneaſy as poſſible, by oppoſing every meaſure he ſhould think proper to adopt. To effect this he devoted his whole time to the affairs of the cabinet; and as his office of chancellor neceſſarily engroſſed a conſiderable part of his attention, he ventured, without any warrant from the king, protector, or regency, or any other authority than his own, to put the great ſeal in commiſſion; and appointed four lawyers to execute, in his abſence, the office of lord high chancellor of England. A meaſure ſo replete with arrogance and preſumption could not fail of giving umbrage to the government; and it was determined to ſuppreſs the haughty ſpirit of the ambitious chancellor. The judges being conſulted on this occaſion, declared, that the commiſſion he had granted was contrary to the laws of England; and that the earl of Southampton, for taking ſuch an unconſtitutional ſtep, had not only forfeited his high office, but alſo rendered himſelf ſubject to the ſevereſt puniſhment. A council was now ſummoned, and the chancellor ordered to attend. But he was ſo far from making any ſubmiſſion, that he defended his own power in the moſt haughty manner, and with very indecent language. He called the authority of the council and protector in queſtion, and told them he would not ſubmit to any ſentence they might pronounce againſt him. He was therefore deprived of the ſeals, and committed a priſoner to his own houſe, where he continued till the 29th of June, when he entered into a recognizance of 4000l. to pay whatever fine they ſhould think proper to impoſe on him.

The ambition of the protector was greatly increaſed by the fall of Southampton; and he now thought himſelf at full liberty to engroſs the ſole management of affairs into his own hands. With this view he obtained from the young king a patent, which inveſted him, under the title of protector, with the whole regal authority. He appointed a council, conſiſting of all the former members, except Southampton; and enjoyed the power of chuſing other counſellors, and to conſult with ſuch only as he thought proper.

During theſe tranſactions in England, Francis I. king of France, paid the debt of nature, and was ſucceeded by his ſon the dauphin, who aſſumed the ſceptre by the name of Henry II. This prince was, in a great meaſure, governed by the duke of Guiſe and the cardinal of Lorraine, brothers to the queen dowager of Scotland; and being zealous champions for the papal authority, and the Roman Catholic religion, they determined to prevent the intended marriage between Edward and the young queen of Scotland. Accordingly they perſuaded Henry to attempt the recovery of Boulogne, and to reject the late treaties which had been concluded between Henry VIII. and Francis I.

This perfidious behaviour, however, did not intimidate the Protector: he determined, if poſſible, to execute the dying injunction of his late maſter, who had left poſitive directions that a marriage ſhould take place between the young queen of Scots and his ſon Edward, by which means the two kingdoms might be happily united. But before he proceeded to carry this deſign into execution, he thought it neceſſary to provide for the tranquillity of the public, and to place the reformation (for which he was a ſtrong advocate) on ſuch a baſis, that it might be able to baffle all the attempts of its open and concealed enemies.

The Protector was very materially aſſiſted in this buſineſs by the affection young Edward himſelf had to the reformed principles, and by the cool and politic councils of Cranmer. This prelate had, without being ſeen to ſtir in the matter, procured ſeveral of the beſt works written abroad againſt popery, to be tranſlated and publiſhed in England. He alſo publiſhed a catechiſm, which he tranſlated and improved from the Latin; and compoſed ſeveral homilies to be delivered by prieſts in the nature of ſermons.

It was now ordered that a general viſitation ſhould be made of all the churches in England. Accordingly the whole kingdom was divided into ſix circuits, each of which was aſſigned to a certain number of viſitors, who were partly lay men and partly eccleſiaſtics. The chief purport of their inſtructions was, to aboliſh certain abuſes that had been introduced into divine ſervice, and particularly with regard to images; but at the ſame time they were directed to proceed with delicacy and reſerve. The viſitors diſcharged their buſineſs, and preſerved the injunctions laid on them, in the moſt punctual manner: and with this viſitation commenced the execution of the deſign formed in the late reign for perfecting the reformation.

The affairs at home being thus adjuſted to the ſatisfaction of the Protector, his whole attention was now turned towards proſecuting the war with Scotland. He aſſembled an army of 18000 men, and equipped a fleet of ſixty ſail, one half of which were ſhips of war, and the other loaded with ammunition and proviſions. The command of the fleet was given to lord Clinton; while he himſelf, aſſiſted by the earl of Warwick, led the land forces.

Alarmed at this powerful armament, the French ambaſſador applied, by orders from his court, to the regency, deſiring that a negotiation might be opened, in order, if poſſible, to reſtore peace between the two kingdoms, without the effuſion of human blood. The requeſt was complied with, and Tonſtal, biſhop of Durham, and Sir Thomas Rowe, were appointed to meet the Scottiſh commiſſaries at Newcaſtle, where the conferences were opened on the fourth of Auguſt. But the Engliſh plenipotentiaries refuſing to proceed in the negotiation, unleſs the marriage between the two ſovereigns was previouſly ſettled, and the Scottiſh commiſſioners declaring they had no power to conſent to the marriage, the negotiations became abortive.

In conſequence of this the protector entered Scotland on the ſecond of September. But before he commenced hoſtilities he publiſhed a maniſeſto, in which he recapitulated the reaſons that induced the Engliſh to have recourſe to arms, and urged, by a variety of arguments, the expediency and even neceſſity of the marriage of the young queen of Scots and Edward being immediately concluded. Theſe arguments were drawn from the ſituation of the two kingdoms, which nature, by ſurrounding them with the ocean, ſeemed to have deſigned for one empire; from the ſimiliarity of the inhabitants in their laws, language, cuſtoms, and manners, whereby they were naturally adapted to be united, and to become one people; from the equality of the young king and queen, with regard to age and fortune; from the imminent danger to which Scotland was perpetually expoſed from the hoſtile attempts of a richer and moſt powerful neighbour; and from the many advantages that muſt reſult to the inhabitants of both kingdoms from living in a ſtate of peace and ſecurity. The protector added, that excluſive of theſe conſiderations, poſitive engagements had been made for concluding this alliance; and that the Scots were bound in honour to perform, what their intereſt and ſafety ſo ſtrongly demanded.

Theſe remonſtrances, however, were rendered totally abortive by the arts and intrigues of the queen dowager of Scotland, who was warmly attached to the intereſt of France and the Roman catholic religion. The Protector, therefore, found himſelf obliged to have recourſe to arms, in order to compel the Scots to adopt a meaſure which no motives of policy or prudence could induce them to embrace. He accordingly continued his march towards Edinburgh without meeting with any oppoſition, except from a few ſmall caſtles, which were forced to ſurrender at diſcretion.

The earl of Arran, governor of Scotland, had collected the whole force of the kingdom; and his army, which was double to that of the Engliſh in numbers, had taken poſt at Muſſelburgh, on a very advantageous ſpot of ground, ſecured by the banks of the river Eſke, about ſix miles from Edinburgh; while the Engliſh lay encamped at Preſton-Pans. In this ſituation ſeveral ſkirmiſhes paſſed between the light troops of each army, but without any thing deciſive; and Somerſet, finding it impoſſible to draw the Scots to an engagement, and fearing he ſhould ſoon be diſtreſſed for want of proviſions, ſent an herald to Arran, offering to abandon his enterprize, and to pay all the damages the Scots had ſuffered from his troops, provided he would give his promiſe, that the young queen ſhould not be given in marriage to any foreign prince, till ſhe reached the age of chuſing a huſband for herſelf.

Theſe moderate terms induced the Scots to imagine that the Engliſh were intimidated, and that, if the enemy was attacked, the victory would be certain. The prieſts and monks, who had come to the camp in great numbers, laboured aſſiduouſly to propagate this opinion; adding, that they had now an opportunity of inflicting vengeance on their heretical enemy. A movement made by the Engliſh towards their ſhips, confirmed them in this opinion; and that the protector was going to embark his forces. Elated with this idea, and determined to cut off his retreat, they quitted their camp, croſſed the river Eſke, and advanced, with great precipitation, into the plain, where the Scottiſh regent drew up his army in three diviſions: the firſt, which conſiſted of the beſt troops, was commanded by the earl of Angus; the ſecond by the regent himſelf; and the third by the earl of Huntley. The earl of Argyle headed a body of Highland archers, who formed a guard to the artillery.

When Somerſet ſaw the Scots leave their advantageous camp, he was highly pleaſed, thinking he ſhould now have an opportunity of bringing on a deciſive action. He drew up his troops in two lines, the firſt of which was commanded by the earl of Warwick, and the ſecond by the Protector himſelf. The lord

Grey of Wilton led a reſerved body of cavalry, and had orders to fall upon the flank of the van of the Scottiſh army, as ſoon as they ſhould be engaged in cloſe fight with the firſt line of the Engliſh.

The Scottiſh army at length advanced to the charge; when a dreadful fire from the cannon of the Engliſh ſhips threw the Highland archers into the greateſt confuſion. Lord Grey perceived the ſituation of the enemy, and could not reſiſt the opportunity of attacking them before they recovered from their ſurprize. But he ſoon perceived he had acted with too much precipitation. The ſpot occupied by the enemy was fallow land, broken ridges, and ſeparated from him by a ſlough and a ditch. Theſe impediments rendered the ſhock of his body of horſe feeble and irregular; and the Scottiſh infantry ſtanding firm, he was repulſed with conſiderable loſs: he himſelf was dangerouſly wounded; lord Edward Seymour, ſon to the Protector, was unhorſed; and the Engliſh ſtandard in danger of being taken. But the earl of Warwick and the duke of Somerſet advanced with ſo much celerity to ſupport the Engliſh horſe, that they ſoon formed behind the infantry, and the battle now became general. The Engliſh artillery, planted on a neighbouring eminence, played full on one of their flanks, while the cannon of the ſhips galled them on the other; and the lord Grey, eager to repair his error, charged them in front with ſo much fury, that their firſt line gave way, and an orderly retreat was begun: but the Highland archers betaking themſelves to flight, ſpread a panic through the whole army; the retreat was changed into a precipitate flight, and the whole became one general ſcene of confuſion, terror, and conſternation. The braveſt of Scots were put to the ſword, and the route and ſlaughter became ſo general, that from the field of battle to Edinburgh, the whole ground was covered with the dying and the dead. The prieſts and monks received no quarter, for having engaged in an enterprize ſo foreign to their profeſſion. Few victories have been more deciſive or more complete. Above ten thouſand periſhed in the engagement and purſuit, and about fifteen hundred ſurrendered themſelves priſoners. The Engliſh loſt not more than two hundred men. This action is known in hiſtory by the name of the battle of Pinkey, from a nobleman's ſeat of that name in the neighbourhood where it was fought.

The earl of Arran fled with the queen dowager to Stirling-caſtle, and the Scottiſh army was ſo entirely diſperſed, that Arran found the utmoſt difficulty of checking the incurſions of ſmall parties of the Engliſh. The Protector marched directly to Leith, which made no oppoſition; but he failed in his attempt againſt Edinburgh caſtle. He, however, plundered the town, while the fleet under lord Clinton, burnt all the places on the ſea coaſts, and took all the ſhipping in the frith of Forth. Had the duke purſued all the advantages of his late victory, he might have given law to the conquered. But a cabal having been raiſed againſt him at London, he haſtened his return, leaving Warwick with full powers to negotiate a treaty with Arran, who had deſired leave to ſend commiſſioners for that purpoſe. The latter, however, meant only to gain time till the ſuccours could arrive from France; and accordingly no Scottiſh commiſſioners appeared at the place appointed for the conferences to be held.

No ſooner did the Protector arrive in London, than he found that his brother Thomas, who had married Catharine Parr, the queen dowager, and had lately been created lord high-admiral of England, was become his greateſt oppoſer. He had not only joined in the cabals of his enemies, but alſo made ſeveral vigorous efforts to ſupplant him in the high poſt he enjoyed. He had already gained ſuch an aſcendancy over Edward, that he had perſuaded the king to write a letter with his own hand to the houſe of commons, recommending him to their choice as governor of the king's perſon. Though this attempt ſtruck at the foundation of the Protector's greatneſs, he ſtill endeavoured to reclaim his brother by gentle and munificent methods; but finding he was ſtill determined to purſue his ſcheme, Somerſet found it neceſſary to ſummon a parliament, as the only authority that could ſupport him againſt the machinations of his brother.

Previous, however, to the opening of the ſeſſion, he informed the council of the letter his brother had obtained from the young king, and which he propoſed to lay before the houſe at the meeting of the parliament. The council were alarmed at this circumſtance, and ſeveral lords were deputed to diſſuade the admiral from purſuing a ſcheme which might involve the government in diſtreſs, and ultimately terminate in his own deſtruction. But he continued firm to his purpoſe, till the council threatened to deprive him of all his poſts, commit him to the Tower, and indict him upon the ſtatute which made it death for any perſon to diſturb the eſtabliſhed government. Theſe menaces awakened his attention: he ſaw the conſequences that might reſult from his diſobeying the council, and therefore thought proper to abandon his enterprize.

The reputation of the Protector was ſo greatly enhanced by the late victory over the Scots, that he now obtained a patent, appointing him to ſit on the throne, upon a ſtool or bench, on the right hand of the king, and to enjoy the ſame honours and privileges which had uſually been poſſeſſed by any princes of the blood, or uncles of the kings of England. Theſe honours were invidious to the old nobility, and created the duke many powerful enemies. But if the protector diſcovered his vanity and weakneſs in aſſuming ſo much ſtate and grandeur, he merited the higheſt applauſe on account of the laws, enacted thro' his influence in this ſeſſion of parliament; for by theſe the rigour of former ſtatutes was greatly mitigated, and ſome ſteps taken for ſecuring the liberties of the people. All laws were repealed which extended the crime of treaſon beyond the limits aſſigned it by the ſtatute of the twenty-fifth of Edward the Third; together with all laws enacted during the late reign, for extending the crime of felony; all the former laws againſt the Lollards or heretics; and the bloody ſtatute of the Six Articles. Thus were ſome of the moſt ſevere laws ever enacted in England totally abrogated, and the people began to flatter themſelves with the hopes of enjoying ſome ſhare of religious and civil liberty.

Several laws were enacted, which greatly contributed to promote the Reformation. But the moſt remarkable bill paſſed by parliament was, that which gave the revenues of chauntries and colleges to the crown. The preamble to this ſtatute premiſes, that theſe funds ſhould be employed to good and godly uſes, in erecting grammar ſchools, in farther augmenting the revenus of the univerſities, and in making better proviſion for the poor and needy. But the rapacious courtiers had already, in their imaginations, devoured the prey; and it was not long before it was ſhared out among them. Cranmer, and ſeveral other prelates, were of opinion, that the revenues of the church, by the impropriation of tythes, and other methods of alienation, were already too much reduced. The primate, therefore, ſtrenuouſly oppoſed the bill, and was joined by the biſhops of London, Durham, Ely, Norwich, Hereford, Wincheſter, and Chicheſter: but notwithſtanding this oppoſition, it was paſſed into a law. By this act no fewer than two thouſand three hundred and ſeventy-four chauntries, colleges, and other religious foundations, fell to the crown.

A. D. 1548. In the beginning of this year the council made ſeveral alterations in the ceremonies of the church. Orders were iſſued that candles ſhould not be carried about on Candlemas-day, nor aſhes on Aſh-Wedneſday, nor palms on Palm-Sunday: that no images ſhould be ſuffered to remain in the churches, and that the people ſhould be at liberty to practiſe or lay aſide auricular confeſſion.

Theſe alterations were ſtrongly oppoſed by ſeveral of the catholic party. Gardiner, biſhop of Wincheſter, was at the head of this oppoſition, and defended his opinions with great boldneſs before the council. He laid down his reaſons on which his oppoſition was founded with all the force of eloquence, and concluded his ſpeech in the following manner: "For my part, my ſole concern is to manage the third and laſt act of my life with decency, and to make a handſome exit off the ſtage. Provided this point is ſecured, I am not ſolicitous about the reſt. I am already, by nature, condemned to death: no man can give me a pardon from this ſentence, nor ſo much as procure me a reprieve. To ſpeak my mind freely, and to act as my conſcience directs me, are two branches of liberty I can never part with. Sincerity in ſpeech and integrity in action are entertaining qualities; they will ſtick by a man when every thing elſe takes its leave, and I muſt not reſign them upon any conſiderhtion. The beſt of it is, I do not throw them away myſelf, no man can force them from me; but if I give them up, then am I ruined by myſelf, and deſerve to loſe all my preferments." This oppoſition of Gardiner drew on him the indignation of the council, and he was committed to the Tower; an act of ſeverity which intimidated the Popiſh party; and no farther oppoſition was made to the ordinances.

The Scots not having ſent commiſſioners to the conference appointed to be held at Berwick for a peace, the war was now renewed with that kingdom. Talbot, earl of Shrewſbury was ſent into Scotland to command the Engliſh forces, in the character of lieutenant-general. In the mean time the lord Grey of Wilton took and fortified Haddington, which made him maſter of the moſt fruitful part of Scotland, and from whence he made excurſions to the very gates of Edinburgh.

The Scots were in no condition to oppoſe the Engliſh till the month of June when they received ſuccours from France. The troops ſent by that monarch landed at Leith, and conſiſted of 6000 men, under the command of Deſſe. This revived the courage of the Scots, and they immediately reſolved on undertaking the ſiege of Haddington. But they were very unfit for this undertaking: even with the aſſiſtance of the French, they deſpaired of taking the place by aſſault, and depended entirely for ſucceſs on the hopes of ſtarving the garriſon. They, however, repulſed ſeveral ſallies made by the beſieged, and obliged them to keep cloſe within their fortifications.

During the ſiege of Haddington, the Scotch parliament were deliberating on the moſt proper method of preventing their young queen from falling into the hands of the Engliſh, as her marriage with Edward muſt be productive of an union between the two kingdoms. The earl of Huntley, who at firſt was diſpoſed to favour the propoſal of Somerſet, but had changed his opinion by the late violent meaſures purſued by the Engliſh, ſaid pleaſantly, "That he was not averſe to the match, but that he diſliked the manner in which the princeſs was courted." Several weighty reaſons were, however, urged, both for and againſt the marriage; but at laſt it was determined to ſend their young queen to France; and, what was underſtood to be the neceſſary conſequence, to marry her to the dauphin. She was accordingly embarked on board the French gallies, and after a tempeſtuous paſſage, arrived ſafely at Breſt; from whence ſhe was conducted to Paris, and ſoon after betrothed to the dauphin.

The Scots, who were ſtill continuing the ſiege of Haddington, had the good fortune to ſurpriſe and cut off a party ſent to its relief, under the command of Sir Robert Bowes and Sir Thomas Palmer. But on the approach of the earl of Shrewſbury, at the head of 20,000 men, they raiſed the ſiege, and retired with great precipitation. Shrewſbury, however, made no attempt to diſtreſs the enemy; he contented himſelf with reinforcing the garriſon, and leaving a large ſupply of proviſions and ammunition in the place; ſoon after which he returned to England.

While the war was thus carrying on in Scotland, the Protector was indefatigable in completing the Reformation. The public offices of the church were reviewed, a new catechiſm was publiſhed by Cranmer, and a new liturgy received by the convocation, tho' not without a long and ſtrenuous debate. The parliament met on the twenty-fourth of November, and confirmed all the orders of council iſſued for the reformation of religion. Prieſts were permitted to marry, though the preamble to the act paſſed for that purpoſe expreſsly declared, that it were better for the prieſts and miniſters of the church to live chaſte, and without marriage; and it were much to be wiſhed they would of themſelves abſtain. The new liturgy, drawn up by a ſelect committee of biſhops and divines, was confirmed, and ordered to be uſed in all churches in the kingdom. This liturgy was nearly the ſame with that at preſent uſed in the Church of England.

The attention of the Protector, however, was now diverted from promoting the progreſs of the Reformation. His brother had renewed his former practices, and carried them to a much greater length. The queen-dowager, his wife, had ſome time ſince died in child-bed; and he flattered himſelf with the hopes of eſpouſing the princeſs Elizabeth, who was then in her ſixteenth year, and ſeems to have liſtened to the inſinuations of a man poſſeſſed of every talent proper to captivate the affections of the fair. But as Henry VIII. had excluded his daughters from the ſucceſſion, if they married without the conſent of his executors, which Seymour could never hope to obtain, it was concluded, that he propoſed to effect his purpoſe by expedients ſtill more raſh and more criminal. He endeavoured to ſeduce the young king and the courtiers into his intereſt; he inveighed openly againſt his brother's adminiſtration; and he drew to him a great number of partizans from all the claſſes of the people.

A. D. 1549. When the Protector firſt received intimation of his brother's proceedings, he attempted to bring him back to his duty and allegiance by gentle methods; but his attempts were in vain; he rejected every offer, and ſet his brother at defiance. Somerſet therefore laid the whole affair before the council; in conſequence of which a charge, conſiſting of thirty-three articles, was drawn up againſt him, and he was committed priſoner to the Tower.

A few days after his commitment commiſſioners were ſent to interrogate him, but he refuſed anſwering to a ſingle queſtion: he deſired that his trial might proceed in the legal method; that the witneſſes might be confronted with him, and that the heads of his accuſation ſhould be laid before him. Theſe demands however reaſonable in themſelves, were denied; the laws had long ſince yielded to force, and it was in vain to expect that the method of proceeding would now be altered. A bill of attainder was preferred againſt him, and paſſed without any material oppoſition in the Houſe of Lords. The Commons were more ſcrupulous: ſome of the members were averſe to the whole method of proceeding by bills of attainder paſſed in the abſence of the accuſed; and required that a formal trial ſhould be given to every man before his condemnation. This oppoſition alarmed the miniſtry. A meſſage was ſent from the king, requiring them to proceed; and offering, that the ſame narratives which had ſatisfied the lords ſhould be laid before them. This conceſſion produced the deſired effect; the bill paſſed in a very full houſe: near four hundred voted for it, and not above nine or ten againſt it. The royal aſſent was ſoon after given to the bill, and the admiral was beheaded on Tower-hill on the 20th of March. His behaviour on the ſcaffold was very undaunted; and he perſiſted, with his laſt breath, in declaring, that he had never committed, or intended to commit, any act of treaſon againſt the government.

The death of the admiral was followed by an almoſt univerſal commotion throughout the kingdom. During the laſt ſeſſion of parliament an act had paſſed the Houſe of Lords, for giving licence to every perſon to incloſe his own grounds, but had been thrown out by the Commons. Irritated at this oppoſition, the nobility determined to carry the project into execution, notwithſtanding their bill had proved abortive in parliament. This occaſioned an univerſal diſcontent among the lower claſs of people, who were perſuaded that a ſcheme was now formed for reducing them to an abſolute ſtate of ſlavery. Extreme indigence, to which they had been reduced by various cauſes, contributed to ſpread the flame of civil commotion into divers parts of the kingdom. The ſuppreſſion of the abbies and monaſteries, tho' doubtleſs of the utmoſt advantage to the nation in general, tended greatly to promote the oppreſſion of the poor and indigent. It not only deprived the idle of a reſource, but the peaſant and the farmer loſt a ſure market for the fruits of their labour. Beſides, the nobility, who were now become the owners of the church-lands, not only raiſed the rents of the farms, but alſo diſtreſſed the tenants by every method that avarice could invent. The woollen manufacture was carried to a great height in the Netherlands; and the large quantity of bullion imported from America, enabled the grandees of Spain to purchaſe the fineſt pieces of their cloth at very high prices. Hence the Engliſh wool found a ſure and advantageous market among the Flemings. The natural conſequence of this was, that the nobility turned their farms into paſture lands, and agriculture, which required the labours, and therefore afforded ſubſiſtence, to the huſbandmen, was neglected. Hence the tenants and labourers were conſidered as a burden; and a multitude of people were reduced to beggary. The poorer claſſes of men could neither maintain their cattle nor themſelves. What contributed ſtill farther to oppreſs them, was the adulteration of the coin, begun in the reign of Henry VIII. and continued by Somerſet to anſwer the neceſſities of the ſtate. In conſequence of this impolitic meaſure, the good coin was either hoarded up or exported; baſe metal only circulated, and the poor became unable to provide bread for their families. An alarming ſtagnation of commerce took place, and the loudeſt complaints reſounded from every part of England.

The Protector, dreading the conſequences of this univerſal diſcontent, exerted himſelf to quiet the minds of the people. He publiſhed a pardon, even after the inſurgents had committed overt-acts of rebellion, and appointed commiſſioners to enquire into and redreſs their grievances. In conſequence of this, many of the incloſures were thrown down, and the nobility were exaſperated againſt the Protector, while the people received very little mitigation of their ſufferings. The evil was of too complicated a nature to be eaſily redreſſed. The inhabitants of almoſt every county of England gave indications of their being ready to take up arms, and procure by open violence the neceſſaries of life, which they could not obtain by their labour.

Inſurrections were now raiſed in almoſt every county in the kingdom; but thoſe which threatened the moſt fatal conſequences were in the counties of Devon and Norfolk. In the former the diſturbances were raiſed by a prieſt of Stamford-Courtney, who had the addreſs to give them a religious turn, which fed the flame of diſcontent. The artful change of the ſubject, from temporal to religious objects, increaſed the number of the inſurgents, and many of the gentry, particularly Humphry Arundel, governor of St. Michael's Mount, joined the populace. They were ſoon formed into a kind of regular army, amounting to near 10,000 men. Lord Ruſſel, who commanded a ſmall body of forces in Devonſhire, being unable to meet the rebels in the field, had recourſe to negotiation. But they inſiſted on the moſt extravagant articles, declaring that they would never lay down their arms till they were granted. They demanded, that all the general councils and antient canons of the church ſhould be obſerved: that the law of the ſix articles ſhould be executed: that the maſs ſhould be ſaid in Latin, and the prieſt alone receive the euchariſt: that the hoſt ſhould be elevated and worſhipped, and that thoſe who refuſed to perform that adoration ſhould ſuffer as heretics: that the ſacrament ſhould be only adminiſtered to the people at Eaſter, in one kind: that baptiſm ſhould be adminiſtered at all times, and at any ſeaſons: that holy bread, holy water, and palms, ſhould again be uſed, and all the images reſtored, together with all the antient ceremonies: that the new liturgy ſhould be laid aſide, and both the old offices and the proceſſions, be reſtored: that all preachers before their ſermons, and prieſts in their celebrating maſs, ſhould pray for the ſouls in purgatory: and that the people ſhould be forbid to read the bible.

When lord Ruſſel informed the regency of theſe demands, they received them with that contempt they deſerved; and as ſoon as the rebels found they were rejected, they determined to have recourſe to arms, in order to force a compliance from the government. Accordingly, they marched directly to Exeter, carrying before them croſſes, banners, holy water, candleſticks, and other implements of the antient ſuperſtition; together with the hoſt, placed on a canopy. The ſiege of the city was formed on the ſecond of July; but as the rebels were wholly deſtitute of cannon, they were repulſed in every attempt to take the place by ſtorm. The citizens were, however, ſoon reduced to extremity; but they held out till they were relieved. The lord Grey having joined the lord Ruſſel with a conſiderable body of forces, they advanced againſt the rebels, who were totally routed. Many of the inſurgents were executed by martial law. Arundel, and the other leaders were ſent to London, where they ſuffered for their crimes. The prieſt of Stamford-Courtney was hanged on the top of a tower, adjoining to his own houſe, dreſſed in the popiſh robes of his order, and a chaplet of beads ſuſpended at his girdle.

The inſurrection in Norfolk, (inſtead of decreaſing, as might have been ſuppoſed from the defeat of the weſtern inſurgents) became ſtill more violent. The rebels were headed by one Ket, a Tanner, who exerciſed his authority with the utmoſt inſolence and outrage. They were exceeding numerous, and increaſed ſo faſt daily, that their number amounted to at leaſt 20,000. Intoxicated with power, Ket made the moſt exorbitant pretenſions. He demanded that the gentry ſhould be ſuppreſſed; that new counſellors ſhould be placed about the king; and that the antient rights of religion ſhould be re-eſtabliſhed. Theſe demands being rejected, the inſurgents marched to Norwich, and took poſt at Mouſhold-hill, which commands the city, where they erected a caſtle, and fortifications, ſome remains of which are ſtill extant. Their leader, Ket, affecting great auſterity and regularity of conduct, held a court of judicature under a great oak (called, on this occaſion, the Tree of Reformation) on the top of the hill, forcing the neighbouring gentry to obey his lawleſs ordinances, and committing a thouſand enormities under pretence of redreſſing the grievances of the people.

The protector firſt endeavoured to heal theſe diſorders by lenient methods; but the rebels having refuſed, with the moſt provoking inſolence, a pardon which was offered them, it was determined to reduce them by force. The marquis of Northampton was accordingly ſent againſt them, with about a thouſand Engliſh infantry, and a body of Italian horſe. But that nobleman advancing to Norwich, contrary to his orders, his forces were routed with the loſs of about an hundred men killed and forty taken priſoners, among the former of whom was John lord Sheffield. This defeat alarmed the government, and the king propoſed to ſend Somerſet at the head of a powerful army, in order to cruſh the rebels before they increaſed to a more formidable number. The protector, however, who affected popularity, choſe not to appear in perſon againſt the rebels; but diſpatched the earl of Warwick, at the head of ſix thouſand men levied for carrying on the war againſt Scotland. Warwick marched with the utmoſt expedition, and came up with the inſurgents at Duſſingale. A bloody engagement enſued, in which the rebels were totally defeated, and above two thouſand of them ſlain on the ſpot. Ket was hanged on the walls of Norwich-caſtle, his brother on the top of Wymondham ſteeple, and nine of his principal followers on the boughs of the oak of reformation.

The defeat of the Norfolk rebels intimidated thoſe of Yorkſhire, where a conſiderable party were already in arms. The ſucceſs of Ket had animated them to purſue the ſame meaſures for obtaining redreſs of their grievances. They aſſembled at Semor in the North Riding, and committed ſeveral outrages; but the victorious Warwick, after ſuppreſſing the Norfolk rebellion, marched againſt and quickly defeated them. Two of their principal ring-leaders being taken were hanged at York; and as a general pardon was offered to the reſt, they laid down their arms, and quietly diſperſed.

Notwithſtanding theſe rebellions were thus happily ſuppreſſed yet they proved of great prejudice to the king's affairs, not only in Scotland but on the continent. The forces deſtined for Scotland were detained in England; and M. de Thermes landing there with freſh ſuccours from France, gave great aſſiſtance to the Scots. He took the caſtle of Boughtry, and put the whole garriſon to the ſword. Haddington, however, held out againſt all his efforts, and it was determined to reduce the place by famine. But this was not eaſily effected, ſupplies were continually thrown into the place during the ſummer, ſo that all his efforts proved abortive. At laſt winter effected what his whole power could not perform. The inclemency of the weather was an obſtacle not to be ſurmounted by the Engliſh. The earl of Rutland, warden of the Eaſt Marches, received orders to diſmantle the place. He accordingly marched thither at the head of a ſtrong body of forces, demoliſhed the fortifications and brought off the garriſon.

Theſe were far from being the worſt inconveniencies that aroſe in conſequence of the late diſturbances at home. The French monarch, encouraged by the inteſtine troubles of England, made an effort to execute his favourite ſcheme of recovering Boulogne. The Engliſh court had for ſome time been apprehenſive that he had formed that deſign, and ſent over ſecretary Paget to the court of Charles V. in order to conclude an alliance with that powerful monarch. But Charles having formed a deſign of extending his dominions by acting the part of a champion for the catholic religion, liſtened not to the advances made by the Engliſh for entering into a ſtrict confederacy. In the mean time Henry II. entered the territory of Boulogne at the head of a numerous army, took ſeveral caſtles, equipped a powerful fleet, and attempted a deſcent on the iſlands of Guernſey and Jerſey; but a ſquadron of the Engliſh ſhips being immediately fitted out, fell upon the enemy, and drove them from the iſlands with the loſs of above a thouſand men.

Somerſet, finding himſelf diſappointed in his wiſhed-for alliance with the emperor, was deſirous of concluding a peace with France and Scotland; eſpecially as he was in no condition to ſupport the neceſſary expences, and had experienced the difficulties and dangers that attended miniſters in demanding and raiſing new ſubſidies: at the ſame time, he was anxious for completing the great work of the reformation ſo ſucceſsfully begun. He therefore determined to ſacrifice Boulogne, in order to gain the friendſhip and aſſiſtance of Henry. But when he propoſed the reſtitution of that place in the council, he met with the ſtrongeſt oppoſition from his enemies; who knowing he was in no condition to carry on the war, were determined, for that very reaſon, to oppoſe every meaſure that had any tendency to procure a pacification, and to embrace the firſt opportunity that offered for depriving him of his dignity.

Somerſet was particularly expoſed to danger from the great authority he enjoyed above the reſt of the nobility. The haughtineſs of his carriage, his ambition, the contempt he expreſſed for all thoſe who refuſed to be directed by his ſentiments, joined to the conſideration of his limited and inferior capacity, irritated daily the diſcontented nobles. Warwick, the moſt powerful, and therefore the moſt dangerous of his enemies, formed a very ſtrong party againſt him. He had provoked the nobility and gentry by the preference he had ſhewn the people with regard to the incloſures, and the commotions that followed: they even dreaded a renewal of the ſame diſorders from his preſent affectation of popularity. He had created a court of requeſts in his own houſe for the poorer claſs of the people, and readily embraced every meaſure calculated to promote their intereſt and ſafety.

But though Somerſet courted the affections of the people, his power was not conſiderable: the popiſh party, which ſtill formed a principal part of the illiterate commonalty, were his inveterate enemies, and readily embraced every opportunity to condemn his conduct. All his actions were miſrepreſented; he was reproached with the execution of his own brother; a crime ſo unnatural in the eyes of mankind in general, that he was repreſented as a monſter rather than an human being. Add to this the great parade he made of his wealth in erecting that magnificent palace in the Strand, called from him Somerſet-houſe. The pariſh church of St. Mary, and three biſhops houſes were pulled down, to furniſh ground and materials for this ſtructure. Nor was he contented with that piece of ſacrilege; he made an attempt to demoliſh St. Margaret's Weſtminſter, in order to employ ſtones to the ſame purpoſe; but the pariſhioner roſe upon the workmen, drove them from the church and threatened to put them to death if they made a ſecond attempt. But Somerſet was not intimidated at this repulſe. He ſeized a chapel, together with a cloiſter and charnel-houſe belonging to it in St. Paul's church-yard, and alſo the church of St. John of Jeruſalem; and with theſe materials his palace was raiſed.*

The enemies of Somerſet now thought they had ſufficient accuſations to form articles of impeachment againſt him. Accordingly, the lord St. John, preſident of the council, the earls of Warwick, Southampton, and Arundel, with five other counſellors, met, on Sunday the 6th of October, at Ely-houſe, where the earl of Warwick reſided; and aſſuming to themſelves the whole power of the council, ſent for the lord-mayor and aldermen of London; and after arraigning the protector's conduct, and charging him with the moſt enormous crimes, commanded them to obey no orders but ſuch as were iſſued by themſelves. The next day the lord-chancellor, the marquis of Northampton, the earl of Shrewſbury, Sir Thomas Cheny, Sir John Gage, Sir Ralph Sadler, and the lord chief-juſtice Montague, joined the malecontent counſellors, and every thing ſeemed to threaten a final period to the diſtinguiſhed authority of the protector.

Intimidated at theſe appearances, the protector removed the king from Hampton-court to Windſor-caſtle; and arming his friends and ſervants, ſeemed determined to defend himſelf againſt his enemies. But finding that Cranmer and Paget were the only perſons of rank that adhered to him, that he was abandoned by his partiſans, and that the people did not ſeem to intereſt themſelves in his favour, he loſt all hopes of ſucceſs, and offered to ſubmit to the deciſions of the council, provided they would promiſe to treat him with candour. This, indeed, was agreed to; but he was nevertheleſs, ſent to the Tower, with ſome of his friends and adherents; among whom was Cecil, afterwards ſo famous in the reign of queen Elizabeth. On the fourteenth of October, he was brought before the council, and articles of accuſation exhibited againſt him, of which the following were the chief: That he had not obſerved the conditions on which he had been made protector: that he had treated with ambaſſadors, without notifying it to the council; and had, by his own authority, diſpoſed of governments and biſhoprics: that he had held a court of requeſts in his own houſe: that he had debaſed the coin: that he had iſſued proclamations in the affair of incloſures, contrary to the opinion of the whole council: that he had not taken care to ſuppreſs the late inſurrections; but had, on the contrary, ſupported and encouraged them: that he had occaſioned the loſs of the forts in the territory of Boulogne, by neglecting to furniſh them with proviſions and ammuniton: that he had endeavoured to inſtil into the king a bad opinion of his counſellors, by perſuading him they intended to deſtroy him: that he had cauſed the lords of the council to be proclaimed traitors; and that he had maliciouſly not only put the king in great fear by carrying him ſo ſuddenly to Windſor, but had alſo been the means of throwing him into a moſt violent diſeaſe, to the great danger of his life.

As the duke had not been apprized of the nature of the articles intended to be exhibited againſt him, he was not prepared to give his anſwer, and was therefore remanded back to the Tower. The marquis of Northampton, the earls of Warwick and Southampton, the lords St. John, Ruſſel, and Wentworth, were appointed governors of the king's perſon, and the principal adminiſtration of the government entruſted with the earl of Warwick, but without any title that might give him the leaſt authority over the other counſellors. A revocation of the protector's power was alſo publiſhed under the great ſeal.

But all the arts of Warwick could not perſuade the well-meaning part of the council to believe the duke guilty of any thing intentionally bad, either againſt the king or the conſtitution of his country: they indeed thought him too obnoxious to the landed intereſt of England, to continue longer at the head of affairs; and therefore willingly engaged in meaſures for removing him from the ſeat of power, as well as for excluding him from ever regaining it for the future.

The fall of the duke of Somerſet gave freſh ſpirits to the Roman Catholic party, who aſcribed all the late innovations to his councils. They flattered themſelves that Warwick, who was always conſidered as a friend to the Romiſh religion, would reſtore the ancient faith and mode of worſhip; but they ſoon found themſelves miſtaken. Warwick always made religion ſubſervient to his intereſt; and knowing that the king had imbibed a ſtrong attachment to the Proteſtant doctrines, he was reſolved not to oppoſe his inclinations, nor forfeit his own power by purſuing any violent meaſures. He accordingly declared his intention to promote the Reformation; and ſo ſtrongly oppoſed the meaſures of Southampton, who was conſidered as the head of the Catholics, that he retired from court in diſguſt, and ſoon after died of vexation. Several other changes were alſo made in the council; but they all tended to convince the Romaniſts, that they had nothing to expect from their having been inſtrumental in the fall of the duke of Somerſet. The earl of Warwick was made lord-high-admiral of England; the lord St. John was created earl of Wiltſhire, and made treaſurer, in the room of the duke of Somerſet; Wootton was made ſecretary of ſtate, in the room of Smith; the marquis of Northampton obtained the office of great chamberlain; and lord Wentworth was made maſter of the king's houſhold.

The diſgraced Somerſet was now prevailed upon to confeſs, on his knees, before the council, all the articles of the charge exhibited againſt him; a ſubmiſſion that made him contemptible in the eyes of the nation. The parliament deprived him of all his offices, and condemned him in a large fine. But Warwick thinking he had now ſufficiently humbled the haughty Somerſet, and that his abject behaviour had effectually deſtroyed the ſmall remains of his authority, re-admitted him into the council.

* After Somerſet's death this palace fell to the crown; and re Anne of Denmark, queen to king James I. kept her court, ence, during that reign, it was called Denmark-houſe; but it n after recovered the name of the founder. It was afterwards reſidence of queen Catharine, dowager of Charles II. and, an act paſſed in the ſecond year of the reign of his preſent jeſty, it was ſettled upon the preſent queen for life.

This palace conſiſted of ſeveral courts, and had a garden be- d it ſituated on the bank of the Thames. The front next the rand was adorned with columns and other decorations, and in center was a handſome gate that opened into a quadrangle. the ſouth ſide of this quadrangle was a piazza, before the at hall or guard-room; beyond which were other courts that on a deſcent towards the garden. The back front next the Thames was added to it by king Charles II. and was a magnificent ſtructure of free-ſtone, with a noble piazza built by Inigo Jones. In this new building were the royal apartments, which commanded a beautiful proſpect of the river, and the adjacent country. The garden was ornamented with ſtatues, ſhady walks and a bowling-green: but as none of the royal family had reſided there after queen Catharine, dowager of Charles II. ſeveral of the officers belonging to the crown were permitted to lodge in it; and a great part of it was for ſome time uſed as barracks for ſoldiers.

This palace has been lately taken down, and on its ſcite are now erecting ſeveral elegant buildings, the principal of which are intended as public offices for the uſe of government.

A. D. 1550. Notwithſtanding Warwick and his party had made ſuch grievous complaints againſt the late protector, with regard to his conduct in foreign affairs, they ſoon found themſelves involved in the ſame difficulties. The wars with France and Scotland, which could not be ſupported by an exhauſted exchequer, appeared dangerous to a divided and diſcontented nation; eſpecially as there was now no object worth contending for. Ambaſſadors were therefore diſpatched to the French court; but Henry abſolutely refuſed to pay the two millions of crowns, which his predeceſſors had acknowledged to be due to the crown of England, as arrears of penſions, declaring that he would never conſent to be a tributary prince to any power. He, however, offered a ſum for the immediate reſtitution of Boulogne, and four hundred thouſand crowns were at laſt agreed upon, one half to be paid immediately, and the other in Auguſt following. Six hoſtages were given for the performance of this article. Scotland was alſo included in the treaty; the Engliſh, ſtipulating to reſtore Lauder and Douglas, and to demoliſh the fortreſſes of Eymouth and Roxburgh.

Though great rejoicings were made, by order of government, on account of this peace, yet it was far from being agreeable to the nation. The reſtitution of Boulogne, which had been conſidered as ſo great a crime even to have propoſed it, in the duke of Somerſet, opened the eyes of the people: they were now convinced, that the ambition of the courtiers, not any regard for the glory of the king and the welfare of the nation, had raiſed the ſtorm that had ſwept Somerſet from the ſeat of power. The murmurs became general, and ſoon reached the ears of the aſpiring Warwick, who, to divert the public attention, and prevent their reſentment from proving fatal to the adminiſtration, undertook the popular office of enquiring into certain miſdemeanors of thoſe who had been intruſted with the management of the public money, ſome of whom were ſeverely puniſhed. He alſo thought it neceſſary to make all the friends and well-wiſhers of the duke of Somerſet eaſy, rather than to provoke them: the lord Ruſſel was made earl of Bedford; Cecil had a promiſe of being made ſecretary of ſtate; and as a mark of ſincere reconciliation to Somerſet, the lord Liſle (Warwick's ſon) was contracted to a daughter of the duke's; and ſeveral of that nobleman's friends who had been impriſoned on his account were diſcharged upon their own recognizances.

A. D. 1551. Warwick, who had already declared his deſign of completing the reformation, now began to carry his promiſe into execution. Several biſhops, though they had extended their complaiſance very far with regard to the meaſures of the court, were ſtill friends to the tenets of the Roman church, and it was now determined to ſeize their revenues. The proſecution was begun with the famous Gardiner, biſhop of Wincheſter, who, in ſeveral inſtances, had rendered himſelf obnoxious to the adminiſtration. He was required to acknowledge his former miſbehaviour, and confeſs the juſtneſs of his confinement; to own that the king was ſupreme head of the church; that the power of making and diſpenſing with holidays was part of the prerogative; that the common-prayer-book was a godly and commendable form; that the king was a complete ſovereign in his minority; that the ſtatute of the ſix articles was juſtly repealed; and that the king had full authority to correct and reform what was amiſs in eccleſiaſtical diſcipline. The biſhop ſaid he was ready to ſubſcribe to all theſe articles except the firſt. He maintained, that his conduct had always been innoffenſive; and declared he would never hold himſelf guilty of faults he had not committed. But the council, who never intended to accept of any acknowledgment, multiplied the articles in proportion to his ſubmiſſion. At laſt, the prelate, from a dread of totally diſhonouring his former conduct by mean compliances, determined to act with vigour. He refuſed to ſubſcribe any articles they might preſent to him; and was therefore depoſed from his ſee by a commiſſion appointed for that purpoſe. He was likewiſe committed cloſe priſoner; his books and papers were taken from him; he was denied all company; nor was he permitted either to ſend or receive any letters or meſſages. Several other biſhops, much leſs ſuſpected and obnoxious than Gardiner, were alſo deprived of their ſees; particularly the biſhops of Chicheſter, Worceſter and Exeter; and thoſe of Landaff, Saliſbury and Coventry, were obliged to ſacrifice the greater part of their revenues to the rapacity of the courtiers.

Nor were theſe plunderers of the church contented with the revenues of the prieſthood; they extended their rapacity to objects of much ſmaller importance. The council iſſued an order for purging the libraries of all ſuperſtitious books, and all that were plated with gold and ſilver were condemned for their ornaments. If they were books of literature, they were deſtroyed, as uſeleſs; if of mathematics, geometry, or aſtronomy, they were ſuppoſed to be infected with magic. The libraries of Oxford ſuffered the utmoſt outrage; nor had the univerſity power to oppoſe theſe barbarous violences; they even feared that their revenues would attract the rapacity of the earl of Warwick.

The princeſs Mary herſelf was expoſed to th utmoſt danger: ſhe was required to change her religion, or at leaſt to read St. Auguſtin and the ancient fathers, who would convince her of the error of popery. But Mary was inſenſible to all theſe remonſtrances. She was, however, alarmed for he own ſafety, and formed a plan for making her eſcape to the court of Charles V. but her deſign wa diſcovered, and prevented. The emperor, however made ſtrong repreſentations in her behalf: he eve threatened to commence hoſtilities, if liberty of conſcience was refuſed her. His remonſtrances had th deſired effect: is was not thought adviſeable to plung the nation into a war on ſo ſlight an occaſion; an Edward, who had imbibed the utmoſt deteſtation fo the idolatrous worſhip of the catholics, lamented wit tears the obſtinacy of his ſiſter, and his own misfortune in being obliged to tolerate her errors.

In the mean time the ambition of Warwick wa arrived at the moſt exorbitant height. Not contente with the emoluments he had already acquired, he extended his pretenſions much farther, and had gaine over to his intereſt a very formidable party, wh were determined to facilitate all his ambitions ente prizes. The late earl of Northumberland died wit out iſſue, and his brother Sir Thomas Piercy havin been attainted on account of the ſhare he had in th Yorkſhire inſurrection, the title became extinct, a the eſtate was veſted in the crown. This was too ri a prize to be neglected by the ambitious Warwic he procured from the king a grant of thoſe amp poſſeſſions, and was dignified with the title of du of Northumberland. His friend Paulet St. Jo earl of Wiltſhire and and lord-high treaſurer, w created marquis of Wincheſter, Sir William Herbe earl of Pembroke; and William Cecil was made cretary of ſtate.—By Warwick's thus forming projects for the advancement of his family ſo early, appears that he had ſome reaſon to think, that the of the king would be but of ſhort duration.

But ſtill Northumberland was far from being ſatisfied: he conſidered all increaſe of titles or poſſeſſions, either to himſelf or his adherents, only as ſteps to farther acquiſitions; and perceiving the duke of Somerſet (though deprived of his dignity) ſtill preſerved a conſiderable degree of popularity, he determined to ruin a man, whom he conſidered as the chief obſtacle to his ambitious projects. He began his infamous deſign by alienating the affections of the young king from his uncle, whom he repreſented as a very dangerous ſubject: he ſpread a report, that Somerſet had cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed king in ſeveral counties, and that he was preparing an armed force to make himſelf maſter of his majeſty's perſon. At the ſame time he continually offered him freſh inſults, in order to provoke him to commit imprudent actions; and had gained over many of the friends and ſervants of that unfortunate nobleman to his intereſt. Thus provoked, the unguarded Somerſet let fall ſome menacing expreſſions againſt Northumberland, and his treacherous confidents carried to his enemy every paſſionate word that dropped from him; they even revealed the ſchemes which they themſelves ſuggeſted. The king was informed of theſe pretended diſcoveries, and by too readily believing the ſlanderous tales, he abandoned his uncle, and conſented to his being put under arreſt.

Accordingly, on the 17th of October, at night, the duke of Somerſet, the lord Gray, David and John Seymour, Hammond and Newdigate, two of the duke's ſervants, Sir Ralph Vane, and Sir Thomas Palmer, were all apprehended at the ſame time, and committed to priſon. The next day the ducheſs of Somerſet, with her two favourites, Crane and his wife, Sir Miles Patridge, Sir Michael Stanhope, Baniſter, and others, were taken into cuſtody. Sir Thomas Palmer, who had acted as a ſpy upon the duke's actions, charged him with having formed a deſign "to excite a rebellion in the north; to attack the horſe-guards on a muſter-day; to take poſſeſſion of the Tower; and to raiſe an inſurrection in London." But the only accuſation that ſeemed to have ſome truth for its foundation was, that he had formed a deſign to murder the duke of Northumberland, the marquis of Northampton, and the earl of Pembroke, at an entertainment that was to be made for them at lord Paget's. Crane and his wife corroborated Palmer's evidence with regard to the laſt ſcheme; and Hammond confeſſed that the duke had armed men to guard him one night in his houſe at Greenwich.

On the firſt of December the duke was brought to his trial at Weſtminſter-hall, the marquis of Wincheſter preſiding as high-ſteward on the occaſion. He denied the charge, and demanded to be confronted by his accuſers; but this requeſt, however equitable, was refuſed, and the court proceeded to the trial. The depoſitions of the witneſſes, as given before the privy-council, were delivered in to the jury, but they were neither produced in court, nor confronted by the priſoner. The duke's defence, however, was ſo ſatisfactory with regard to the treaſonable part of the charge, that the peers gave a verdict in his favour; but they found him guilty of the other part of the charge, purſuant to a ſtatute paſſed in the reign of Henry VII. declaring it felony for any perſon to form a deſign of killing a privy-counſellor; in conſequence of which he received ſentence of death.

A. D. 1552. From the time this unfortunate nobleman received his woeful ſentence, his behaviour was calm, reſigned, and unaffected; and he chiefly employed himſelf in reading and compoſing exerciſes of devotion. He made a decent application to the king in favour of his wife and family, and on the twenty-ſecond of January he was carried to the ſcaffold on Tower-hill, where he was to ſuffer. He was attended on this melancholy occaſion by Dr. Cox; and after performing ſome devotions, he addreſſed himſelf in a ſpeech to the people, in which he declared his innocence with regard to the king, and his fidelity to his country: he ſubmitted to his ſentence, becauſe awarded by the law: he profeſſed his zeal and affection for the proteſtant religion, and a ſincere ſatisfaction in what he had done to promote it. He expreſſed the higheſt regard for the perſon of the king; he exhorted the people to pay both him and the council the moſt implicit obedience: declared he died in peace with all mankind; aſked pardon of all whom he had offended; and requeſted the prayers of all preſent. On finiſhing his ſpeech, he adjuſted himſelf with the utmoſt calmneſs on the block, where he received the blow which put a period to his exiſtence.

When the fatal ſtroke was given, a dreadful groan univerſally iſſued from the ſpectators, many of whom ruſhed in and dipped their handkerchiefs in his blood, which they preſerved as a precious relic; and ſeveral of them, when Northumberland, ſome time after, met a ſimilar fate, upbraided him with his cruelty, and diſplayed before his eyes theſe ſymbols of his crime.

Thus fell the great duke of Somerſet, an eminent inſtance how incapable the beſt intentions, not tempered with caution and modeſty, are to ward off the blows which deſtructive ambition aims at virtuous greatneſs. He was an honeſt, but not amiable man; he had courage, but not reſolution; honour, but not ſpirit. In power he was too over-bearing; out of power always repining, though retirement would have been his poſt of honour, as well as his only ſource of happineſs. His virtues were better calculated for private than for public life. Fortune had made him too great and too little for a conſpicuous ſtation. His abilities could not ſecure the honours which his virtue deſerved, while his virtue could not conquer the diſgraces his ſpirit was forced to ſuffer. He lived the darling of a people who could not aſſiſt him in his diſtreſs; he fell a victim to a faction whom he had deſpiſed in his greatneſs. But with all his faults and failings, religion has ſince ſeen few friends ſo ſincere, and England fewer patriots ſo honeſt as the duke of Somerſet.

Sir Ralph Vane, a brave old ſoldier, and Sir Miles Patridge were hanged; and Sir Michael Stanhope, with Sir Thomas Arundel, beheaded, as the duke's confederates; but ſtrenuouſly denied, in their laſt moments, the crime for which they ſuffered. Lord Paget, chancellor of the duchy of Somerſet, was deprived of his office, and condemned to pay a fine of ſix thouſand pounds; and lord Rich, lord high chancellor, was alſo deprived of the ſeals, for having ſent a letter to Somerſet, informing him of the deſigns of the council.

The day after the execution of Somerſet, the king convoked a parliament, in which ſeveral bills were paſſed both of a civil and religious nature; but the moſt remarkable was one relative to the crime of treaſon; to which the Commons annexed a clauſe of infinitely more conſequence than the bill itſelf. It was declared, "That none ſhould be attainted of treaſon on this act, unleſs two witneſſes ſhould come, and to their face aver the fact for which they were to be tried, except ſuch as ſhould make a voluntary confeſſion; and that none ſhould be queſtioned for any thing ſaid or written againſt the king or government, but within three months after it was done." This equitable and conſtitutional clauſe was ſtrongly oppoſed by all Northumberland's faction, as it totally condemned their late proceedings in the caſe of the unfortunate duke of Somerſet; but notwithſtanding all their arts, it paſſed both houſes, and has ever ſince remained one of the chief bulwarks of Engliſh liberty.

The ambitious Northumberland had for ſome time formed a deſign of ruining Tonſtal biſhop of Durham, and appropriating to himſelf the ample revenues of that ſee. Accordingly, during this ſeſſion, a bill of attainder was brought into the Houſe of Lords againſt that prelate, (on pretence of his having concealed a conſpiracy againſt the king) where it paſſed with two diſſenting voices, Cranmer and lord Stourton. But when the bill was ſent down to the Commons, they inſiſted that witneſſes ſhould be examined, in order to prove the charge againſt him; that the biſhop ſhould be confronted with his accuſers, and be permitted to ſpeak in his own defence. Theſe equitable demands were refuſed, and the Commons nobly exerted the power with which they were entruſted, by throwing out the bill. This oppoſition of the Commons ſo enraged Northumberland, that he immediately diſſolved the parliament, and ſummoned another to meet in the beginning of the enſuing year.

In the mean time he continued to wreak his vengeance on the adherents of the late duke of Somerſet. He commenced a rigorous inquiſition about the lands formerly appertaining to the chauntries, which had been given away during the adminiſtration of that nobleman; and ſome of the new proprietors were condemned in heavy fines, while others appeaſed him with large ſums of money.

A. D. 1553. Northumberland exerted himſelf with ſo much induſtry and ſucceſs, and employed ſo many corrupt and unjuſtifiable methods in the election of members, that when the new parliament met, he found the Commons totally obſequious to his will; and that there was no likelihood of any oppoſition being made to whatever meaſures he ſhould adopt.

Tonſtal had, during the receſs of parliament, been depoſed by lay commiſſioners, and the ſentence was now confirmed by that aſſembly, who divided the ſee of Durham into two biſhoprics; but the dignity of earl Palatine was veſted in the king, who gave it to Northumberland. Having thus accompliſhed his deſigns with this tool of a parliament, during the ſeſſion of a month, Northumberland cauſed it to be prorogued, and applied himſelf to other meaſures for the gratification of his towering ambition.

During the ſpring of the preceding year, Edward had been ſeized with the meaſles, and afterwards with the ſmall-pox, but paſſed through both without any dangerous ſymptoms, and his health had ſome time been fully re-eſtabliſhed, when he was ſeized with a cough, which brought on a conſumption. It was, however, hoped, that his youth, the approach of ſpring, and the medicines adminiſtered by his phyſicians, would, by degrees, get the better of his diſorder; but it proved of too malignant a nature for the power of medicine to eradicate.

The duke now thought it neceſſary to ſet about the deſign he had formed of placing his own family on the throne of England. He therefore ſuffered no one to approach the royal perſon except thoſe who were ſtrongly attached to his intereſt. At the ſame time he affected the moſt anxious concern for the young monarch's health and recovery; and, by theſe hypocritical expreſſions of duty, ſoon gained the firſt place in the affections and confidence of his ſovereign.

Having thus far ſucceeded, Northumberland's next ſtep was, to prevail upon the king to alter the ſucceſſion. Edward, who was ſincerely attached to the Proteſtant religion, had often expreſſed his dread of the fatal conſequences that would inevitably attend its profeſſors if ſo bigotted a catholic as his ſiſter Mary ſhould ever aſcend the throne. Northumberland improved theſe melancholy reflections, and artfully inſinuated, that the only method of averting thoſe dreadful misfortunes from the profeſſors of the new religion conſiſted in changing the ſucceſſion. He added, that the king poſſeſſed the ſame power with his father, and might therefore transfer the crown from the princeſs Mary to the lady Jane Gray, eldeſt daughter of the duke of Suffolk, and grand-daughter to Mary queen of France, ſiſter to Henry VIII*. He obſerved, at the ſame time, that the princeſs Elizabeth muſt inevitably ſhare the fate of her ſiſter; becauſe the only pretence they could uſe againſt Mary was her illegitimacy, which equally affected Elizabeth, the marriages both of Catharine and Anne having been declared unlawful by the parliament.

Edward, whoſe prevailing paſſion was the intereſt of the reformed religion, liſtened with great attention to this expedient. He knew the lady Jane to be a perſon equally diſtinguiſhed for the accompliſhments of her mind and perſon; ſtrongly attached to the reformed religion, a friend to virtue, and a lover of her country. He therefore acquieſced with the duke's propoſal, and promiſed to leave the crown to that accompliſhed princeſs.

Northumberland, in order effectually to accompliſh his deſign, now perſuaded the duke of Suffolk to give his daughter the lady Jane Gray in marriage to his fourth ſon, the lord Guildford Dudley. Suffolk readily agreed to the offered alliance; and the nuptials were accordingly ſolemnized. This being effected, Northumberland determined to ſtrengthen his intereſt by other marriages, and accordingly brough about a match between the lady Catherine Gray (ſecond daughter to the duke of Suffolk) and the lord Herbert, eldeſt ſon to the earl of Pembroke and beſtowed his only daughter Catharine upon lor Haſtings, eldeſt ſon to the earl of Huntingdon.

The only matter that now remained was, to obtai the execution of the change which Edward had determined to make in the ſucceſſion. Accordingly, o the 11th of June, Sir Edward Montague, chief juſtice of the Common Pleas, Sir John Baker and Si Thomas Bromley, attorney and ſolicitor-general, attended the council, in obedience to a ſummons they had received for that purpoſe, when Edward gav them the minutes of an intended deed for altering th ſucceſſion, with orders to draw them up in the form of a patent. They at firſt refuſed complying wit the king's orders; but being wrought on by th threats and promiſes of the powerful duke, they a length obeyed; the patent was drawn up, an ſigned by all the judges, except Sir James Hale who, though a ſincere friend to the reformation, obſtinately refuſed to put his name to the inſtrument.

The king's health now viſibly declined every day and all hopes of his recovery vaniſhed. The peopl had not ſcrupled, for ſome time, to impute his diſorder to the practices of Northumberland; and an incident which now happened tended to confirm them i their opinion. His phyſicians were all diſcharged by a order of council procured by Northumberland, and the king committed to the care of an ignorant old woman, who engaged, by the help of her noſtrums, to reſtore him, in a ſhort time, to his former health and vigour. But experience ſoon expoſed the falſehood of her pretenſions; for after uſing her medicines only a few days, all the alarming ſymptoms increaſed to the moſt violent degree: he felt a difficulty of ſpeech and breathing; his pulſe became feeble, his legs ſwelled, and his colour changed livid: indications that ſhewed too plainly he could not be long an inhabitant of this world. But his pious diſpoſition, and his benevolent turn of mind, never left him. He prayed, with his lateſt breath, for the peace and happineſs of England; and expired at Greenwich on the 6th of July, in the Sixteenth year of his age, and the ſeventh of his reign.

* It is here neceſſary to obſerve, that on the death of the late duke of Suffolk, which happened in 1551, the title became extinct in the family of Brandon. And the duke of Northumberland (at that time earl of Warwick) having formed a deſign upon the crown in favour of his own family, cauſed Henry Gray, marquis of Dorſet (who had married Frances Brandon, one of the daughters of the deceaſed duke) to be created duke of Suffol His ſcheme was, to effect a match between one of his ſons and t eldeſt daughter of the ſaid Henry Gray by Frances Brandon, wh in the order of ſucceſſion, held the next place to the two daug ters of the late king, whom he meant to exclude from the thro of England.

This young prince poſſeſſed all the qualities, both natural and acquired, that could attract the admiration of the world, or recommend him to the affection of his ſubjects. His perſon was elegant, his diſpoſition affable and humane, and his mind cultivated by extenſive learning. Though only ſixteen years of age, he is ſaid to have been verſed in the Greek, Latin, French, Italian, and Spaniſh languages, together with the ſciences of logic, muſic and natural philoſophy. Notwithſtanding theſe amiable accompliſhments, a youth of his tender years can hardly be ſaid to have had any public character, as every part of his political conduct was influenced by thoſe who happened to be at the head of the council, both of whom were devoted, not to the ſervice of their country, but their ſordid ſelves.

Had his life been protracted, his regal conduct would, in all probability, have redounded to his own honour, and the happineſs of his ſubjects: with juſtice, therefore, might they lament, that ſo fair a ſun ſhould ſet before it reached its meridian glory.

Edward, a ſhort time before his death, founded and inſtituted Chriſt's Hoſpital for the maintenance and education of a certain number of orphan children deſcended from freemen of the city of London; which is a ſtanding memento of his benevolence, as well as an eſtabliſhment of infinite benefit to ſociety. He alſo gave the old palace of Bridewell to the city for the lodging of poor way-faring people, the correction of vagabonds and diſorderly perſons, and for finding them work.

The remains of Edward were depoſited in the chapel of St. Peter's church, Weſtminſter, near the body of Henry VII. his grand-father, with great funeral pomp, and the unfeigned lamentations of an affectionate people.

The only remarkable occurrences that happened during this king's reign were the following:

In his fourth year the horſe-guards were firſt appointed to attend the kings of England.

In the ſame year the river Thames ebbed and flowed three times in the ſpace of nine hours, occaſioned by a violent eaſterly wind repelling the ebb before it could perform its natural courſe.

In his fifth year the ſweating ſickneſs viſited England for the laſt time; and carried off a great number of the inhabitants. It raged with particular violence in London, where ſeveral of the nobility fell victims to its fury; among whom was Charles Brandon duke of Suffolk. He was ſucceded in the title by his brother, who died four days after with the ſame diſeaſe, by which means the family of Brandon became extinct.

SECTION IV.

MARY.

THOUGH the title of this princeſs to the crown of England was indiſputable, after the death of her brother, yet her acceſſion was greatly interrupted by the diſtinguiſhed machinations of the duke of Northumberland. Though he knew the people conſidered her as legal ſucceſſor to Edward, yet he was determined to perſevere in the plan he had ſo long concerted, and, if poſſible, to place the lady Jane Gray on the throne of England.

Conſcious, however, that his paſt actions had made him odious in the eyes of the people, and that he had reaſon to expect a powerful oppoſition, he determined to proceed with the utmoſt caution. He concealed the king's death for ſome days; and prevailed upon the council to requeſt the attendance of the two princeſſes, Mary and Elizabeth, under pretence of the bad ſtate of health of their brother, who deſired the aſſiſtance of their counſel, and the conſolation of their company.

Mary, who was at this time in the north of England, readily obeyed the ſummons, and was actually arrived as far as Hunſdon in Hertfordſhire before ſhe diſcovered the ſnare that was laid for her deſtruction. Here ſhe received a letter from the earl of Arundel, informing her of the death of the king, of the ſettlement of the crown upon lady Jane, and of the deſigns of Northumberland to ſeize her perſon. She was convinced of the neceſſity of providing for her own ſafety, and therefore precipitately retired to Framlingham in Suffolk, from whence ſhe wrote circular letters to the council and nobility, reminding them of her right, and commanding them to proclaim her queen of England.

The duke of Northumberland, finding it in vain to diſſemble any longer, now threw off the maſk, and reſolved to act in a more open manner. He engaged the council to depute him and the earl of Suffolk to go to Sion-houſe, where the lady Jane then reſided, to inform her that ſhe had been appointed by the deceaſed king to ſucceed him in the throne.

Jane, who was nearly of the ſame age with Edward, had received her education with him; and could perſonal merit have entitled her to the crown, ſhe had enjoyed it without oppoſition. She was a lady of the moſt amiable perſon, the moſt engaging diſpoſition, and the moſt accompliſhed parts. The ſtudy of the learned languages was at once her employment and her delight; and ſhe preferred the leſſons of Plato to the amuſements of the court. She had hitherto been acquainted with the ſecret diſpoſition of Edward in her favour; but never imagined ſhe was deſtined to the throne.

Struck with ſurprize and conſternation at the meſſage brought by Northumberland and Suffolk, Jane refuſed the offer; alledging the preferable right of the two princeſſes, and warning them of the fatal conſequences that would, in all probability, attend ſo dangerous, and, in her opinion, ſo criminal an enterprize; and earneſtly entreated, that they would let her continue in the private ſtation ſhe had hitherto enjoyed.

At length, however, being overpowered by their arguments, and the ſtrong ſolicitations of her huſband, whom ſhe tenderly loved, ſhe yielded to their importunities; but with ſo much reluctance, that her conſent was rather extorted than given. In conſequence of this, ſhe was immediately conducted to the Tower, where it was then cuſtomary for the new ſovereigns to reſide ſome days before the ceremony of their coronation.

The next day, being the 10th of July, lady Jane Gray was proclaimed queen of England, with the uſual formalities, in the city of London; which being ſo contrary to the expectations of the people, who had not the leaſt notion of this lady's immediate acceſſion to the throne, they received the news with ſilent ſurprize, nor were any of thoſe acclamations heard, which are uſual on ſuch occaſions: and though orders were ſent for her being proclaimed through the realm, they were not obſerved farther than ten miles from London. The diſcontent of the people (which aroſe from their hatred to the duke of Northumberland) was not a little increaſed by an ill-timed act of ſeverity in the council, who ordered one Gilbert Pot, a vintner's ſervant, to be ſet on the pillory, with his ears cut off and nailed to it, on the very day the lady Jane was proclaimed, only for expreſſing himſelf in a ſlighting manner of the new queen.

In the mean time Mary exerted all her intereſt to oppoſe the deſigns of Northumberland. She was attended by great numbers of the neighbouring inhabitants; and, by poſitively promiſing to leave religion in the ſame ſtate ſhe found it (reſerving nothing more than a liberty to profeſs her own) ſhe fixed the people in her intereſt; and, though ſtrongly attached to the Reformation, they promiſed to ſupport her with their lives and fortunes. She was now joined by great numbers of the nobility and gentry, particularly John Bouchier, earl of Bath; Henry Radcliff, earl of Suſſex; Sir Henry Bedingfield, Sir William Drury, and the lord Thomas Howard, ſon to the duke of Norfolk; all of whom repaired to her ſtandard, with ſtrong reinforcements. And Sir Edward Haſtings, who had been ordered to levy troops for the ſervice of lady Jane, deſerted to her, at the head of 4000 men.

When Northumberland was informed of the great progreſs made by Mary to oppoſe him, he ordered the army now ready in London to march immediately towards Newmarket, under the command of the duke of Suffolk. But the counſellors perſuaded him to head the army in perſon; obſerving, that his known valour, his ſuperior military acquiſitions, and the dread of his name (already terrible in Norfolk by his victory in the late reign) would ſtrike the inſurgents with fear. He accordingly took their advice, and joined the army, which conſiſted of 2000 horſe and 6000 foot. He was attended by his ſon the earl of Huntingdon and the lord Gray of Wilton.

The friends of Mary, being informed that Northumberland was in full march againſt them, adviſed the princeſs to retire to the continent. This advice might, in all probability, have been followed, had the duke advanced with that expedition the cauſe he had undertaken demanded; but he marched in ſo ſlow and deliberate a manner, that Mary's friends had time to recover from their fears, and to join her ſtandard with all their forces. When the duke reached Bury, he found that great numbers of his men had deſerted; and he was obliged to wait for reinforcements from London, before he could advance againſt Mary's army, which now amounted to 40,000 men.

The council, inſtead of making levies for reinforcing the duke, left the Tower, (where they had been confined by that ambitious nobleman under pretence of attending on the perſon of lady Jane) and repaired to Baynard's Caſtle, a houſe belonging to the earl of Pembroke, whither they invited all the noblemen whom they conceived to be well affected to Mary. Accordingly, a conſiderable number attended; and the conference was opened by the earl of Arundel, who inveighed, in the ſtrongeſt terms, againſt the cruelty and injuſtice of Northumberland, his inſatiable avarice and unbounded ambition, the criminal deſign he had formed for altering the ſucceſſion, and the wickedneſs in which he had involved the whole council: and concluded with moving, that they might return immediately to their duty and allegiance, which they owed their lawful ſovereign, by proclaiming Mary queen; that being the only method they could take to recover their own honour, and preſerve the tranquillity of the ſtate.

This motion was immediately ſeconded by Pembroke, who, laying his hand upon his ſword, ſwore he was ready to fight any man who ſhould preſume to oppoſe ſo ſalutary a meaſure: but there was little occaſion for employing force, the majority expreſſing their approbation of the propoſal. They then ſent for the lord-mayor and aldermen of London, and informed them of the reſolution that had been taken; with which theſe magiſtrates were ſo well pleaſed that they immediately mounted their horſes, and rode in a body to the Croſs in Cheapſide, where Mary was proclaimed queen of England by Sir Chriſtopher Barker, principal king at arms, on the 19th of July; and the ceremony was performed on the ſame day at the other uſual places in London and Weſtminſter. Te Deum was ſung in the cathedral of St. Paul's, and the event celebrated with great rejoicings by the populace. Even the duke of Suffolk himſelf, who commanded in the Tower, finding all reſiſtance would be vain, ordered the gates to be thrown open, and declared for Mary. The lady Jane now threw off her royal robes, and again deſcended to a private ſtation, which ſhe would never have left, had not the ambition of her relations forced her to graſp a ſcepter which belonged to another.

The firſt ſtep taken by the council, after proclaiming lady Mary queen, was, to diſpatch the earl of Arundel and lord Paget to Framlingham Caſtle, to give that princeſs an account of what had been tranſacted in her favour; and the next day they ſigned an order to the duke of Northumberland, commanding him to diſband his forces, and behave himſelf a became a dutiful ſubject. Before, however, the duk received theſe orders, he had diſmiſſed the ſmall body which remained after an almoſt general deſertion, and had endeavoured to gain the favour of Mary by a early ſubmiſſion, which he teſtified by proclaiming he queen with all the external marks of joy and ſatisfaction But Mary was not be deceived by the hypocritica behaviour of Northumberland; ſhe knew him to b an inveterate enemy to her whole family, and that hi expreſſions of loyalty and zeal for her ſervice wer wholly extorted by fear. She therefore immediatel ſent the earl of Arundel to arreſt that ambitious no bleman, his ſons and accomplices. The haught Northumberland loſt at once both his hopes and h courage. Arundel no ſooner informed him of th purport of his viſit, than he fell at his feet, and, i the moſt ſubmiſſive manner, begged his favou This abject behaviour, ſo peculiar to fallen inſolenc excited the contempt, rather than the pity of Aru del. He told the duke the queen's orders muſt b obeyed; and Northumberland, together with two his ſons, and his principal accomplices, were ſent

London and committed to the Tower. The duke of Suffolk, lady Jane Gray, and lord Guildford Dudley, were alſo taken into cuſtody.

On the 30th of July, Mary, attended by vaſt numbers of people, and a long train of courtiers, ſet out from Framlingham for London, where ſhe was met by the princeſs Elizabeth, with a body of two thouſand men. She had raiſed thoſe forces as a defence for her own perſon during the troubles which ſeemed to threaten the kingdom with all the horrors of a civil war; but on being informed of her ſiſter's ſucceſs, ſhe proceeded, at the head of her little army, to join her ſiſter; and had the addreſs to gain her confidence, by aſſuring her that thoſe men were raiſed for her ſervice.

As ſoon as Mary arrived in London ſhe immediately proceeded to the Tower, where the duke of Norfolk, who had been detained priſoner there ever ſince the death of her father; Courtney, ſon to the marquis of Exeter, who without being charged with any crime, had been ſubject to the ſame puniſhment ever ſince his father's attainder; the three prelates, Gardiner, Tonſtal, and Bonner, who had been confined for their adherence to the catholic religion, appeared before her, and implored her clemency and protection. She embraced them all in the moſt affectionate manner, ſaying to the conſtable of the Tower, "Theſe are my priſoners;" and inſtantly ordered them to be ſet at liberty. The next day the prelates were reſtored to their ſees; Courtney was created earl of Devonſhire, and Gardiner made lord high chancellor of England.

Notwithſtanding Mary had given the moſt ſolemn promiſes that ſhe would preſerve the religion eſtabliſhed by Edward, yet, ſo bigotted was ſhe to her own opinions, that ſhe determined to make promiſes, oaths, juſtice, and even intereſt itſelf give way to her favourite project of reſtoring the religion of the church of Rome. And had it not been for the more artful counſels of the emperor Charles V. and biſhop Gardiner, ſhe had ſent directly for cardinal Pole, as legate, to reconcile England to the Pope; but they diſapproving ſo hazardous a ſtep, ſhe was prevailed upon to ſuſpend her reſolution for the preſent, and to content herſelf with publiſhing a liberty of conſcience in affairs of religion.

Though this declaration was conſidered by the partizans of Mary as a diſtinguiſhed inſtance of her generoſity, it was conſidered in a very different light by the proteſtants: they were alarmed for their religion; and their fears were ſoon confirmed by the confidence of the catholics, who made no ſcruple of inveighing, in the moſt bitter terms, againſt the tenets of the proteſtants. Bourne, one of the chaplains of biſhop Bonner, in a ſermon preached before that prelate in the cathedral of St. Paul's, uſed the moſt indecent invectives againſt Edward's adminiſtration, particularly with regard to the reformation. But he ſhould have remembered, that the memory of Edward was ſtill dear to the people who were alarmed for their religion, and it could not be ſuppoſed they would part with it eaſily. Accordingly a furious tumult was excited: ſome of the audience reproached him in the harſheſt terms; others pelted him with ſtones; and one of them threw a dagger with ſuch dexterity at the preacher, that it narrowly miſſed his face, and ſtuck faſt in the wood of the pulpit behind him. At laſt the people grew ſo furious, that Bourne would probably have been torn in pieces, had not Bradford and Rogers, two eminent proteſtant miniſters, interpoſed, and conveyed him, by a private door, out of the church, to a neighbouring houſe.

No ſanguinary act had yet taken place ſince Mary's acceſſion; but it was now thought neceſſary to open thoſe ſluices of ſeverity which ſoon deluged the kingdom with the blood of its inhabitants.

On the 18th of Auguſt the duke of Northumberland was brought to his trial in Weſtminſter-hall, and arraigned for high treaſon. After the indictment was read, the duke deſired permiſſion to propoſe two queſtions to the peers who were appointed to decide his fate: firſt, whether any perſon could be guilty of treaſon for having obeyed orders given him by the council, under the great ſeal? Secondly, Whether thoſe who were equally guilty with himſelf could ſit as his judges? The high-ſteward anſwered, That the great ſeal of an uſurper had no authority; and that thoſe peers who had neither been impeached nor convicted, were innocent in the eye of the law, and therefore might be admitted on any jury. Theſe anſwers, though far from being uncontrovertible, ſufficiently convinced the duke, that it would be abſolutely uſeleſs to make any objections: he therefore pleaded guilty to the indictment. His example was followed by the marquis of Northampton, and the earl of Warwick, who were tried at the ſame tribunal, and were all condemned to ſuffer as traitors. Sir John and Sir Henry Gates, Sir Andrew Dudley, and Sir Thomas Palmer, who had been ſo inſtrumental in bringing the duke of Somerſet to the block during the late reign, pleaded guilty, and received the ſame ſentence.

From the diſpoſition of the queen, and the preſent ſituation of affairs, Northumberland had little hopes of expecting any favour. He was, indeed, deteſted by all parties, and his fate was conſidered as a neceſſary act of juſtice. On the ſcaffold, he profeſſed himſelf a member of the catholic religion; and lamented his having plundered the effects of the church, eſpecially as it was not now in his power to make reſtitution. But whether theſe were his real ſentiments, or whether he hoped by this declaration, to render the queen more favourable to his family, cannot be known. However that be, the people who had ſincerely lamented the duke of Somerſet, beheld with joy the puniſhment of his oppreſſor. Sir Thomas Palmer, and Sir John Gates, ſuffered with him. The reſt were thought proper objects of the royal clemency, as they pleaded conſtraint as an excuſe for their treaſon. Suffolk himſelf was pardoned, and recovered his liberty; an indulgence which he owed, in a great meaſure, to the contempt entertained of his capacity. Sentence of death had been pronounced againſt the lady Jane, and her huſband the lord Guilford Dudley, but no time was yet fixed for their execution.

The adminiſtration, who were formed of creatures merely at the will of the queen, now applied themſelves to forward her favourite deſign, the re-eſtabliſhment of the Popiſh religion in England. They began with ſilencing all preachers, under pretence of diſcouraging controverſy, except ſuch as ſhould obtain a particular licence from Gardiner; and it was eaſily foreſeen that none but Catholics would be favoured with ſuch a privilege. Bradford, one of the two proteſtant miniſters who had reſcued Bourne in the late tumult at St. Paul's, was committed to priſon, and his companion, Rogers, was confined to his own houſe. Judge Hales, who alone, of all his brethren, had refuſed to ſign the inſtrument which transferred the crown to lady Jane Gray was ſent to priſon, where he was treated with ſuch ſeverity, that he fell into a frenzy, and put an end to his own life. Sir Edward Montague, who was alſo a Proteſtant, was deprived of his office, and fined a thouſand pounds, for having aſſiſted in drawing up the ſettlement of the crown in favour of lady Jane; and his poſt given to Sir Thomas Bromley, a bigotted papiſt, though he had been equally concerned in drawing up that deed, and alſo ſigned it without heſitation. Hooper, biſhop of Glouceſter, and Ferrar, biſhop of St David's, were impriſoned, for daring to preach without a licence from Gardiner. Coverdale, biſhop of Exeter, was alſo confined to his own houſe, for the ſame crime. Peter Martyr, profeſſor of divinity at Oxford, ſuffered ſo many indignities and inſults from the enemies of the reformation that he was obliged to retire for protection to the archbiſhop's palace at Lambeth, though that prelate was in no condition to protect himſelf, the court having already doomed him to deſtruction.

Bonner, the ſworn enemy of Cranmer, not only attempted to ridicule him by indecent ribaldry, but to ruin his character, by propagating a report, that he had ſubmitted to the queen, and offered publickly to recant his errors. The archbiſhop, in order to wipe off this calumny, drew up a confeſſion of his faith, which he offered, with the queen's permiſſion, to defend in public. A copy of this confeſſion being ſhewn to the council, Cranmer was ſummoned to appear before them, when he acknowledged himſelf the author, and was, for that day, diſmiſſed. Some of the council adviſed the queen to treat him with lenity, as it was owing to him ſhe was chiefly indebted for that indulgence ſhe enjoyed during the reign of her father. But the ungrateful queen declared, ſhe remembered nothing of Cranmer, except his having pronounced her mother's divorce, and promoted the reformation. He was therefore ſummoned a ſecond time before the council, who, on pretence of his having publiſhed ſeveral ſeditious libels, committed him priſoner to the Tower.

The impriſonment of the primate was followed by that of biſhop Latimer. Nor was there hardly a biſhop, or even a preacher who had ſignalized himſelf in eſtabliſhing the tenets of the reformation, and did not either recant or fly beyond the ſeas, that eſcaped either deprivation or impriſonment. John a Laſco, a Pruſſian nobleman and miniſter of the German proteſtant church in Auſtin-friars, with all the other reformed preachers, who were foreigners, were baniſhed the kingdom. Theſe were followed by a great number of Engliſh families, who had embraced the reformation. They foreſaw that the deſtructive hand of bigotry would ſoon light the flames of perſecution in their unhappy country, and were unwilling to behold the miſeries of their fellow-ſubjects.

On the firſt day of October Mary was crowned with great pomp at Weſtminſter. The ceremony was performed by the hands of Gardiner, biſhop of Wincheſter, aſſiſted by Bonner, biſhop of London, Tonſtall of Durham, and eight other prelates. On the ſame day was publiſhed what is uſually called a general amneſty; from the benefit of which, however, all thoſe who had been arreſted before the laſt day of September, and many others, were nominally excluded.

As a parliament had been appointed to meet on the fifth of October, the miniſtry were very diligent in obtaining thoſe members that might be moſt likely to anſwer their ſiniſter purpoſes, and ſuch ſcandalous methods were uſed on this occaſion, that though the proteſtants in England were more numerous than the papiſts, the Houſe of Commons was almoſt filled with the latter. In the upper Houſe alſo the queen had a great majority; for even the principal part of thoſe noblemen, who had rejected the papal authority in the late reign, now infamouſly conformed to the doctrines of the court, from motives of intereſt or ambition. Mary was well informed of this, and therefore ordered maſs to be performed in Latin, with all the antient ceremonies, before both Houſes of Parliament, on the firſt day of opening the ſeſſion, though directly contrary to an act of parliament then in being. Dr. Taylor, biſhop of Lincoln, and Dr. Harley, biſhop of Hereford, nobly ſupported the laws of their country: they refuſed to kneel, for which oppoſition they were immediately thruſt out and expelled the Houſe.

This violation of the laws of Edward was followed by an act that aboliſhed them: and thus, by bringing things back to the ſtate in which they were left by Henry VIII. the maſs was eſtabliſhed, and Mary continued in poſſeſſion of the title of ſupreme head of the church. Here it was thought ſhe would have ſtopped; but it ſoon appeared that this was only the firſt ſtep towards eſtabliſhing the Romiſh religion in England. The parliament, however, paſſed an act of a popular nature. They aboliſhed every ſpecies of treaſon which was contained in the ſtatute of Edward III. and every ſpecies of felony which did not ſubſiſt before the firſt year of Henry VIII.

Thus far the parliament had acquieſced with the meaſures of the court; but they now thought proper to exert their authority in a matter which ſeemed of the utmoſt importance to the intereſt of the nation. The ambitious Charles V. having by his deſpotiſm and diſregard to the principles of natural juſtice, occaſioned a revolt in the empire, and been obliged to ſubmit to articles of peace, which ſecured the independency of Germany, was very deſirous of retrieving his loſſes by acquiring the crown of England to his family. His ſon Philip was a widower; and the emperor immediately on the death of Edward, ſent over an agent to the queen, propoſing a marriage between her and his ſon. Mary, who was very deſirous of being united with a houſe from whence ſhe derived her origin, and which might afford her aſſiſtance in the execution of her deſigns with regard to the catholic religion, embraced the offer with great ſatisfaction. The negotiations were carried on with the utmoſt ſecrecy and ſucceſs. But the Commons were no ſooner informed of this intended marriage, than they made it known to the whole nation. The parliament were greatly alarmed with the thoughts of an alliance which they conſidered as prejudicial to their country; they could not bear the thoughts of ſeeing a Spaniard on the throne of England, eſpecially one who had already patronized the inquiſition in his own dominions, and recorded his cruelty with the blood of the inhabitants of the Low-Countries, Naples, Sicily and Milan. The Commons now ſhook off their ſubmiſſion to the court; and preſented a remonſtrance to the queen, in the ſtrongeſt terms, againſt ſuch a dangerous and imprudent ſtep. But Mary, who was naturally obſtinate, perſiſted in her reſolution, and to prevent any farther addreſſes of the like nature, diſſolved the parliament.

A. D. 1554. In the beginning of this year Charle ſent over the count of Egmont, at the head of ſplendid embaſſy, to adjuſt the marriage articles; and Gardiner was appointed to act in behalf of the queen The treaty was at length concluded, and, that i might give as little diſguſt as poſſible, the articles wer drawn up not only favourable but advantageous t England. It was agreed, that though Philip ſhoul have the title of king, the adminiſtration ſhould b ſolely in the hands of the queen; that no foreigne ſhould be capable of enjoying any office in the kingdom; that no innovation ſhould be made in th Engliſh laws, cuſtoms, or privileges; that Phili ſhould not carry the queen abroad without her conſent, nor any of her children without the conſent the nobility; that ſixty thouſand pounds a year ſhou be ſettled on her as a jointure; that the male iſſue the marriage ſhould inherit together with Englan both Burgundy and the Low Countries; and that, Don Carlos, Philip's ſon by his former marriag ſhould die, and his line be extinct, the queen's iſſu whether male or female, ſhould inherit Spain, Sicily, and all the other dominions of Philip.

No ſooner were theſe articles publiſhed, than a general diſcontent prevailed throughout the nation. The people diſtruſted, with reaſon, the artful emperor, and ſtill more his ſon, who was equally inclined to ſuperſtition and tyranny. The inquiſition diſplayed itſelf in all its horrors; and the moſt ſpecious advantages ſeemed only intended to veil the moſt hideous ſlavery.

The ſpirit of revolt appeared now to be univerſal; and ſome perſons, more factious than the reſt, believing it was eaſier to prevent, than to remedy evils, determined to take up arms, and vigorouſly oppoſe the queen's marriage with Philip. Sir Thomas Wyat, a Kentiſh gentleman (very conſiderable on account of his ample fortune, and ſtill more ſo by the opinion the world entertained of his virtues and abilities) engaged to arm the inhabitants of Kent: Sir Peter Carew undertook to aſſemble and provide for the inhabitants of Devonſhire; and theſe two perſuaded the duke of Suffolk, by the hopes of reſtoring the lady Jane to the throne, to attempt to raiſe the Midland counties.

Carew, prompted either by his impetuoſity or apprehenſions, roſe in arms before the day appointed; but his troops were ſoon diſperſed by the duke of Bedford, and he himſelf was forced to take refuge in France. Suffolk, informed of the fate of this confederate, and dreading an arreſt, quitted the town, and attempted to raiſe the people in the counties of Warwick and Leiceſter, where his intereſt chiefly lay; but he was ſo cloſely purſued by the earl of Huntingdon, at the head of 300 horſe, that he was obliged to diſmiſs his followers, and being diſcovered in his retreat, was taken into cuſtody and ſent priſoner to London.

Wyatt's attempt was at firſt more ſucceſsful, and ſeemed to threaten more fatal conſequences. He ſummoned his friends to meet him in the field on the twenty-fifth of January, and was immediately joined by Sir Henry Iſley, Sir George Harper, Thomas Colepepper, and many other gentlemen of diſtinction in Kent. Proper perſons were immediately diſpatched into different parts of the county, to raiſe the people, while he himſelf, with ſome of his principal followers, retired to Rocheſter, took poſſeſſion of the bridge, and fortified the eaſtern part of the city, which he intended as a rendezvous for his army. At the ſame time he ordered a manifeſto to be publiſhed at Maidſtone, and other places, againſt the queen's marriage, and invited every well-wiſher to his country to join him in his endeavours to defend England from the inſolent and tyrannical government of a haughty foreigner. The people were ſoon alarmed at their danger, and flocked to Wyat's ſtandard in conſiderable numbers.

Advice of this rebellion being brought to the queen and her council, they were thrown into the greateſt conſternation. They were incapable of making any vigorous efforts againſt the force of a diſcontented people. The inclemency of the ſeaſon rendered it very difficult to raiſe a number of forces, and thoſe that had been collected to eſcort Mary to the capital, were diſbanded. It was therefore determined to ſend an herald to Wyat, with aſſurance of a full pardon; but the herald not being ſuffered to deliver his meſſage, the duke of Norfolk was diſpatched againſt the rebels, at the head of ſix hundred of the trained-bands, and the queen's guards. The two parties ſoon met, but the very inſtant the duke's artillery began to play, the Londoners deſerted and joined the inſurgents. This treacherous action threw the duke into the utmoſt conſternation. The ranks of his little army were thrown into confuſion, and it was with great difficulty that he himſelf and Sir Henry Jernegan, captain of the queen's guards, were ſaved by a precipitate flight. Thus the rebels, without ſtriking a blow, became maſters of the field, the duke's baggage, and eight pieces of braſs cannon.

Wyat, animated by this ſucceſs, led his army towards the capital, perſuaded that the Londoners would open their gates, and declare in his favour. At Dartford he was met by lord Haſtings and Sir Thomas Cornwallis, who promiſed him, in the queen's name, every reaſonable ſatiſfaction he ſhould require. This conceſſion raiſed the preſumption of Wyat; he now thought himſelf invincible, and had the inſolence to demand poſſeſſion of the Tower, and of the queen's perſon, with authority to change the council at his pleaſure. Haſtings could not bear to hear ſuch ſhameful conditions with any great degree of patience; he defied Wyat, and returned immediately with Cornwallis to court.

The conſternation of the council was ſtill farther increaſed by the demands of Wyat. The queen repaired to Guildhall, acquainted the citizens with the inſolent anſwer of the rebels, aſſerted that ſhe had done nothing in the marriage treaty, without the advice of her council, and declared her reſolution to throw herſelf upon the protection of the faithful city of London. Pleaſed with this condeſcenſion of their ſovereign, the citizens reſolved to oppoſe the rebels. They ordered the bridge to be ſtrongly barricadoed, and every precaution to be taken that had any tendency to render the efforts of the inſurgents abortive, ſhould they attempt to force a paſſage into the city.

Wyat, who was ignorant of theſe reſolutions, advanced as far as Southwark, in order to croſs over the bridge into the city; but finding it would be difficult, if not impoſſible, to force a paſſage, he determined to croſs the Thames at Kingſton; he therefore marched with all expedition to that town, but found on his arrival, that the bridge was ſo decayed as to be impaſſable. This obliged him to halt ſome time till the bridge was repaired. By theſe delays, the critical ſeaſon, on which all popular commotions depend, was entirely loſt. He entered Weſtminſter indeed without reſiſtance; but no perſon of note joining him, his men became diſpirited, and inſenſibly forſook their leader, who was at laſt taken priſoner near Temple-bar by Sir Maurice Berkeley. The principal leaders were alſo taken, and the ſcene cloſed with the moſt bloody executions.

Above ſeventy perſons ſuffered for this rebellion; and four hundred, falling on their knees, obtained pardon, and were diſmiſſed. Wyat was condemned and executed; and as it had been reported, that, on his examination, he had accuſed the princeſs Elizabeth and the earl of Devonſhire as accomplices, he took occaſion to declare, on the ſcaffold, before the whole people, that neither of them had the leaſt concern in the rebellion.

Several attempts had been made to accuſe the princeſs Elizabeth of ſome deſign againſt the peace of the government, and ſhe was in the utmoſt danger of falling a ſacrifice to the malevolence of her ſiſter. Her being the daughter of Anne Boleyn, her attracting, by her ſuperior qualities, the regard of the nation, and her engaging the affections of Courtney, earl of Devonſhire, who was allied to the crown, and on whom the queen had matrimonial views, were crimes which the gloomy ſoul of Mary could never forgive. She was ſhut up in the Tower, and all acceſs to her denied. But the declaration made by Wyat rendered it impoſſible to prove any thing againſt her; and ſhe made ſo good a defence before the council, that there was not a ſingle pretence left for keeping her in confinement. She was therefore reſtored to her liberty; but on refuſing an offer of marriage made her by the duke of Savoy, ſhe was again committed to cuſtody, under a ſtrong guard, at Woodſtock. The earl of Devonſhire experienced the ſame ungenerous treatment: he was equally innocent with the princeſs; and though nothing could be proved againſt him, yet he was committed priſoner to Fotheringay caſtle.

But this rebellion proved ſtill more fatal to lady Jane Gray and her huſband. The duke of Suffolk's guilt was imputed to her; and Mary, who was a ſtranger both to generoſity and clemency, reſolved to remove every perſon from whom the leaſt danger could be apprehended. Lady Jane and her huſband had languiſhed in priſon ever ſince the queen's acceſſion, and it was now determined to finiſh the diſmal tragedy. Accordingly Fakenham, abbot of Weſtminſter, was ſent to the Tower to announce the fatal meſſage of death to theſe unhappy priſoners. Jane received the news with great compoſure: ſhe had long expected it; and the innocence of her life, together with the misfortunes to which ſhe had been expoſed, rendered it no unwelcome news. During three days (which was the intervening ſpace before that appointed for her execution) the Romiſh prieſts were continually diſturbing her with religious controverſies; but even in theſe melancholy circumſtances lady Jane had preſence of mind ſufficient to baffle all their attempts: ſhe defended the tenets of the Reformation with great learning and eloquence. She alſo wrote a letter, in the Greek language, to her ſiſter Catharine, exhorting her to maintain, in every circumſtance of life, a like ſteady perſeverance. On the morning of her execution, her huſband deſired permiſſion to ſee her, but ſhe refuſed her conſent: ſhe feared the tenderneſs of a parting interview would overcome the fortitude of both, and render them incapable of finiſhing the period of life with that conſtancy which was neceſſary in their melancholy circumſtances. "Our ſeparation (ſaid ſhe) will only be for a moment; we ſhall ſoon rejoin each other in the regions above, where our affections will be for ever united, and where the ſtorms of adverſity, and even death itſelf, can never afflict us more."

It had been determined to execute the lady Jane and her huſband on the ſame ſcaffold, erected on Tower-hill. But the council dreading the conſequences that might ariſe from the compaſſion of the people for their youth, beauty, innocence, and noble birth, changed the order, and gave direction that ſhe ſhould be executed within the verge of the Tower. She ſaw her huſband led to execution, and having given him from the window, ſome token of her remembrance, ſhe waited with tranquillity till her own appointed hour ſhould bring her to a like fate. She even ſaw his headleſs body carried back in a cart, and found herſelf more confirmed by the reports ſhe heard of the conſtancy with which he met the king of terrors, than ſhaken by ſo tender and melancholy a ſpectacle. Sir John Gage, conſtable of the Tower, when he led her to execution, deſired her to beſtow on him ſome ſmall preſent, which he might keep as a perpetual memorial of her. She accordingly gave him her table book, in which ſhe had juſt wrote three ſentences on ſeeing her huſband's dead body, one in Greek, another in Latin, and a third in Engliſh. The purport of them was, that human juſtice was againſt his body, but the divine mercy would be favourable to his ſoul: that if her fault deſerved puniſhment, her youth and innocence might plead her excuſe; and that ſhe truſted, God and poſterity would ſhew her favour. On the ſcaffold ſhe made a ſpeech to the ſpectators, in which the mildneſs of her diſpoſition led her to take the blame entirely on herſelf, without uttering a ſingle complaint againſt the ſeverity with which ſhe had been treated. She ſaid that her fault did not conſiſt in having laid her hand upon the crown, but in her not having rejected it with ſufficient conſtancy: that ſhe had erred leſs through ambition than thro' reverence to her parents, whom ſhe had been taught to reſpect and obey: that ſhe willingly ſuffered death as the only ſatisfaction ſhe could make to the injured ſtate; and that though her infringement of the laws had been conſtrained, ſhe would ſhow by her voluntary ſubmiſſion to their ſentence, that ſhe was deſirous of atoning for that diſobedience into which too much filial piety had betrayed her: that ſhe had juſtly deſerved this puniſhment for being made the inſtrument, though the unwilling inſtrument, of the ambition of others: and that the ſtory of her life might at leaſt be uſeful, by proving that innocence cannot excuſe great defects, if they have any tendency to deſtroy the commonwealth. After uttering theſe words, ſhe cauſed herſelf to be diſrobed by her women; and with a ſteady ſerene countenance ſubmitted herſelf to the hands of the executioner.

Thus fell, in the bloom of life, the lady Jane Gray, whoſe innocence merited a much better fate. She was only in the ſeventeenth year of her age; but her beauty, ſpirit, ſenſe, and virtue, did honor to her country; and her happineſs, had ſhe been left to the indulgence of her own ſtudious inclinations, would have been more to be envied than that of princes: but the fatal ambition of her family cropt the lovely flower before it was expanded to its full luſtre.

The duke of Suffolk was ſoon after tried and executed. Sir Nicholas Throgmorton was alſo impeached, but owed his deliverance to the amazing ſpirit and abilities he diſcovered on his trial. He challenged the court to bring proof of any one overt-act of the treaſon of which he was indicted; and no poſitive proof being produced, he was acquitted by his jury. But ſo great was the power of the judge, and ſo malignant the ſpirit of the miniſtry, that the jury, for daring to obey the dictates of their own conſciences, were proſecuted, and ſeverely fined.

The queen no ſooner found herſelf delivered from the danger apprehended from Wyatt's conſpiracy, than ſhe, with redoubled vigor, reſumed the deſign of totally deſtroying the Reformation in England. On the eighth of March Sir John Williams, by order of the council, received from the Tower the biſhops Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer, and carried them down to Oxford, to diſpute with the popiſh divines concerning the tenets of their religion. Though the reformed biſhops evidently defeated their antagoniſts, and reduced them firſt to abſurdities, and then to ſcurrility; yet the party in power aſſumed the victory, and the three prelates were declared obſtinate heretics. Cranmer had before been convicted of treaſon, but he was pardoned for that crime, that he might ſuffer the more painful death of an heretic. Four biſhops were deprived for marrying contrary to their vows when regular prieſts; and three others were deprived for pretended miſdemeanors. This was effected by virtue of the queen's ſupremacy, which ſhe thought ſhe might lawfully uſe againſt heretics. Sixteen new biſhops were created: the old worſhip was univerſally eſtabliſhed; and the married clergy every where ejected, together with thoſe who made any difficulty of embracing popery. Theſe proceedings rendered the government ſufficiently odious; but this had no effect upon Gardiner, who was determined, if poſſible, to cruſh effectually the reformation in England. The lord Rich and Sir John Wentworth were ordered to proceed againſt ſome of the diſaffected in Eſſex, particularly at Colcheſter; and this commiſſion produced many commitments and proſecutions. Thus every thing ſeemed to portend a total deſtruction of the reformiſts; but it was impoſſible to prevent the lower claſs of people from exclaiming againſt the ſanguinary proceedings of the government.

A parliament was now ſummoned to meet at Weſtminſter; but Gardiner had taken care, previous to the election, by means of money procured from the emperor, to corrupt the members to a degree before unknown. This was done with a view to procure their aſſent to the Spaniſh alliance, and facilitate the intentions of the government with regard to the re-eſtabliſhment of the Romiſh religion.

Gardiner, the chancellor, opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, in which he aſſerted the queen's hereditary title to the crown; maintained her right of chuſing a huſband for herſelf; obſerved the proper uſe ſhe had made of that right, by preferring an old ally deſcended from the houſe of Burgundy, and remarked the failure of the poſterity of Henry the eighth, of whom there now remained only the queen and the princeſs Elizabeth. He added, that in order to obviate the inconveniencies that might ariſe from different pretenders to the throne, it was neceſſary to inveſt the queen, by a ſolemn act of the legiſlature, with a power of diſpoſing of the crown, and appointing her ſucceſſor.

But however willing the parliament might be to gratify the queen in all her reaſonable deſires, yet, when the liberty, the independence, and even the very being of the nation, were expoſed to ſuch imminent danger, they could not by any means be perſuaded to comply. They were no ſtrangers to the inveterate hatred the queen bore to the lady Elizabeth, nor to her ſtrong attachment to the houſe of Auſtria. They remembered her bigotry and ſuperſtition, which prompted her to prefer the eſtabliſhment of the Catholic religion to all conſiderations of juſtice and national intereſt. They obſerved that Gardiner, in his ſpeech, had carefully avoided giving Elizabeth the title of the queen's ſiſter, and thence inferred, that a deſign was formed of declaring her illegitimate. They apprehended that Mary, if inveſted with the power ſhe demanded, would bequeath the crown to her huſband, and, by that means, render England a province of the Spaniſh monarchy. They were the more inclined to entertain theſe ſuſpicions when they were informed that Philip's deſcent from the Houſe of Lancaſter had been carefully traced and explained, and that he was repreſented as the true and only heir by right of inheritance.

The parliament, therefore, ſenſible of their danger, reſolved not to entruſt the queen with the power ſhe demanded. They ſaw the precipice, and were determined to keep at a ſecure diſtance from its brink. They could not refuſe confirming the articles of the marriage, becauſe they were extremely advantageous to England; but they abſolutely refuſed to agree to any ſuch law as was recommended by the chancellor. They would not even declare it treaſon to attempt the death of the queen's huſband while ſhe was alive; and a bill being brought in for that purpoſe, it was rejected at its firſt reading. At the ſame time, in order to deprive Philip of all hopes of ever being able to exerciſe any authority in England, they enacted a law, by which it was declared, "That her majeſty as their only queen, ſhould ſolely, and as ſole queen, enjoy the crown and ſovereignty of her realms, with all the pre-eminence, dignities, and rights thereto belonging, in as large and ample a manner after her marriage as before, without any title or claim accruing to the prince of Spain, either as tenant by courteſy of the realm, or by any other means whatever."

Notwithſtanding the corrupt practices uſed by Gardiner, the ſpirit of the parliament was far from being confined to the queen's marriage; for they oppoſed the meaſures of the court in ſeveral other inſtances. Bills were brought in for ſuppreſſing the many erroneous opinions contained in books publiſhed by the reformers; for reviving the ſtatute of the Six Articles; with thoſe againſt the Lollards, and thoſe againſt hereſy and erroneous preaching; but they were thrown out by the Commons. The queen, therefore, finding the parliament would not pay an implicit obedience to her will, was ſo provoked, that ſhe thought proper to diſſolve it on the 5th of May; and writs were immediately iſſued for chooſing another, to aſſemble on the 11th of November following.

The marriage articles between the queen and Philip having been confirmed by the parliament, the earl of Suſſex was ſent over, with a ſtrong ſquadron, to bring the prince to England; and he arrived at Southampton on the 19th of July. On his firſt landing he drew his ſword, and carried it for ſome time naked in his hand; and when the magiſtrates preſented him with the keys of their town, he received them without ſpeaking a ſingle word. The queen met him at Wincheſter, where their nuptials were ſolemnized with great pomp and magnificence on the 24th of July; and on the 18th of Auguſt following they made their public entry into London.

Gardiner now employed himſelf with the greateſt diligence in influencing the elections for members to ſerve in the enſuing parliament. No endeavours to obtain his ends were neglected: bribery, corruption, promiſes, and menaces, were uſed by him and his agents; by which means an aſſembly was formed, who were ready to ſignify their zeal for the Romiſh church, whenever the court thought it neceſſary to introduce any bill for that purpoſe. They met, according to appointment, on the 11th of November, when the king and queen rode together on horſeback in their robes, to the houſe, two ſwords of ſtate, and two caps of maintenance being borne before them.

The firſt act of this ſenate was to ſecure the admiſſion of cardinal Pole, who had been inveſted with the dignity of legate; and in order to this, the act of attainder paſſed againſt him in the reign of Henry VIII. was annulled; and the queen, by her prerogative, diſpenſing with long eſtabliſhed ſtatutes, he was empowered to act in his office of legation.

When the cardinal arrived in London, he exhorted the parliament to be reconciled to the holy ſee: upon which the two houſes expreſſed their regret at being ſeparated from the church, and their reſolution to annihilate every thing that ſchiſm had attempted againſt it. They requeſted abſolution in the moſt humble manner; which the cardinal readily granted, and, in the name of the ſovereign pontiff, removed all cenſures. But the ſubmiſſion of the nobility, who were in poſſeſſion of the church-lands, would never have been made, had not meaſures been prudently taken to aſſure them they ſhould not be deprived of their eſtates. The parliament accordingly confirmed their poſſeſſion; and they, in return, did not heſitate to come into all the meaſures of the court: they readily ſacrificed their liberty, and the exerciſe of their reaſon, at the altar of ſuperſtitious bigotry: they ſhewed the utmoſt indifference with regard to religion, or even the lives of their fellow-ſubjects; and renewed the old ſanguinary laws againſt heretics which had been aboliſhed in the reign of Edward VI. and once more lighted up the piles for conſuming all who thought differently from the Roman church. Such, however, was their rooted averſion to Spain, that though the queen laboured with the utmoſt aſſiduity to procure her huſband to be declared preſumptive heir to the crown, and inveſted with the adminiſtration of public affairs, ſhe failed in both attempts: ſhe could not even prevail upon the parliament to agree to his coronation, nor obtain from the Commons a ſubſidy for aſſiſting the emperor in his war againſt France.

Philip was not formed to attract the affection of the Engliſh: his cold, reſerved, imperious air, and the vexatious ceremony that, in a manner, cut off all acceſs to his perſon, rendered him obnoxious to the people. This was ſo viſible, that he began now to alter his conduct, and endeavoured to obtain the favour of the public by procuring the enlargement of ſeveral perſons of diſtinction, who had been confined in conſequence of the jealouſy or reſentment of the court; but nothing was more acceptable to the nation than his protecting the lady Elizabeth from the malice and cruelty of her ſiſter, and obtaining for her the enjoyment of her liberty. He well knew, that if this princeſs fell a ſacrifice to the malevolent diſpoſition of the queen, Mary Stuart, queen of Scots, and wife to the dauphin of France, was the next in the order of ſucceſſion, and, conſequently, that England would be annexed to that crown. To prevent an incident of ſuch importance to his own tranquillity, Philip affected a generoſity little conſiſtent with his real character.

A. D. 1555. The attention of the miniſtry was now chiefly engaged in conſulting the methods proper to be purſued for re-eſtabliſhing the antient religion. Cardinal Pole, and biſhop Gardiner, were the two churchmen moſt in favour; and between theſe a very impotant queſtion was frequently debated before the queen and council, namely, Whether the laws lately revived againſt heretics ſhould be executed in their full extent and rigour, or ſhould only be employed to prevent the reformers from making any farther innovations. Pole, who was ſincerely attached to the Catholic faith, and virtuous from principle, was for moderation and indulgence. Gardiner, on the contrary, who was a zealot from intereſt, and indifferent from principle, was for violence and puniſhment. The bigotted queen paid the greateſt attention to the arguments of Gardiner; but willing at the ſame time to ſhew regard to the counſels of Pole, ſhe ordered him to take upon himſelf the reformation of the clergy, and charged Gardiner with the work of extirpating the Proteſtant religion.

It was now determined to execute the laws againſt hereſy in their full force; and England was ſoon filled with thoſe ſcenes of horror, which have ever ſince rendered the Romiſh religion the object of general deteſtation. We could wiſh, indeed, for the honour of humanity, that the mantle of oblivion could be drawn over theſe deteſtable actions; but the pen of hiſtory muſt not diſſemble the exceſſes and dreadful conſequences of bigotted zeal. The horrid ſcenes which muſt be diſplayed furniſh an important, though melancholy leſſon to mankind.

The two firſt victims of religious fury were Hooper, biſhop of Glouceſter, and Rogers, a prebendary of St. Paul's: both eminent for their learning, their piety, and their virtue. But Gardiner's plan was firſt to attack men of that character; vainly imagining, that terror would force them to ſubmiſſion; and that their example, either of puniſhment or recantation, would naturally influence the multitude. Rogers had preſerved the life of Bourne, the popiſh preacher at St. Paul's, at the hazard of his own; and therefore deſerved ſome favour at the hands of Gardiner, who was no ſtranger to that circumſtance: but no regard was ſhewn to this eminent preacher; the dictates of juſtice and humanity had loſt their force. Rogers was even denied the favour of ſeeing his wife and children, whom he tenderly loved. But this denial could not ſhake his conſtancy: the ties of nature gave way to the influence of religion; and he went with chearfulneſs to the ſtake, and periſhed in the flames with unſhaken conſtancy.

Hooper behaved with all the fortitude of a primitive martyr, and ſhewed a noble contempt for all the inſults he received. He was tried with Rogers in London, but ſent down to his own dioceſe to be executed. This circumſtance, which was contrived to ſtrike a greater terror into his flock, was a ſource of ſatisfaction to Hooper, who ſincerely rejoiced in having an opportunity of giving teſtimony, by his death, to the doctrine he had formerly inculcated from the pulpit. When he was faſtened to the ſtake, a ſtool was placed before him, and the queen's pardon laid upon it, and which it was ſtill in his power to merit by his recantation. But life, on ſuch conditions, was deſpiſed: he ordered it to be removed, and chearfully prepared himſelf to ſuffer the ſentence pronounced againſt him by his enemies. His death was attended with every circumſtance that could heighten its ſeverity. The wind, which was very ſtrong, blew the flames of the reeds from his body; the faggots were green, and did not eaſily take fire; all his lower parts were conſumed before his vitals were affected; one arm dropped off, while he continued to beat his breaſt with the other. He was heard to pray, and exhort the people to adhere to their religion, until his tongue, ſwoln with the violence of the agony, ſtopped his ſpeech. He was full three quarters of an hour in torture, but bore the whole with a conſtancy that was truly aſtoniſhing.

About the ſame time, Mr. Laurence Saunders, miniſter of Allhallows, Bread-ſtreet; and Mr. Rowland Taylor, rector of Hadley, in Suffolk, were delivered over to the ſecular arm, and ſealed the truth of the doctrines they had taught with their blood. Saunders ſuffered at Coventry, and was alſo indulged with the offer of a pardon; but he rejected it with diſdain, and embraced the ſtake, crying out, "I ſalute thee, O croſs of Jeſus Chriſt, O life eternal!" Taylor was executed among his antient friends and pariſhioners: and repeated, in the midſt of the flames, a pſalm in Engliſh; on which one of the guards ſtruck him on the mouth and bid him pray in Latin. Another, ſtill more violent, ſtruck him on the head with his halbert, and the blow put a period to his life.

Ferrar, biſhop of St. David's, was burnt about the ſame time at Caermarthen. He appealed to Cardinal Pole, but his appeal was diſregarded, and he received the crown of martyrdom.

So many inhuman executions, merely for the ſake of opinion, inflamed the nation, and Gardiner began to entertain diſagreeable apprehenſions for his ſafety. He therefore refuſed to act any longer, and devolved his odious commiſſion on Bonner, biſhop of London; a man of the moſt profligate and abandoned morals, and, at the ſame time, of ſo ſavage and cruel a diſpoſition, that he ſeemed to delight in the torments o thoſe unfortunate perſons whom his iniquitous ſentences committed to the flames.

It would be uſeleſs, as well as ſhocking to the reader, to particularize the various executions that took place at the inſtigation of this finiſhed monſter: the ſavage barbarity on the one hand, and the patien conſtancy on the other, are ſimilar in all. A few inſtances more will, therefore, be abundantly ſufficient.

In the beginning of October Ridley, biſhop o London, and Latimer, biſhop of Worceſter (wh had been a long time confined with archbiſhop Cranmer at Oxford) were both tried for hereſy, and condemned to the flames. They ſuffered together on th north ſide of the city of Oxford, oppoſite Balio college, on the 16th of the ſame month; and behaved with a conſtancy and reſolution little inferio to what we read of the primitive martyrs.

Ridley was born of a good family in Northumberland. He was firſt educated at Newcaſtle, from whence he was ſent to Pembroke-hall in Cambridge, of which he became maſter. King Henry VIII. made him firſt his chaplain, and afterwards promoted him to the ſee of Rocheſter, from whence king Edward VI. tranſlated him to London. He was one of the moſt able champions of the reformation; pious, learned, ſolid in judgment, conſtant, admired by his friends, and dreaded by his enemies; which were ſufficient reaſons for the popiſh counſellors to put him to death. The night immediately before his execution, he invited the mayor of Oxford and his wife to ſee him die; and the good woman melting into tears, he ſpoke to her with an aſſurance which baniſhed her ſorrow, and convinced her that ſo much firmneſs on ſo melancholy an occaſion could only be the gift from heaven, inſpiring and animating him againſt his approaching agony. He was ſo little ſhocked with the terrors before him, that he not only gave a ſerious attention to the furious bigot that preached at his execution, but calmly propoſed to anſwer exceptionable parts of his ſermon, which was not permitted, leſt his eloquence and reaſon ſhould bias his hearers and ſpectators too much in his favour; and he left the world with an act of juſtice, for he ſent a petition to the queen, praying that either the tenants of the biſhopric of London might be continued in their leaſes, or that their fines might be reſtored out of his goods, ſeized when he was impriſoned. But he paid dearly for his courage. The faggots were ordered to be placed in ſuch a manner as to torment him as much as poſſible; and he was rather roaſted than burned, for his legs were almoſt conſumed before the fire was permitted to reach his body.

Biſhop Latimer was born at Thurcaſton, in Leiceſterſhire, and brought up alſo at Cambridge. Henry VIII. promoted him to the ſee of Worceſter, which he reſigned becauſe he would not ſubſcribe to what were called King Henry's Six bloody Articles. He was remarkable for his ſimplicity, freedom and plainneſs, with which he arraigned great ſinners, and which, without the ornament of human eloquence, found a way to their hearts, and made them humble, though ever ſo exalted. One of his converts, a notorious robber, who had been perſuaded by him to reform, attended his execution, and comforted him at the ſtake; where, deſiring to accompany ſo righteous a man in ſo good a cauſe, he propheſied with unſhaken zeal, in the midſt of reigning popery, "that thoſe two biſhops and martyrs ſhould light up ſuch a candle in England, as, by God's grace, ſhould never be extinguiſhed." Latimer's age, who was upwards of eighty, made him ſoon yield up his ſoul in the flames, without undergoing much pain; and he died with the character of having preſerved the piety and integrity of the firſt ages, in the corruptions of the laſt.

The paſſion for martyrdom, infuſed by theſe examples, communicated itſelf to the young as well as to the old, and even to women, ſeveral of whom ſuffered in different parts of the kingdom with the moſt unſhaken conſtancy. Theſe unhappy people, though condemned to torture ſhocking to humanity, were not always convicted of having inculcated tenets contrary to the eſtabliſhed religion: they were taken up merely on ſuſpicion, and condemned on refuſing to ſign certain articles. Hence they excited the concern and admiration of their own party, and a general hatred againſt the government. Philip perceived the whole nation was agitated; and, by an artifice ſuitable to his character, endeavoured to throw the odium of theſe barbarities on the Engliſh biſhops. He ordered friar Alphonſo, his confeſſor, to diſclaim theſe ſanguinary proceedings from the pulpit. The eccleſiaſtic obeyed; and, in a ſermon preached before their majeſties, he exclaimed againſt all religious perſecution, and accuſed the biſhops of all the barbarities that had been inflicted on the Proteſtants.

Alarmed at this charge, Bonner himſelf refuſed to be any longer concerned in ſuch ſanguinary proceedings, unleſs others were involved in the ſame odious buſineſs. In conſequence of this, the fires of perſecution ceaſed for a time; till repeated orders were ſent to Bonner, by the queen and her conſort, enjoining him to proſecute his duty. Thus animated, the brutal prieſt reſumed the perſecution with the moſt unremitting diligence, and great numbers of people were inhumanly dragged to the ſtake.

England was now reduced to a more deplorable ſituation than ever Spain itſelf, where the inquiſition is eſtabliſhed with all its horrors. Commiſſioners were appointed to take an account of all hereſies; to puniſh all neglect of the Catholic worſhip in churches and chapels; and to proceed againſt the clergy who did not preach the doctrine of the euchariſt; to puniſh every perſon who did not hear maſs, who did not aſſiſt at the ſervice of the church, who did not receive the euchariſt, or uſe the holy water. The juſtices of the peace were ordered to appoint ſpies over the conduct of the people: to ſummon the accuſed, without diſcovering the accuſer, and to put to the torture ſuch obſtinate perſons who would not confeſs. Nor did the tyranny of the court terminate here; a proclamation was iſſued, commanding all who were poſſeſſed of heretical books to burn them without reading or ſhewing them to others: and declaring that all who refuſed to pay an implicit obedience to theſe orders ſhould be deemed rebels, and executed immediately by martial law.

But notwithſtanding theſe perſecutions, the proteſtants ſtill ſupported their tenets with the moſt diſtinguiſhed reſolution, and the doctrines of the reformation encreaſed ſurpriſingly. The iron rod of tyranny was diſplayed in vain; every martyrdom was equivalent to a thouſand ſermons againſt popery; and the aſhes of the ſufferer, like ſeed diſſeminated in a fertile ſoil, produced an hundred fold. The proteſtants were far more numerous at the cloſe, than in the beginning of this bloody reign, though it is computed, that in the ſpace of three years, no leſs than two hundred and ſeventy-ſeven perſons were burnt for hereſy, among whom were five biſhops, twenty-one clergymen, eight gentlemen, eighty-four tradeſmen, one hundred huſbandmen, ſervants, and labourers, fifty-five women and four children.

The meaſure of iniquity in this bloody reign was now filled up by the execution of that good but unfortunate prelate, archbiſhop Cranmer. He had long been confined in priſon at Oxford; and it was now determined to puniſh him as an heretic. He was accordingly tried before Brooks, biſhop of Glouceſter, who had been commiſſioned to that office by the pope. Dr. Martin and Dr. Godwin, who attended as commiſſioners from the queen, accuſed him of having been twice married; of keeping a wife ſecretly in the reign of Henry VIII. and openly in the reign of his ſucceſſor; of publiſhing books againſt, and forſaking the doctrines of the Roman church; and of denying the real preſence of Chriſt in the ſacrament. He owned the facts, and they cited him to appear before the pope in eight days, though they knew it was impoſſible, as he was then their priſoner. He was, however, on not appearing, condemned as contumacious. Bonner, biſhop of London, and Thirley, biſhop of Ely, were ſent down to Oxford to degrade him. The former performed his office with his uſual inſolence, uſing the moſt bitter railleries and invectives againſt the priſoner, during the ceremony, while Thirley melted into tears. Bonner put on him pontifical robes made of canvas, that he might appear the more ridiculous; after which he ſtripped him of that ludicrous attire, piece by piece, according to the bull and ceremonies of degradation ſent from Rome. During this mortifying ceremony the primate's behaviour was uniform and becoming his unfortunate circumſtances. He ſaid he was not ſorry to be thus cut off with all his pageantry from his relation to the ſee of Rome; but thought it great injuſtice to be condemned for not going to that capital, when they kept him cloſe confined in priſon. At the ſame time he denied the pope's authority over him, and appealed from his ſentence to a free general council.

Notwithſtanding the queen, from her conſummate bigotry, was ſatisfied in her own mind, that Cranmer would periſh eternally, yet ſhe was deſirous of augmenting the weight of his misfortunes, by ruining his honour and conſigning his name over to infamy. Perſons were accordingly employed to attack him, not by reaſon and argument, againſt which they knew he was too well prepared, but by the moſt artful flattery, inſinuation and addreſs. They diſplayed before him, in the faireſt point of light, the dignities and honours to which his character ſtill entitled him, if he would merit them by a recantation: they flattered him with long enjoying thoſe powerful friends whom his humanity and beneficence had procured him during the courſe of his proſperity; and the great advantages that might yet reſult to ſociety by his labours. Theſe inſinuations ſhook the firmneſs of the primate, who, influenced by that love of life ſo deeply engraven in the human heart, and terrified at the proſpect of thoſe dreadful tortures he was condemned to ſuffer, permitted, in an unguarded hour, the feelings of nature to overpower his reſolution; he agreed to ſign a paper, acknowledging the doctrines of the papal ſupremacy, and the real preſence of Chriſt in the ſacrament.

The queen, whoſe perfidy was only exceeded by her cruelty, reſolved that this recantation ſhould not ſave his life. She ſent orders that he ſhould acknowledge his errors in the church before the whole congregation, and that after he had ſo done, he ſhould be immediately led to the place of execution.

Mary's diſtinguiſhed malevolence, however, was for once diſappointed. Cranmer had now reſumed his proper dignity; he had ſincerely repented of his weakneſs and apoſtacy, and determined, inſtead of the declaration they expected, to ſpeak the real ſentiments of his heart without diſguiſe. Accordingly, when he was brought to the church, he began his addreſs to the audience with obſerving, that he was ſufficiently acquainted with the obedience he owed to his ſovereign, and the laws of his country; but this duty extended no farther than to ſubmit patiently to their commands, and to bear, without reſiſtance, whatever puniſhment they might inflict upon him; that a ſuperior duty, the duty which he owed his Maker, obliged him to maintain the truth on all occaſions, and not to abandon, by a baſe denial, the holy doctrine which the Supreme Being had imparted to mankind; that there was one error in his life, which, above all others, filled him with the moſt unfeigned ſorrow and repentance, the inſincere declaration of faith to which he had unhappily been induced to agree, and which nothing but the fear of death could have extorted from him; that he chearfully embraced the preſent opportunity of atoning for his crime, by a ſincere and open recantation; and was willing to ſeal with his blood that doctrine which he verily believed to be revealed from heaven; and that as his hand had erred in betraying his heart, it ſhould firſt be puniſhed, and by a ſevere, but juſt ſentence, firſt expiate the guilt of that crime which it had been the inſtrument of committing.

Cranmer's enemies were ſo exaſperated at this declaration, that they immediately dragged him from the church, and conducted him to the ſtake amidſt the ſhouts and inſults of the catholics. But having now collected the whole force and vigour of his mind, he bore their ſcorn, as well as the torture of his puniſhment, with ſurprizing courage: he ſtretched out his right hand, and without diſcovering the leaſt ſign of weakneſs, or even of feeling, held it in the flames till it dropt off. His mind ſeemed to be wholly poſſeſſed with reflecting on his former fault, and he was heard to exclaim ſeveral times, "This unworthy hand has offended." Satisfied with that atonement, he reaſſumed a wonderful compoſure and ſerenity of countenance: and when the fire ſurrounded his body, he ſeemed to be entirely inſenſible of all his outward ſufferings, and by the force of hope and chriſtian fortitude, to have raiſed himſelf above all bodily ſenſations, and to triumph over the fury of the flames.

Cranmer was a man of the moſt amiable character; equally diſtinguiſhed by his piety and learning, and poſſeſſed of candour, ſincerity, benevolence, and indeed of almoſt every virtue that could render him the object of public eſteem and veneration. His death was lamented by the ingenuous of all parties; and he is conſidered as the hero of the Proteſtant faith. Cardinal Pole ſucceeded him in the archiepiſcopal ſee of Canterbury; and ſincerely diſapproved of the violent meaſures of the court, but wanted power to oppoſe its ſanguinary proceedings.

When we conſider the gloomy and malevolent diſpoſition of Mary, together with her unparalleled bigotry to her own opinion, it is not at all ſurprizing that ſhe ſhould be guilty of theſe diſtinguiſhed cruelties; but it is aſtoniſhing that, conſidering the ſtate of the kingdom at this period, when the number of proteſtants greatly exceeded that of the catholics, ſhe was ſuffered to ſurvive one moment the commiſſion of ſuch horrid barbarities. It was not, however, long before ſhe felt the effect of the public hatred. The miniſtry became extremely unpopular; and every thing bore the marks of diſguſt and averſion. Mary's ill temper was alſo increaſed by a very ſingular circumſtance. She had flattered herſelf with an imaginary pregnancy, and when ſhe found her miſtake, ſhe fell into a profound melancholy.

Philip, diſguſted with a wife who was extremely jealous, without being in any reſpect amiable, made preparations for returning to the continent. He had received an invitation from the emperor, who had declared his intentions of reſigning to him his dominions. He therefore took this opportunity of retiring to Flanders, and met his father at Bruſſels. Here the emperor, (previous to the reſigning of hi ſovereignty, which took place on the 25th of October instructed his ſon in the art of government; and recommended to him the following maxims for his conduct, which Philip took no care to obſerve: "T think himſelf rich, when his ſubjects were ſo; an wiſe when he had wiſe counſellors; to govern hi ſubjects rather by love than by fear; to let a ſmal fault paſs unpuniſhed, rather than condemn an innocent perſon; to avoid the curioſity of ſearching int things done in private; to leave the ſecrets of men hearts and thoughts to God, and the chaſtiſement o interior offences to the divine vengeance; ſince what the eyes of man could not ſee, it was not fit fo their hands to puniſh." Had Charles himſelf directe his conduct by theſe maxims, Germany and the Ne therlands had not been deluged with blood, no Europe been filled with widows and orphans. B the cool reflections of age had now diſcovered him the emptineſs of his former purſuits; and h found that the vain ſcheme of extending his empi had now been the ſource of endleſs oppoſition a diſa diſappointment, had kept himſelf, his neighbours, and his ſubjects in perpetual inquietude, and had fruſtrated the ſole end of government, the felicity of the nations committed to his care.

The parliament met on the 21ſt of October, when ſo viſible a diſcontent appeared among the members from the late proceedings againſt the proteſtants, that it was with the greateſt difficulty the queen could obtain a very moderate ſupply. This ſudden change in the temper of the Houſe of Commons was, perhaps, with juſtice, attributed to the death of Gardiner, who paid the debt of nature on the 12th of November. By the loſs of this prelate the queen was deprived of her ableſt counſellor, and the only perſon in the miniſtry who had any great authority in the parliament. He was a man of a ſelfiſh character; a profound diſſembler, and of a proud, vindictive and cruel diſpoſition. He underſtood the canon and civil law as well as moſt of his time; he wrote Latin with eaſe and purity, and few of his cotemporaries excelled him in the knowledge of the Greek language. He is ſaid to have felt ſome remorſe in his laſt moments for the cruel perſecutions he had carried on againſt the proteſtants, and to have exclaimed, "I have ſinned with Peter, but I have not wept with Peter."——He was buried in the cathedral at Wincheſter, where his monument and effigy are ſtill to be ſeen.

A. D. 1556. Mary was ſo exaſperated at the refuſal of the parliament to grant her the neceſſary ſupplies wanted, that ſhe had recourſe to every method in her power to extort money from her people. She levied a loan of 60,000l. on a certain number of people whom ſhe was aſſured would not refuſe to aſſiſt her; but that ſum being inſufficient to anſwer the end propoſed, ſhe exacted a general loan of 100l. a piece on all perſons poſſeſſed of 20l. a year: ſhe alſo extorted 60,000 marks from ſeven thouſand yeomen, who had not contributed to former loans; and exacted 60,000l. from the cloth-merchants of London trading to Antwerp, which they refuſed, having advanced her large ſums already. But Mary was determined not to be diſappointed, and having received advice that they had ſhipped great quantities of cloth for Antwerp fair, ſhe ſeized both ſhips and cargo, laying upon them a new ſubſidy of twenty ſhillings for each piece of cloth, by an arbitrary ſtretch of the royal prerogative; nor could they procure this impoſition to be aboliſhed, till they had agreed to advance 40,000l. and to engage to pay 20,000l. more in a limited time.

All theſe violent and oppreſſive meaſures were purſued at a time when England enjoyed a profound tranquillity, and when Mary herſelf had no other occaſion for money than to ſatisfy the exorbitant demands of a huſband, who was equally regardleſs of her love and her generoſity, and attended to nothing but his own emolument.

Charles V. after having relinquiſhed the ſovereignty of his dominions into the hands of his ſon, determined to ſeek, in the tranquillity of retirement, that happineſs he had ſo ardently purſued in vain amidſt the tumults of war, and the reſtleſs projects of ambition. He accordingly embarked on board a fleet, ſailed immediately to Spain, and took his journey to St. Juſt, a monaſtery in Eſtramedura, which being ſituated in a happy climate, and amidſt the greateſt beauties of nature, he had choſen that for the place where he intended to end his days in ſolitude and contemplation. He was ſoon convinced that the homage he had received had been paid to his fortune rather than to his perſon; but he purſued his deſign with undaunted reſolution, and ſhut himſelf up in his retreat. Being thus ſecluded from the world, he amuſed himſelf in examining the religious controverſies which had ſo much agitated Europe in his reign, and in imitating the works of celebrated mechanics. Among the reſt the conſtruction of clocks and watches engaged his attention, and never being able to make two go in a perfect equality of time, he concluded from thence that it was impoſſible for men to agree exactly in the articles of faith; and that it was unjuſt to puniſh them for their opinions. This concluſion proved, at leaſt, that he had changed his own. Notwithſtanding the ingratitude of his ſon Philip, who no ſooner ſucceeded than he neglected him, he endeavoured to make him maſter of the empire, with all the other vaſt eſtates of the family. But Ferdinand the brother of Charles, who had been elected king of the Romans, would not come into his views; and the houſe of Auſtria was divided into two branches. Paul IV. refuſed to crown Ferdinand, alledging, that though on the death of an emperor he was obliged to crown the prince elected; yet in caſe of a reſignation, the right devolved to the holy ſee, and conſequently it belonged to the pope alone to appoint a ſucceſſor.

The pope was a ſworn enemy to the houſe of Auſtria, and accordingly engaged Henry II. of France to break the truce with Spain. Philip was not fond of war; his object was to govern by political reſources, and flattered himſelf by that means alone to riſe ſuperior to all his enemies, and extend, at once, his authority and dominions. But being obliged to take up arms, he endeavoured to engage the Engliſh in his cauſe againſt France. Had the deciſion depended entirely upon the queen, he would have found no difficulty in his application: ſhe was incapable of refuſing the demands of a huſband ſhe ſo tenderly loved; but ſhe had little influence in the council, and ſtill leſs among the people: her government was hardly able to ſupport itſelf in the midſt of a profound peace.

A. D. 1557. On the 20th of March Philip arrived in England, and during his ſtay continued at Greenwich, where his queen had ſome time reſided in order to avail herſelf of thoſe melancholy reflections which had been occaſioned by his abſence. Soon after Philip's arrival, the nation was alarmed with accounts that a rebellion was broke out in the northern parts of the kingdom. Thomas Stafford, a lineal deſcendant from the late duke of Buckingham, and conſequently poſſeſſed of a diſtant claim upon the crown, had for ſome time taken refuge in France, where he had been joined by ſeveral other diſaffected perſons; and, unhappily for themſelves, miſtaking the diſcontents of the people for an indication of their readineſs to take up arms againſt the government, they attempted to excite an inſurrection. About the latter end of April they landed in Scotland, marched directly to Scarborough, and ſeized the caſtle. Stafford now aſſumed the title of Protector of the kingdom, and publiſhed a maniſeſto, pretending that the queen had forfeited her right to the crown by introducing Spaniards into England. But he ſoon found the people, however oppreſſed with regard to religion, were too cautious to join his ſtandard. The earl of Weſtmoreland marched againſt him, defeated his little army, and took him priſoner. Perſuaded that this attempt to diſturb the internal peace of the kingdom was owing to the inſtigations of the French King, a reſolution was taken in the council to declare war againſt that monarch, which was accordingly performed, with great ſolemnity, about the middle of June.

Philip, having procured from the Engliſh a body of 8000 forces, immediately paſſed over to the Lower Countries; while his general, the duke of Savoy, ſtrengthened with the junction of another body of Britiſh troops, entered St. Quintin in Picardy. As the place was but poorly fortified, and defended only by a weak garriſon, he hoped in a few days to compel it to ſurrender: but the governor, admiral Coligny, thinking it his duty to ſave ſo important a fortreſs, threw himſelf into the town, with a few battalions of French and Scots, and by his exhortations and example, encouraged the ſoldiers to make a vigorous defence. In the mean time he ſent an expreſs to his uncle, the conſtable Montmorency, then at the head of the French army, requeſting a reinforcement. That general accordingly advanced towards St. Quintin, at the head of his whole army, in order to facilitate the attempt of throwing a body of forces into the town; but the duke of Savoy being informed of the conſtable's deſign, fell upon the reinforcement with ſuch irreſiſtible fury, that not more than five hundred men entered the place. Animated by this ſucceſs, he attacked the conſtable, routed his whole army, and took him priſoner. Two thouſand five hundred of the enemy fell on the field of battle.

The duke of Savoy, in order to improve the advantage he had thus gained over the enemy, diſpatched the duke of Bedford, and the count of Egmont, at the head of 4000 men, to make an inroad into France. They obeyed their inſtructions, and ravaged the country to the diſtance of two and twenty miles, without meeting with the leaſt reſiſtance. The inhabitants of Paris were ſo terrified, that they began to fortify their city with the utmoſt expedition; and had the duke of Savoy marched directly to the capital, he had, in all probability, made himſelf maſter of the place; but he continued the ſiege of St. Quintin, which, by the bravery of the admiral, held out ſeventeen days, when it was taken by ſtorm, and that gallant officer, with his brother, and all who had ſurvived of the garriſon, were made priſoners.

In the mean time, the French, having recovered from their fears, made the neceſſary preparations for rendering abortive any farther attempts of the enemy. They had even formed a deſign of reducing Calais, as appeared by ſome obſcure hints found among the papers of the French admiral, taken priſoner at St. Quintin. Philip failed not to inform Mary of the diſcovery, and offered to ſupply her with troops to defend the place; but the Engliſh council, conſidering this as a ſtratagem of Philip to get poſſeſſion of Calais, declined the offer.

However right the Engliſh might be in their ſuſpicions of Philip, they ſoon found the information he had given them, relative to the deſigns of the French, was not without foundation; for the duke of Guiſe, who had lately been created lieutenant-general of France, not content with fortifying the frontiers of the kingdom, reſolved, though in the depth of winter, to attempt the reduction of Calais; an enterprize which France, during her greateſt ſucceſs, had always conſidered as impracticable.

The place was commanded by the lord Wentworth, a brave and experienced officer, whoſe garriſon conſiſted only of 500 ſoldiers, and about 200 townſmen. It was ſurrounded by moraſſes on the land ſide, and could only be approached by a dyke, at the head of which was a bridge, defended by a fort called Newnham, about a quarter of a mile from the town. Near this fort was another, called St. Agatha; and the entrance of the harbour was defended by a caſtle, termed the Ryſbank. Such was the ſituation of Calais, when Guiſe, to the aſtoniſhment of all Europe, inveſted it on the firſt of January, 1558.

At the time the duke began his march towards Calais, a fleet of French ſhips was ſent into the channel, under pretence of cruiſing on the trading veſſels of the Engliſh, but in reality to aſſiſt the land forces in their attempts upon a place deemed impregnable. The firſt operation of the French was againſt Fort Agatha, which the Engliſh, after a gallant defence, were forced to abandon. The garriſon, however, threw themſelves into Fort Newnham, which was immediately inveſted by the enemy. At the ſame time, the French ſhips cannonaded the Ryſbank, and both forts ſoon became untenable. Wentworth ſaw the neceſſity of abandoning theſe caſtles, as the greater part of his garriſon was employed in defending them: he therefore gave orders for their capitulating with the enemy, and joining him in Calais, which, without their aſſiſtance, he was in no condition to defend. The garriſon of Newnham followed his inſtructions, and were permitted to retire into the town: but thoſe in the Ryſbank were not ſo fortunate; the French admiral refuſed to ſign any capitulation; and the garriſon were ſoon after obliged to ſurrender themſelves priſoners of war.

All the avenues to the place being now ſecured, the duke of Guiſe, with prodigious labour, formed a road, conſtructed of pitched hurdles, through the moraſs, by the help of which a large detachment of his army lodged themſelves behind ſome heights, near the walls of the town. Here they erected a battery of fifteen pieces of large cannon againſt the caſtle, in which a practicable breach was ſoon made. D'Andelot, brother to admiral Coligny, was now ordered to draw the water out of the ditch, and ſucceſsfully executed the taſk in one night. The next day the duke ordered a general aſſault, which was made with ſuch fury, that the breach was carried by ſtorm, and the French effected a lodgment in the caſtle. During the enſuing night, Wentworth endeavoured to recover that poſt; but having loſt two hundred men, and the French pouring ſuch numbers into the caſtle, he thought any farther defence would be madneſs, and accordingly capitulated on the following conditions, the beſt he could obtain in his diſtreſſed ſituation: "That he himſelf ſhould remain a priſoner of war, with fifty of the chief officers of his garriſon: that the reſt ſhould be at liberty to retire, either to England or Flanders; and that the place, with all its proviſions, ammunition, cannon, and riches, ſhould be immediately delivered up to the French." This capitulation was ſigned on the ſeventeenth of January. Ham and Guiſnes were taken by the twenty-ſecond; and the duke of Guiſe reduced, in leſs than thirty days, and even in the depth of winter, what had coſt Edward III. a ſiege of eleven months. And thus all the Engliſh poſſeſſions on the continent were totally loſt.

The news of this important conqueſt threw th nation into a ferment: they murmured loudly againſt the queen and her council for having, on the moſt frivolous pretences, engaged the kingdom in a war, by which one of the moſt important poſſeſſions of th crown was irretrievably loſt.

Mary was ſo ſenſibly affected with the loſs of Calais, that ſhe abandoned herſelf to grief; and repeatedly declared to thoſe about her, "That her end wa approaching, and that ſhe ſhould never recover th effects of this misfortune." She, however, aſſembled the parliament, in order to obtain ſupplies. This wa effected, though not without oppoſition from th Commons, who ſeemed determined to remonſtrat againſt the abuſe of prerogative. They alſo paſſe an act for confirming all alienations of crown lan that the queen had made or might think proper t make during the ſpace of ſeven years to come.

Although the Engliſh had refuſed the offer of Ph lip with regard to throwing a ſtrong reinforceme into Calais, yet he made a propoſal for aſſiſting the to the utmoſt of his power in recovering that i portant fortreſs, before the ſeaſon would permit t French to repair the works which were now in a ve bad condition. But this offer was alſo refuſed, a no military expedition attempted till the ſpring w conſiderably advanced, when a fleet of one hundr and forty ſail of ſhips was fitted out, for revenging the inſult upon the enemy. This fleet being reinforced with thirty Flemiſh ſhips, having on board a body of ſix thouſand land forces, were ſent to alarm the coaſt of France. They accordingly landed near Breſt; but ſo little care had been taken to conceal the deſign, that the French were prepared for their reception; and the Engliſh were obliged to retreat to their ſhips, without having effected any thing of conſequence.

This diſgrace, however, was ſoon after recovered by the activity of a ſmall ſquadron, conſiſting only of ten ſhips. The marſhal de Thermes, governor of Calais, invaded Flanders at the head of an army of fourteen thouſand men. He croſſed the Aa without oppoſition, and made himſelf maſter of Dunkirk and Berg St. Winloc. But being overtaken by the Spaniards under count Egmont, near Gravelines, a bloody conteſt enſued. While the two armies were cloſely engaged, and fortune ſeemed undetermined on which ſide to beſtow the wreath of victory, the Engliſh men of war came into the harbour; and pointing their cannon againſt the flank of the French, made ſuch a dreadful ſlaughter, that the whole army was thrown into confuſion, and the Spaniards gained a complete victory. The mareſchal himſelf was taken priſoner, and about 5000 were left dead on the field of battle.

During theſe tranſactions the two armies of France and Spain approached each other on the frontiers of Picardy, and a deciſive battle was every moment expected; when offers were made for a general peace, and the two armies retired into winter quarters, that the contending princes might have time ſufficient to finiſh the treaty. Indeed the demands of Henry and Philip were ſo very oppoſite, that there were hardly any hopes of their coming to an agreement. The former demanded the reſtitution of Navarre to its proper owner: and the latter that of Calais and its territories to England. But, during theſe negotiations, news arrived of the death of queen Mary; and Philip, no longer connected with England, did not inſiſt on the reſtitution of Calais, and a peace was ſoon after concluded between the two monarchs.

Mary's health had been long declining. She had for ſome time been afflicted with the dropſy, the conſequence of her falſe conception, and the improper regimen ſhe had purſued. The malady was greatly increaſed by the anxiety of her mind, which was now increaſed by the moſt painful reflections. The conſciouſneſs of being hated by her ſubjects; the mortification of being without children; the fear of leaving her crown to a ſiſter whom ſhe deteſted; the approaching ruin that threatened the Catholic religion; the indifference of a huſband, who was going to retire into Spain; all theſe diſagreeable reflections preyed upon her mind, and threw her into a ſlow fever, of which ſhe died on the ſeventeenth of November, in the forty-third year of her age, and the ſixth of her reign.

The progreſſive circumſtances attending the reign of this princeſs renders it almoſt ſuperfluous to add any thing relative to her character. Indeed, the barbarities committed in her time are beyond the pen of hiſtory to deſcribe. With her the practice of religion became the trade of murder, and the care of her people the exerciſe of her cruelty; while all her views for their happineſs terminated in puniſhments for their virtues. Her bigotry infected every branch of government, and weakened every band of ſociety. She had not any thing engaging either in her perſon, her behaviour, or her addreſs: her underſtanding was confined within very narrow limits; and her temper moroſe and gloomy; while obſtinacy, bigotry, violence, cruelty, malignity, revenge, and tyranny, directed all her actions.

Cardinal Pole, who had long laboured under an intermitting fever, died about ſixteen hours after the queen, ſo that the throne and the archiepiſcopal chair of Canterbury became vacant nearly at the ſame time; an event which the reformed conſidered as the happy omen of the ſpeedy eſtabliſhment of civil and religious liberty.

Mary's funeral was ſolemnized on the 14th of December, at Weſtminſter, with a maſs of Requiem in the uſual form of the Romiſh church; and her body was interred in the chapel of Henry VII. her grandfather.

The moſt remarkable occurrences that happened during the ſhort reign of this queen were as follow:

Her firſt year gave riſe to the practice of ſtarching linen, the art of which was brought into England by one Mrs. Dinghen, a native of Flanders.

In her third year, alderman Draper of Cordwainers Ward, firſt inſtituted the office of Bellman, whoſe buſineſs was to go about the ward by night, and, ringing his bell at certain places, exhort the inhabitants, with an audible voice, to take care of their fires and lights, to help the poor and pray for the dead. This inſtitution was ſoon after adopted in all the other wards of the city.

During this year a malignant fever raged with great violence in London: it carried off a conſiderable number of its inhabitants, among whom were ſeven aldermen.

In this queen's reign, needles were firſt made in Cheapſide, London, by a negro from Spain; but he would not teach his art; and, dying ſoon after, it was loſt till the ſucceeding reign, when Elias Growſe, a German, taught the Engliſh the art; which has ſince been brought to the greateſt perfection.

SECTION V.

ELIZABETH,

The Fifth and laſt Sovereign of the Houſe of Tudor.

THE death of Mary revived the drooping ſpirits of the proteſtants. They now beheld the pleaſing proſpect that they ſhould no longer be perſecuted for their religion; and that their virtues would not expoſe them, for the future, to the rage of ignorance and bigotry.

As the parliament was at this time ſitting, Heath, archbiſhop of York, notified the death of the queen to that aſſembly; when both houſes unanimouſly declared Elizabeth the legal ſucceſſor to the crown, and ſhe was accordingly proclaimed on the ſame day at the uſual places in London and Weſtminſter.

Elizabeth was at Hatfield when ſhe received the news of her ſiſter's death, a few days after which ſhe proceeded to London admidſt the univerſal acclamations of the people, who ſeemed to vie with each other in teſtifying their joy on the happy event of her acceſſion to the throne of England.

The day after her arrival in London, ſhe iſſued a proclamation, ſtrictly enjoining all her ſubjects "to keep the peace, and forbear all attempts, upon any pretence whatever, to break or alter any order or uſage at that time eſtabliſhed." This prudent meaſure was taken to prevent thoſe diſorders which there was too much reaſon to apprehend would otherwiſe have reſulted from the intemperate zeal of ſome of the reformed, who, following the precedent given them by the popiſh party in the late reign, might have proceeded in an illegal and riotous manner by deſtroying the ſuperſtitious objects of the catholics, and reſtoring the reformed method of worſhip without waiting for the royal authority.

Elizabeth was about twenty-five years of age when ſhe paſſed as it were from a priſon to a throne. The remembrance of her misfortunes added a luſtre to her merit, and ſhe was conſidered as the deliverer of the kingdom. Born with ſuperior talents, ſhe had acquired, by ſtudy, the great art of government, and had in herſelf all the reſources of genius, authority and policy. Her compliances during the late reign had inſpired the catholics with hopes, that ſhe was not ſo great an enemy to their religion as to the cruel and bloody methods made uſe of to enforce it; while the proteſtants believed her to be a ſincere friend to their more humane and enlightened doctrine. She knew the advantage of keeping both parties in ſuſpence, and therefore formed her council of perſons of both religions, though at the ſame time ſhe was attentive to the choice of thoſe who were moſt diſtinguiſhed for their wiſdom, reputation and experience.

Though Elizabeth had been ſo cruelly perſecuted during the reign of her ſiſter, yet ſhe ſeemed, on her change of fortune, to forget all the injuries ſhe had received from her enemies. She returned thanks to heaven for her deliverance as for a miracle; but ſhe wiſhed not to make her perſecutors feel the rod of retaliation: her prudence and magnanimity buried all offences in oblivion. She received with affability thoſe very perſons who had acted with the greateſt virulence againſt her; and even Sir Henry Bedingfield, (to whoſe cuſtody ſhe had been committed, and who had treated her with uncommon ſeverity) found her inſenſible to the deſire of revenge. This noble inſtance of a ſuperior underſtanding and beneficent diſpoſition charmed her enemies; they were convinced that their religion would never be puniſhed as a crime by a princeſs who cheriſhed not the paſſion of revenge.

But though Elizabeth readily paſſed over all injuries offered to herſelf, ſhe could not forgive thoſe who had inflicted the moſt inhuman cruelties on her innocent people. When the biſhops came in a body to pay her their obedience, ſhe expreſſed her ſentiments of regard for them all, except Bonner, from whom ſhe turned aſide as from a man polluted with blood; an object that excited horror in every heart ſuſceptible of the tender feelings of humanity.

As ſoon as the queen had, in ſome meaſure, ſettled the domeſtic tranquillity of the kingdom, ſhe diſpatched orders to her ambaſſadors at foreign courts, to notify her ſiſter's death, and her own acceſſion to the Engliſh crown. At the ſame time the lord Cobham was diſpatched to Philip, who ſtill continued in the Low Countries, in order to keep that monarch firm to the intereſts of England.

When Philip received advice of Elizabeth's acceſſion to the Engliſh throne, he expreſſed great ſurprize; but being deſirous of ſecuring his intereſt in that kingdom, he ordered his miniſter to pay her his compliments on the occaſion, and offer her propoſals of marriage. He flattered himſelf with obtaining at laſt the government of that kingdom over which Mary, or rather the parliament, gave him no power. But the queen knew too well the averſion of the Engliſh to an alliance with Spain; and, at the ſame time, was too fond of her own independence, to accept his propoſals. However, ſhe thought it moſt prudent to treat the ambaſſador with particular reſpect, and to elude his offers, without appearing to reject them. She likewiſe took care that the court of France ſhould be acquainted with Philip's offer, in order to induce Henry to conclude a ſpeedy peace, and by that means prevent her from throwing herſelf into the arms of the Spaniſh monarch.

Notwithſtanding Elizabeth was determined to reſtore the reformed religion in England, yet her ambaſſador at Rome received orders to notify to the pope her acceſſion to the throne. Had the pontiff been the leaſt deſirous of ſupporting his own intereſt, and that of the holy ſee, he could not, on this critical occaſion, have acted with too much prudence and moderation. But Paul IV. one of the moſt haughty and inflexible churchmen that ever filled the papal chair, inſtead of endeavouring to heal the breaches that had ſo long ſubſiſted between the churches of Rome and England, behaved with all the inſolence natural to his character. He declared, that the kingdom, being a fief of the holy ſee, it was an act of the higheſt preſumption in Elizabeth to aſſume the title of queen without his concurrence; that her illegitimate birth excluded her from the right of ſucceſſion; that he would annul the decree paſſed againſt the marriage of her father with Anne Boleyn; but that if ſhe would ſolicit his favour, he would ſhew her all the indulgence ſhe could expect from the head of the church. The queen being informed of this anſwer, ſaid, that the pope, in order to gain too much, was willing to loſe the whole. She accordingly recalled her ambaſſador, and applied herſelf ſeriouſly to reſtore a religion altogether unfavourable to the papacy. She, however, uſed not terrifying, but conciliating meaſures; nor did ſhe withdraw her favours from a ſingle individual of the catholic party.

The people, from the diſtinguiſhed violences committed in the preceding reign, were ſufficiently diſpoſed to a change of religion; but the queen was fearful of their running into the oppoſite extreme, and ſeverely retaliating on the catholics the miſeries that had been inflicted on the proteſtants. In order, therefore, to render this change leſs dangerous and more durable, ſhe imitated not the precipitate conduct of her ſiſter; ſhe took meaſures with caution, and inſured her ſucceſs by the rectitude of her views. She ſoon perceived that the proteſtant divines attacked, with all the virulence of religious zeal, the ſuperſtitious worſhip of the Roman church, and that the papiſts retorted upon them with equal acrimony. She therefore publiſhed a proclamation, forbidding all preaching, without a ſpecial licence, that the pulpits might not be filled with the combuſtibles of diſcord. At the ſame time, ſhe introduced ſuch a number of proteſtants into her council, as were ſufficient to counterbalance the power of the papiſts, ſhould they exert themſelves in favour of the ancient religion. She diſcharged from priſon, or recalled from exile, thoſe whoſe religion only had been their crime and ſhe ordered the Lord's Prayer, the Creed, th Ten Commandments, and the Goſpel, to be read i Engliſh. The elevation of the hoſt was diſcontinued and a greater zeal was expreſſed for the Bible tha for the church of Rome.

Th

The popiſh biſhops were ſo alarmed at theſe meaſures, that (apprehending a total abolition of the papal power, together with the ceremonies of the church of Rome, would ſoon follow; or, perhaps fearful of offending the holy father, who had ſcrupled to acknowledge the queen's title, and abſolutely denied her legitimacy) they reſolved not to officiate at her coronation. The only perſon that diſſented from this reſolution was the biſhop of Carliſle, who readily undertook to diſcharge the important office of crowning his ſovereign.

A. D. 1559. The ceremony of the coronation being fixed for the 15th of January, her majeſty, the preceding day, paſſed in grand proceſſion from the Tower to Weſtminſter, amidſt the acclamations of a prodigious number of ſpectators. The queen's behaviour was remarkable; ſhe returned their applauſes with ſuch a modeſt affability and winning behaviour as charmed the hearts of all beholders. But nothing diſplayed in a ſtronger light the religious ſentiments of the citizens, or tended more to endear the new ſovereign to the people, than her accepting of an Engliſh bible, richly gilt, which was let down, from a pageant in Cheapſide, by a child repreſenting Truth, who made the queen a ſpeech on the occaſion. Elizabeth received the book in both her hands; and having kiſſed it, held it up, and laid it on her boſom, promiſing to be diligent in reading it; and aſſuring the citizens, that ſhe eſteemed that gift more than all the coſtly preſents they had made her. The next day ſhe was crowned at Weſtminſter with great ſolemnity; and the two following days were celebrated with juſts and tournaments.

The parliament met on the 25th of January, where both houſes teſtified, in the moſt ample manner, their obedience and loyalty to the queen. After confirming her right to the crown, they acknowledged her ſupremacy, and gave her, under the title of head of the church, the tenths, firſt-fruits, and impropriations, which had been reſtored to the pope by queen Mary, together with all the eccleſiaſtical authority which her father and her brother had enjoyed, and alſo a power of adjuſting that authority to ſuch commiſſioners, whether eccleſiaſtics or laymen, as ſhe ſhould think proper to nominate. Several penalties were levied on all thoſe who refuſed to take the oath of ſupremacy. The ſtatutes of Edward the VI. were confirmed; and the maſs and liturgy of the church of Rome were aboliſhed.

Nor did the parliament confine their attention ſolely to the affairs of religion. The commons, excluſive of tonnage and poundage, then conſidered as the property of the crown, voted new ſupplies to Elizabeth: they granted her a ſubſidy of four ſhillings in the pound on land, and two ſhillings and eight-pence on goods, together with two fifteenths.

Before the commons broke up, they voted an addreſs to the queen, requeſting her to fix her choice of a huſband which they ſuppoſed could not be diſagreeable to a perſon of her age and beauty. This addreſs, though couched in the moſt reſpectful terms, met with a refuſal from the queen. She told the ſpeaker, who preſented it, that as the application from the houſe was conceived in general terms, ſhe could not take offence at the addreſs, or conſider it in any other light than as a freſh inſtance of their affection and regard for her; but that any farther application on this head would ill become either them to make as ſubjects, or her to hear as an independent princeſs. She farther ſaid, that ſhe alwas conſidered marriage as a burthen, and that while ſhe was charged with the government of ſo great a kingdom, it ſeemed ſtill more ſo; that the ſtate was her huſband, and the people of England her children; and that ſhe ſhould not think herſelf barren, nor her life unfruitful, while her days were devoted to the care of ſuch a family. She concluded with ſaying, that ſhe deſired no higher character, nor that a fairer remembrance of her ſhould be tranſmitted to poſterity, than to leave this inſcription engraved on her tomb-ſtone, when ſhe had paid the laſt debt of nature: "Here lies Elizabeth, who lived and died a maiden queen."

The new liturgy was eaſily introduced into the churches; but all the biſhops, except Landaffe, refuſed to take the oath of ſupremacy, and were deprived of their ſees. The inferior clergy, however, were not in general ſo tenaciouſly addicted to the ancient tenets, as to forfeit their livings; a few only refuſed to take the oath required, and were deprived of their benefices. Bonner was committed to the Marſhalſea, where he died in confinement. Dr. Parker was made archbiſhop of Canterbury, Jewel, biſhop of Saliſbury; Barlow, Scovy, and Coverdale, biſhops under Edward, were reſtored to their ſees, and the other vacant biſhoprics were filled up with men of piety and learning.

While the queen and parliament were employed in ſettling the public religion, the negotiations for a peace were carrying on at Chateau-Cambroſis, between the miniſters of France, Spain and England. The treaty was at laſt concluded, by which Calais was given up to Henry, who, on the other hand, engaged to reſtore it at the end of eight years, provided, during that time, Elizabeth did not break the peace either with France or Scotland. All men of penetration eaſily ſaw, that this ſtipulation was nothing more than a colourable pretence for abandoning Calais; but they excuſed the queen for making the ſacrifice on account of the neceſſity of her affairs, and even extolled her prudence in ſubmitting without farther ſtruggle to that neceſſity. A peace with Scotland followed as a neceſſary conſequence of that with France. The treaty was more honourable for the king of Spain. Henry II. reſtored all the places he had conquered, and gave Philip his daughter in marriage. It was alſo agreed that Philibert, duke of Savoy, ſhould marry the French king's ſiſter. The ceremonies were accordingly performed, when Henry II. was accidentally killed by a wound he received in his eye from the ſplinter of a lance, at a tournament held in honor of the nuptials.

His ſon and ſucceſſor Francis II. who had married Mary, queen of Scots, was a prince void of genius and experience. He was nothing more than an inſtrument in the hands of the Guiſes, who hurried him into meaſures which tended to augment their ambition and vanity. By their perſuaſions he conteſted the legitimacy of Elizabeth's birth, in order, at a proper opportunity, to diſpute her right to the Engliſh crown. Mary took the arms and title of queen of England, and by her intimate alliance with the French nation, was conſidered as a formidable rival. Elizabeth ſaw her danger, and determined to exert all her prudence and courage to render the attempts of her enemies abortive.

The French influence was at this time ſo ſtrong in the Scottiſh parliament, that an act paſſed for ſending the crown of that kingdom over to France. This complaiſance threw the Scots into a flame; the duke of Caſtle-herault, who was next heir to the crown, entered a ſolemn proteſt againſt it; and the earl of Arran, his eldeſt ſon, loudly exclaimed againſt ſo abſurd a proceeding.

In the mean time the friends of the reformation began to increaſe conſiderably, and the diſturbances excited by religious diſputes in Scotland now aroſe to the moſt enormous height. The proteſtants were headed by perſons of the firſt diſtinction; particularly by the earl of Argyle, the lords Turner and Morton, and others of the nobility. Theſe reformers ers had ſent an invitation to Knox, one of their countrymen, and a famous proteſtant teacher, inviting him to return from Geneva, where he then reſided. Knox was one of the moſt extraordinary men of that age. He was born in Scotland, and had taken orders in the Romiſh church. His birth was mean, his education illiberal, his learning ſmall, and his manners unpoliſhed. But with all theſe diſadvantages he roſe above the titles beſtowed by ſovereigns; he became the companion of princes; and though his enthuſiaſtic zeal carried him far beyond the bounds of decency, it was not in the power of courts to controul him. By reſiding long in England he had acquired the language in great perfection, and enlivened his writings with a peculiar vein of wit, always keen, and ſometimes delicate. He was the firſt who had the art of teaching politics from the pulpit, and of erecting on the altar a battery againſt the crown. His ambition was too refined to be ſatisfied with what crowns could beſtow: it could be ſatisfied only by the rank of a deſtroying angel, when it was in his power to have proved the better genius of his country. He raiſed, guided, and enjoyed the tempeſt, which reduced the Scottiſh churches to ruins, the independency of the ſtate to a ſhadow, and the crown to beggary. He had no juſt notions of liberty, becauſe he had none of order. In civil affairs he affected the ſpirit of a tribune, and in eccleſiaſtical, he exceeded even the inſolence of a pope. He was a perfect maſter of impenetrable diſſimulation; and by that deceitful acquiſition, proved the moſt formidable enemy to the eſtabliſhed government of his country.

Knox immediately obeyed the ſummons, and on his arrival in Scotland, the reformers entered into a bond of aſſociation, calling themſelves, "The Congregation of the Lord," in contradiſtinction to the eſtabliſhed church, which they denominated "The Congregation of Satan." The ſigning of this bond was followed by an open revolt from the clergy and the church of Rome. They committed ravages in various parts of the country, and the whole kingdom became one continued ſcene of diſorder. The enthuſiaſtic ſermons preached by Knox kindled the flames of rebellion. The Romiſh prieſts were attacked, the images broken, the monaſteries demoliſhed, and every diſorder was committed that could be expected from a multitude inflamed with religious madneſs.

The heads of theſe revolters, however, ſoon perceived that it would be impoſſible to complete their project, of effectually extirpating the Romiſh religion, without the aſſiſtance of ſome foreign power. They were already diſtreſſed for want of money, and found, that the reformation of religion, however deſired by the people, would not be ſufficient to keep a numerous army together. The revolters therefore, notwithſtanding the inveterate hatred that ſubſiſted between the two kingdoms, applied to Elizabeth for aſſiſtance. The court of France were at firſt pleaſed with theſe commotions, as they afforded a plauſible pretence for ſending forces into Scotland, who would be there in readineſs to act againſt Elizabeth, and ſupport Mary's claim to the Engliſh crown. But on receiving intelligence that the Scottiſh revolters were negotiating with Elizabeth for aſſiſtance, they were greatly alarmed, and exerted all their influence to render the treaty abortive. They even offered to reſtore Calais, and all its dependences, if the queen would obſerve a ſtrict neutrality. But Elizabeth was too prudent to be diverted from her purpoſe: ſhe anſwered, that a ſmall fiſhing town was of little conſequence when compared to the ſecurity of her dominions. She diſpatched Randolph into Scotland, to aſſure the revolters of ſupport, and to animate the leaders of the congregation in their deſign of ſhaking off their ſubjection to Rome.

A. D. 1560. Accordingly, in the beginning of January a ſquadron of ſixteen ſhips of war was fitted out under the command of vice-admiral Winter; and an army of 8000 men was ordered to rendezvous at Berwick, in order to act in conſort with the fleet, and join the revolters. The appearance of the Engliſh ſhips in the Forth gave new ſpirits to the leaders of the congregation; while the French forces, terrified at the loſs of ſome of their ſhips, which Winter had deſtroyed in his paſſage up the river, retired to Leith, in order to wait the powerful reinforcement they expected from the continent. But the troubles which now broke out in France engaged the attention of the miniſtry, and all thoughts of invading England totally vaniſhed.

On the 27th of February a treaty of mutual defence was ſigned at Berwick, between the duke of Norfolk, earl marſhal of England, (on the part of Elizabeth) and the leaders of the congregation; and the Engliſh received orders to join the Scottiſh revolters. The combined army immediately began their march for Leith, which was immediately inveſted. The queen-regent retired to the caſtle of Edinburgh, where ſhe ſoon after expired. She was a princeſs of great capacity, virtue, and moderation; and had the management of the affairs of Scotland been wholly intruſted to her, ſhe would, probably, have accommodated all differences with the reformers, and preſerved the nation from the miſeries of a civil war.

The French, finding that all farther oppoſition would be in vain, deſired to capitulate. The offer was accordingly accepted; and a treaty was ſigned at Edinburgh, whereby it was ſtipulated, That the French ſhould evacuate Scotland in twenty-four days, and return to France in ſhips furniſhed by Elizabeth: that the king and queen of France and Scotland ſhould thenceforth abſtain from bearing the arms of England, or aſſuming the title of that kingdom: that farther ſatisfaction for the injury already done in that particular ſhould be granted Elizabeth; and that commiſſioners ſhould meet to ſettle this point; or, if they could not agree, the king of Spain ſhould be arbiter between the two crowns. Beſides theſe ſtipulations, which ſolely regarded England, ſome conceſſions were granted to the Scots, which the plenipotentiaries, in the name of the king and queen of France and Scotland, promiſed, in the treaty with Elizabeth, to obſerve; that an amneſty ſhould be publiſhed for all paſt offences; that none but natives ſhould be put into any office in Scotland; that the ſtates ſhould name twenty-four perſons, of whom the Queen of Scots ſhould chuſe ſeven, and the States five; that the whole adminiſtration of affairs ſhould be committed to theſe twelve, during the queen's abſence; and that Mary ſhould neither make peace nor war without the conſent of the States.

A treaty, ſo glorious for Elizabeth, greatly increaſed her power, and extended her reputation. She became, from that moment, ſure of the confidence of the Scottiſh malecontents, and miſtreſs of their hearts and fortunes. This union was ſtill farther cemented by the ſubſequent meaſures of the reformers. They aſſembled the parliament, without any authority or orders from Mary. As ſoon as the ſeſſion was opened, they preſented a petition againſt the catholics, in which they were repreſented as robbers, aſſaſſins, and traitors, that ought no longer to be tolerated. Thus the reformers adopted all the violent meaſures of their enemies. The parliament itſelf ſeemed alſo to be actuated by the ſame ſpirit of rage and perſecution. The maſs was prohibited, under pain of confiſcation, baniſhment and death. The preſbyterian worſhip, founded on the moſt rigid principles of Calviniſm, was eſtabliſhed ; and the Roman clergy were ſtripped of their poſſeſſions, and baniſhed from the kingdom.

The queen of France and Scotland, who governed her huſband, and was herſelf governed by her uncles, the Guiſes, refuſed her conſent to theſe meaſures, declared ſhe would not ratify the treaty of Edinburgh, and continued the war againſt Elizabeth. The reformers, however, gave themſelves little concern about the refuſal of their ſovereign; they immediately put the ſtatutes in execution; aboliſhed the maſs ; ſettled their miniſters ; committed every where the moſt dreadful devaſtations upon the monaſteries, and even the churches, which they conſidered as having been polluted with idolatry. The rapacity of the people, who had been excited to rebellion by their new preachers, could not be reſtrained ; and fanaticiſm concurring with avarice, gave an incurable blow to the papal authority in Scotland.

A. D. 1561. While theſe things were tranſacting in Scotland, the fortune of Mary underwent a ſudden change by the death of the king her huſband, who was not yet eighteen years of age. Francis II. was ſucceeded by his brother Charles IX. who being only ten years old, Catherine de Medicis, his mother, was appointed regent during his minority. Mary, who had experienced nothing but mortifications from the hands of Catherine, found herſelf obliged to leave a country which ſhe loved, and return to her unhappy kingdom, rent to pieces on account of religion. Accordingly ſhe ſent her ambaſſador to England, to demand from Elizabeth a ſafe conduct for herſelf and the ſhips that were to attend her. But that princeſs, who was highly exaſperated at her refuſing to ſign the treaty of Edinburgh, anſwered, " that every part of her requeſt ſhould be readily granted, provided ſhe previouſly ratified that convention." She added, " That ſhe ſhould have free liberty to paſs through England, where ſhe ſhould be received with all the marks of affection ſhe could expect from a ſiſter." Mary could not retain her reſentment at this refuſal : ſhe ſent for Throgmorton, the Engliſh ambaſſador, and aſked him, What offence ſhe had given his miſtreſs, that Elizabeth ſhould deny her ſo ſmall a favour ? " But, (added ſhe) " I can, with God's aſſiſtance, return into my own country without her leave, as I came into France in ſpite of all the oppoſition of her brother Edward. I want not friends both able and willing to conduct me home, as they brought me hither, though I was deſirous rather to make an experiment of her friendſhip than of the aſſiſtance of any other perſon."

As a ſafe conduct could not be hoped for from Elizabeth, Mary determined to run all hazards rather than continue any longer at the French court. She accordingly repaired to Calais, attended by all her relations, and ſeveral noblemen of the firſt rank in that kingdom, from whence ſhe embarked for Scotland in the beginning of Auguſt. She ſeemed greatly affected on her leaving France ; ſhe kept her eyes fixed on the coaſt till darkneſs intercepted it from her view. " Farewell France !" ſhe cried, " Farewell, beloved country ! I ſhall never ſee thee more !" Elizabeth had fitted out a fleet of ſhips, under pretence of purſuing ſome pirates, but, probably, with a view of intercepting the Queen of Scots in her paſſage. Mary, however, paſſed the fleet in a fog, and reached her native kingdom in ſafety on the eighteenth of Auguſt, after an abſence of thirteen years. She was received by her people with every mark of eſteem, regard, and affection ; and was prompted, from the preſent appearances, to flatter herſelf with the expectations of a long and happy reign.

Mary, at this time, had only reached the nineteenth year of her age ; and, if the graces of youth, if the charms of beauty, if ſoftneſs of ſoul, if elegance of manners, if every amiable talent could have touched the hearts of a ſtubborn, unenlightened, and fanatical people, Mary would have ſoon become the idol of her ſubjects. Far from interfering in their religious ſentiments, ſhe repoſed her whole confidence in the heads of the reformers, who were now the leaders of the people. But her being a papiſt was a ſufficient provocation to the multitude. It was with the utmoſt difficulty ſhe could obtain permiſſion to celebrate maſs in her own chapel. " One ſingle maſs (ſaid the reforming miniſters) is more dangerous to this kingdom than an hundred thouſand armed men."

Knox, the enthuſiaſtic and turbulent preacher, daily ſignalized himſelf by freſh inſtances of zeal againſt the Catholics. He publicly called the queen Jezabel ; and even went ſo far as to tell her to her face, in one of his ſermons, That Samuel did not heſitate to hew Agag in pieces, in ſpite of king Saul ; that Elias, in the preſence of Ahab, neither ſpared the falſe prophets of Jezabel, nor the prieſts of Baal ; that Phineas, though no magiſtrate, put the fornicators to death ; and that others of courſe, though no magiſtrates, might legally puniſh thoſe crimes which were condemned by the laws of God." All the endeavours of Mary to gain this impracticable preacher over to her intereſt were in vain : he rejected her offers with contempt, and continued to diſſeminate the ſeeds of revolt and rebellion. He was cited before the council, but refuſed to make any acknowledgment : he defended his principles without timidity, and was diſcharged without puniſhment.

Mary, finding herſelf ſurrounded with dangers from a bigotted people, determined, if poſſible, to maintain a good underſtanding with Elizabeth. In order to this, ſhe diſpatched Maitland, her ſecretary, to pay her reſpects to that princeſs, to ſignify her deſire of cultivating a friendſhip and good correſpondence with her, and requeſting that ſhe might be acknowledged her ſucceſſor in the throne of England, in caſe ſhe died without iſſue. It was hardly poſſible for Mary to have made a more unreaſonable requeſt, or to have urged it at a more improper juncture. Elizabeth was highly provoked, and told the Scottiſh ambaſſador, " That ſhe was determined to live and die queen of England, and would therefore never have the mortification of ſeeing her ſubjects adore the riſing ſun ; that to name a ſucceſſor was to expoſe her own life to danger, to deſtroy the ſecurity of her government, to place a winding-ſheet before her, and to invite the king of terrors before his time." She added, " That ſhe ſhould leave it to others, after her death, to diſcuſs the title of her ſucceſſor ; that ſhe hoped the Queen of Scots claim would then be found preferable, and that ſhe would do nothing to hurt her intereſt in that reſpect.

Though this imprudent ſtep taken by Mary greatly contributed to increaſe the jealouſy Elizabeth had long entertained againſt that princeſs, yet ſhe thought proper to ſend Sir Peter Meutas with compliments to Mary on her ſafe return to her kingdom, and to inſiſt on her ratification of the treaty of Edinburgh : but Mary ſtill eluded the demand, pretending that the affairs of Scotland were yet in too unſettled a condition for her to examine the articles of the treaty with that attention the importance of them required, as ſhe imagined they might tend to deprive her of all hopes of ſucceeding to the crown of England. Elizabeth, to put the matter out of all diſpute, offered to explain the words of the treaty in ſuch a manner as to leave no ſuſpicion of their excluding Mary's right of ſucceſſion. But ſtill difficulties occurred, and the treaty continued without being ratified.

Elizabeth's whole attention was now engaged in taking proper meaſures for the preſervation and government of her kingdom. Her firſt buſineſs was to put the navy in a very reſpectable condition: ſhe augmented the pay of her ſeamen; filled her magazines with arms; introduced the manufacture of gunpowder into England; ordered a great number of iron and braſs pieces of ordnance to be caſt; reinforced the garriſon of Berwick; fortified the northern borders of her kingdom; introduced and encouraged improvements in agriculture, by permitting the exportation of corn; promoted the trade and navigation of England; regulated the national coin, which her predeceſſors had altered; and ordered her people to attend the exerciſe of arms at ſtated times.

The glory that attended Elizabeth's labours attracted the admiration of Europe; and ſhe received the addreſſes of ſeveral princes, who were either in love with her perſon or her power. She amuſed their hopes, but always with a reſolution to preſerve her liberty. Self-love had, poſſibly, as much concern in this particular as the love of dominion. What is ſtill more ſingular in her conduct, is, that though ſhe determined never to have any heirs of her own body, ſhe was not only averſe to fix any ſucceſſor to the crown, but alſo deſirous to prevent, as far as lay in her power, any perſon who had the leaſt pretenſion to the ſucceſſion from ever having heirs. Catherine Gray, daughter to the duke of Suffolk, ſiſter to lady Jane, and now the ſole heireſs of that houſe, was ſent to the Tower, for marrying the earl of Hertford without her conſent. The earl was ſoon after committed to the ſame priſon, where they remained for the ſpace of nine years, when Catherine dying, the queen was freed from all apprehenſions, and the earl was again reſtored to his liberty.

Notwithſtanding, however, Elizabeth was very ſevere with regard to thoſe who had any pretenſions to the throne, ſhe was attentive to remove the oppreſſions of her ſubjects. She revoked all warrants granted to the purveyors for victualling the fleet, which were generally executed in a very vexatious manner; and iſſued orders, that the people ſhould be paid in money for whatever proviſions they furniſhed. She reformed the impoſitions of the exchequer; and took care that the penſions aſſigned to the popiſh clergy, on their reſigning their livings, ſhould be punctually paid. She alſo increaſed the ſalary of the judges, and allowed them a proviſion for their reſpective circuits. At the ſame time, ſhe took care that her œconomy ſhould go hand in hand with her liberality: ſhe gave very little out of the royal demeſnes, but on condition of its reverting, on default of male iſſue, to the crown.

A. D. 1562. The attention of Elizabeth and her council was now principally engaged by the civil commotions which had for ſome time raged with the greateſt violence in France. After the death of Francis II. the French proteſtants, or Hugonots, whom that prince had perſecuted with the utmoſt rigour, became a very formidable people, whether we conſider their zeal for the reformation, their numbers, or the talents of their leaders. The prince of Conde, admiral Coligny, and his brother Andelot, were at the head of the Hugonots, and rendered their party reſpectable to the government. The Guiſes were their declared enemies, and armed againſt them the popiſh faction. Both parties aſſumed the maſk of religion; and, under pretence of ſupporting the goſpel of peace, carried on the moſt dreadful war againſt each other. Fourteen armies were levied and put in motion in different parts of France: each province, each city, each family, was agitated with inteſtine rage and animoſity. The father was divided againſt the ſon; and even the women ſacrificing at once their humanity and timidity to religious fury, diſtinguiſhed themſelves by acts of ferocity and valour. Wherever the reformed, or Hugonots prevailed, the images were demoliſhed, the altars pillaged, the churches ruined, and the monaſteries deſtroyed. Where ſucceſs attended the catholics, they burned the bibles, re-baptized the infants, and obliged married perſons to repeat the ceremony: while plunder, deſolation, and murder, attended equally the triumph of both parties.

Catherine of Medicis, the queen-regent, wiſhing to put an end to theſe civil diſcords, perſuaded the catholics to compromiſe their differences with the chiefs of the Proteſtant party; and an edict, favourable to the reformers, was publiſhed, by which they were permitted to have places without the cities and towns, for performing divine ſervice according to the tenets of their religion. But this deceitful compliance ſerved only to irritate theſe two irreconcileable parties. The duke of Guiſe, who was conſidered as the protector of the catholic religion, paſſing through Vaſſi, a town on the borders of Champagne, fell upon a congregation of Hugonots, who, in conſequence of the privilege granted them, were ſinging pſalms in a barn. Above ſixty of theſe poor defenceleſs people were killed, and the reſt fled to the woods for ſhelter. The conſequence of this inhuman action was a general inſurrection of the proteſtants in almoſt every par of the kingdom, and the nation was divided betwee the duke of Guiſe and the prince of Conde. Catherine, fluctuated between both, attempted, but in vain to mediate a peace between them. She was then a Paris with the young king her ſon, where finding herſelf deprived of all authority, ſhe wrote to the princ of Conde to come to her deliverance. This lette augmented the flames of the civil war, which wa carried on with the greateſt inhumanity: every tow was a fortified poſt; every ſtreet a field of battl Anthony, king of Navarre, the firſt prince of th blood, was obliged to ſerve in the army of the duk of Guiſe, and, with the queen mother, dragged to th ſiege of Rouen, where he was killed.

Philip, engaged by intereſt and inclination to ſup port the catholic religion, formed a ſecret allianc with the duke of Guiſe; and accordingly ſent 600 men to aſſiſt in ſuppreſſing the Hugonots. Alarme at this confederacy, the prince of Conde, who pe ceived it would be impoſſible to ſupport himſe againſt this combined party without aſſiſtance, applie to Elizabeth for ſupplies both of men and money, i order to prevent the total ruin of the proteſtant par in France. Accordingly Vidame of Chartres, a Briguemant were diſpatched to London to ſettle t treaty. Conde, who was poſſeſſed of moſt of t provinces of Normandy, offered to put Havre Grace into the hands of the Engliſh, on conditi that Elizabeth ſhould ſend three thouſand men to g riſon the place, together with three thouſand ot troops to defend Dieppe and Rouen, and furniſh t prince with an hundred thouſand crowns. The qu accepted the offer, and three thouſand men were i mediately ſent under the command of Sir Edw Poinings; but the fortifications of the place were ſo ruinous a condition, that the town was ſoon ab doned, and it was with the utmoſt difficulty t Poinings was able to throw a ſmall garriſon into Rou the city having for ſome time been inveſted by catholics, who at laſt took it by ſtorm, and put whole garriſon to the ſword. Soon after the of Warwick, eldeſt ſon to the duke of Northum land, arrived at Havre, with another body of th thouſand Engliſh, and took upon himſelf the command of the place.

But theſe forces were not ſufficient to ſtop the career of the catholics. And accordingly Elizabeth, who foreſaw the conſequence, had negotiated with the princes of Germany for a body of troops to aſſiſt the Hugonots. Dandelot, who conducted this negotiation, ſoon procured a body of ſix thouſand foot, and four thouſand horſe: and the German princes were ſo ſincere in their profeſſions of religion, that they refuſed any pay for the forces, till there was a proſpect of ſucceſs. This reinforcement enabled the prince of Conde, who was now at Orleans, the ſeat of the Hugonot's power, to take the field, and oppoſe the progreſs of the enemy. He intended to march to Havre; but the catholic army, commanded by the duke of Guiſe and the conſtable Montmorency, followed the rear of the Hugonots, and forced them to a battle in the neighbourhood of Dreux. The conteſt was very obſtinate on both ſides; but at laſt the Hugonots thought proper to retire, though the loſs was nearly equal on both ſides. One particular, however, was very remarkable; the prince of Conde was taken priſoner by the catholics, and the conſtable Montmorency by the Hugonots. Coligni, who commanded under Conde, was not intimidated by this misfortune: he inſpired his own unconquerable courage and conſtancy into every breaſt, kept forces together, and ſubdued ſome of the moſt conſiderable places in Normandy.

A. D. 1563. The aſſiſtance given by Elizabeth in favour of the Hugonots had greatly exhauſted her treaſury, and ſhe found it neceſſary to ſummon a parliament. They accordingly met on the 11th of January, a few days before which the queen was ſeized with the ſmall pox, and her life appeared in danger. The commons therefore preſented an addreſs to her majeſty, requeſting that ſhe would either marry, or fix the ſucceſſion in ſuch a clear and explicit manner, as might prevent the calamities which it was natural to fear would reſult from the conteſts of ſeveral claims to the throne. But Elizabeth ſtill found means to elude their application: ſhe could not be prevailed upon to declare a ſucceſſor. The parliament, however, made no difficulty of granting the neceſſary ſupplies. They were very willing to ſupport the noble deſigns of Elizabeth for the improvement of trade and manufactures, for the augmentation of her navy, for the ſuppreſſion of vice, and for the more effectual reſtraining the progreſs of popery. They granted two fteenths and two ſubſidies. They alſo paſſed a bill r enlarging the oath of ſupremacy, and thoſe who refuſed to take it were to be deemed traitors.

During theſe tranſactions in England, the catholic rmy under the duke of Guiſe were carrying on the ege of Orleans with great vigour. A very confi- erable progreſs had been made in this undertaking, hen the duke was aſſaſſinated by a young enthuſiaſt lled Poltrot de Merc. The duke, before he ex- red, expreſſed the deepeſt remorſe for having in- lved his country in the horrors of a civil war; and njured the queen-regent to conclude a peace as on as poſſible with the Hugonots. His advice was llowed; both parties were heartily tired of the r, and ſoon agreed to articles of pacification.

toleration, under ſome reſtrictions, was again nted to the proteſtants; a general amneſty was bliſhed; Conde was reinſtated in his offices and vernments; and money being advanced to pay the rears of the German troops, they were ſent out of kingdom. Not the leaſt regard was paid to Eli- beth in this treaty; and a garriſon of ſix thouſand n ill ſupplied with proviſions could not long re- the whole army of France. The earl of War- k, who commanded the Engliſh garriſon at Havre, made a gallant defence, notwithſtanding the many difficulties under which he laboured; but the plague breaking out among his troops, he was obliged to ſurrender the place. Nor did the misfortune terminate here; the garriſon imported with them the peſtilence, which afterwards raged with ſuch violence in England, that above 20,000 perſons died of it in London only.

Soon after Warwick's arrival in England a peace was concluded between England and France; Elizabeth received 200,000 crowns for the redemption of hoſtages, and the mutual pretenſions of both parties ſtill continued.

The queen being no longer engaged in foreign affairs, and a perfect tranquillity prevailing at home, ſhe made a progreſs to the univerſity of Cambridge, where ſhe was received with the greateſt pomp and magnificence. Every thing was conducted with a ſplendor that did honor to that celebrated ſeat of learning; and the queen declared her ſatisfaction in an elegant oration, in which ſhe aſſured the univerſity of her protection, and promiſed to exert her utmoſt endeavours for the promotion of knowledge, and the advancement of learning.

A. D. 1565. This year opened with a new ſcene of diſcontent and troubles between Elizabeth and Mary; as alſo between the latter and her ſubjects. Mary had for ſome time determined to marry, and the object ſhe pitched on was lord Darnley, ſon to the earl of Lenox. This young nobleman was her couſin-german by the lady Margaret Douglas, niece to Henry VIII, and daughter to the earl of Angus by Margaret queen of Scotland. He had been born and educated in England, where his father had conſtantly reſided, after being expelled his native country by the ſuperior intereſt of the Hamiltons. Darnley was alſo, by his father, deſcended from the ſame family with Mary herſelf; and would, by marrying her, preſerve the royal dignity in the houſe of Stuart. He was, after her, next heir to the crown of England; and thoſe who affected to deny her title, on account of her being a foreigner, had endeavoured to maintain his claim, and to give it the preference. It was therefore conſidered as no inconſiderable advantage, that by eſpouſing him, ſhe could unite both their titles; and as he was an Engliſhman by birth, and could not, either by his power or alliances, give any cauſe or ſuſpicion to Elizabeth, it was preſumed that the propoſal of this marriage could not be diſagreeable to the queen of England. She, indeed, ſeemed to conſent to this alliance; and even wrote to Mary, thanking her for her kind behaviour towards the earl of Lenox, whom that princeſs now treated with the moſt diſtinguiſhed reſpect.

Darnley, having obtained the aſſent of Elizabeth, repaired to Scotland; and, by his preſence, completed the conqueſt, which the fame of his accompliſhments had already begun. He was in the flower of his age, and his appearance remarkably graceful. Mary, forgetting all her ſchemes of policy, liſtened only to the dictates of her growing paſſion. Elizabeth was no ſooner informed that the queen of Scots was pleaſed with the figure and perſon of Darnley, and that the treaty was on the point of being concluded, than ſhe exclaimed againſt the marriage; diſpatched Throgmorton to Scotland, to diſſuade Mary from eſpouſing lord Darnley; ordered the earl of Lenox and his ſon to return immediately into England, under the ſevereſt pains and penalties the laws could inflict; and cauſed the counteſs of Lenox and her ſecond ſon, who were then in England, to be committed to the Tower.

Though Elizabeth's conduct was generally judicious, yet it was too often full of duplicity; but never did ſhe behave with greater inſincerity than in her tranſactions with the queen of Scotland. Though ſhe now expreſſed ſo violent a reſentment againſt the intended marriage of Mary with Darnley, ſhe was not averſe to it in her heart. She would rather, indeed, have wiſhed that Mary had remained for ever in a ſingle ſtate; but as that could not be effected, ſhe did not diſlike a choice that effectually delivered her from the fear of a foreign alliance. She had, however, ſome ſtrong reaſons of a political nature for affecting diſpleaſure on the preſent occaſion; it furniſhed her with a plauſible pretence for refuſing to declare Mary her ſucceſſor to the Engliſh crown, a point which ſhe had always laboured to evade; and it gave her an opportunity of exciting a ſpirit of rebellion among the Scottiſh nobility and clergy.

As ſoon as Mary received advice of Elizabeth's oppoſition to her marriage, ſhe juſtly obſerved to Throgmorton, that as the queen of England had already ſignified her deſire of her marrying an Engliſh nobleman, to avoid the umbrage of her eſpouſing a foreign prince, ſhe had, in effect, followed her own advice; but in order to give Elizabeth time to examine the affair with more deliberation, ſhe would defer her marriage for three months. But this conceſſion not ſatisfying Elizabeth, the ceremony was performed at Edinburgh; and Mary was ſo pleaſed with her new conſort, that ſhe gave him the title of king, and added his name to her own in all public acts. But ſhe ſoon perceived that his advantages of perſon ſerved only to conceal a mind that was trifling, vain, ungrateful, too much occupied with ſelf-love, too much ſwollen with ſilly pride, too much the ſlave of libertine folly, to be ſincerely attached to the moſt amiable of women. Reaſonably diſguſted with this unworthy huſband, ſhe withdrew from him, by degrees, her confidence, and treated him with that contempt his ingratitude merited.

At this time there was in the court of Scotland one David Rezzio, a Piedmonteſe muſician, who had raiſed himſelf to an honorable employment by his addreſs rather than by his talents. Mary had appointed him her ſecretary for foreign affairs, loaded him with favours, and by repoſing in him too much confidence, and giving him too much credit, empowered him to make a traffic of his patronage, and to exerciſe all the inſolence of an upſtart favourite. The king was perſuaded that Rezzio was the principal cauſe of the queen's coolneſs. Jealouſy enſued, and notwithſtanding the diſagreeable figure of the Piedmonteſe, he was thought to enjoy more of Mary's favour, than merely her confidence. The ſuſpicion was ridiculous, but ſufficient to make the moſt dreadful impreſſions on a heart already inflamed. The malecontents among the nobility added fuel to the flame of his jealouſy; and perſuaded him to expoſtulate with the queen on her too great intimacy with this Italian favourite. Secure in conſcious innocence, the queen treated theſe inſinuations with the contempt they merited; and in order to convince her unworthy conſort, that in exalting him ſhe meant not to diveſt herſelf of any part of her authority, ſhe ordered his name to be omitted on the coin, and to be placed after her own in all public acts, which before ſhe had ordered to take the precedence.

A. D. 1566. Darnley, inflamed with rage, and incapable of curbing the violence of his paſſion, vowed the moſt ſevere revenge againſt Rezzio; and the diſſatiſfied nobility offered to aſſiſt him in his deſign, and to be themſelves the executors of his vengeance. The ninth of March was the day fixed for this ſanguinary purpoſe, and the neceſſary precautions were taken to prevent the deſign from being rendered abortive. Mary, who was then in the ſixth month of her pregnancy, was ſupping in private with her natural ſiſter, the counteſs of Argyle, and David Rezzio. The king entered the apartment by a private paſſage, and placed himſelf at the back of Mary's chair: the lord Ruthven, George Douglas, and other conſpirators ruſhed in after him. Terrified with this appearance, the queen demanded the reaſon for ſo rude an intruſion. They told her, that not the leaſt violence was intended againſt her perſon; they meant only to bring that villain (pointing to Rezzio) to the puniſhment he ſo juſtly deſerved. Aware of his danger, Rezzio ran behind his miſtreſs, and ſeizing her waiſt, called aloud to her for protection; while ſhe interpoſed in his behalf with cries, menaces, and entreaties. But all her efforts were in vain; the impatient aſſaſſins ruſhed upon their prey; and by overturning the table, greatly increaſed the horror and confuſion of this dreadful ſcene. Douglas ſeizing Darnley's dagger, ſtuck it in the body of Rezzio, who ſcreaming with fear and agony, was dragged into an anti-chamber, and his body peirced with no leſs than fifty-ſix wounds.

Mary's conduct on this occaſion was directed by the moſt diſtinguiſhed prudence. After paying a decent tribute of grief to the memory of the man ſhe had honoured with her confidence, ſhe dried up her tears, and employed her mind wholly on meditating a ſevere revenge; while the aſſaſſins, conſcious o their own guilt, and dreading the reſentment of thei ſovereign, detained her a priſoner in the palace, diſmiſſing all who might have attempted her eſcape. In this alarming ſituation, ſhe determined to pardo thoſe noblemen who had oppoſed her government, i order to ſecure herſelf againſt the malice of the a ſaſſins, whom ſhe now conſidered as her moſt inve terate enemies. They readily accepted the offer returned to court, and the aſſaſſins of Rezzio wer obliged to fly into England, where they lived in grea poverty and diſtreſs. Darnley declared himſelf, b proclamation, innocent of the murder of Rezzi and that he ſincerely repented of having given an countenance to the perpetrators of ſo horrid a dee

Soon after this event Mary was delivered of a ſo whoſe fortune it was to unite the crowns of Englan and Scotland. Sir James Melvill was diſpatched the court of Elizabeth to inform her of this happ event, and was received with great politeneſs by th queen. She thanked him for the diſpatch he h made in bringing her ſuch agreeable intelligence, an expreſſed the moſt cordial friendſhip for the Scotti queen. She ſoon after ſent the earl of Bedford, a George Carey, ſon to the lord Hunſdon, to aſſiſt the baptiſm of the young prince.

The birth of a ſon contributed greatly to encoura the zeal of Mary's partizans in England; and perſo of all ranks began to be impatient for ſome ſett ment of the ſucceſſion; but Elizabeth, whenev preſſed on that ſubject, eluded the queſtion, by p tending ſhe had ſome thoughts of marrying Charl archduke of Auſtria. Several of Mary's frien however, adviſed Melvill to make the propoſal to queen. He followed their inſtructions, but uſed utmoſt circumſpection in this delicate affair. He her majeſty "he was well aſſured ſhe formerly layed declaring his miſtreſs preſumptive heir of crown of England, merely to wait till ſhe ſhould ſome iſſue of her body. And as that objection fortunately removed, he hoped her majeſty would longer defer gratifying the deſire of her ſubje who wiſhed to ſee one point ſettled, in doing juſtic the title of his ſovereign, who would never ſeek place or right in England, but by her favour an ſiſtance." The queen anſwered, "that the birt a prince was a ſtrong inducement to her uſing gre diligence in making a ſtrict inquiſition into that ter; that ſhe was perſuaded the right belonged t ſiſter of Scotland, in whoſe favour ſhe heartily wiſhed it might be decided;" but added, "that ſhe ſhould defer making any declaration till the young prince was baptized, when ſhe would certainly ſatisfy the queen in that particular." Melvill conſidered this anſwer as a mere evaſion, which was truly evinced by the future conduct of the queen.

About autumn Elizabeth made a progreſs to Oxford, where ſhe diſplayed her great knowledge and love of literature. She addreſſed the univerſity in an elegant Latin ſpeech, in which ſhe recommended the moſt aſſiduous attention to the inſtruction of youth committed to their care. And during her ſtay in that famous ſeat of the muſes, ſhe diſplayed ſuch a lively concern for the proſperity of literature, and the welfare of the univerſity, that the members were enraptured with her government, and ever after made her the ſole arbiter of all their diſputes.

A few days after the queen's return from Oxford, the parliament met at Weſtminſter, and once more determined to addreſs her, either to marry, or ſettle the ſucceſſion. Accordingly Mr. Molyneux made a motion, that the affair of the ſubſidy, which had already been moved by ſecretary Cecil, might go hand in hand with that of the ſucceſſion. The majority declared in ſupport of the motion; but the members of the privy council, who knew how diſagreeable the ſubject would be to Elizabeth, oppoſed it with all their influence. They informed the houſe that they had authority to aſſure them, that the queen would marry as ſoon as ſhe could find a prince deſerving her affection; that the appointing a ſucceſſor would expoſe her perſon to the moſt imminent danger; and that ſhe was therefore determined to delay the deciſion of that important ſubject to a more favourable opportunity. But theſe reaſons not being ſatisfactory to the members, they reſumed the ſubject with ſome warmth; ſeveral of them ſpoke with great freedom. Elizabeth was alarmed, and ſent a meſſage by Sir Francis Knolles, expreſsly commanding them o proceed no farther in that affair; but to reſt ſatisied with her promiſe to marry. Paul Wentworth, a nember who nobly ſupported the cauſe of liberty, ade a motion, and put the queſtion, whether ſuch prohibition was not an infringement on the liberties nd privileges of that houſe? This brought on very arm debates; and Elizabeth repeated her commands againſt their proceeding any farther in that atter. But this order, inſtead of ſilencing the embers, increaſed their ardour; the whole houſe as in a flame, and ſuch ſtrong ſymptoms of diſguſt ppeared, that the queen was obliged to retract her rmer orders, and allow the houſe free liberty of ebate. In conſequence of this the ſpeakers deliver- their thoughts with more calmneſs and temper; d even voted the ſupply without any condition. t as it appeared to have been given with a view of taining her conſent to fix the ſucceſſion, ſhe remit- d one third of it, declaring, that the money of her ople might as well be in their own pockets as in the blic treaſury. She was, however, far from being aſed with the ſpirited behaviour of the commons; d when ſhe put an end to the ſeſſion, ſhe ſeverely primanded the members in her ſpeech from the one, and adviſed them never to put her patience to ſevere a trial for the future.

During theſe tranſactions in England, the Nether- ds were agitated with thoſe alarming convulſions, ch at laſt gave liberty to a very conſiderable part that country. Soon after Philip had quitted theſe vinces, in order to reſide in Spain, the diſcontent the inhabitants arrived at ſuch a height, that it was oſſible for affairs to continue long in their preſent ation. This univerſal diſſatisfaction flowed from ral cauſes. The people were perſuaded that the king intended to aboliſh the ſmall remains of their liberties and privileges, and to erect on their ruins the throne of deſpotic power. The eſtabliſhment of biſhoprics alarmed many of the principal families, as the juriſdiction and revenues of the abbies, in which they were nearly concerned, were greatly leſſened. The inquiſition, which was going to be eſtabliſhed in theſe provinces, cauſed an univerſal alarm, that bloody tribunal being little leſs abhorred by the catholics than by the proteſtants themſelves. The ſtates had been prohibited from aſſembling; and a project was formed by the king for extirpating the reformed religion, which had now a multitude of profeſſors. Theſe meaſures, which were on the point of being eſtabliſhed, ſet the provinces in a flame. They had, for ſeveral years, petitioned the governeſs to aſſemble the ſtates, in order to avert the ſtorm which threatened the deſtruction of their country. Their requeſt was always rejected, and often with contumacious language. This ſtrange behaviour raiſed the reſentment of the people. The prince of Orange, with the counts of Egmont and Horne, withdrew from the council, and joined in a petition to the king. The cardinal de Glanville, who directed all the meaſures of the government, had rendered himſelf ſo odious, that the moſt violent attempts were to be feared, if he filled any longer the ſeat of power. Philip, whoſe pride would not ſuffer him to recall the cardinal, adviſed him to withdraw. The cardinal obeyed, and the nobles reſumed their ſeats at the council-board. This point being obtained, they exerted themſelves to prevent the eſtabliſhment of the inquiſition, which they conſidered as one of the greateſt misfortunes that could attend any people. They formed aſſociations; and the proteſtants celebrated divine ſervice openly, notwithſtanding all the threats of the government. From this moment Philip conſidered the people of the Low Countries as rebels, while they looked upon him as an unjuſt and arbitrary ſovereign. Such was the beginning of the troubles in the Netherlands, and in which the Engliſh were afterwards very intimately engaged.

A. D. 1567. This year opened with the moſt alarming commotions in Scotland, occaſioned by the earl of Bothwell, who had for ſome time been in great credit with Mary. He was always ſincerely attached to her family and perſon, and had performed ſignal ſervices to both. His courage and conduct as a ſoldier were unqueſtionable, and he bore an utter hatred to the Engliſh, againſt whom he had been a great and ſucceſsful commander on the borders where his own eſtate lay. He had been for ſome years baniſhed through the influence of the earls of Arran and Murray, but had been recalled by Mary, and pardoned. His figure was manly, though now advancing to the decline of life: he was equally gallant in the court as in the field; and he poſſeſſed that openneſs of manners, which, with his experience in life, rendered him to both ſexes an agreeable companion.

A man of ſuch a character could not be well reliſhed by the gloomy reformers of Scotland; and thisver y circumſtance, perhaps, ſerved to rivet him in Mary's eſteem. He had now acquired ſuch an aſcendancy over that princeſs, that all her meaſures were directed by his advice. Reports were ſpread of more particular intimacies and familiarities between them; and theſe reports gained more credit, as the hatred of Mary towards her huſband ſeemed rather to increaſe than diminiſh. Even Darnley himſelf was reduced to ſuch a ſtate of deſperation, that he had ſecretly provided a veſſel, in order to paſs over to the continent: while ſeveral of the nobility, perceiving there were no hopes of bringing about a reconciliation between them, propoſed ſome expedients for obtaining a divorce; but ſo many difficulties aroſe, chiefly with regard to the young prince's legitimacy, that it was laid aſide. The king, convinced that it was in vain ever to hope to recover the favour he had loſt, retired to Glaſgow, where he was ſeized with an illneſs of a very extraordinary nature.

Mary's enemies, who took every opportunity of blackening her character, imputed her huſband's diſeaſe to a doſe of poiſon adminiſtered to him with her own hand. But whatever truth there might be in this report, Mary ſeemed greatly alarmed. She repaired to Glaſgow, paid him a viſit, and behaved with the utmoſt tenderneſs; forgetting, in the duty ſhe owed him as a wife, the cauſes of reſentment he had given her as his ſovereign. This behaviour of the queen gave the greateſt pleaſure to all who wiſhed ſhe might retrieve her character, eſpecially when it was known that ſhe had brought the king with her to Edinburgh. The queen herſelf reſided in the palace of Holyrood-houſe; but as the ſituation of that place was unhealthy, and the noiſe of a court not well adapted to perſons in ſickneſs, it was thought proper to fit up apartments for him in a houſe at ſome diſtance from the city, called the Kirk Field. Here the queen continued her viſits, and behaved in the moſt endearing manner. She even lay ſeveral nights in a room below Darnley's chamber. But on the ninth of February, Mary told the king, that ſhe intended to ſleep that night in the palace, in order to be preſent at the marriage of one of her maids of honour. About two o'clock in the morning, the whole city was alarmed with a violent noiſe; and every face wore the aſpect of aſtoniſhment, when it was known that it was occaſioned by the blowing up of the houſe where the king reſided. Darnley's body was found at ſome diſtance, without any marks either of fire, contuſion, or violence; but not the leaſt doubt was made by any, that the king had been murdered; and Bothwell was generally conſidered as the author of that atrocious crime.

Mary ſeemed to be inconſolable on this occaſion: ſhe appeared to have devoted herſelf wholly to grief. The earl of Lenox loudly demanded juſtice on the murderers of his ſon; and accuſed Bothwell, and ſeveral others, as the perſons who had committed the regicide. Placards were ſecretly affixed on the walls in various parts of the city, accuſing Bothwell as the principal author, and that Mary herſelf was privy to the bloody deed. Voices were alſo heard in the ſtreets of Edinburgh during the ſtillneſs of the night, imputing to Mary and Bothwell the death of the late king. Whatever reaſons there might be for deſiring that the ſanguinary act might be conſigned to oblivion, the court was ſoon convinced, that it was abſolutely neceſſary to make ſome enquiry; and that Bothwell and his aſſociates, accuſed by the earl of Lenox, ſhould undergo a legal trial: but, at the ſame time, care was taken that no evidences ſhould appear againſt him. Fifteen days only were allowed the earl of Lenox for making good his charge againſt Bothwell, though he lived at a great diſtance from the court, and though he conjured the queen, for the ſake of vindicating her own honour, to employ more leiſure and deliberation in determining a queſtion of ſuch importance to the whole kingdom. Lenox finding all his attempts to put off the trial were in vain, ſent one of his retinue to proteſt, in his name, againſt the acquittal of the criminal, finding it would be impoſſible, in ſo ſhort a time, to collect the witneſſes ſufficient to prove the charge againſt ſo powerful a nobleman. No regard was, however, paid to this proteſt; and Bothwell, after a ſhort trial, was honourably acquitted.

Theſe proceedings were far from ſatisfying the people, and, inſtead of exculpating Bothwell, tended rather to prove his guilt. "Why (it was aſked) ſhould a perſon, innocent of the crime he is accuſed of, endeavour to precipitate the trial? The witneſſes themſelves, if any are produced, will tend to clear his character; and every enquiry will withdraw part of the veil of calumny and detraction." The murder of the king was, however, only a prelude to the crimes of Bothwell. He forcibly carried off the queen, as ſhe was going to ſee her ſon, and conveyed her to the caſtle of Dunbar, with an intent to marry her. It was generally ſuſpected that the whole tranſaction was managed in conſort with the queen; and ſome of the nobility, in order to diſcover the truth, ſent her a private meſſage, aſſuring her, that if ſhe lay under any conſtraint, they would exert all their power for her relief. She anſwered, that ſhe had indeed been carried to Dunbar by violence, but had been treated with ſo much kindneſs ſince her arrival, that ſhe willingly remained with Bothwell. The nobility were now ſufficiently convinced that the whole had been previouſly planned between them, and gave themſelves no farther concern about her captivity. A few days after, Bothwell received a pardon, not only for this violence, but for all other crimes he had ever committed.

Mary's thoughts were now engaged in effecting a marriage with Bothwell; but this ſeemed to be attended with an inſuperable difficulty. That nobleman had been married, about ſix months before, to a lady of great merit and noble family; and it was neceſſary to ſet this marriage aſide. Villainy is always fertile in expedients. The cauſe was pleaded with ſucceſs in two ſpiritual courts, the catholic and the proteſtant. The firſt decided in his favour from reaſons of conſanguinity, alledged by Bothwell; the latter from reaſons of adultery, alledged by his wife. Craig, the miniſter of Edinburgh, received orders t publiſh the banns of the queen's marriage, which h nobly refuſed. He even exhorted all thoſe who ha acceſs to her perſon, to give her their advice againſ ſo ſcandalous an alliance. But all his endeavour were in vain; the queen perſiſted in her intention t marry Bothwell and the ceremony was performed b the biſhop of Orkney. Very few lords attende notwithſtanding many of them had ſigned a petitio for her marrying Bothwell; and even the Frenc ambaſſador, though a dependant on the houſe o Guiſe, could not be prevailed upon to countenanc the marriage by his preſence.

This event diſgraced Mary in the eyes of all Eu rope: her ſubjects beheld her with horror. The ſu picions ſhe lay under with regard to her being an a complice in the death of the king grew ſtronge Her connection with the man whom the public voi had pointed out as the murderer; her great anxie to have him acquitted; a marriage ſo contrary to decency, negotiated by means ſo odious; all the conſiderations ſeemed to confirm, that Mary, t ſlave of her paſſion for Bothwell, was the partner his crime.

Bothwell's iniquity was augmented by his inſolen He treated the queen herſelf with the greateſt b tality; and endeavoured to make himſelf maſter the young prince, who had been committed to care of lord Erſkine, lately created earl of M but he nobly refuſed to part with his charge. T attempt alarmed the whole nation; and the princi nobility, by whom Bothwell was hated for his o bearing inſolence, met at Stirling, and formed aſſociation for protecting the prince, and bring the murderers of the late king to condign puniſhm They ſoon collected a conſiderable number of tro and marched, with the utmoſt diligence and ſecr to ſurprize the queen and Bothwell in Holy-ro houſe. Their attempt had certainly been ſucceſ had not one of their number informed the quee their deſign. She ſlighted not the notice ſhe had received, but made her eſcape, with Bothwell, to the caſtle of Brothwick, which the aſſociated lords reſolved immediately to beſiege. Bothwell fled to the Marches at the appearance of the enemy; and the queen eſcaped, in man's cloaths, to the caſtle of Dunbar, which was capable of holding out till her friends could come to her aſſiſtance. Had Mary continued in Dunbar, the army of the aſſociated lords muſt have been diſperſed for want of pay; but being joined by a conſiderable number of troops, ſhe imprudently took the field againſt her rebellious ſubjects, and marched to Preſton, where ſhe was joined by Bothwell. She ſoon perceived that his preſence was of no advantage to her cauſe; for on meeting the forces of the enemy at Carberry Hill, they refuſed to fight in defence of a man who was univerſally conſidered as the murderer of the late king. Mary was now obliged to have recourſe to negotiation; and Bothwell, perceiving that the authority of the queen was no longer able to protect him, made his eſcape to Dunbar, and thence paſſed over into Denmark, where he was thrown into priſon, loſt his ſenſes, and died in the moſt abject diſtreſs.

Mary, finding all hopes of reſiſtance were vaniſhed, ook the fatal reſolution of ſubmitting to her enemies, nd was conducted to Edinburgh amidſt the inſults f the populace. A banner was carried before her, on which was painted the murder of her huſband, nd her ſon in tears, imploring the vengeance of eaven. She was not permitted to continue long at he palace: the conſpirators ſent her, under a ſtrong uard, to the caſtle of Lochleven, belonging to William Douglas, uterine brother to the earl of Murray. This caſtle was ſituated on a ſmall iſland n the middle of a lake, and acceſſible only by a boat. Here the captive queen was treated with the utmoſt ruelty, without a ſingle friend to comfort her in this cene of diſtreſs.

The ſufferings of the unhappy princeſs affected lizabeth, and ſhe reſolved to employ all her authoty to alleviate her misfortunes, and reduce her reellious ſubjects to reaſon. She diſpatched Throgorton to Scotland, with orders to enquire into the al ſituation of Mary, and to promiſe her all the aſſtance in her power. At the ſame time, he was mmiſſioned to demand of the conſpirators the lierty of their ſovereign, and, in caſe of refuſal, threaten them with the reſentment of his miſtreſs.

The aſſociated lords, who were determined to mble Mary, refuſed the Engliſh ambaſſador acceſs her perſon; and obliged the unfortunate queen to n an inſtrument, whereby ſhe reſigned the crown her infant ſon, who was proclaimed in Edinburgh der the name of James VI. and crowned at Stirling the 29th of July. They alſo forced her to ſign a ond inſtrument, by which the earl of Murray, ary's natural brother, and one of the principal proters of the reformation in Scotland) was appointed ent during the minority of the young king.

The ſigning of theſe inſtruments, however, was ſufficient to procure Mary her liberty. The conators feared the conſequence of the return of the ctions of the people at the ſight of majeſty in diſs. Murray, therefore, ſummoned a parliament, that aſſembly, after voting the queen an accome in her huſband's murder, condemned her to peral impriſonment, ratified the inſtruments ſhe had ed, acknowledged her ſon for their king, and rray for regent. But though no difficulties occurthe parliament, many of the nobility were diſed at the proceedings of the conſpirators. The t of Bothwell had tended greatly to alter the ſennts of the virtuous part of the nation; the ſitua- of Mary was commiſerated; and a powerful party was formed for ſupporting the cauſe of diſtreſſed majeſty.

A. D. 1568. The endeavours of Mary's partiſans would, in all probability, have been rendered abortive, had it not been for George Douglas, (brother to the laird of Lochleven) who was ſo affected at the melancholy ſituation of Mary, and ſo captivated with her charms, that he determined, if poſſible, to effect her eſcape. He found means to ſteal the keys of the caſtle from his brother's chamber, and, while the family were engaged in their devotions, opened the gates, conveyed her into a ſmall boat, and rowed her aſhore. The news of her eſcape was ſoon known to her friends, who conveyed her to Hamilton, where ſhe was joined by a great number of the nobility. A bond of aſſociation was immediately ſigned for her defence, and Mary, in a few days, found herſelf at the head of a very conſiderable army.

In conſequence of this ſhe diſpatched Bethune, a perſon of abilities, and one that had been very inſtrumental in her releaſe, with a letter to Elizabeth, informing her of the happy change in her circumſtances, and requeſting a body of troops to aſſiſt her in reducing her rebel ſubjects. Mary intended to retire to the ſtrong caſtle of Dumbarton, in order to wait the arrival of the ſuccours expected from England. She alſo took ſome ſteps towards opening a negotiation with Murray. But the regent refuſed to liſten to any terms of accommodation that tended to diveſt him of the power he had acquired by uſurpation: and both parties prepared to decide the conteſt by the ſword. The regent could collect no more than four thouſand men; but notwithſtanding the inferior number of his army, he took the field againſt his ſovereign. The two armies met on the thirteenth of May, at Langſide, near Glaſgow; and a battle was fought in which Mary's forces were totally defeated. The unhappy princeſs fled with great precipitation, attended by a few friends, to the borders of England. A conſultation was now held with regard to the meaſures ſhe ought to purſue, as they would, in all probability, determine her future happineſs or miſery. It was hoped, that the late interpoſition of Elizabeth in favour of the Scottiſh queen, would induce her to aſſiſt her effectually in her diſtreſs; and it was therefore determined to paſs over into England. Accordingly the queen, attended by a ſmall retinue of ſeventeen perſons, landed at Workington in Cumberland, and was conducted with great pomp to the caſtle of Carliſle, where ſhe was received by the governor of that fortreſs with the moſt diſtinguiſhed reſpect.

No ſooner was Mary landed in England, than ſhe diſpatched a letter to Elizabeth, informing her of the unfortunate iſſue of the battle of Langſide, and ſolliciting that aſſiſtance ſhe had promiſed her againſt her rebellious ſubjects. Elizabeth received the letter with aſtoniſhment; and had ſhe been left to follow the dictates of her own mind at that inſtant, ſhe would certainly have complied with the requeſt of the Scottiſh queen; but ſhe was cautioned againſt the danger of ſuffering the failings of humanity to prevail over the dictates of prudence. She, however, diſpatched lord Scroop, warden of the Marches, and Sir Francis Knolles, vice-chamberlain, to pay her compliments to Mary, and to take care that ſhe was treated with all the reſpect due to her high rank and dignity.

In the mean time, a privy-council being aſſembled, great debates enſued on the manner of proceeding with regard to the Scottiſh princeſs. To detain her in England might, it was thought, be attended with many diſagreeable circumſtances, and to ſend her to France with ſtill more. Humanity would not permit her being delivered into the hands of her rebellious ſubjects. At laſt it was agreed by the majority, that ſhe ſhould be detained a priſoner, till ſhe had made ſatisfaction for having aſſumed the title and arms of England, and proved her innocence with regard to the murder of her huſband.

Mary had certainly entered England without leave from Elizabeth, or procuring any ſafe conduct; and from this circumſtance, it was determined by the council, that ſhe was actually a priſoner of war. It cannot be denied, that a ſovereign has power to ſeize a foreign prince, who enters his dominions without a ſafe conduct; but there are caſes wherein that right deviates into juſtice. In this inſtance, the circumſtances were remarkably favourable. Mary had been forced out of her dominions by her rebellious ſubjects, and obliged to take refuge in the firſt place that offered. She had no time for choice: ſhe muſt either ſubmit to thoſe who ſought her life, or take ſhelter in the country of a friend and ally. She had alſo received aſſurances of aſſiſtance from Elizabeth; ſo that if the detaining her a priſoner was not contrary to the law of nations, it was at leaſt repugnant to the dictates of humanity.

Elizabeth's mind was ſo agitated that ſhe knew not in what manner to proceed: political prudence, and her natural generoſity contended with each other. The former at laſt prevailed; ſhe followed the advice of her council, and informed the queen of Scots, that notwithſtanding her friendſhip for her, ſhe could not, with any degree of decency, either ſee or ſupport her, till ſhe ſhould be cleared of the crimes of which ſhe was accuſed. Mary anſwered, that ſhe would willingly juſtify herſelf before a princeſs whom ſhe conſidered as a ſiſter. But Elizabeth reflected that ſhould ſhe ſit in perſon as a judge, and pronounce any ſentence, it would produce many difficulties: the royal dignity would be wounded when majeſty itſelf ſubmitted to puniſhment. She therefore declined the office, but offered to ſend two noblemen, as her commiſſioners, to hear the mutual charges between her and her ſubjects. Mary accepted the offer, and Elizabeth wrote immediately to Murray, charging him in a very peremptory manner, to deſiſt from any farther hoſtilities againſt the friends of the queen of Scots, and to appear in perſon to vindicate his conduct with regard to his ſovereign, before the commiſſioners, who were appointed to ſit at York for that purpoſe.

Murray was equally ſurprized and offended at this peremptory meſſage; but having always been an abject ſlave to the Engliſh, and his domeſtic enemies being now both numerous and powerful, he determined to obey the commands of Elizabeth, as the only perſon from whom he could hope for aſſiſtance. This reſolution was, however, ſtrongly oppoſed in the council, by the moſt judicious of his party. They repreſented that it would caſt an indelible ſtain on himſelf and his country ſhould he accuſe his lawful and native ſovereign before a foreign court of judicature; before perſons who were profeſſed enemies to the Scottiſh nation. But their arguments were urged in vain. Murray was not to be diverted from his purpoſe; he paſſed into England, attended by the earl of Morton, the biſhop of Orkney, the lord Lindſey, and the abbot of Dumfermling.

At firſt Mary's cauſe appeared triumphant. Murray flattered himſelf that if her honour was not impeached, ſhe might be prevailed upon to accept of reaſonable terms of accommodation; whereas if he accuſed her of being an accomplice in the murder of Darnley, and ſhe ſhould afterwards re-aſcend the throne, inevitable death muſt be the conſequence. This accuſation being omitted, the anſwers of the queen to the arguments of her adverſaries were extremely plauſible: "How could ſhe ſuſpect, ſaid her advocate, that Bothwell was the murderer of her huſband, after he had been legally tried and acquitted, and after the nobility themſelves had ſolicited her to marry him? If he was guilty, ſhe deſired he might be puniſhed; ſhe appealed to the laws of her country, and they found him innocent. As to her reſignation of the crown, it was evidently an act of conſtraint, and conſequently null and void. By what right, or on what pretence, could the Scots revolt from their allegiance, throw their queen into priſon, give her battle, and place her ſucceſſor on the throne. Theſe are confeſſedly acts of rebellion, and puniſhed as ſuch in every well-governed ſtate."

The force of theſe arguments was clearly diſcerned by Murray, who was now convinced, that he muſt either give up the conteſt, or accuſe his ſovereign as the murderer of her huſband. He choſe the latter; and being aſſured that if Mary's crime was proved in a ſatisfactory manner, Elizabeth would immediately declare againſt her, and give him every reaſonable protection he could deſire, he produced proofs in ſupport of the moſt horrid accuſations. Theſe were love-letters written by Mary to Bothwell, and a promiſe of marriage ſigned by the hand of that infamous ſeducer. From theſe papers it was ſufficiently evident, that all the crimes committed by Bothwell, the murder of the king, and forcibly carrying off the queen, had been concerted with her majeſty.

Mary's commiſſioners were aſtoniſhed when they perceived that Murray had produced teſtimonies which could not be anſwered, unleſs they could prove that the papers were forged. They therefore changed their ſyſtem; they deſired that Elizabeth would bring about an accommodation; and on being informed, that the accuſations exhibited againſt Mary muſt be firſt obviated, they broke off the conferences. The friends of Mary have laboured to prove that theſe famous letters were forged, and many volumes have been written with that intention. The ſubject is, however, too diffuſe, nor indeed is it neceſſary to diſcuſs the arguments that have been offered both for and againſt the authenticity of theſe letters here. Let it ſuffice to ſay, that from a candid examination, the circumſtances advanced to prove them forgeries are weak and inconcluſive.

Elizabeth uſed her utmoſt endeavours to prevail on Mary to continue the conferences, but without effect. That princeſs remained inflexible, and even accuſed Murray and other commiſſioners of being the murderers of her huſband: but produced no proof againſt them. Elizabeth offered to bury whateve was paſt in oblivion, and negotiate a reconciliatio with her ſubjects, provided ſhe would renounce th throne, and ſuffer the direction of affairs to continu in the hands of Murray during the minority of th young prince. But Mary rejected the propoſal wit diſdain. "My laſt words, anſwered ſhe, ſhall b the words of the queen of Scotland."

While Murray was abſent, the Hamiltons and th earl of Huntley, who were ſtill in arms, had take poſſeſſion of Glaſgow, with a body of ſeven thouſan men, intending to march forward, and intercept th regent in his return from England. Murray, bein informed of this, had recourſe to artifice: he ſe Sir Robert Melvill to Mary, with propoſals of ma riage between her and the duke of Norfolk, and ceſſation of hoſtilities between the two parties in Sco land. She anſwered that her repugnance to a n marriage ſhould give way to the public good, and th ſhe ſhould be ready to receive any propoſal that mig be recommended by her parliament, and to make peace with the rebels; but at the ſame time declar ſhe would give no definitive anſwer till ſhe was ſet liberty, and reſtored to the throne of her anceſto

Sh

She, however, agreed to ſend orders to the lords of her party to ſuſpend hoſtilities againſt Murray till further orders. This was the ſole point the regent had in view; he took advantage of the queen's order, and returned to Scotland in ſafety.

A. D. 1569. Mary now preſſed Elizabeth either to enable her to regain poſſeſſion of her kingdom, or to ſuffer her to retire into France and ſeek other reſources. Elizabeth was exaſperated to the higheſt degree by ſome letters which Mary had wrote to her friends in Scotland, which, being intercepted were put into her hands. She therefore evaded complying with Mary's requeſts, and that unfortunate princeſs, whoſe wit and inſinuating graces might have created her intereſt in too many hearts, was removed, on the 18th of January, to Tutbury caſtle, in Staffordſhire, where ſhe was put under the cuſtody of the earl of Shrewſbury.

The duke of Norfolk, however, ſtill purſued his deſign of marrying Mary. He was greatly beloved by the people, and the firſt nobleman in England in point of birth and fortune. He was paſſionately fond of the Scottiſh queen, but, fearful of concluding a treaty of that importance without the conſent of his ſovereign, he conſulted the earls of Arundel, Northumberland, Weſtmoreland, Suſſex, Pembroke, and Southampton, who all agreed in adviſing him to proceed. The principal nobility and gentry engaged to ſupport him; and the lord Lumley and Sir Nicholas Throgmorton joined his intereſt with great cordiality. It was now agreed to open the affair to the earl of Leiceſter, Elizabeth's declared favourite. He approved the deſign, and wrote to Mary, recommending the duke of Norfolk for a huſband, and ſtipulating the following articles for the advantage of both kingdoms: "That Mary ſhould attempt nothing in conſequence of her pretenſions to the Engliſh crown, prejudicial to Elizabeth or her poſterity; that ſhe ſhould confirm the preſent eſtabliſhed religion in Scotland, and grant a free pardon to ſuch of her ſubjects as had appeared in arms againſt her." Mary very readily gave her conſent to theſe propoſals, which ſeemed to open a path to liberty, and the recovery of the crown of her anceſtors.

Cecil, ſecretary of ſtate to Elizabeth, having got intelligence of the intended marriage, communicated it to his miſtreſs, who one day told Norfolk to take care on what pillow he laid his head. She afterwards ſent for the duke, upbraided him ſharply for preſuming to engage in a treaty without her knowledge, and commanded him upon his allegiance, to proceed no farther. The duke promiſed to obey her commands; but retired from court without taking leave, and repaired to his ſeat in Norfolk. He was ſo greatly beloved in that country, that he could eaſily have aſſembled a conſiderable army in his defence; but his loyalty would not permit him to take up arms againſt his ſovereign. He ſet out on his return to the court, but was arreſted at St. Albans and ſent to the Tower. All who had been privy to the deſign were alſo taken into cuſtody; but as they unanimouſly agreed in declaring, that the marriage had been propoſed by Murray, and that it was never intended to be concluded without Elizabeth's conſent, they were ſet at liberty.

The people had been univerſally alarmed at the impriſonment of ſo many of the nobility, and ſeveral ſuſpicious aſſemblies were held in the north, where Mary was the idol of the people. Lord Suſſex, preſident of York, was not ignorant of theſe meetings, nor of the inclination of the northern inhabitants. He ſent for the earls of Northumberland and Weſtmoreland, who thought proper to pay no regard to the ſummons; but being alarmed of their danger they flew to arms without waiting for a ſupply of men and money, which they had been promiſed by the duke of Alva, governor of the Netherlands. The inſurgents proceeded immediately to Durham, tore the bible and common prayer book in the public market-place, erected a crucifix in the cathedral, and cauſed maſs to be openly celebrated in an aſſembly of above ſix thouſand perſons. The rebel army now became very numerous, and a party of 500 horſe were detached to releaſe the queen of Scotland from her confinement in Tutbury caſtle; but that princeſs having been removed to Coventry before their arrival, the expedition miſcarried. The inſurgents ſoon after made themſelves maſters of Bernard-caſtle, and Hartpool, the latter of which they ſtrongly fortified.

While part of their forces, amounting to about 15,000 foot and 2,000 horſe, were employed in theſe operations, the reſt, formed into ſmall detachments, over-ran all Yorkſhire; the royal army, commanded by the earl of Suſſex, being too weak to prevent their ravages. But the chiefs of the rebels finding it impoſſible to furniſh money ſufficient to pay their troops, the army diſperſed. Northumberland fled into Scotland, where he was ſeized by the regent, and committed to the caſtle of Lochleven. But the earl of Weſtmoreland was more fortunate; he found means to paſs over into Flanders, where he lived on a ſmall penſion ſettled on him by the Spaniſh monarch.

A. D. 1570. This year was opened by a circumſtance that greatly facilitated the already diſturbances that ſubſiſted between the Engliſh and Scots. The earl of Murray, regent of that kingdom, was aſſaſſinated on the 23d of January by a gentleman of the name of Hamilton, who gave no other reaſon for his conduct than obtaining revenge for a private injury he had received from the earl.

From this remarkable event Scotland was again thrown into its former anarchy. No ſooner was the death of the regent known, than a conſiderable body of Scots entered England, and committed ravages which equalled in cruelty thoſe of the moſt barbarous times. This expedition ſeems to have been undertaken merely to provoke the Engliſh to revenge theſe affronts on all the Scots in general; and by that means to revive the ancient enmity between the two people, and unite all the inhabitants of Scotland againſt their ſouthern neighbours. But they were miſtaken in their politics: Elizabeth was too cautious to be deceived by ſo ill-concerted a ſcheme: ſhe declared, that ſhe did not think the party that ſupported the government concerned in the late unprecedented inſult upon her ſubjects, nor inclined to think the whole nation criminal. She even offered her aſſiſtance to reſtore the government to its former vigour, and to redreſs the diſorders that had been committed by Mary's friends. She added, that ſhould her friendly offers be rejected, ſhe was ſufficiently prepared to do herſelf juſtice, and take a ſevere revenge on thoſe who had wantonly, and without the leaſt provocation, inſulted her crown and dignity.

This declaration, which was delivered by Randolph, the Engliſh ambaſſador, to an aſſembly of the ſtates, diſconcerted all the meaſures of Mary's friends: they were not prepared with an anſwer, and obtained a farther time for that purpoſe. During this interval, both parties exerted all their abilities to gain the aſcendant. Elizabeth collected an army to give weight to her counſels; and her ambaſſador artfully cheriſhed the diviſions in Scotland, while he ſeemed to be labouring to promote an union between the two parties. Mary's friends had recourſe to the moſt provoking ſarcaſms upon Elizabeth and her council, in order to urge them to a general rupture. At the ſame time, they expected conſiderable aſſiſtance from France and Spain, to enable them to oppoſe, with more probability of ſucceſs, the attempts of the party ſupported by the Engliſh.

The earl of Suſſex, who commanded Elizabeth's army, received orders to march into Scotland, in order to revenge the injuries ſuffered by the Engliſh, and to influence the election of a regent. But before he arrived in that kingdom, he was recalled by an agreement with the queen of Scots, who ſtipulated, that no foreign troops ſhould be introduced into Scotland; and that the Engliſh rebels, who had taken refuge in that kingdom, ſhould be delivered up by her partizans. The earl of Lenox was ſoon after choſen regent in an aſſembly of the ſtates, and Randolph received orders to maintain a correſpondence with him.

Elizabeth, notwithſtanding theſe inſtances of partiality to Mary's enemies, ſtill continued her ambiguous conduct, and maintained the appearance of friendſhip with that unfortunate princeſs. At the requeſt of the biſhop of Roſs, Mary's ambaſſador, joined with the preſſing inſtances of ſome foreign powers, Elizabeth procured a ſuſpenſion of arms between the Scottiſh factions; and by that means checked the progreſs of the regent's party, when they were on the point of gaining very conſiderable advantages over their opponents. By this variable conduct, Elizabeth artfully fed the flames of civil diſcord in Scotland, and rendered the whole country a ſcene of horror and deſolation.

A. D. 1571. The attention of the Engliſh was now engaged by the affairs on the continent, where the moſt dreadful ravages were committed, and whole cities laid waſte by religious wars. The prince of Conde was ſlain at the battle of Jarnac: and his ſon, with the young prince of Navarre, afterwards Henry IV. placed at the head of the Hugonots. The admiral Coligni, always unfortunate, but always formidable in his misfortunes, conſtantly ſupported the proteſtant party againſt the royal forces, headed by the ambitious Henry de Guiſe. Elizabeth ſaw the neceſſity of ſupporting the Hugonots, whoſe intereſts were connected with her own, notwithſtanding her hatred of all rebellion, and every ſpecies of oppoſition to the will of the ſovereign. Soon after, the whole army of the inſurgents was defeated at Moncontour, in Poictou, and the admiral himſelf dangerouſly wounded. The loſs of this battle ſeemed to have put a final period to the attempts of the Hugonots; and the court of France, perſuaded that the force of the rebels was totally annihilated, neglected to make any farther preparations againſt an enemy whom they thought could never be more dangerous. But they were miſtaken. Coligni appeared in another quarter of the kingdom, at the head of ſo powerful an army, that even the capital itſelf was in danger. It was now thought proper to have recourſe to negotiation; and a treaty was ſoon concluded, in which liberty of conſcience, and a pardon for their revolt, were once more granted them.

The low countries felt much more ſeverely than France the dreadful effects of ſuperſtitious tyranny. Philip was determined to rule thoſe commercial provinces with a deſpotic power, and employed a man well qualified to execute his tyrannical deſign. Ferdinand of Toledo, duke of Alva, was the man ſelected by Philip for this purpoſe. He had been educated in a camp; and having obtained a conſummate knowledge of the military art, his habits led him to transfer into all governments the ſevere diſcipline of an army. This general, about three years ſince, had conducted into the Low Countries, from Italy, a powerful body of veteran Spaniſh forces. The Flemings, who were no ſtrangers to his ferocious character, and the inveterate hatred he entertained againſt them, were ſtruck with conſternation. Nor were they terrified in vain. The military executions of that unfeeling nobleman are ſhocking to humanity, and will hand down his name with infamy to the lateſt poſterity. All the privileges of that people were aboliſhed by edict; arbitrary and ſanguinary tribunals erected; the counts of Egmont and Horne, notwithſtanding all their merits and paſt ſervices, were brought to the ſcaffold; multitudes of all ranks were thrown into priſon, and thence delivered over to the hand of the executioner. He met with no reſiſtance; the people ſubmitted to his power; but this was not ſufficient to ſatisfy his ſlaviſh purpoſes: he proceeded in his career of cruelty; and nothing was heard of but confiſcation, impriſonment, exile, torture and death.

Driven to deſpair, great numbers of the Flemings took refuge in England, where they were protected by Elizabeth, and where they eſtabliſhed their uſeful manufactures, for which they had been long famous. It was impoſſible for the violent government of Alva to be of any long continuance, without exciting ſome dreadful commotion. Elizabeth declared, ſhe could not behold the deſtruction of a whole people, without affording them aſſiſtance. She accordingly ſeized a large ſum of money which ſome Genoeſe merchants were ſending to Alva, for the payment of his forces. This reduced him to have recourſe to the moſt oppreſſive meaſures, which ſtill farther animated the Flemings againſt the Spaniſh government.

Alva, exaſperated at the proceedings of Elizabeth, determined if poſſible, to raiſe diſturbances in England. He accordingly opened a ſecret correſpondence with Mary, queen of Scots, by means of one Rodolphi, a Florentine merchant, who had reſided many years in London, and managed all the intrigues between the catholics and the court of Rome. It was agreed that a powerful army of Spaniſh troops ſhould be landed in England, and at the ſame time an inſurrection ſhould be excited in the heart of the kingdom. But Alva was perſuaded that the attempt could not poſſibly ſucceed unleſs ſome Engliſh nobleman of authority could be found to head the inſurgents, and inſpire them with courage; and no perſon appeared ſo proper for this purpoſe as the duke of Norfolk. Mary, who was now ſufficiently convinced of Elizabeth's duplicity, and deſpaired of ever recovering her crown or even her liberty, by pacific meaſures, readily embraced the offer: while Norfolk, unable to recover the favour of Elizabeth, agreed to violate the promiſe he had made of breaking off all correſpondence with Mary. He engaged in this new conſpiracy; the promiſe of marriage was renewed between them; but he ſtill flattered himſelf that there was nothing criminal in his actions, as his ſole view was, that of obtaining the queen's conſent to marry the captive princeſs. In conſequence of the duke's conſent, three letters were wrote in his name by Rodolphi, one to Alva, another to the pope, and a third to the king of Spain; but Norfolk, though very deſirous of delivering Mary from confinement, refuſed to ſign them. He could only be prevailed upon to ſend Baker, one of his confidents, to the Spaniſh ambaſſador, to vouch for their being authentic. The ſcheme was embraced with great alacrity by Alva and the pope, and every thing ſeemed to wear a very promiſing aſpect.

Theſe proceedings could not long remain concealed in ſo prying a court as that of Elizabeth's. Rodolphi, indeed, was beyond the reach of the Engliſh council; but one Baley, a ſervant to the queen of Scots, whom Rodolphi had diſpatched with letters to Mary, the biſhop of Roſs, the duke of Norfolk, and the lord Lumley, was ſeized at Dover immediately upon his landing, and the letters ſent to lord Cobham, governor of the cinque ports; who being a friend to the duke of Norfolk, ſuffered the biſhop of Roſs to change the letters for others of leſs importance. Walſingham, Elilabeth's miniſter at Paris, had obtained ſome intelligence of this affair, and was perpetually alarming his miſtreſs with accounts of plots forming againſt her by Mary's party. The letters delivered by lord Cobham contained no traces of any ſecret deſigns againſt the government, and ſuſpicions were entertained by the miniſtry, that theſe were other letters which had not reached their hands. Baley was therefore ſent for to the council, and ſoon brought to confeſs all he had learned from Rodolphi, and that the original packet he had brought over was in the poſſeſſion of the biſhop of Roſs.

That prelate ſuſpecting his public character would not protect him, and fearful of the conſequence, had ſecreted the moſt material of his papers; and on the 13th of May, after undergoing a ſtrict examination before a committee of the council, he was delivered into the cuſtody of the biſhop of Ely. Sir Thomas Stanley, Sir Thomas Gerard, and one Rolſton were committed to the Tower on ſuſpicion.

Hitherto nothing had appeared that could greatly affect the duke of Norfolk; but a ſubſequent tranſaction completed his ruin. Mary was very deſirous of ſending a ſum of money to lord Herries, and her partizans in Scotland; and Norfolk undertook to convey it to Banniſter, a ſervant of his in the north, who was to find ſome expedient to have it delivered to lord Herries. The perſon who was entruſted to convey the money to Banniſter not being in the ſecret, and judging from the weight and ſize of the box that it was full of gold, carried it, together with a letter he was charged with to Banniſter, to Cecil, now lord Burleigh. As ſoon as this diſcovery was made, Banniſter and Hickford, the duke's ſecretary, were apprehended and brought before the council. On being threatened with the torture, they immediately confeſſed the whole, and as Hickford, (though ordered to burn all Mary's letters) had concealed them under the mats of the duke's chamber, the miniſtry became poſſeſſed of ſufficient evidence againſt his maſter.

Ignorant of the diſcoveries made by Hickford, the duke, when cited before the council, denied every article of the charge brought againſt him, and though exhorted to merit the mercy of his ſovereign by a full confeſſion, he perſevered in his firſt declaration. He was therefore ſent to the Tower, and after being convicted of high-treaſon, finiſhed his life upon the ſcaffold. He died with great calmneſs and conſtancy, and was ſincerely regretted by the people, by whom he was greatly beloved. He had acquired their affections by his beneficence, generoſity, and affability. His anceſtors had long been conſidered as the leaders of the catholics; and this hereditary attachment, joined to the alliances of blood, had procured him the friendſhip of the moſt conſiderable men of that party; but as he had been educated among the reformers, was ſincerely devoted to their principles, and maintained that ſtrict decorum and regularity of life by which the proteſtants were at that time diſtinguiſhed; he thereby enjoyed the real felicity of being popular even in the moſt oppoſite factions. The height of his proſperity alone was the cauſe of his misfortunes, and engaged him in attempts from which his virtue and prudence would naturally have for ever kept him at a diſtance.

During theſe tranſactions the kingdom of Scotland remained in a perfect ſtate of anarchy. Kirkaldy of Grange, who commanded in the caſtle of Edinburgh, having declared for Mary, the lords of her party, encouraged by his countenance, made themſelves maſters of the capital, and carried on a vigorous war, againſt the regent, who was obliged to retire to Stirling. The inſurgents followed, and made themſelves maſters of his perſon; but perceiving his friends at the head of a conſiderable body of troops, were advancing, they immediately put him to death. The earl of Mar was choſen regent in his room; but that nobleman found it impoſſible to govern ſo divided a country. At laſt the two courts of France and England ordered their miniſters to negotiate a ceſſation of arms, which they accordingly effected. But this tranquillity was of no long duration; Mar ſoon after died of grief for the diſtracted ſtate of his country, and the earl of Morton was elected to the regency. Morton had always been directed in his meaſures by Elizabeth, and it was now determined to ſupport effectually the party at the head of which he was placed. Sir Henry Killigrew was accordingly ſent ambaſſador into Scotland, where he found the partizans of Mary ſo diſcouraged by the diſcovery of Norfolk's conſpiracy, that they were glad to ſubmit to the royal authority, and accept an indemnity for all paſt offences.

A. D. 1572. We muſt now direct our attention to the affairs on the continent, where, through the power of exceſſive bigotry, the kingdom of France became the theatre of cruelty hardly to be equalled in the moſt barbarous ages. The deceitful peace granted to the Hugonots was pregnant with horrors that ſhock humanity. Charles, the more effectually to lull the proteſtants into a fatal ſecurity, offered his ſiſter in marriage to the prince of Navarre, and great preparations were made for celebrating the nuptials with uncommon ſplendor. Deceived by theſe perfidious arts, the leaders of the Hugonots flocked to Paris to be ſpectators of a ceremony which they imagined would for ever put a period to the civil wars that had ſo long waſted their country. The queen of Navarre died ſuddenly ſoon after her arrival, not without the moſt violent ſuſpicion of poiſon; and Coligni, the high-admiral of France, was dangerouſly wounded by a baſe aſſaſſin as he was returning to his lodgings. Charles, however, by redoubling his diſſimulation, was ſtill able to retain the Hugonots in their fatal ſecurity. He viſited the admiral, expreſſed the greateſt concern for his misfortune, and promiſed to take the ſevereſt vengeance on the aſſaſſin, and all his abettors. The eve of St. Bartholomew was appointed for putting in execution this horrid ſcheme. The duke of Guiſe, who was at the head of this infernal enterprize, communicated the king's intention to the intendant of Paris, who ordered the captains of the different wards, to arm the citizens privately, and when the alarm was given, to place lights in their windows, break into the houſes of the Hugonots, and put them all to the ſword without diſtinction. About midnight, when the whole city was wrapt in darkneſs, and the unſuſpecting victims folded in the arms of ſleep, the fatal alarm was given, and the catholics began the horrid butchery. The hatred they had long bore to the proteſtants ſteeled their breaſts againſt the feelings of humanity, and all conditions, ages, and ſexes, ſuſpected of any propenſity to that religion, were involved in an undiſtinguiſhed ruin. The ſtreets of Paris flowed with blood, and the catholics, after all their deteſted victims were deſtroyed, exerciſed on their bodies all the rage of the moſt licentious brutality. They ſeemed to regret that the work of death was over. Above five hundred gentlemen of rank and fortune periſhed in this maſſacre; and near ten thouſand of inferior condition. Among the former were admiral Coligni, his ſon-in-law Teligni, Sobize, Rochefoucaut, Pardillon, Piles, and Lavardin; all perſons diſtinguiſhed by their births and talents, and whoſe only crime was their religion.

Nor was this inhuman execution ſufficient to ſatiſfy the brutality of the French miniſtry. Orders were immediately diſpatched to all the provinces for continuing the ſanguinary ſacrifice. The people emulated the fury of the capital, and the proteſtants in Meaux, Orleans, Trope, Bourges, Angers, Thoulouſe, Rouen, Lyons, and other cities, were butchered in the ſame inhuman manner. Even the young king of Navarre, and his couſin the prince of Conde, had been devoted to deſtruction by the duke of Guiſe; but Charles, hoping that theſe young princes might be eaſily converted to the catholic faith, determined to ſpare their lives, though he obliged them to purchaſe their ſafety by an apparent change of their religion.

When Charles came ſeriouſly to reflect on his barbarous conduct, and the inhuman maſſacre that had taken place in conſequence thereof, he ſeemed ſhocked with the thought, and endeavoured to conceal from the eyes of the world his barbarous perfidy. He pretended that a conſpiracy of the Hugonots againſt his perſon was ſuddenly diſcovered, and that the ſeverity they ſuffered flowed entirely from neceſſity. He wiſhed to bury in oblivion a tranſaction that is ſhocking at once to religion and humanity. Fenelon, the French ambaſſador at London, abhorred the treachery, and did not heſitate to expreſs his grief. He bluſhed, he ſaid, to bear the name of a Frenchman. Being, however, ordered to juſtify the court of France, he demanded an audience of Elizabeth. He repaired to court, which ſeemed plunged in the abyſs of ſorrow. An awful ſilence reigned through all the chambers of the royal apartment. The nobility, clad in deep mourning, were ranged on each ſide, and allowed him to paſs without interruption. Sorrow and indignation were painted in every countenance, and declared, in the ſtrongeſt language, the ſentiments of the Engliſh nation. The queen heard his apology with great coolneſs, and calmly anſwered, that ſuppoſing there had been a conſpiracy formed by the proteſtants, it was not neceſſary to have recourſe to ſuch cruel methods; that the ſame force that had murdered ſo many defenceleſs men, might eaſily have ſecured their perſons; and that by proceeding in a legal manner, diſtinctions might have been made between the guilty and the innocent; that Coligni, in particular, who was dangerouſly wounded, could not have fled from the juſtice of his prince; that cruel aſſaſſins were not the proper executors of juſtice; the ſword ſhould not be put into the hands of a ferocious multitude. She added, the future conduct of the king would more fully diſplay his real intentions; and that, in the mean time, ſhe ſhould proceed no farther than to lament the rigour with which he had treated his ſubjects. Elizabeth well knew the power of the Guiſes, and their attachment to the queen of Scotland. She was therefore unwilling to break with a court that was capable of giving her ſo much uneaſineſs.

Notwithſtanding, however, Elizabeth ſo cautiouſly avoided coming to extremities with Charles, whoſe union with the courts of Spain and Rome for the extermination of the proteſtants, gave her ſo much anxiety, ſhe afforded protection to all the unhappy fugitives, who, on receiving intelligence of the maſſacre of their brethren, fled into England; and when the French ambaſſador made a propoſal from his maſter, to have them delivered up as rebellious fugitives, ſhe plainly told him, that humanity would not ſuffer her to refuſe an aſylum to ſo many wretches, who were driven by the barbarity of their enemies to ſeek refuge in a foreign country.

Neither did ſhe neglect to take the neceſſary meaſures for her own defence. She prepared for that attack which ſeemed inevitable from the combined power and violence of the catholics. She fortified Portſmouth; augmented her fleet; exerciſed her militia; cultivated popularity with her ſubjects; diſcharged the ſums ſhe had borrowed; and paid the debts which her father and brother had contracted. By theſe prudent meaſures ſhe gained the love and eſteem of her people, who were willing to ſacrifice their lives and fortunes in her defence. The nobility and gentry offered to levy an army of twenty-two thouſand foot, and four thouſand horſe, tranſport them into France, and maintain them ſix months at their own expence, in order to aſſiſt the Hugonots to retaliate on their perfidious enemies the miſeries they had ſuffered.

The ſame principles which engaged Elizabeth to aſſiſt the Hugonots in France, pleaded ſtrongly in favour of the diſtreſſed proteſtants in the Low-Countries; but the great power of Philip rendered her more cautious in her proceedings. That monarch ſent an ambaſſador to London, with remonſtrances againſt the conduct of Elizabeth. He complained that many of the Flemiſh exiles, who infeſted the ſeas, and robbed his maſter's ſubjects, were protected in England, contrary to the treaties ſubſiſting between the two courts. Unwilling to engage in an open rupture with Spain, Elizabeth publiſhed a proclamation, commanding all the Flemings, ſuſpected of rebellion, to depart the kingdom. But this was far from anſwering the views of the Spaniards. Driven to deſpair, theſe wretched exiles undertook the moſt dangerous expedients. William Vandermark, a perſon of diſtinction in the Netherlands, having collected a conſiderable number of his countrymen, left England in the beginning of April, and made himſelf maſter of the Brill and Fluſhing. This ſucceſs raiſed the ſpirits of the Flemings; they flocked to his ſtandard, and before the end of the year he was joined by the greater part of the provinces of Holland and Zealand.

D. A. 1573. The dreadful maſſacre of the Hugonots in France was ſo far from extirpating thoſe perſecuted people, that they now became more powerful and violent than ever. The king of Navarre, and the prince of Conde, both retracted the abjuration that fear had extorted from them. Under theſe two chiefs the Hugonots were in a condition of revenging the blood of their brethren; and every thing again relapſed into confuſion. The catholics had, for ſome time, cloſely beſieged Rochelle, the bulwark of the proteſtants in France. The Hugonots made the moſt deſperate reſiſtance; and the duke of Anjou, (brother to the French king) who commanded the catholic army, loſt twenty-four thouſand men, without making any conſiderable progreſs in the ſiege. Anjou now perceived he had undertaken a taſk he was unable to perform, and ſincerely wiſhed that ſome incident might happen to preſerve his honor. Hi deſires were fulfilled. Advice arrived of his being elected king of Poland; and he immediately concluded a treaty with the inhabitants of Rochelle.

A. D. 1574. Charles, exaſperated at the miſcarriage of his brother, called aloud for new ſeveritie againſt the proteſtants; but before he could carry then into execution, he paid the debt of nature on the 30t of May, in the 25th year of his age, after having ren dered his name odious to all the world, and throw an eternal ſtain of infamy upon his country. H died without iſſue, and was ſucceeded by his brothe the duke of Anjou, who had lately been elected ſove reign of the Poliſh dominions.

Elizabeth was now greatly alarmed at the diſtur bances in Ireland, which raged with little leſs vio lence than thoſe on the continent, and from the ſam cauſe, namely, the enmity of the Roman Catholics the Proteſtants. The earl of Eſſex, an active youn nobleman, offered a propoſal to the queen, for pu ting an end to the troubles in that iſland. Elizabe accepted the offer; and it was agreed, that the e ſhould tranſport to Ireland 200 horſe, and 400 fo and maintain them there at his own expence; th the theſe forces ſhould act againſt the rebels for two years, the queen furniſhing the ſame number during that period; and that the earl ſhould receive the commiſſion of captain-general for ſeven years. In conſideration of this ſervice, the queen agreed to inveſt him with half the lordſhips of Clandeboy, Ferney, and other lands of a great extent, which he agreed to people with as many ſoldiers as the queen ſhould think proper to maintain on the other half of theſe lordſhips. The expence of maintaining the fortifications was to be equally divided between the queen and the earl. Eſſex was ſo fond of this command, which placed him on the footing of a prince, that he borrowed ten thouſand pounds of Elizabeth, upon a mortgage of his lands in Eſſex; and landed in Ireland about the latter end of Auguſt, accompanied by the lords Dacres and Rich, three ſons of the lord Norris, and many other gentlemen of diſtinction, who ſerved under him as volunteers. He met with almoſt every difficulty that could be expected from an attempt of this kind. The lord deputy Fitz-Williams, thinking the command of Eſſex an encroachment on his own authority, ſecretly favoured the rebels, and greatly increaſed the obſtacles that naturally oppoſed the execution of this deſign. The earl ſoon perceived that the reduction of the rebels, while clandeſtinely aſſiſted by the Engliſh, was a taſk beyond his power. He, however, exerted all his abilities, but in vain: he was obliged to return to England, after having ſpent the greater part of his fortune.

A. D. 1575. The war with the Hugonots in France was carried on with no leſs alacrity by Henry IV. than it had been by his brother Charles; but ſo formidable were thoſe people now grown, and ſo ſtrong was their oppoſition, that Henry found himſelf obliged to grant them a truce for ſix months, under the mediation of Elizabeth. This was the fifth pacification made with the Hugonots; but the terms were ſo diſgraceful to the crown of France, that the duke of Guiſe made no ſcruple to condemn openly the meaſures and maxims of his ſovereign. That old and daring leader embraced this opportunity of forming his party into a regular and conſiſtent body, and laid the foundation of that famous league, which, without paying any regard to the royal authority, aimed at the total extirpation of the Hugonots. Henry ſaw the conſequence, and laboured aſſiduouſly to adopt a new plan, by acting as arbitrator between the two parties, and, by balancing their power, to reduce both to a dependence upon himſelf. But all his attempts were rendered abortive. France was reduced to ſo wretched a condition by the former ſeverities of her princes, that toleration could be no longer practiſed; and an edict for liberty of conſcience, which would, probably, have ſatisfied the proteſtants, inflamed the catholics, and threatened the kingdom with anarchy.

A. D. 1576. William of Naſſau, prince of Orange, had exerted his utmoſt endeavours in ſupporting the confederacy of Holland and Zealand againſt the attempts of Lewis Zuniga, who, on the death of the duke of Alva, ſucceeded to the government of the Netherlands. But the prince of Orange finding it would be impoſſible to continue the oppoſition much longer without ſome foreign aſſiſtance, he ſent a deputation to Elizabeth, imploring her protection; and offering to acknowledge her for their ſovereign, if ſhe would engage in their defence. The queen rejected a ſovereignty which ſhe could not ſupport without carrying on the moſt dangerous wars; but promiſed to uſe all her influence in negotiations with Philip in their favour. An ambaſſador was accordingly diſpatched to the court of Spain; but Philip found means to evade a categorical anſwer, and the war continued to rage with as much violence as ever. An accident delivered the Hollanders, when they were driven to the very brink of deſtruction. Zuniga died ſuddenly; and the Spaniſh troops, diſcontented for want of pay, and licentious for want of a proper commander, broke out into the moſt dreadful mutiny. They ſacked and plundered the cities of Antwerp and Maeſtricht, and maſſacred ſeventeen thouſand perſons of all ages and ſexes; nor was there any poſſibility of preventing their dreadful outrages. They menaced all the cities of the Low Countries with the ſame fate. Alarmed at the deſtruction which awaited them, all the provinces, that of Luxembourg excepted, engaged in an aſſociation for their mutual defence; and diſpatched a deputation to the prince of Orange, imploring his protection, and requeſting that he would put himſelf at their head. Conferences were immediately opened at Ghent; and an union was formed between the provinces, called the Pacification of Ghent. By this treaty, which was ſigned on the eighth of November, the contracting parties declared, that they had entered into this union for the defence of the laws and liberties of their country, againſt the encroachments, oppreſſions and cruelties long exerciſed on them by the Spaniards. At the ſame time, they declared, that, notwithſtanding this treaty, they were ſtill willing to acknowledge the king of Spain's authority, provided he would govern them according to the antient laws. This union being formed, the fortreſſes which had been raiſed to keep the Netherlands in ſubjection were every where demoliſhed; and the nobility and clergy ſoon after aſſembled at Bruſſels, and took a ſolemn oath to obſerve inviolably the articles of the aſſociation. Philip was now reduced to the mortifying alternative of governing according to the laws eſtabliſhed by his predeceſſors, or content himſelf with the bare title of ſovereign, while the regal authority was exerciſed by others.

The troubles of Ireland ſtill continuing, the earl of Eſſex was ſent back to that kingdom, with the title of earl marſhal, in the room of Sir Nicholas Bagnal. But he ſoon perceived that, notwithſtanding his new dignity, he was little more than a private officer. He, however, exerted all his abilities to reduce that turbulent people to order, but without effect; and he died a few months after his arrival, not without ſuſpicion of being poiſoned by ſome of the creatures of the earl of Leiceſter, who was his declared enemy. What tended to give weight to this conjecture was, the impudent behaviour of Leiceſter himſelf, who, immediately after the death of Eſſex, divorced his own wife, and married the widow of that nobleman.

A. D. 1577. This year was opened with the ambitious projects of Don John of Auſtria, who had been made governor of the Netherlands. He was naturally of an aſpiring genius, and had rendered himſelf particularly famous for a glorious victory obtained over the Turks at Lepanto. Encouraged by the ſucceſs that had hitherto attended him, he now projected a ſcheme for rendering himſelf one of the moſt powerful princes in Europe. After reducing the revolted provinces of the Netherlands to obedience, he propoſed, by the aſſiſtance of the pope and the king of Spain, to land a powerful army in England, releaſe the queen of Scots, and carry into execution the bull fulminated at Rome, for dethroning Elizabeth.

The prince of Orange, being informed of Don John's deſign with regard to the Scottiſh princeſs, immediately imparted the ſecret to Elizabeth, who, fearing the conſequences of his ambition, no longer ſcrupled to aſſiſt the oppreſſed confederates, whoſe liberties ſeemed now to be materially connected with her own ſafety.

The meaſures purſued by Don John contributed daily to enlarge the breach already made between him and the ſtates; and Don John, not thinking himſelf ſafe in Bruſſels, ſeized the caſtle of Namur. This violent proceeding convinced the ſtates that they had nothing to expect from their new governor, and prepared to defend their liberties, which it was ſufficiently evident Don John intended to wreſt from them. They accordingly diſpatched the marquis of Hautree, and Adolphus Meetkirck, to Elizabeth, to vindicate their proceedings, and ſolicit a loan of an hundred thouſand pounds for eight months. Elizabeth very readily granted their requeſt, but inſiſted that certain towns of the Netherlands ſhould be bound for the payment. At the ſame time, ſhe entered into a treaty with them, whereby it was ſtipulated, That the queen ſhould furniſh them with five thouſand foot, and one thouſand horſe, to be paid by the Flemings, but commanded by an Engliſh general; that this commander ſhould have a ſeat in the council of the ſtates; that nothing ſhould be determined concerning war or peace, without previouſly imparting it either to the queen or to him; that they ſhould enter into no league without her conſent; that if any difference happened among themſelves, it ſhould be ſubmitted to her arbitration; and that if any prince, on any pretence whatever, ſhould attempt hoſtilities againſt her, they ſhould ſend to her aſſiſtance an army equal to that ſhe had employed in their ſervice.

As Elizabeth was unwilling to declare openly againſt Spain, ſhe ſent an ambaſſador to that court, where he preſented a memorial on the the twentieth of December, importing, that the queen by no means intended to break the antient alliance concluded with the houſe of Burgundy; that with this view ſhe had refuſed the ſovereignty of Holland and Zealand, when offered her; had adviſed the prince of Orange to return to his allegiance, and even threatened him with her diſpleaſure in caſe of refuſal. She added, that ſhe would ſtill continue in the ſame friendly intentions, and exert all her intereſt to compromiſe the preſent differences, provided Don John, whom ſhe could not but regard as her mortal enemy, was recalled, ſome other prince, more popular, ſubſtituted in his place, the Spaniſh forces withdrawn, and the Flemings reſtored to their antient liberties. If theſe conditions were accepted, the queen promiſed, if the Flemings ſtill continued obſtinate, to join her arms to thoſe of the king of Spain, and force them to a compliance. Philip, who was far from being pleaſed with the interpoſition of the queen, gave an evaſive anſwer, but ſtill continued to furniſh Don John with troops and money.

A. D. 1578. The great aſſiſtance given by Philip to Don John ſo animated that enterpriſing and ambitious governor, that inſtead of liſtening to any lenient propoſition, he was determined to proſecute the war with the utmoſt vigour. He was joined by the prince of Parma one of the beſt ſoldiers of that or any other age, and received prodigious ſupplies of men and money both from Italy and Spain. But notwithſtanding his power daily increaſed, the prince of Orange found means to prevail on the cities of Amſterdam, Haerlem and Utretch to declare in his favour.

Alarmed at this acquiſition, the court of Spain offered to recall Don John, and to ſubſtitute in his room either the prince of Parma, the archduke Ferdinand, or even the archduke Matthias, provided the ſtates would return to their duty. The offer was refuſed, and the operations of war were continued with the utmoſt fury. Don John knew that the army of the ſtates lay in a ſtrong camp at Rimenant, and that they expected a ſtrong reinforcement of French troops, under the command of the duke of Anjou; and that prince Caſſimir was advancing to join them, with a German army in the pay of the ſtates. He therefore propoſed, in a council of war, to attack the enemy before they were joined by their reinforcements. This motion was ſtrongly oppoſed by the prince of Parma; but his reaſons were not thought ſufficient, and it was reſolved to attack the confederate army. The battle was fought with amazing perſeverance, and the Engliſh and Scotch auxiliaries diſtinguiſhed themſelves in a very particular manner: they oppoſed the whole Spaniſh forces; and had it not been for the amazing genius of the prince of Parma, the army of Don John muſt have been totally routed.

The Spaniſh monarch was now convinced that he had every thing to fear from the power of Elizabeth. He ſaw that the invaſion of England, projected by Don John, was at a great diſtance; and therefore entered into a freſh negotiation with the pope, for raiſing troubles againſt Elizabeth in Ireland. One Steukley, a native of England, whom the pope had created marquis of Leinſter, was engaged to command the expedition, and alſo to attempt to deſtroy the royal navy of England. As Philip was deſirous of concealing his being concerned in this attempt, it was agreed that it ſhould be made in the name of his holineſs; and that his natural ſon, James Boncampagni, ſhould be declared king of Ireland. Steukley, on his arrival in the Tagus, was prevailed upon to accompany Don Sebaſtian, king of Portugal, in making a deſcent in Africa againſt the Moors. This put a final period to the expedition. Steukley and his whole detatchment were cut to peices, and Don Sebaſtian himſelf fell by the ſwords of the infidels. A few of the Spaniſh and Italian troops, who purſued their courſe when Steukley entered the Tagus, landed in Ireland, and animated the Iriſh, who were then zealous catholics, though a barbarous people, to continue in rebellion to the Engliſh. But the enterprize had no ſucceſs: the foreign troops were cut in pieces, and about 2500 of the Iriſh were put to death by order of government.

A. D. 1579. We muſt now turn our attention to the affairs of Scotland. That kingdom had hitherto been retained in ſtrict alliance with Elizabeth, by the influence of Morton the regent. But among a people regardleſs of laws, and agitated by religious controverſies, it could not be expected that the authority of a regent could be long ſupported. Factions were formed among the nobility, who were diſguſted with Morton's avarice; while the clergy, whoſe narrow revenues were ſtill farther invaded, joined the diſcontented party, and encreaſed the confuſion. Alarmed at his dangerous ſituation, and oppreſſed with the increaſing weight of government, the regent dropped ſome peviſh expreſſions, implying a deſire of being relieved from the care of conducting the adminiſtration. This conceſſion, whether real or pretended, was readily ſeized by the oppoſite party, and he was diſmiſſed from the regency. Morton, who flattered himſelf that a general pardon, which was now paſſed, would render abortive all the deſigns of his enemies, reſigned his authority into the hands of the young king, who was then only eleven years of age. James determined to hold himſelf the reins of government, and conduct, in his own name, the adminiſtration of the affairs of the kingdom. The regent ſeemed at firſt determined never more to engage in the buſy ſcenes of active life; but ſeek in domeſtic affairs that tranquillity which was not to be found in the hurry of a court, and amidſt the contentions of turbulent parties. But either his ambition would not ſuffer him to continue in the ſhades of obſcurity, or he did not find in retirement that tranquillity he expected, for he returned again to court, acquired the aſcendant in the council, and directed as before all the affairs of the adminiſtration, but without reſuming the title of regent. The oppoſite party ſaw their danger, and flew to arms, under pretence of reſcuing their prince from captivity. Both parties endeavoured to gain the protection of Elizabeth; but that of Morton prevailed, and he was ſuffered to continue at the head of adminiſtration.

The party formed againſt Morton were ſupported by the duke of Guiſe, who ſent over the count d'Aubigney, a deſcendant of the houſe of Lenox, and couſin-german to the young king's father, to detach that prince from the Engliſh intereſt. D'Aubigney was poſſeſſed of all the talents neceſſary for effecting the projected deſign. He had been educated in France, was poſſeſſed of an inſinuating addreſs, and of a pleaſing diſpoſition. Guiſe was not miſtaken. D'Aubigney ſoon gained the affections of the young monarch: and joining his intereſts with James Stuart, of the houſe of Ochiltree, a young man of great parts, but of the moſt profligate manners, who was already in great favour with the king, he inſtilled into the tender mind of James principles of politics and government very different from thoſe in which he had been educated. He painted, in ſuch glaring colours, the great injuſtice of depoſing his mother, and detaining her a priſoner in England, that James was greatly affected at her ſufferings, and wiſhed either to reſign the adminiſtration into her hands, or aſſociate her with him in the government.

Elizabeth, alarmed at the great progreſs daily made by this party in Scotland, diſpatched Sir Robert Bowes to Stirling, where James then reſided, to warn the king of the danger that would inevitably enſue, if he continued to liſten to the falſe ſuggeſtions of d'Aubigney, now created earl of Lenox. The young prince, deſirous of preventing Elizabeth from aſſiſting the party of Morton, ſent excuſes to the court of London; but Lenox, perceiving that the Engliſh princeſs was determined to ruin him, reſolved, if poſſible, to overturn the Scottiſh government, as the only expedient that remained to ſupport his intereſt. Morton was conſidered as the head of the oppoſite party, and his ruin was therefore neceſſary. He was accordingly arreſted at the council board, committed to priſon, accuſed of being an accomplice in the late king's murder, and condemned to ſuffer as a traitor. He confeſſed upon his trial that he was not ignorant of Bothwell's deſign, but denied his having ever given his conſent to that attrocious act. He added, that he ſhould have revealed it either to Henry or Mary, had not the danger to which he muſt have been expoſed, deterred him from purſuing his deſign; Henry poſſeſſing neither reſolution nor conſtancy, and Mary appearing to him to be an accomplice in the crime. Great intereſt was made in behalf of Morton. The queen diſpatched Sir Thomas Randolph into Scotland, and that ambaſſador exerted all his influence in favour of the late regent. He even engaged the earls of Argyle, Montroſe, Angus, Mar, and Glencarne, to enter into a confederacy for protecting, even by force of arms, the life of the priſoner. At the ſame time, an Engliſh army moved towards the frontiers of Scotland, to give weight to the interceſſions of the ambaſſador. The French party ſaw the danger of delaying the execution of the ſentence, and Morton finiſhed his life upon the ſcaffold. He died with the ſame conſtancy and reſolution he had always diſplayed in every action of his life; and had his probity and virtue been equal to his abilities, he might have been conſidered as one of the moſt accompliſhed ſtateſmen of the age.

A. D. 1580. In the beginning of this year Sir Francis Drake (the firſt Engliſh circum-navigator) returned from his voyage round the world. This intrepid ſeaman was a native of Devonſhire, and introduced at court by the vice-chamberlain Hatton, on his propoſing to paſs into the South Seas through the ſtreights of Magellan, a voyage till that time unattempted by the Engliſh. Drake's fleet conſiſted only of the five following veſſels, namely, the Pelican, of an hundred tons, commanded by himſelf; the Elizabeth of eighty tons, under captain John Winter; the Marygold, a bark of thirty-tons, commanded by captain John Thomas; the Swan, a fly-boat of thirty tons, under captain John Cheſter; and the Chriſtopher, a pinnace of fifteen tons, under captain Thomas Moon. On board this ſmall ſquadron were embarked one hundred and ſixty-four men, and the gallant admiral ſailed on a voyage, which, with ſuch ſmall ſhips, would, even in our times, be conſidered as a very raſh undertaking. He ſoon found that his veſſels were too ſmall for the tempeſtuous ſeas near the ſtreights of Magellan, and entered the pacific ocean with only his own ſhip. During his cruiſes in the South-ſea, he took a prodigious booty from the Spaniards, who expected no enemy in that diſtant part of the world. He ſacked and plundered the town of Arica, and in one ſhip took four hundred pounds weight of Baldivian gold. Hardly any oppoſition was made by the Spaniards; Drake eaſily loaded the Pelican with gold, ſilver and precious ſtones. But he ſoon after learned that the vice-roy of Peru had fitted two large ſhips, and ſent them to cruize near the ſtreights of Magellan, in order to intercept him in his return. A new paſſage was therefore to be attempted, as he was in no condition to fight the two Spaniſh ſhips fitted out to intercept him. He firſt endeavoured to find a paſſage by the north of California; but failing in that enterprize, he ſailed for the Eaſt Indies, and returned ſafely by the Cape of Good Hope.

The return of Drake animated the Engliſh, who were now deſirous of ſharing in the riches of South America; and his name became celebrated on account of his bold and fortunate attempt. It was, however, apprehended that this attack upon the Spaniſh territories in South America, would occaſion an open war with Spain, an event which it was thought ſhould, if poſſible, be avoided at this juncture. It was therefore moved in the council, that the queen ſhould diſown the enterprize, puniſh Drake, and reſtore the treaſure. But Elizabeth rejected the propoſal; ſhe loved valour, and determined to protect that intrepid ſeaman, againſt all the machinations of his enemies. She accepted a banquet from him on board the ſhip which had performed ſo memorable a voyage, and conferred on the commander the honour of knighthood. The Spaniſh ambaſſador did not fail to make complaints againſt what he called the piracies of Drake. But he was told by Elizabeth, that no treaty with his catholic majeſty excluded her ſubjects from trading in the South Seas; that ſhe could not conſider all South America as the property of the king of Spain, as he held it by no better title than a donation from the biſhop of Rome, who having no right over thoſe countries himſelf, could convey none to another, and whoſe authority both in temporal and civil matters ſhe diſowned. She added, that the inſignificant ceremonies practiſed by the Spaniards in taking poſſeſſion of ſuch immenſe tracts of land in America, ſhould never preclude her from ſending colonies thither, nor would ſhe even ſubmit to ſuffer the ocean to be claimed as the property of any prince or perſon. She, however, ordered part of the treaſure to be reſtored to Pedro Sebrura, a Spaniard, who pretended to be an agent from the merchants whoſe effects Drake had ſeized; but underſtanding afterwards that Philip had ſequeſtered the money, ſhe refuſed to make any farther reſtitution.

A. D. 1581. On the 6th of January the parliament met at Weſtminſter, when a ſupply was granted to the queen of one ſubſidy and two fifteenths. Several laws were made for the ſecurity of the government, but chiefly againſt the attempts of the catholics, who had occaſioned many diſturbances. In one of theſe laſt it was enacted, that whoever reconciled any perſon to the church of Rome, or was himſelf reconciled, ſhould be guilty of treaſon: to ſay maſs was ſubject to the penalty of a year's impriſonment, and a fine of two hundred marks: whoever abſented himſelf during a whole month from the ſervice of the church, was ſubjected to a fine of twenty pounds. The uttering ſlanderous or ſeditious words againſt the queen, was puniſhable, for the firſt offence, with the pillory and loſs of ears; the ſecond offence was declared felony. The writing or printing ſuch words, was felony, even for the firſt offence.

A treaty of marriage between the duke of Anjou and Elizabeth had been for ſome time negotiating, and a reſolution was now taken on the part of the former to finiſh it. The duke had long been convinced that political reaſons alone would never be ſufficient to anſwer the intended purpoſe; and he accordingly ſent over Simier, an agent of his own, to act in conjunction with his brother's ambaſſador. He could not have ſent a perſon more likely to anſwer his purpoſe. He was artful and intriguing, of inſinuating addreſs and agreeable converſation. Inſtead of entering into the ſerious reaſons of political intereſt, he entertained the queen with the topics of paſſion and gallantry. Elizabeth liſtened to his diſcourſe, and Simier ſoon inſinuated himſelf ſo firmly into the queen's favour, that he obtained a more ready acceſs to her perſon, than even the moſt favoured miniſters of ſtate. Leiceſter, who had laughed at every preceding treaty of marriage, was now ſufficiently alarmed; he feared that the queen was at laſt caught in her own ſnare, and that the young Frenchman had really engaged her affections. He was acquainted with the arts of Simier, and exerted all his power to render him odious; he even took advantage of the credulity of the times, and ſpread reports, that Simier had gained an aſcendancy over the queen, not by any natural principles of her conſtitution, but by love potions and incantations. Simier was exaſperated at theſe unmanly proceedings, and determined to ruin the credit of Leiceſter. He accordingly revealed to the queen a ſecret which none of her courtiers dared to diſcover; namely, the marriage of Leiceſter with the widow of the late earl of Eſſex, which that nobleman had hitherto carefully concealed from Elizabeth. This diſcovery anſwered the purpoſe of Simier; the queen was ſo provoked at the action, that ſhe threatened to ſend Leiceſter a priſoner to the Tower, and to prevent the effects of his reſentment, took the Frenchman under her own protection.

The duke of Anjou, encouraged by the accounts he received from his agent, and deſirous of finiſhing a treaty pregnant with the moſt conſpicuous advantages, determined to paſs over into England, and ſolicit his ſuit in perſon. He accordingly landed at Dover, and ſecretly viſited the queen at Greenwich. Anjou had no reaſon to be diſpleaſed with his viſit; he loſt no ground in being perſonally known to Elizabeth. For ſoon after his departure ſhe commanded Burleigh, now lord treaſurer, Suſſex, Leiceſter, Bedford, Lincoln, Hatton, and ſecretary Walſingham, to concert with the French ambaſſadors the terms of the intended treaty. And as Henry, who was deſirous of freeing France from the reſtleſs ambition of the duke of Anjou, had given his plenipotentiaries almoſt unlimited powers to agree to all the demands of the court of England, the conditions of the treaty were ſoon ſettled, and the inſtrument ready for the royal ſignet. It was agreed, that the marriage ſhould be celebrated within ſix weeks after the ratification of the articles; that the duke and his retinue ſhould enjoy the free exerciſe of their religion; that after the marriage was ſolemnized, the duke of Anjou ſhould enjoy the title of king, but that the management of affairs ſhould continue ſolely in Elizabeth; that their children, male or female, ſhould ſucceed to the crown of England; that if there ſhould be two males, the eldeſt, in caſe of Henry's death, without iſſue, ſhould be king of France, and the younger of England; that if there ſhould be one male only, and he ſhould ſucceed to both the crowns of France and England, he ſhould be obliged to reſide eight months every two years in the latter kingdom; that the laws and cuſtoms of England ſhould be obſerved inviolate; and that no foreigner ſhould be promoted by the duke to any office in England.

Notwithſtanding theſe articles were very favourable to the Engliſh, and though there was little probability that Elizabeth, who was then in her fortieth year, ſhould have any children by the duke of Anjou, yet the treaty ſpread an alarm through the whole kingdom. It was ſtrenuouſly oppoſed by all her favourite miniſters, and the queen herſelf, as a proof of her remaining uncertainty, added a clauſe, by which it was declared, that ſhe was not bound to complete the marriage till farther articles, not ſpecified in the treaty, ſhould be agreed on between the parties, and till the king of France ſhould be certified of thei agreement. Walſingham was diſpatched to Paris, in order to form the cloſeſt connection with Henry, and enter into a league offenſive, and defenſive, againſt the encreaſing power and dangerous uſurpation of the Spaniſh monarch.

Walſingham purſued his inſtructions with the utmoſt aſſiduity; but had the mortification to perceiv that the reſolutions of Elizabeth were fluctuating an unſettled. Sometimes he received orders to purſu the negotiation for completing the marriage, preferable to that of the league; and at others ſhe declared for the league in preference to the marriag The miniſter was aſtoniſhed at this inconſiſtent conduct in the queen, and the whole privy-council wer doubtful what would be the reſult of this conteſt between inclination and reaſon, love and ambition.

In the mean time the duke of Anjou exerted h utmoſt abilities in defence of the Low Countries; b he was now ſo greatly diſtreſſed for want of mone that he had been obliged to put his army into ca tonments. This inability of the duke alarmed t confederates. The prince of Orange ſaw the artf web of policy he had been weaving ſo many yea ready to be cut to pieces by the ſword of the prin of Parma: his laſt effort was to perſuade the ſta to throw off even their nominal obedience to t crown of Spain. Accordingly, in an aſſembly of t confederates at Antwerp, he repreſented the neceſſ they were under of either ſubmitting to the ter preſcribed by the Spaniards, or of ſhaking from th necks the yoke of a tyrannical and perfidious maſt by diſclaiming his authority, and uniting under t duke of Anjou, who had already been declared p tector of their liberties. He obſerved, that as marriage of the duke with the queen of England on the point of being concluded, there was all reaſon in the world to imagine that Elizabeth wo look upon his quarrel as her own; that all the r of good policy engaged his brother, the king France, to ſupport him in his new acquired dign and that Hainault and Artois, together with Fre Flanders, which was now returned to the Spa yoke, would then undoubtedly follow the exampl the other ſtates, and join in the confederacy. T reaſons, however powerful, did not appear ſuffic to induce the ſtates to embrace the offer immedia they did not think the provocations they had received from the king of Spain could diſſolve the allegiance they owed their ſovereign. But the imprudent conduct of Philip effected what their leader attempted in vain. He proſcribed the prince of Orange, and ſet a price of twenty-five thouſand crowns upon his head. Exaſperated at this tyrannical action, the ſtates immediately aſſembled and declared, by proclamation, that Philip, king of Spain, had forfeited the ſovereignty of the Low Countries, by violating, contrary to his oath, the privileges of the people; "That therefore the provinces, in conſequence of the permiſſion given them by Philip himſelf, when they recognized him to be prince of Flanders, and before they owed him any allegiance, voluntarily, and of their own proper motion, had choſen for their prince Philip Valois, duke of Anjou, and brother to the king of France."

In conſequence of this reſolution taken by the tates, a formal deputation was ſent to the duke, in- iting him to come and take poſſeſſion of the princi- ality of the Low Countries; but before this could e effected, ſome very alarming difficulties were to e overcome. The active prince of Parma had, ith incredible expedition, marched his army towards rench Flanders, the provinces where the duke's hief intereſt lay, and ſat down before the city of Cambra. Anjou immediately advanced to raiſe the iege, at the head of a well-diſciplined army of twen- y thouſand men. Parma puſhed the ſiege with reat violence; but not being able to make himſelf aſter of the place before the duke's arrival, he was bliged to abandon the undertaking, and retreat with me precipitation, his forces conſiſting only of five ouſand foot and two thouſand horſe. Soon after, ompone de Bellievre arrived in the prince of Par- a's camp, with letters from the king of France, owning and diſclaiming the duke's behaviour, and ffering a ceſſation of arms till every thing could be ccommodated in a friendly manner. But the prince Parma treated this as a mere artifice; and, upon s retreat, the duke of Anjou drove the Spaniards t of the Cambreſis. His ſucceſs was not, how- er, ſufficient to ſupport his army; money was anting; and unleſs a very conſiderable ſum could procured, all his conqueſts were in danger of re- rting again to the enemy. The moſt preſſing ap- ications were made to Elizabeth, and ſhe remitted e duke an hundred thouſand crowns; with which, d the aſſiſtance he received from his brother and e queen dowager, he levied a new army, and took e field againſt the prince of Parma. But the cam- ign being now greatly advanced, he, after ſeveral cceſsful ſkirmiſhes with the Spaniſh forces, put his my into winter quarters, and determined to paſs er into England, in order to proſecute his ſuit to e queen.

Accordingly, about the middle of November, he ded at Dover, and proceeding immediately to ndon, was received by Elizabeth with the greateſt gnificence and affection. Every action betrayed r tenderneſs; and ſhe appeared, at laſt, indiffe- t about concealing it. The truth is, ſhe ſeems to have known how far either ambition or affec- n would carry her; and notwithſtanding all her dence, to have been deceived by both. In the dſt of the pomp which attended the anniverſary of r coronation, ſhe was ſeen, after a long and inti- te diſcourſe with him, to take a ring from her own ger, and put it upon his. This unguarded action s conſtrued into an abſolute promiſe of marriage all the ſpectators, and that ſhe was deſirous of ifying her intentions to all the world. Expreſſes e immediately ſent to every part of the kingdom, well as to all the courts of Europe. Perhaps Elizabeth, in that critical moment, when ſhe ſeemed diſſolved in ſoftneſs, was ignorant that ambition would evermore gain the aſcendancy in her ſoul. But ſhe no ſooner reflected on the conſequences that might poſſibly reſult from ſuffering the ſofter paſſions to prevail, than ſhe ſhuddered at the precipitate ſtep ſhe was going to take; a ſtep by which, perhaps, ſhe was to loſe all the glories her wiſdom, her courage, and her perſeverance, crowned with perpetual ſucceſs, could impart. She was ready to divide her power, by which all England was obedient to her nod, and all Europe in terror of her frown, with a young man of untried temper, of foreign education, and of a different religion. She was to hear the diſcontents, the reproaches, nay, perhaps, the curſes of her ſubjects, who, by this marriage, dreaded to ſee the fair and flouriſhing fabric of their religion, reared by the toil of princes, and cemented by the blood of martyrs, ſink into ruins. She reflected with horror on her ſiſter's miſery, who, in the decline of life, married a catholic prince much younger than herſelf; and ſhe began already to imagine that ſhe ſaw a total alteration in the laws and government of her kingdom.

Agitated by theſe reflections, the queen paſſed ſeveral nights in great anxiety without ſleep or repoſe. At the ſame time her moſt favourite courtiers diſcovered an extreme averſion to the marriage; and even the ladies of her bed-chamber made no ſcruple of oppoſing her reſolution with the moſt zealous remonſtrances. At laſt, her ſettled habits of prudence and ambition prevailed over her temporary inclination; and ſending for the duke of Anjou, ſhe had a long converſation with him in private, where ſhe was ſuppoſed to have made him apologies for breaking her former engagements. But, however that be, he expreſſed great diſguſt at leaving her; threw away the ring ſhe had given him; and uttered many curſes on the mutability of women in general, and of Iſlanders in particular.

A ſhort time after this, the duke of Anjou returned to the Low Countries; but wanting to make himſelf maſter of their forts, he was driven away as a traitor and oppreſſor, and obliged to return to France, where he died. The diſtracted ſtate of the French monarchy prevented the queen from feeling any effects of that reſentment ſhe had reaſon to dread from the affront ſo wantonly put upon that royal family. The blind tenderneſs of Elizabeth for a man more worthy of hatred than of love, can only be accounted for by the weakneſs of the human heart, which frequently ſuffers genius and merit to be impoſed on by incapacity and unworthineſs.

A. D. 1582. During theſe tranſactions the troubles in Scotland continued to rage with the moſt unremitting violence. The death of Morton, and the influence of the earl of Lenox, and James Stuart, now earl of Arran, alarmed the enthuſiaſtic preachers. A faſt was appointed to be held all over the kingdom, when the pulpits reſounded with declamations againſt the king's preſent counſellors. A conſpiracy of the nobility was formed for ſeizing the perſon of James, who was then at Ruthven, a ſeat belonging to the earl of Gowry. The utmoſt ſecrecy was obſerved; and the council not having the leaſt intimation of the conſpirators deſigns, the attempt ſucceeded without any oppoſition. The earls of Gowry and Mar, the lords Lindſey and Boyd, the maſter of Glamis and Oliphant, the abbots of Dunfermling, Plaiſey and Cambuſkenneth, were the principal leaders in this enterprize. James wept when he found himſelf deprived of his liberty. "No matter for his tears, (ſaid one of the conſpirators) better that boys ſhould weep than bearded men." James was deeply affected, and could never be prevailed upon to forgive the expreſſion. He, however, prudently ſubmitted to the preſent neceſſity, and ſtifled his reſentment. He agreed to iſſue writs for calling an aſſembly of the church and a convention of the ſtates, in order to exculpate the aſſociated lords from the crime of treaſon, and ratify their enterprize. Though the eccleſiaſtical aſſembly had no right to meddle with civil matters, yet on this occaſion they uſurped an authority they never enjoyed, and declared that the late attempt was agreeable to all that feared God, or deſired to preſerve the perſon of the king, and the proſperity of the realm. They even threatned every perſon who ſhould dare to oppoſe the authority of the confederated lords with the ſevereſt eccleſiaſtical cenſures. The convention ratified theſe proceedings, and declared the attempts of the aſſociates a lawful act. The earl of Lenox, unwilling to excite a civil war in the heart of his country, retired into France, where he ſoon after died. The earl of Arran was confined a priſoner in his own houſe; and Elizabeth (who it is ſuppoſed countenanced the conſpiracy) ſent ambaſſadors to compliment the captive king on his delivery from ſuch pernicious counſellors.

A. D. 1583. Mary no ſooner heard of her ſon's detention, than ſhe immediately wrote a pathetic and ſpirited letter to Elizabeth, craving the aſſiſtance of that princeſs, both for his and her own liberty. She ſaid, that the account of the prince's captivity had excited her moſt tender concern; and the experience which ſhe herſelf, during ſo many years, had acquired of the extreme unhappineſs attending ſuch a ſituation, had rendered her more apprehenſive that a ſimilar fate ſhould attend her unfortunate offſpring. She concluded by entreating Elizabeth to reſume her natural diſpoſition and to reflect on the ſupport as well as comfort which ſhe might receive from her ſon and herſelf, if, joining the obligations of gratitude to the ties of blood, ſhe would deign to raiſe them from their preſent melancholy ſituation, and reinſtate them in that liberty and authority to which they were intitled.

Though Elizabeth was ſenſibly affected with Mary's letter, yet political motives prevented her from paying any attention to its contents. She was apprehenſive of the conſequences, and the hopes of Mary once more vaniſhed. In the mean time James, impatient of reſtraint, made his eſcape from his keepers; and going to St. Andrew's, ſummoned his friends and partiſans to attend him. The confederated lords perceiving that all the oppoſition they could make would be in vain, laid aſide any farther thoughts of attempting to recover their authority: ſome of them accepted a pardon, which was offered them on their ſubmiſſion, while others took ſhelter in England and Ireland; and the earl of Arran, a man without either manners or moderation, was placed at the head of affairs, and engaged the chief attention and confidence of the young monarch.

In the beginning of the following year 1584, James, who had now ſhook off that natural puſillanimity to which he was ſubject, ſummoned a parliament, and cauſed an act to be paſſed for preventing the clergy from ſowing the ſeeds of ſedition from the pulpit. It was declared, that no clergyman ſhould, for the future, preſume to blacken the character of the king, or his miniſters, in their ſermons, or cenſure the affairs of government. This highly provoked the enthuſiaſtical preachers: they ſaid, that the king himſelf was a papiſt in his heart, and beſtowed the moſt degrading epithets on his friends and favorites. But all their attempts would, probably, have been rendered abortive, had not the violent conduct of the earl of Arran engaged the people to ſupport them. Gowry, notwithſtanding the late pardon, was tried, and executed; and many innocent perſons ſuffered from the tyranny of that favourite. The baniſhed noblemen were perſuaded that they had now an opportunity of recovering their honours and eſtates: they made the attempt, and were ſucceſsful. Arran was degraded from his authority, deprived of the eſtate and title he had uſurped, and the whole country ſeemed to have obtained that tranquillity to which they had long been ſtrangers.

While theſe things were tranſacting in Scotland, the Engliſh were frequently alarmed by the practices of the diſcontented party. All the prudence o Elizabeth could not ſecure her from conſpiracies. The zeal of the papiſts grew ſtronger by reſtraint. A great number of letters were diſpatched, containing the moſt earneſt exhortations to ſeveral ladie more immediately concerned about the perſon o Elizabeth, to imitate the example of Judith, and pu a period to the life of a princeſs anathematized b the holy father. At the ſame time, aſſuring them that they would be powerfully protected by the pope the king, and the duke of Guiſe, who had forme an aſſociation for reſtoring the catholic religion i England, and extirpating the proteſtants. The letters appeared to have been written by one Franc Throgmorton, a young man of family and exceller parts; who being apprehended, and brought befo the council, abſolutely denied the accuſation: b on being ſhewn two liſts, one of all the ports in England favourable for landing an army, and the oth of all the gentlemen who favoured the Romiſh rel gion, and were well diſpoſed to aſſiſt in an invaſio he retracted his denial, and made the following co feſſion: “ That going, ſome few years ſince, to t German Spa, he contracted an intimacy with Jen and Sir Francis Inglefield, two Engliſh fugitive that their conferences generally turned on the b means of invading England; and that they deliver him the two liſts above mentioned: that after return, Morgan, another fugitive in France, t him the catholic princes had formed a deſign to fr the queen of Scots from her confinement, and t the care of executing the attempt would be co mitted to the duke of Guiſe: that nothing was wa ing but to know what aſſiſtance might be depend upon from the Engliſh catholics: that in order to fo their meaſures on more certain information, Cha Paget, under the name of Mope, was ſent into S ſex, where the duke of Guiſe intended to land forces: that he (Throgmorton) himſelf had impar the project to the Spaniſh ambaſſador, who, found, had been already intruſted with the ſec and ſhewed him a copy of the liſt of the ports wh the troops might be landed: that he alſo acquain the ambaſſador with the names of the nobility whom he might ſafely open his mind, in order to p mote the deſign; and that conferences had actu been held on the beſt method of raiſing troop England to join the foreign forces on their landi Throgmorton was immediately ſent to priſon, being ſoon after tried and convicted of treaſon, with ſeveral of his acomplices, executed at Tybu

A. D. 1585. In the beginning of this yea moſt horrid conſpiracy was diſcovered to have b projected againſt the life of Elizabeth. Wil Parry, a bigotted catholic, after having received queen's pardon for a capital offence, retired Italy, where he openly profeſſed his religion, w he had concealed while he continued in Engl Happening to contract an intimacy with one Pal a jeſuit, he too readily liſtened to the deteſtable trine of that order, and was perſuaded that he c not do a more acceptable or meritorious action that of taking away the life of his ſovereign and nefactor. The Dutch Ambaſsadors imploring the Protection of QUEEN ELIZABETH all his doubts, and approved extremely of his intended undertaking. Parry accordingly retired to Paris, whence he propoſed to paſs over into England, in order to execute his bloody deſign. Remorſe, however, ſtaggered his reſolution; it is not ſometimes even in the power of fanaticiſm to ſilence the remonſtrances of conſcience. He was deſirous of trying every method in his power to ſoften the perſecutions carried on againſt the catholics, before he proceeded to extremities. His ſoul ſhuddered at the complicated horror he was going to commit. He found means of being introduced to the queen; aſſured her that many conſpiracies were formed againſt her life; and exhorted her, as the only means of rendering the attempts abortive, to allow the catholics a little more indulgence in the exerciſe of their religion. Finding all his attempts were, in vain, he determined to execute his bloody deſign, and imparted his intention to Nevil, next heir to the Weſtmoreland family, who readily approving of the infernal project, meaſures were immediately taken for carrying it into execution. But while they were waiting for a favourable opportunity, the earl of Weſtmoreland died; and Nevil, hoping to recover the honours and eſtates of that noble family, revealed the whole to the queen. In conſequence of this Parry was ſeized and impriſoned; a few days after which he was tried at Weſtminſter, when he confeſſed the fact, and being found guilty of treaſon, was condemned to be hanged, which ſentence was executed in Palace-yard Weſtminſter, during the ſitting of parliament.

During theſe tranſactions in England, the prince of Orange was aſſaſſinated by one Baltazar Gerard, a native of Burgundy, who executed the bloody deed with the moſt conſummate intrepidity. He ſacrificed his own life, in order to deſtroy the famous reſtorer and protector of religious liberty. This event ſpread a general conſternation through the Netherlands, where the people conſidered that prince as their father, and where the prince of Parma had made an alarming progreſs in re-eſtabliſhing the authority of Philip.

In this deplorable ſituation the ſtates offered the ſovereignty of their country to the king of France; but the preſent condition of that monarchy obliged him to reject ſo advantageous an offer. Thus diſappointed, the ſtates ſent over a ſolemn embaſſy to Elizabeth, imploring the queen to take them under her protection. The buſineſs was of a delicate nature; and the council were divided in opinion, whether they ſhould accept or reject the offer. Some conſidered the Flemings as rebels, whoſe revolt could not be countenanced without injuſtice, and whoſe propoſals, if they were accepted, would expoſe the kingdom to dangers, to which they would bring no adequate advantage. Others repreſented the unbounded ambition of the king of Spain, his tyranny over the Low Countries, his implacable hatred to Elizabeth, as ſufficient motives for accepting the offer. It was ſaid, that the acquiſition of the provinces, and the efforts of a brave people groaning under the weight of lawleſs power, would leſſen the danger by multiplying reſources. The queen, always leſs enterprizing than circumſpect, thought proper to adopt the medium. She declined the ſovereignty, that ſhe might avoid the reproach of being a uſurper; but ſhe entered into a treaty, offenſive and defenſive, with the ſtates, whereby ſhe engaged to ſend them ſix thouſand men, and maintain them during the war: that the general, and two others whom ſhe ſhould appoint, ſhould be admitted into the council of the ſtates; that neither party ſhould make peace without the conſent of the other; that her expences ſhould be refunded at the concluſion of the war; and that the towns of Fluſhing and Brille, with the caſtle of Rammekins, ſhould be immediately put into her hands, by way of ſecurity.

Elizabeth was not inſenſible that theſe proceedings would immediately occaſion a rupture with Spain; but ſhe was far from being terrified at the ambitious power of Philip. The great ſucceſs he had acquired, and the increaſe of his naval power, were not ſufficient to deter her from ſuccouring a people diſtreſſed, and ſupporting the liberties of a country threatened with the moſt arbitrary deſpotiſm. The earl of Leiceſter, who was appointed to command the Engliſh forces, embarked on the 23d of October, attended by ſeveral of the principal nobility, and a ſelect company of 500 gentlemen. On his arrival at Fluſhing, he was met by his nephew Sir Philip Sidney, governor of that place; and every town through which he paſſed expreſſed the moſt ſincere joy, conſidering him as their guardian angel, and the perſon who was to reſcue them from the moſt impending danger.

Philip II. was one of the moſt formidable princes of Europe. Beſides large acquiſitions in America and the Eaſt, he was, in ſome meaſure, the arbiter of the court of Rome, and the protector of the holy league formed in France againſt the Hugonots. He made religion a political reſource for his unbounded ambition. The idea of his prodigious power alarmed moſt of the princes of Europe; and the king of Sweden, when informed that Elizabeth had entered into a league with the ſtates-general, highly blamed her conduct, and ſaid ſhe was tearing the crown from her head. But ſhe ſhewed no leſs courage in the danger than prudence in the deſign. She diſpatched a fleet of one and twenty ſail, under the command of Sir Francis Drake, with two thouſand three hundred land forces, commanded by Chriſtopher Carliſle, to attack the Spaniſh ſettlements in America, the chief ſource of Philip's power, and the moſt defenceleſs parts of his extenſive dominions. The appearance of the Engliſh being wholly unexpected in that diſtant part of the world, they eaſily made themſelves maſters of the capital of St. Domingo, reduced Carthagena, and burnt the towns of St. Antonio and St. Helena, in Florida. Drake loſt ſeveral hundred men in this expedition, but brought home ſuch a prodigious quantity of treaſure, as ſufficiently rewarded the ſurvivors for their ſufferings. At the ſame time, he diſplayed the weakneſs of the Spaniards in the New World, in ſuch alluring colours, that his countrymen were animated to attempt other enterprizes of a ſimilar nature.

But the earl of Leiceſter was far from having equal ſucceſs in the Low Countries. The prince of Parma, at the head of twenty thouſand foot and ſix thouſand horſe, made himſelf maſter of Grave and Venlo; while, on the other hand, lord Willoughby, governor of Bergen-op-Zoom, cut off a large quantity of proviſions belonging to the enemy; and Sir Philip Sidney and count Maurice ſurpriſed the town of Axel, in Flanders. The prince of Parma, exaſperated at theſe loſſes, beſieged Rheinburgh, garriſoned by twelve hundred Engliſh, under the command of colonel Morgan. Leiceſter thought this place of too much importance to be neglected, and immediately made diſpoſitions for attacking Zutphen, a town of the greateſt conſequence to the enemy. The ſtratagem ſucceeded; the prince of Parma immediately abandoned the ſiege of Rheinburgh, and advanced to give Leiceſter battle before Zutphen. A bloody engagement enſued; but the Engliſh, after exerting all their valour, were obliged to retreat. Among others, the celebrated Sir Philip Sidney, a man of the fineſt genius, and the moſt heroic virtue, periſhed in this battle. Being mortally wounded, and almoſt ſuffocated with thirſt, a bottle of water was offered him; but obſerving a ſoldier lying by his ſide, in the ſame dreadful ſituation, he reſigned to him the valuable acquiſition, with this generous obſervation, "That man's neceſſities are ſtill greater than mine."

A. D. 1586. As Elizabeth received daily intelligence of Philip's deſigns againſt her perſon and government, ſhe thought it eſſentially neceſſary to ſecure the intereſt of the king of Scotland. Wotton, her ambaſſador, by conſulting only how to pleaſe him and gain his confidence, ſoon became thoroughly acquainted with all the ſecrets of his cabinet. It is no wonder Wotton ſucceeded in gaining the aſcendancy over a prince of ſo open and unguarded a temper as James: he was a maſter of profound diſſimulation, and knew how to cover, under the appearance of the moſt careleſs gaiety, the deepeſt deſigns and moſt dangerous artifices. Elizabeth was fearful leſt James ſhould contract an alliance by marriage, that might render him formidable to England: in the preſent ſtate of the Scottiſh kingdom there was nothing to fear. But Wotton employed his intrigues to ſtill more dangerous purpoſes: he formed a conſpiracy for ſeizing the perſon of the king, and delivering him into the hands of the Engliſh princeſs; who would certainly not have been diſpleaſed had it ſucceeded, though ſhe was intirely ignorant of the ſcheme. The treachery was, however, diſcovered, and Wotton was obliged to ſecure himſelf by a precipitate flight.

Notwithſtanding James was highly exaſperated at this deſign againſt his liberty, he thought it prudent to diſſemble his reſentment: negotiations were ſoon after formed, and a treaty of alliance was concluded between the two kingdoms, for their mutual ſecurity and the defence of the proteſtant religion againſt the open combination of all the catholic powers of Europe. By this treaty it was ſtipulated, that if Elizabeth was invaded, James ſhould furniſh her with a body of two thouſand horſe and five thouſand foot: that the charge of theſe armies ſhould be defrayed by the prince that demanded aſſiſtance; that if the invaſion ſhould be made in England, within ſixty miles of the frontiers of Scotland, James ſhould march his whole force to the aſſiſtance of Elizabeth; and that the preſent league ſhould ſuperſede all former alliances of either ſtate with any foreign prince, ſo far as religion was concerned.

By this treaty James was guarantied not only againſt the dangers of an invaſion, but alſo againſt domeſtic troubles, ſo much the more to be dreaded in Scotland, as the fanaticiſm of the preſbyterian teachers had lately defied the authority of the king, the parliament, and the church. They had even proceeded to that height of audacity, as to excommunicate the archbiſhop of St. Andrew's, becauſe he had found it neceſſary to reſtrain their licentious conduct; and the primate of the kingdom was conſtrained to diveſt himſelf of his eccleſiaſtical authority. One of the preachers declared publickly from the pulpit, that the king himſelf was the chief perſecutor of the church; and, as a puniſhment, denounced againſt him the curſe that fell upon Jeroboam that he ſhould die childleſs and be the laſt of his race.——Such are the effects of religious bigotry, which ſometimes carries its votaries to the moſt unreaſonable lengths!

The ſpirit of depoſing and murdering princes upon papal bulls and excommunications had arrived to the greateſt height in the Engliſh ſeminaries abroad; and ſeveral plots were formed by the catholics for taking away the life of Elizabeth. The brain of one John Savage had been fired to ſuch a degree by the king-killing doctrine, that he ſolemnly devoted himſelf to murder Elizabeth. A plot of the like nature had alſo been formed in the Engliſh ſeminary at Rheims; and one Ballard, a prieſt of that ſchool, came over to England, with a reſolution of executing the like horrid project. Ballard found means to engage in his deſign one Babington, a young gentleman of good fortune in Derbyſhire: he was alſo countenanced by ſeveral catholics of diſtinction, and it was agreed amongſt them that a ſelect number ſhould join Savage in executing his diabolical intentions.

In the mean time the papiſts, in order to carry on their plot with leſs ſuſpicion, and lull, if poſſible, the watchful council of the Engliſh cabinet into a fatal ſecurity, publiſhed ſeveral hypocritical writings, in which they profeſſed the higheſt regard for the perſon and government of Elizabeth, admoniſhed the people of their perſuaſion not to engage in any practices againſt the ſtate, but to confine themſelves to ſuch weapons as were alone lawful for chriſtians to uſe, ſuch as tears, prayers, faſtings, and the like.

Sir Francis Walſingham, ſecretary of ſtate to the queen, ever watchful for the ſafety of his miſtreſs, ſoon obtained a ſuperficial account of the deſigns o the conſpirators; and, (by the aſſiſtance of one Maud a man of impenetrable diſſimulation, who found means to inſinuate himſelf into the favour of Ballard was regularly informed of every circumſtance attending the conſpiracy. It had been determined, in ſeveral of their meetings, to aſſaſſinate Elizabeth place Mary on the Engliſh throne, and reſtore th catholic religion. Babington had, ſome years before contracted an intimacy with Thomas Morgan, a penſioner of the queen of Scots, and had by him bee introduced to the biſhop of Glaſgow, Mary's amba ſador at the court of France. That prelate ſtrongl recommended him to the captive queen, and he, f ſome time, managed her correſpondence with her foreign friends. But, on her being more cloſely co fined, the connection dropped, and Babington lai aſide all farther thoughts of Mary and her concern Unfortunately for him, Ballard re-kindled all his fo mer zeal for her ſervice; and he undertook, with th aſſiſtance of an hundred gentlemen, to ſet Mary at l berty.

As ſoon as the plan was ſettled, Babington wro to Mary informing her of all that had paſſed betwe him and Ballard; and inſiſted that the gentleme who were concerned in ſo dangerous an attempt f her ſervice, ſhould be aſſured of a reward ſuitable their merit. This letter was written in the uſu cypher which had paſſed between him and Mary and was ſo agreeable to her, that ſhe failed not to a ſwer it in the ſame cypher, deſiring the conſpirat to be extremely cautious, leſt they ſhould precipit matters before the return of their Engliſh frien from abroad, before they were aſſured of foreign ſ cours, and before ſome diſturbances were raiſed Ireland. At the ſame time, ſhe pointed out the m natural methods for her own deliverance, which w either by overturning a cart in the gateway of houſe where ſhe was confined, ſetting the ſtables fire, or carrying her off when ſhe rode out for the nefit of her health.

The artful and diligent Walſingham found me to obtain the letters that paſſed between Mary Babington. But he was ſtill deſirous of obtain farther information. To effect this, he added to of Mary's letters, delivered to him by Maud, truſty agent, a poſtſcript in the ſame cypher, requ ing Babington to ſend her the names of the princ conſpirators. The ſtratagem ſucceeded; and ſtateſman ſoon diſcovered, that Savage, already m tioned; Charles Tilney, a man of family, and of Elizabeth's penſioners; John Charnock, a gen man of Lancaſhire; Edward Abingdon, whoſe fa had been cofferer to Elizabeth; Chidcock Tichb a gentleman of Southamptom; and one Barnwe perſon of quality in Ireland, were the ſix engage oath to aſſaſſinate the queen. At the ſame time, ridiculous vanity of Babington furniſhed Wal ham with another method of diſcovery, and alſo an indication of defence. He had cauſed a picture to be drawn, in which he himſelf was repreſented ſtanding amidſt the ſix aſſaſſins, with a motto, implying, that they were all embarked in ſome dangerous enterprize. A copy of this picture was carried to Walſingham by another of his ſpies, who had found means to inſinuate himſelf into Babington's confidence. Walſingham delivered this copy to the queen, that ſhe might know the aſſaſſins, and be upon her guard if any of them ſhould attempt to approach her perſon.

Babington, convinced that delays in ſecret enterprizes were dangerous, procured a licence for Ballard, under a feigned name, to paſs over to the continent; but the real intention of his journey was, to haſten the foreign ſuccours, whoſe arrival was deſired with anxiety. And to remove all ſuſpicion, Babington applied to Walſingham himſelf, pretended the greateſt zeal for her majeſty's ſervice, offered to go abroad, and employ that confidence which he had gained among the catholics, to the detection and diſappointment of their conſpiracies. Walſingham, deſirous of ſeizing all the aſſaſſins, commended his loyal intention, promiſed to aſſiſt him with his counſel and advice in the execution, and encouraged his deluſive hopes by keeping up a correſpondence with him.

The treacherous Babington having, as he imagined, gained the favour of Walſingham, began to flatter himſelf that the whole ſcheme would ſucceed according to his wiſhes. But while he was lulled in this fatal ſecurity, Ballard was ſeized by a warrant from one of the ſecretaries of ſtate. This incident alarmed the conſpirators, and introduced confuſion into their councils. Some propoſed, as the only method of eſcaping, to paſs immediately over to the continent: while others adviſed, that Savage and Charnock ſhould execute, without delay, their intended purpoſe upon Elizabeth. The laſt propoſition was agreed to, and Babington furniſhed Savage with money that he might purchaſe cloaths neceſſary for obtaining the more eaſy acceſs to the queen's perſon. The next day they began to apprehend that they had taken the alarm too haſtily; and Babington, having renewed his correſpondence with Walſingham, the anxiety and concern with which the conſciouſneſs of guilt had inſpired the conſpirators, began to ſubſide; they flattered themſelves that the ſeizure of Ballard was owing entirely to the uſual diligence of informers in detecting popiſh and ſeminary prieſts: Babington was even perſuaded to take lodgings in Walſingham's houſe; but obſerving that all his actions were watched with the moſt careful aſſiduity by one Scudamore, he began to be alarmed for his ſafety. Soon after, as they were ſitting at ſupper, Scudamore received a note from Walſingham, ordering him to watch Babington more narrowly than ever; and Babington, by Scudamore's inadvertency, reading the note over his ſhoulder, was ſufficiently convinced of his danger. He roſe haſtily from table, went out of the room, as if on ſome ſudden occaſion, made the beſt of his way to Weſtminſter, and, after acquainting Charnock and ſome others with the diſcovery he had made, they withdrew immediately into the woods, where they concealed themſelves for ten days; but were at laſt diſcovered near Harrow on the Hill, dreſſed like countrymen, and brought priſoners to London.

On the thirteenth of September, Babington and Ballard, with five of their accomplices, were arraigned, and pleaded guilty; and the next day ſeven more of the conſpirators were convicted on evidence. The firſt ſeven ſuffered the ſentence pronounced againſt traitors in its utmoſt rigour; but the others were ſuffered to hang till they were dead. They all behaved with great decency and reſignation, and confeſſed their ſorrow for that part of the conſpiracy relative to the murder of Elizabeth.

The leſſer conſpirators being thus puniſhed, meaſures were taken for the trial and conviction of the queen of Scots, on whoſe account, and by whoſe concurrence, this deep and dangerous plot had been formed againſt the life of the queen, and the peace of the kingdom. But great difficulties occured with regard to the manner of proceeding. Scarce a precedent in the hiſtory of mankind could be found of a meaſure of this nature: not one in the annals of England. Some of the council therefore propoſed, that no farther proceedings ſhould be carried on againſt the queen of Scots; thinking that the cloſe confinement of a woman, who was now become very ſickly, would be ſufficient ſecurity to the government. Leiceſter adviſed that Mary ſhould be ſecretly diſpatched by poiſon: but Walſingham declared his abhorrence of ſo deteſtable an action, and inſiſted that all their proceedings ſhould be open and candid. The majority of the council declaring for Walſingham's opinion, a reſolution was taken for trying the queen of Scots; and ſhe was immediately removed to Fotheringay caſtle in Northamptonſhire.

Mary had for ſome time been ſo ſtrictly guarded, that ſhe was ſtill ignorant of the detection of Babington's conſpiracy; and ſhe received the intelligence of this event with equal ſurprize and concern, from Sir Thomas Gorges, who had been ſent for that purpoſe by Elizabeth. Nau and Curle, her two ſecretaries, were immediately apprehended; all her papers were ſeized, and tranſmitted to the council: among which were many letters from perſons abroad, and ſome Engliſh noblemen, expreſſing their firm attachment to her perſon and title.

Elizabeth thought proper to take no notice of this laſt diſcovery; but the perſons themſelves, conſcious of their guilt, and dreading the puniſhment due to their crime, endeavoured to atone for their fault by changing their principles, and declaring themſelves inveterate enemies to the queen of Scots.

In the laſt ſeſſions of parliament, an act had been paſſed relative to the crime of treaſon, and it was determined to try Mary on this ſtatute, and not by the common laws made againſt that crime. Accordingly Elizabeth appointed a commiſſion, conſiſting of forty noblemen and privy-counſellors, and judges, who were empowered to examine and pronounce ſentence againſt Mary, whom they ſtiled daughter and heir to James V. late king of Scotland.

On the 11th of October the commiſſioners repaired to Fotheringay caſtle, when Sir Walter Mildmay and Edward Barker delivered to the queen of Scots a letter from Elizabeth, informing her of the commiſſion, and of her approaching trial. Mary read the letter with a countenance more becoming her dignity than her ſituation, and told them, without the leaſt emotion, that it was very ſurprizing the queen ſhould command her as a ſubject to ſubmit to a trial and examination before perſons of a rank far inferior to herſelf: that ſhe was an abſolute independent princeſs, and would ſubmit to nothing that had a tendency to leſſen her royal majeſty, the ſtate of ſovereign princes, or the dignity or rank of her ſon; that however her ſpirits might be broken and oppreſſed by misfortunes and calamities, ſhe was not yet reduced to that abject ſtate her enemies deſired; nor would ſhe ever be prevailed upon to conſent to her own degradation and diſhonour: that though ſhe had long lived in England, ſhe had lived in captivity; was ignorant of the laws and ſtatutes of the kingdom, deſtitute of council, and could not conceive who could be called her peers, or ſit in judgment on a ſovereign princeſs: that ſhe had never enjoyed the protection of the laws of England, and therefore could not be ſuppoſed to have ſubjected herſelf to their juriſdiction and authority: that if in her own perſon every rule of juſtice ſhould be violated, ſhe ſhould find her revenge in the judgment of the whole world, where innocence would triumph on a theatre infinitely larger than that of a ſingle kingdom.

The commiſſioners were greatly embarraſſed at this ſpirited anſwer to Elizabeth's letter; and they deputed lord Burleigh the treaſurer, Bromley the chancellor, and Sir Chriſtopher Hatton the vice-chamberlain, to prevail upon her to relinquiſh her plea with regard to her royal dignity, and ſubmit chearfully to a trial, which was now abſolutely impoſſible to be avoided, even though her acquieſcence could not be obtained. Various arguments were urged on this occaſion, which were ſo forcible that they at length produced the deſired effect: Mary gave up her plea of royalty, and agreed to appear before the court of commiſſioners on the 14th of October.

The trial had the appearance of great order and ſolemnity. At the upper end of the room was placed a chair of ſtate for the queen of England, under a royal canopy: over againſt it, at ſome diſtance, ſtood a chair for the queen of Scots; and by the walls, on both ſides, benches were placed for the commiſſioners. As ſoon as the court was opened, the chancellor, turning to Mary, told her, "that ſhe was accuſed of conſpiring the deſtruction of the queen, the realm of England, and the proteſtant religion; and that they were commiſſioned to examine into the truth of the accuſation, and to hear her anſwer. Mary replied, "that ſhe came into England to crave the aſſiſtance which had been promiſed her: that ſhe was a queen, and no ſubject to Elizabeth; and if ſhe appeared before them, it was only to ſecure her honour and reputation." The chancellor denied that any aſſiſtance had been promiſed her; and declared, that her proteſtation was in vain; for ſince the law, upon which the accuſation was founded, allowed of no diſtinction in the perſon of the tranſgreſſor, it could not be admitted.

This conteſted point being ſettled, the crown lawyers opened the charge againſt Mary queen of Scots. They accuſed her of offering to cede to the king of Spain the right to the crown of Scotland, if James, her ſon, refuſed to be a convert to popery. Mary did not attempt to exculpate herſelf from this accuſation; ſhe only anſwered, that ſhe had no longer a kingdom at her diſpoſal, but had ſtill power to give what belonged to her, and was not reſponſible to any perſon. Strong proofs were produced, that ſhe had formed a reſolution of diſinheriting her ſon as an heretic; that the late alliance of that prince with Elizabeth had heightened theſe prejudices; and that her maternal tenderneſs was abated by time, reſentment, and religious zeal.

As Mary knew theſe facts could not affect her life, ſhe took no pains to confute the aſſertions. The great buſineſs, therefore, was to prove the capital charge of the impeachment, that Mary had concurred in the conſpiracy for aſſaſſinating Elizabeth. In order to effect this, copies of the intercepted letters between her and Babington were produced, in which her approbation of the murder was clearly expreſſed; and this was confirmed by the evidence of her two ſecretaries, Nau and Curle, who, even without being threatened with the torture, had ſworn, that ſhe both received theſe letters from Babington, and that they had wrote the anſwers by her order. The confeſſion of Babington alſo correſponded with the depoſitions of her ſecretaries. Mary was incapable of making a ſatisfactory defence before the commiſſioners; her reply conſiſted chiefly in her own denial. She aſſerted, that as Nau and Curle had taken an oath of ſecrecy and fidelity to her, their evidence could not be credited; and that if theſe men had received any letters, or wrote any anſwers, the imputation could never lie upon her. She added, that it was eaſy to forge the hand writing and cypher of another.

As ſoon as the trial was finiſhed, the commiſſioners adjourned from Fotheringay-caſtle to the Star-Chamber in London; where, after taking the oaths of Mary's two ſecretaries, who voluntarily atteſted the authenticity of the letters produced at the trial, they pronounced ſentence of death againſt the queen of Scots. At the ſame time a declaration was publiſhed by the commiſſioners and judges, importing, "That the ſentence againſt Mary no way derogated from the title and honour of James, king of Scotland; but that he was in the ſame place, degree, and right, as if the ſentence had never been pronounced."

Though Elizabeth was, in reality, far from being diſpleaſed at the ſentence paſſed againſt Mary, yet ſhe affected to be deeply intereſted in the fate of that unfortunate princeſs: and in order to exculpate herſelf from any public odium, ſhe ſummoned a parliament, that ſhe might appear to be guided ſolely by the voice of her ſubjects. She well knew that ſhe ſhould not want the moſt earneſt ſolicitations from that aſſembly to conſent to a meaſure ſo agreeable to her ſecret inclinations. Nor was ſhe deceived: the two houſes confirmed the ſentence pronounced againſt Mary, and requeſted the execution of it with all the ardour ſhe could deſire.

Elizabeth failed not to ſupport, with great propriety, the part ſhe acted: ſhe made a parade of humanity and hypocritical moderation, would promiſe nothing, and left the world in uncertainty with regard to her real ſentiments. She complained of her own unfortunate ſituation; expreſſed her uneaſineſs from the importunity of her parliament; renewed her expreſſions of affection for her people; but ſtill refuſed to declare her real intention with regard to the fate of the captive princeſs. She, however, complied with the requeſt of the parliament, with regard to the publication of Mary's ſentence. The lord Buckhurſt, and Beale, clerk of the council, were ſent to notify to the queen of Scots the ſentence pronounced againſt her, its ratification by the parliament, and the earneſt applications made by that aſſembly for its being carried into execution, from a perſuaſion that their religion could never, while ſhe was alive, attain a full ſettlement and ſecurity. Mary received the news with joy, the idea of dying a marytr for the catholic faith ſupported her ſpirits in this melancholy moment. "I can hardly believe (ſaid ſhe, ſmiling) that the queen, my ſiſter, has conſented to my death; but if her will be ſuch, that death, which will put an end to my ſufferings, cannot be unwelcome to me: and I think that ſoul unworthy of celeſtial happineſs, that ſhould ſhrink in paſſing through the gloomy valley of the ſhadow of death."

In the mean time great efforts were made by foreign powers to prevent the execution of the ſentence pronounced againſt Mary. The ambaſſadors of France and Scotland made vehement remonſtrances, though it was conjectured that the oppoſition made by the king of France was not ſincere: but however that be, it had no weight with Elizabeth. Her miniſters, indeed, ſtrenuouſly oppoſed every argument that had a tendency to make her heſitate. They enlarged on the troubles and conſpiracies that had been excited by the queen of Scotland. They obſerved, that ſhe was already degraded from her rank; and that, in natural equity, every perſon, much more a ſovereign, had a right to juſtice againſt thoſe who ſhould attempt their life. They added, that while Mary lived, every thing was to be feared from the artempts of the catholics; and that therefore prudence dence and juſtice demanded the puniſhment of that princeſs.

Although Elizabeth's actions ſufficiently indicated ſhe had malice in her heart, yet ſhe ſtill continued to conceal her ſentiments; and her duplicity furniſhed her with new artifices. Rumours of invaſions, rebellions, and aſſaſſinations, were ſpread with great addreſs. The people were terrified at their danger, and the death of Mary was conſidered as neceſſary to reſtore the tranquillity of the nation. The captive princeſs, however, ſupported herſelf with ſuch placid dignity, as does honour to her memory. When Sir Amias Paulet took down her canopy of ſtate, ſhe bore the inſult with the utmoſt patience; and when he told her, that ſhe could now be conſidered only as a dead perſon, and incapable of any dignity, ſhe only anſwered, that ſhe received her royal character from the hands of the Almighty, and no earthly power could ever wreſt it from her. She wrote a pathetic letter to queen Elizabeth, requeſting, "that after the fatal ſentence was executed, her body might be ſent to France, there to be interred near the ſacred relics of her mother, and accompanied with thoſe rites and ceremonies which her religion required: that the execution of her ſentence might be public in the ſight of all the world; and that her ſervants, after they had done the laſt offices, and been witneſſes of her perſeverance in the faith, and of her ſubmiſſion to the will of heaven, might be ſuffered to depart without moleſtation, and enjoy the legacies bequeathed them by their dying miſtreſs."

A. D. 1587. When Elizabeth thought importunities ſufficient had been uſed, and as much delay interpoſed as decency required, ſhe determined to proceed to the laſt act of this affecting tragedy; but even in making her final reſolution ſhe had recourſe to artifice. She ſent for ſecretary Daviſon, a man of great parts, but eaſy to be deceived, and commanded him to make out a warrant for the execution of Mary queen of Scots. He obeyed the order; the queen ſigned the warrant, and told him to carry it to the chancellor, in order to have the ſeal affixed to it. The next day ſhe ſent him a meſſage, enjoining him not to execute her former commands till farther orders. Daviſon came immediately to court, and informed the queen, that the warrant had paſſed the ſeals. She ſeemed offended, and blamed him for his precipitation. Alarmed at this inconſiſtency of conduct, Daviſon informed the council of the whole tranſaction; declaring, at the ſame time, that he would proceed no farther without their participation. They all requeſted that the execution might be haſtened; declaring, that if the queen was offended, they would all equally ſhare the blame; and Beale, clerk of the council, was accordingly diſpatched with the warrant, addreſſed to the earls of Shrewſbury, Kent, Derby and Cumberland, commanding them to ſee the ſentence executed on the queen of Scots.

In conſequence of this, on the ſeventh of February, the earls of Shrewſbury and Kent reached Fotheringay caſtle, and informed Mary of their commiſſion; adding, that ſhe muſt prepare for death the next morning by eight o'clock. She received the ſummons with great calmneſs and compoſure. She confeſſed, indeed, that ſhe did not expect to die ſo ſoon; but all her geſtures, looks and words, were full of reſignation. She deſired that ſhe might have a conference with her almoner, confeſſor, and Andrew Melvil, the maſter of her houſhold; but they refuſed her requeſt with regard to her confeſſor. They, however, recommended the dean of Peterborough, who would very readily aſſiſt her in making preparations for her paſſage into eternity. She replied, that his aſſiſtance was not neceſſary; and as they had thought proper to deny a requeſt for which the dictates of humanity ſo ſtrongly pleaded, ſhe would endeavour to ſupply the defect by her own prayers.

When Shrewſbury and Kent had left her, ſhe ordered ſupper to be haſtened, and having eat ſparingly, as was her uſual cuſtom, ſhe called for for a glaſs of wine, and drank to all her attendants. They pledged her in order on their knees; and craved her pardon for any paſt neglect of their duty. She, in return, deigned to aſk their pardon for her offences towards them; and a plentiful effuſion of tears attended this laſt ſolemn farewell, and exchange of mutual forgiveneſs.

Then addreſſing herſelf to her chaplain, ſhe ſaid, they pretend I muſt die becauſe I conſpired againſt the queen's life: but the earl of Kent avowed, that there was no other cauſe of my death but the apprehenſions, which, if I ſhould live, they entertain for their religion. My conſtancy in the faith is my real crime: the reſt is only a colour invented by intereſted and deſigning men.

She then read over her teſtament, with the inventory of her goods and moveables, and wrote on them the names of thoſe to whom ſhe bequeathed them; and what money ſhe had ſhe put in different purſes, according to the number of her ſervants, and according to their merits and qualities diſtributed among them. After this, ſhe wrote letters of recommendation for all her ſervants to the king of France and the duke of Guiſe, and one to her confeſſor, deſiring him to pray for her ſoul. She then retired to reſt, and after ſleeping with the greateſt compoſure for ſome hours, ſhe ſpent the reſt of the night in prayer.

Towards the morning ſhe ordered her women to dreſs her in a rich habit of ſilk and velvet; and all the time they were performing this office, ſhe continued to exhort them to patience and reſignation.

Thomas Andrews, ſheriff of the county, entering the room, informed her that ſhe muſt attend him to the place of execution. She replied that ſhe was ready; and bidding adieu to her ſervants, followed him with a ſerene aſpect, being gently ſupported by two of Sir Amias Paulet's guards. In paſſing through a hall adjoining to her chamber, ſhe was met by the earls of Shrewſbury and Kent, Sir Amias Paulet, Sir Drue Drury, and many other perſons of diſtinction. When ſhe came to the porch of the hall where the ſcaffold on which ſhe was to die was erected, her faithful ſervant Melvil, for whom ſhe had a particular regard, threw himſelf at her feet in tears, and uttered the moſt paſſionate expreſſions of ſorrow and heavineſs. "My good ſervant," ſaid the queen, "ceaſe to lament; for thou haſt cauſe rather to rejoice than mourn; for now thou ſhalt ſee Mary Stuart's troubles receive their expected end. For know, my good ſervant, that all the world is but vanity, and ſubject ſtill to more ſorrow than an ocean of tears can bewail. But I pray thee, carry this meſſage from me, that I die a true woman to my religion, and unalterable in my affections to Scotland and France. But God forgive them, who have long deſired my life, and thirſted for my blood, like as the hart panteth for the water brooks. O God, thou who art the author of truth, and truth itſelf, knows the inward chamber of my thoughts, how that I was ever willing that Scotland and England ſhould be united, and to obviate the ſource of all theſe fatal diſcords." "Hitherto," continued ſhe to Melvil, "thou haſt ſerved me faithfully; and howbeit I take thee in religion to be a proteſtant, and I am a catholic, yet, ſeeing there is but one Chriſt, I charge thee, upon thine account to him, that thou carry theſe my laſt words to my ſon. Tell him, that I pray him to ſerve God, to defend the catholic church, to govern his kingdom in peace, and never to put himſelf in the power of another, as I have done. Aſſure him likewiſe, that notwithſtanding all my diſtreſſes, I have done nothing prejudicial to the ſtate and kingdom of Scotland." She then with her face bedewed with tears, added, "Good Melvil farewell. Once again, farewell, good Melvil; and grant the aſſiſtance of thy prayers to thy queen and miſtreſs."

She then turned to the noblemen who attended her, and deſired that her ſervants might have and enjoy with quietneſs, what ſhe had given them by her will and teſtament; that they might be favourably treated, and ſent ſafely to their reſpective countries, and laſtly, that they might be permitted to be preſent at her death; that their eyes might behold, and, their hearts be witneſſes, how patiently their queen and miſtreſs ſhould endure her execution, that thereby they might be able to make a relation when they came to their own countries, how ſhe died firm in her attachment to her religion. The earl of Kent ſtrongly oppoſed granting her this laſt requeſt, telling her that they would be apt by their ſpeeches and cries both to diſturb her and the ſpectators: that he was alſo apprehenſive, leſt they ſhould practice ſome ſuperſtition unmeet for him to ſuffer; ſuch as dipping their hankerchiefs in her blood, &c. To which ſhe replied, "My lord I give you my word (although it be but dead) that they ſhall not deſerve any blame in any of the actions you have named; but alas! poor ſouls! it would do them good to bid their miſtreſs farewell. And I hope," added ſhe, "that your miſtreſs, being a maiden queen, would vouchſafe, in regard of womankind, that I ſhould have ſome of my own people about me at my death. And I know her majeſty hath not given you any ſuch ſtrict command, but that you might grant me a requeſt, of far greater courteſy than this, even were I a woman of much inferior rank to that which I bear." Finding that ſhe was not like to obtain her requeſt, ſhe burſt into tears. "I am couſin to your queen," cried ſhe, "and deſcended from the blood royal of Henry the ſeventh, a married queen of France, and an anointed queen of Scotland." For her mind, which was fortified againſt the terrors of death, was not prepared for this freſh inſult and indignity.

After ſome conſultation, the lords agreed that Mary might make choice of a few of her ſervants to attend her on the ſcaffold. The perſons ſhe fixed on were Melvil, her phyſician, her ſurgeon, her apothecary, and another old man; and two ladies who uſed always to lie in her bed-chamber. She then entered the great hall, where was erected the ſcaffold, covered with black. She mounted it, and ſaw without diſmay, the two executioners, and all the preparations of death. The room was crowded with ſpectators, and no one was ſo ſteeled againſt all ſentiments of humanity, as not to be moved, at ſeeing a ſovereign princeſs in diſtreſs, remembered the ſurprizing train of misfortunes that had attended her, beheld her mild but inflexible conſtancy, or ſurveyed her beauties, which, though faded by years, and ſtill more by affliction, fully diſplayed themſelves at this fatal moment. As ſoon as ſhe aſcended the ſcaffold, and ſeated herſelf in a chair which was placed for that purpoſe and covered with black cloth, Beal, the clerk of the council, read the warrant for her execution; but ſhe continued ſilent during the whole ceremony, and ſhewed by her behaviour, an indifference and unconcern as if it did not relate to her.

She now prepared herſelf to ſuffer the ſentence which was to put an end to all her misfortunes here; and ſhe ſeemed to have ſo far done with temporal things, as to be wholly employed in thoſe that will never end. But this tranquillity of ſoul was interrupted by Fletcher, dean of Peterborough, who exhorted her to change her religion, and die in the true faith. To which ſhe anſwered, "Do not, Mr. Dean, trouble yourſelf with me. I was born and educated in the Roman faith, and mean to ſpend my blood in its defence." Notwithſtanding this check, the lords ordered the dean to proceed; but Mary again interrupted him, and requeſted, with great earneſtneſs, not to endeavour to diſturb the tranquillity of her ſoul: and the two earls perceiving that it was fruitleſs to harraſs her farther with theological diſputes, ordered the dean to deſiſt from his unreaſonable exhortations, and to pray for her converſion. The dean accordingly addreſſed a prayer to heaven for enlightening her heart with the light of the truth, and diſpelling the clouds of bigotry and ſuperſtition. During the dean's prayer, ſhe employed herſelf in private devotion from the office of the virgin; and afterwards prayed aloud in Engliſh, for the afflicted church, for an end of her own ſufferings, for her own ſon, and for queen Elizabeth.

Her prayer being thus ended, ſhe began, with the help of her two women, to diſrobe herſelf; the executioner alſo lending his aſſiſtance. She ſmiled at the incident, ſaying, that ſhe was not accuſtomed to undreſs herſelf before ſo large a company, nor to be ſerved by ſuch valets. Her ſervants ſeeing their miſtreſs ready to lay her head upon the block, burſt into tears and lamentations; ſhe turned about to them, put her finger to her lips, as a ſign of impoſing ſilence upon them; and having given them her bleſſing, deſired them to pray for her. One of her maids, whom ſhe had appointed for that purpoſe, tied a linen handkerchief round her eyes, which being done, Mary laid her head upon the block without fear or trepidation, repeated the thirty-firſt pſalm; and ſtretching out her arms, the ſignal for the execution, her head was ſevered from her body at two ſtrokes. The executioner inſtantly taking the head from the floor, held it up, ſtreaming with blood, and agitated with the convulſions of death, cried aloud, "Long live queen Elizabeth, and may all her enemies periſh in this manner." The dean of Peterborough and the earl of Kent only replied, "Amen;" the reſt of the ſpectators being diſſolved in tears. Her corpſe was interred with great pomp and ſolemnity in the cathedral of Peterborough, where it lay till the acceſſion of her ſon to the throne of England; when he ordered the remains to be removed into the ſouth iſle of Henry the Seventh's chapel at Weſtminſter, where they now lie under a ſtately monument erected to her memory.

Thus fell Mary queen of Scots, in the forty-fifth year of her age, and the nineteenth of her captivity in England. She was a lady in whom nature and fortune ſeemed to have directly oppoſed each other; the former having exhauſted her whole art to render her accompliſhed, and the latter to make her miſerable. It was her peculiar misfortune that all the advantages ſhe ought to have derived from her birth, education, rank, beauty and accompliſhments, operated immediately to her deſtruction. In her cradle ſhe was an exile; ſhe was educated in the boſom of adulation, and in the politeſt, though the moſt wicked court then in the world; which rendered her ſometimes impatient under the mortifications ſhe received in her native country. No princeſs was ever more unhappy in marriage than Mary. When very young ſhe was eſpouſed to a boy of an unſound conſtitution and mean capacity. In her future attachments, ſhe abandoned herſelf to the directions of profligate men. Theſe are doubtleſs egregious faults, whether they are conſidered as imprudences or crimes; as the reſult of an inexplicable, though not uncommon inconſtancy in the human mind, or the the frailty of human nature, or of violent paſſions, and momentary incidents. Enraged by the ungrateful conduct of her huſband, ſeduced by the treacherous counſels of one in whom ſhe repoſed unlimited confidence, tranſported by the violence of her own temper, which was never ſufficiently under the guidance of diſcretion; ſhe was betrayed into actions, which may, with ſome difficulty, be accounted for, but which admit of no apology, nor even of alleviation. At the ſame time the beauties of her perſon, and graces of her air, combined to render her one of the moſt amiable of women; while the charms of her addreſs and converſation aided the impreſſions which her lovely figure made on the hearts of all beholders. Ambitious and active in her temper, yet inclined to chearfulneſs and ſociety; of a lofty ſpirit, conſtant and even vehement in her purpoſe; yet polite, gentle, and affable in her demeanor; ſhe ſeemed to partake only of ſo much of the male virtues as to render her eſtimable, without relinquiſhing thoſe ſofter graces, which compoſe the proper ornaments of her ſex.

Elizabeth was no ſooner informed of the death of Mary, than ſhe affected the utmoſt grief; nor would he, for ſome time, ſuffer any of her miniſters to approach her. She openly declared, that the execution had been done without her knowledge, and contrary to her inclinations. She wrote a very pathetic letter to the king of Scotland, calling heaven and arth to witneſs, that it was her reſolution to have pared the blood of Mary. She committed Davidſon to priſon, and ordered him to be tried in the Star-Chamber. The miniſter well knew the danger f a conteſt with his ſovereign; he acknowledged his uilt, and ſued for pardon. The queen was inexorable; a tedious impriſonment, and a fine that reduced him to beggary, were the reward of his ſervices. o perſon was deceived by this behaviour of the ueen; they knew that diſſimulation coſt her nothing. aviſon wrote an apology to his friend Walſingham, ontaining many curious anecdotes. He declared, at on the departure of the French and Scottiſh mbaſſadors, who had made ſtrong repreſentations in vour of Mary, Elizabeth commanded him to deliver e warrant for her execution. She ſigned it readily, dered it to be ſealed, and appeared in ſuch good mour on the occaſion, that ſhe ſaid to him, in a cular manner, "Go tell this to Walſingham, who now ſick, though I fear he will die with ſorrow when hears it." At the ſame time, ſhe blamed Paulet d Drury, that they had not before eaſed her of this uble, and wiſhed Walſingham would bring them a compliance in that particular. "I told her ys Daviſon) that Paulet had abſolutely refuſed to any thing inconſiſtent with the principles of honour d juſtice." The queen was very angry, and accuſed n and others of perjury, in having taken the oath aſſociation, whereby they had bound themſelves to enge her wrongs, and yet refuſed their aſſiſtance en it was wanted. "But (added ſhe) there are ers who will be found leſs ſcrupulous."

When the king of Scotland received advice of the e of his mother, he was ſo afflicted with grief that abandoned himſelf to the wildeſt reſolutions. He uſed to admit Cary, who brought the letter from zabeth, into his preſence. He recalled his ambaſſa- r from the Engliſh court; war and vengeance med to have taken poſſeſſion of his ſoul. Great t of the nobility catched the flame, and a rupture h England ſeemed inevitable. When the court t into mourning, lord Sinclair appeared in a ſuit armour, and ſaid, his dreſs only was the proper urning for the queen of Scotland.

Elizabeth was alarmed at theſe warlike appearances; , as ſoon as the firſt flame was abated, ſhe had recourſe to conciliating meaſures. Walſingham wrote a long letter to James, wherein he intimated the dangers to which Scotland would be expoſed in a war with England; the inconveniences that muſt attend his receiving ſuccours either from France or Spain; and how abſurd it would be for James to riſque his expectations of the crown of England, by irritating the people. Theſe conſiderations, joined to the peaceable temper of the young prince, prevailed over his reſentment, and a good correſpondence with the Engliſh court was gradually reſtored.

The northern ſtorm being thus diſſipated, Elizabeth was more at leiſure to watch the motions of Philip of Spain, who had for ſome time been making preparations for invading England. A prodigious number of ſhips were equipping in his ports; and though he had not yet declared war againſt England, no perſon was deceived in his intentions. But the navy of Elizabeth was able to diſpute the prize of victory with the ſovereign of the New World. Drake was ſent, with a ſtrong fleet, to inſult the coaſts of Spain, intercept the ſupplies of naval and military ſtores continually ſending to Cadiz, and deſtroy the ſhipping of the enemy in their own harbours. Drake executed his commiſſion with great courage and ſucceſs, burning and deſtroying above an hundred ſail of ſhips, moſt of them laden with proviſions and military ſtores; and after taking the town of St. Vincent, and bombarding Liſbon, he ſailed for the Weſtern-Iſlands, in order to intercept a rich carrack, or galleon, called the St. Philip, then on her return from the Eaſt-Indies. He ſucceeded, and returned to England with an immenſe booty. But the moſt valuable acquiſition was a pacquet of papers found in the galleon, by which the Engliſh learned the nature of the oriental commerce, and were inſpired with the thoughts of eſtabliſhing an Eaſt-India company.

A ſhort time after this ſucceſsful expedition, Thomas Cavendiſh, who had made a voyage round the world, returned to England. He was a gentleman of Devonſhire, and having ſpent his fortune at court, reſolved, if poſſible, to retrieve it by an attempt againſt the Spaniſh ſettlements in the New World. He fitted out three ſhips at Plymouth, one of 120 tons, another of 60, and a third of 40. With theſe ſmall veſſels he ventured into the ſouth-ſeas, and committed great depredations on the Spaniards. He took no leſs than nineteen veſſels richly laden; and returning to England by the Cape of Good Hope, entered the Thames in triumph, amidſt the univerſal acclamations of the people. His ſailors and ſoldiers were dreſſed in ſilks; the ſails of his veſſels were made of damaſk; and the booty he brought with him was immenſe.

But the Engliſh were not equally ſucceſsful in the Netherlands. The earl of Leiceſter had entruſted the command of Zutphen and Deventer to Stanley and York, two of his creatures; who, inſtead of defending thoſe important poſts, treacherouſly delivered them up to the prince of Parma. The ſtates, alarmed at theſe practices, ſent an embaſſy to the Engliſh court, requeſting that the government might be taken from the earl of Leiceſter, and given to ſome more able and prudent general. Elizabeth knew too well the value of the Dutch alliance to ſacrifice it to the impetuous temper of a favourite. Accordingly, Leiceſter was recalled, and the ſtates elected Maurice, ſon to the prince of Orange, governor in his ſtead.

A. D. 1588. The great preparations made by Philip of Spain gave a univerſal alarm to the Engliſh nation. That ſagacious and hypocritical monarch, though he had not yet declared his intention, was manifeſtly taking meaſures for ſeizing the crown of England. Pope Sextus V. not leſs ambitious than Philip, excited him to the enterprize: he again excommunicated the queen, and publiſhed a cruſade againſt her, with the uſual indulgences. All the ports of Spain reſounded with preparations for this alarming expedition; and the Spaniards ſeemed to threaten the Engliſh with a total annihilation.

Three whole years had been ſpent by Philip in making the neceſſary preparations for this diſtinguiſhed enterprize; and his fleet, which, on account of its prodigious ſtrength, was called "The Invincible Armada," was now completed. A conſecrated banner was procured from the pope, and the gold of Peru was laviſhed on the occaſion. This tremenduous armament conſiſted of the following particulars: nineteen thouſand two hundred and ninety ſoldiers; eight thouſand two hundred and fifty ſeamen; two thouſand and eight galley ſlaves; and two thouſand ſix hundred and thirty pieces of ordnance. The marquis of Santa Cruz, an officer of great reputation and experience, was appointed to command the Armada; and by his counſels and directions all the naval preparations were conducted. There was hardly a noble family in Spain but ſent either a ſon, a brother, or a nephew, on board this fleet, in order to acquire riches and eſtates in England, which was conſidered as an eaſy conqueſt. The duke of Parma, in order to inſure ſucceſs, was ordered to provide tranſports ſufficient to embark an army of twenty-five thouſand men, and land them in England as ſoon as the Spaniſh fleet appeared on the coaſt of Flanders. Ships were accordingly provided, and the duke quartered his troops in the neighbourhood of Gravelines, Dunkirk, and Nieuport.

The Engliſh fleet at this time conſiſted only of twenty-eight ſail, moſt of which were very ſmall veſſels; but the alacrity of Elizabeth's ſubjects ſufficiently atoned for the weakneſs of her navy. The maritime towns, the nobility and gentry, teſtified the greateſt zeal on this occaſion. The city of London fitted out thirty ſhips, though fifteen only had been required. The gentry and nobility hired and armed forty-three ſhips at their own expence. Lord Howard of Effingham, a man of great courage and capacity, was lord admiral, and took upon him the command of the navy: Drake, Hawkins, and Forbiſher, the moſt renowned ſeamen in Europe, ſerved under him. The main fleet was ſtationed at Plymouth; while a ſmaller fleet, conſiſting of forty veſſels, under the command of lord Seymour, lay off Dunkirk, in in order to intercept the forces commanded by the duke of Parma.

Twenty thouſand land forces were cantoned along the ſouthern coaſts of England; another body of diſciplined men encamped at Tilbury, near the mouth of the Thames, under the command of the earl of Leiceſter, whom the queen, on this occaſion, created general in chief of all her forces; and the lord of Hunſdon commanded a third army, conſiſting of thirty thouſand men, for the defence of her majeſty's perſon. Arthur, lord Grey, Sir Francis Knowles, Sir John Norreys, Sir Richard Bingham, and Sir Roger Williams, men renowned for their valour and experience, were conſulted about the management of the war; and, purſuant to their advice, all the landing-places on the coaſt from Hull, to the Land's-End, and thence to Milford-Haven, were fortified and garriſoned. The militia of the country were armed and regulated under proper officers, who received inſtructions for interrupting the diſembarkation of the enemy, waſting the country before them, attacking their rear, and keeping up a continual alarm in their army, till a ſufficient force could be aſſembled to give them battle. Sir Robert Sydney was ſent into Scotland, in order to induce James to continue firmly attached to the Engliſh intereſt. The Scottiſh monarch was ſufficiently diſpoſed to cultivate an union with Elizabeth, and even to march, at the head of all the forces of his kingdom, to the aſſiſtance of the Engliſh. Her authority with the king of Denmark, and the connection reſulting from their common religion, prevailed upon that prince to ſeize a ſquadron of ſhips which Philip had either purchaſed or hired in the Daniſh harbours. But her chief hopes of ſucceſs were placed on the affections of her people. The very papiſts themſelves, though they knew the pope had abſolved them from their oaths of allegiance, exerted themſelves on this occaſion. Conſcious that they could not expect to be intruſted with authority, ſeveral of the young nobility ſerved as volunteers, either in the fleet or army: ſome equipped ſhips at their own expence, and gave the command of them to proteſtants; while others were active in animating their tenants and vaſſals in ſupport of their ſovereign. Party diſtinctions were forgotten, and every man exerted himſelf in the defence of his country.

The magnanimity of Elizabeth was remarkable on this trying occaſion. She appeard on horſeback in the camp at Tilbury, harangued her army, and expreſſed an entire confidence in their loyalty and courage. She aſſured her troops, that the weakneſs of her ſex ſhould not prevent her marching at their head againſt the Spaniſh invaders; that ſhe would behold and reward their bravery herſelf; and that ſhe would ſooner periſh on the field of battle than live to ſee the ſlavery of her people. "My arm (ſaid ſhe) is but the arm of a woman; but I have the heart of a king, and, what is more, of a king of England." The whole army catched the heroic ardour of the queen; they were impatient to meet the enemy, and earneſtly deſirous of convincing the haughty Spaniards, that they ſtill poſſeſſed the ſpirit of Engliſhmen.

The Armada was ſome time prevented from ſailing by the death of the marquis of Santa Cruz. The duke of Madeira Sidonia, a nobleman of great family, but wholly unacquainted with maritime affairs, was appointed admiral in his room. This interval was employed by Elizabeth in making new preparations for rendering the deſign abortive. At length the invincible fleet ſailed from Liſbon on the twenty-ninth of May; but being overtaken with a dreadful tempeſt, the fleet was obliged to put into the Groyne, having received conſiderable damage. After a delay of two months, the armada ſailed once more to proſecute the intended enterprize. The fleet conſiſte of one hundred and thirty ſhips, of which near an hundred were galleons, and of a greater burden tha any that had ever before appeared on the coaſt o England. The Spaniſh admiral was ordered to ſail a near the coaſt of France as poſſible, in order to joi prince Parma, and avoid meeting the Engliſh flee which might occaſion ſome delay in the enterprize; fo it was never imagined that they could make any effectual oppoſition. But an accident induced the Spaniſ admiral to neglect this prudent advice. He took fiſhing-boat in his paſſage, the maſter of which i formed him, that the Engliſh admiral, perſuade that the late ſtorm, which ſcattered the armada, ha prevented any attempt being made this ſeaſon, ha laid up his ſhips, and diſcharged the greater part his ſeamen. Deceived by this intelligence, the Spaniard determined to deſtroy the Engliſh ſhips in Plmouth harbour before he joined the prince of Parm He accordingly ſteered towards that port, hoping obtain an eaſy victory. The armada was diſpoſed the form of a half-moon, and ſtretched to the diſtan of ſeven leagues from the extremity of one diviſio to that of the other. But this tremendous appearan diſmayed not the Engliſh; they knew their hu veſſels were ſo ill conſtructed, and ſo difficult to managed, that they would not be able to ſuppo themſelves againſt the repeated attacks of ſhips a diſtance. Experience ſoon convinced them that they were not miſtaken. Two of the largeſt ſhips in the Spaniſh fleet were ſoon after taken by Sir Francis Drake; and while the enemy advanced ſlowly up the channel, the Engliſh followed their rear, and harraſſed them with perpetual ſkirmiſhes. The Spaniards now began to abate in their confidence of ſucceſs: the deſign of attacking the Engliſh navy in Plymouth was laid aſide; and they directed their courſe towards Calais, in order to join the prince of Parma.

No ſooner were theſe tranſactions made known in England, than the nobility and gentry haſtened out with their ſhips from every harbour to join the admiral, who ſoon found his fleet amounted to one hundred and forty ſail. He ſtill hung upon the rear of the Spaniards, and diſtreſſed them with repeated attacks. At laſt the armada came to an anchor before Calais, in expectation of being joined by the prince of Parma; but before that general could embark his troops, all hopes of ſucceſs vaniſhed, by a ſtratagem of the Engliſh admiral. He filled eight of his ſmaller ſhips with combuſtible materials, and ſetting them on fire, ſent them, one after another, into the midſt of the enemy's fleet. Terrified at this appearance, the Spaniards cut their cables, and betook themſelves to flight in a very precipitate and diſorderly manner. In the midſt of this confuſion, the Engliſh fell upon them with ſuch fury, that twelve of their largeſt ſhips were taken, and ſeveral others were thoroughly damaged.

The ambitious Spaniards were now convinced that their ſcheme was entirely fruſtrated; and would willingly have abandoned the enterprize, and returned immediately to their ports, could they have done it with ſafety: but this was impoſſible; the wind was contrary; and the only chance of eſcaping, was that of making a tour of the whole iſland, and reaching at laſt the Spaniſh harbours by the ocean. But a violent ſtorm ſoon overtook them, and compleated the deſtruction of the Invincible Armada; not half the number of veſſels returned to the ports of Spain. It is ſaid that Philip, being informed of theſe diſaſters, fell on his knees, to thank heaven for leaving him ſo much; while the Spaniſh clergy, confounded at an event ſo contrary to their expectations, aſſigned a very ridiculous cauſe for it, namely, that ſome infidel Mahometans were ſuffered to continue in a catholic kingdom.

The lord high-admiral having entirely cleared the Engliſh coaſt of Spaniards, returned with his fleet to the Downs, and was received in London with the greateſt acclamations of joy. A public thankſgiving was ordered to be obſerved throughout the whole kingdom for ſo ſingular a deliverance; and the queen herſelf went to St. Paul's, in great ſolemnity, to perform the ſacred duty. At the ſame time eleven ſtandards and colours, taken from the enemy, were hung up in the body of the church, as trophies of ſo diſtinguiſhed a victory*.

A ſhort time after the diſperſion of the Spaniſh Armada, Robert Dudley, earl of Leiceſter, the queen's great, but unworthy, favourite, paid the debt of nature. Though he had not diſcovered either abilities or courage in any of his military enterprizes, yet he was entruſted with the chief command of the Engliſh at a time when the Spaniards were expected to invade the kingdom; a partiality that might have proved fatal to Elizabeth, had the prince of Parma landed his troops in England. But the queen's affections ſeemed to terminate entirely with his death; for ſhe cauſed his goods to be expoſed to ſale, in order to reimburſe herſelf for the money ſhe had lent him.

A. D. 1589. The affairs of England were now in a ſtate of tranquillity. The Scots, ſince the death of Mary, were no longer terrible. James, ſurrounded by factions, inveſted with little authority, and naturally inclined to repoſe, was ſo far from being able to give the Engliſh any diſturbance, that he found it his intereſt to maintain a good correſpondence with Elizabeth. He had lately married a daughter of the king of Denmark, and by that means loſt the favour of the catholic party. Philip of Spain had ſufficiently ſeen his error, to attempt a new invaſion: he was not ſo fond of enterprize as to ſquander the treaſures of his kingdom in undertakings big with abſurdity. Elizabeth was therefore now able to aſſiſt the Hugonots in France, who ſtill ſuffered the moſt violent perſecutions. The duke of Guiſe, more abſolute than Henry III. had compelled that prince to take up arms againſt them, and alſo againſt the king of Navarre, the preſumptive heir of the crown. Elizabeth furniſhed the latter with large ſums; and, by her aſſiſtance, he had gained a victory over the league at Coutray. He could not, however, maintain his advantage, becauſe the Germans, who were marching to his aſſiſtance, were defeated by the duke of Guiſe. Unforeſeen events, however, changed the face of things in France. The inhabitants of Paris, intoxicated with the admiration of Guiſe, and ſtrongly prejudiced againſt the king, took up arms againſt him, and Henry was obliged to fly from his capital for ſafety. He, however, diſſembled his reſentment, entered into a negotiation with the league, and loaded Guiſe and his partizans with offices and favours. Deceived by theſe appearances of friendſhip, Guiſe, and his brother, the cardinal of Lorraine, came to court, and were both aſſaſſinated by the king's orders. This perfidious conduct rendered the league more furious and formidable than ever. The citizens of Paris renounced their allegiance, and were followed by thoſe of many conſiderable places in the kingdom. Henry finding it impoſſible to reſiſt the ſtorm that was gathering round him, was obliged to have recourſe to the Hugonots for aſſiſtance; he joined the hero whom he had been obliged to treat as an enemy. At the ſame time, he inliſted large bodies of Swiſs infantry and German cavalry; and being ſtill ſupported by his chief nobility, he aſſembled an army of near forty thouſand men, and advanced to the gates of Paris, threatening the ſevereſt revenge againſt the inhabitants. But the city was ſaved by the reſolution of Jaques Clement, a Dominican monk. Inflamed by the bloody ſpirit of bigotry which diſtinguiſhed this century, he embraced the reſolution of ſacrificing his own life to ſave the church from the perſecutions of an heretical tyrant. He found means to be admitted into the king's preſence, and plunged a dagger into the breaſt of his ſovereign, who expired on the firſt of Auguſt. The king of Navarre, afterwards Henry IV. aſcended the throne, but found he had a kingdom to conquer, and ſubjects to ſubdue.

In the month of October this year died the famous Sir Francis Walſingham, ſecretary of ſtate to Elizabeth. He was one of the moſt able and accompliſhed miniſters that ever appeared in this or any other country, and not more diſtinguiſhed by his great abilities than his unſullied virtues. Though he had paſſed through many great employments, and had been very frugal in his expences, he died ſo poor, that his family were obliged to give him a private burial. He left only one daughter, who was firſt married to Sir Philip Sidney, and afterwards to the earl of Eſſex, the great favourite of Elizabeth.

* A part of the ammunition taken from the Spaniards in this enterprize, together with different inſtruments deſigned for the capture and deſtruction of the Engliſh, had they ſucceeded, are ſtill preſerved in the Tower of London; an ample deſcription of which is given in the account of that fortreſs, inſerted in Harriſon's Hiſtory and Survey of London.

A. D. 1590. No ſooner did Henry IV. aſcend the throne of France, than the ambitious Philip formed a deſign of depoſing that monarch; intimation of which being given to Elizabeth, ſhe ſent the former a conſiderable body of troops in order to aſſiſt him againſt ſo dangerous an enemy. The famous ſieges of Paris and Rouen, which the duke of Parma had the honour of raiſing, deceived, however, the hopes of the queen. She ſeemed diſſatisfied with the conduct of her ally, and complained of his expoſing the Engliſh too much on every occaſion; a complaint that ſeems not to have been well founded, as it was undoubtedly owing to the valour of thoſe troops, eſpecially to their officers, who, under the command of the young earl of Eſſex, riſqued every thing for glory. But while the Engliſh were gathering laurels in the fields of France, the queen ſuſtained an irreparable loſs, by the death of Sir Chriſtopher Hatton, lord high chancellor of England. He was a perſon of great abilities, unſhaken probity, and firmly attached to the conſtitutions of his country.

A. D. 1591. Elizabeth, deſirous of diſtreſſing Philip as much as poſſible, determined to make an attack on part of the treaſure of the Indies, the true ſource of all his power. Accordingly, in the beginning of the ſpring, ſhe diſpatched lord Thomas Howard to the Azores, or Weſtern Iſlands, with a ſquadron of ſeven ſhips, to intercept the galleons in their return to Europe; but the Spaniſh monarch, apprized of her deſign, fitted out a fleet of fifty-five ſail, and ſent them to the Azores, to convoy the India ſhips. Howard, who knew nothing of this ſtrong fleet, eſcaped with difficulty. His little ſquadron was riding at anchor in the harbour of Flores when the Spaniſh fleet appeared. He, however, found means to put to ſea, by which the enemy were diſappointed in the hopes of taking him and his whole diviſion. Sir Richard Grenville, in the Revenge, was not ſo fortunate: he was ſurrounded by the enemy, and all hopes of eſcaping were cut off. In this deſperate ſituation he attempted to break through the Spaniſh fleet, but was diſappointed; and after an engagement of fifteen hours with the whole force of the enemy, he was obliged to ſurrender, but not before he was mortally wounded. The reſt of the ſquadron returned to England, diſappointed, indeed, in their expectations of acquiring part of the riches of the New World, but not in eſſentially diſtreſſing the enemy; for the Plate fleet had been ſo long detained at the Havannah, through fear of the Engliſh, that they were obliged to put to ſea at an improper ſeaſon; the conſequence of which was, that they were unable to reach the Spaniſh ports, and the greater part of them were loſt.

A. D. 1592. Notwithſtanding Henry IV. had obtained ſome advantages over the league, yet the catholics were far from being intimidated: they made the moſt violent efforts againſt their ſovereign, and the cardinal legate publiſhed the pontiff's bull for the election of a popiſh king. They intended to have given the crown to Philip; and the duke of Parma marched a powerful army into France, to over-awe the aſſembly, which the Spaniſh party propoſed to be held at Rheims or Soiſſons. But the duke of Mayenne, ſenſible of the conſequences, ordered the aſſembly to be held at Paris. This, in ſome meaſure, diſconcerted the plan of the prince of Parma; and Henry drew all his troops out of Normandy, in order to fight the Spaniſh general before he could advance into the heart of the country. What the conſequence would have been, it is impoſſible to ſay; but all the vaſt deſigns of Philip were rendered abortive by the death of the prince of Parma, who paid the debt of nature in the forty-fifth year of his age. Even Elizabeth herſelf is ſaid to have dropped ſome generous expreſſions to the memory of that great man; and, perhaps, few princes ever excelled him in virtue, in civil, and in military accompliſhments. His great merits were ſoon conſpicuous after his death. No other general had authority ſufficient to maintain a proper diſcipline in the Spaniſh troops. The ſoldiers mutinied, and a great number of them deſerted.

Elizabeth now determined to make another attempt to humble the pride of Philip, by cutting off the ſinews of his ſtrength in the Weſt Indies. Sir Walter Raleigh was ſent with a ſquadron of fifteen men of war, either to attack Panama, or intercept the Plate fleet in their return to Europe. No man was ever better adapted to enterprizes of this kind than Sir Walter: his ſchemes were great, but difficult, if not impracticable to any capacity but his own: his learning was not inferior to his knowledge, his conſtancy to his courage, nor his virtue to his genius, which was equal to the greateſt undertakings. Having been detained too long in port by contrary winds, he ſailed three months later than he intended; and after paſſing the Land's End, he learned, that orders had been ſent from Spain to ſtop the return of the Plate fleet to Europe that ſeaſon. This intelligence, together with a violent ſtorm which ſeparated his fleet, obliged him to altar his plan of operations. He ſent one part of his ſquadron, under Sir Martin Forbiſher, to cruize on the coaſt of Spain; and another par under Burroughs, a brave ſea officer, to the Azores. The earl of Cumberland was alſo at ſea with three men of war, and had chaſed a galleon into Flores, juſt as Burroughs arrived at that iſland; while the Spaniſh fleet, which was then at ſea, went in ſearch o Forbiſher. Burroughs would have made himſel maſter of the galleon, which had taken ſhelter i Flores, had not a dead calm ſucceeded, and given th Spaniards an opportunity of unloading the treaſure and ſetting the ſhip on fire. He had, however, the good fortune, ſoon after, to take another galleon, afte a deſperate engagement, in which the greater part o the Spaniſh crew, conſiſting of ſix hundred men were either killed or wounded. The Engliſ gained both riches and honour by this capture. The money publickly known amounted t one hundred and fifty thouſand pounds, and th embezzlements were thought to be at leaſt equa in value,

Towards the latter end of this year the papiſts began again to ſhew their inclination to rebellion both in England and Scotland. One Richard Hacket was ſent by the Engliſh fugitives beyond ſea, t perſuade Ferdinand, earl of Derby, to aſſume th regal title, by claim of deſcent from Mary, daughte to Henry VII. and to threaten him that, unleſs h undertook this enterprize, and withal concealed th adviſer, he ſhould ſhortly die in the moſt wretche manner; and, as an encouragement, he was told that he might aſſuredly rely on the aſſiſtance of th king of Spain. The earl, however, fearing this w a trap laid for him, diſcovered the whole affair to th council, and Hacket was taken and hanged: but th threats of that villain were unhappily fulfilled upo the poor earl, who, in leſs than four months afte died in the moſt excruciating torture, ſuppoſed to b the effects of poiſon. The ſuſpicion fell upon h gentleman of the horſe, who diſappeared on th morrow after his lordſhip's death. In the earl's cham ber was found an image of wax, with hairs thru through the belly of it of the ſame colour with his own; which was thought to have been placed there to take off the ſuſpicion of his having been poiſoned, and to throw it upon the effects of necromancy, which, in thoſe days, was greatly credited. Coppinger and Arthington, two principals concerned with Hacket, died ſoon after, the former in Bridewell, and the latter in Wood-ſtreet Compter.

A. D. 1593. The French monarch, notwithſtanding all his heroic qualities, and the great aſſiſtance he received from the Engliſh, ſoon found that arms alone would never make him maſter of his kingdom. He found it impoſſible to triumph over the rage of a party whom religious zeal had rendered the moſt obſtinate rebels. A conſpiracy was even formed in his own court, for electing ſome catholic prince to fill the throne of France, if Henry any longer delayed to embrace the eſtabliſhed religion. The more ſenſible among the proteſtants perceived the neceſſity of ſatisfying the catholics. Henry accordingly abjured Calviniſm, either from conviction, or, as it is rather ſuppoſed, from political motives. But however that be, the papiſts triumphed greatly in gaining ſo illuſtrious a proſelyte; and the dreadful diſputes, which had for ſo many years deluged France with blood, began to ſubſide. Elizabeth, who was herſelf chiefly attached to the proteſtants by political reaſons, reproached Henry for this intereſted converſion in a very angry letter; but ſhe at length liſtened to his apologies, and continued her aſſiſtance: ſhe even entered into a new treaty with him, in which it was ſtipulated, that no peace ſhould be made with Philip without the concurrence of both parties.

A. D. 1594. Philip's intrigues were not confined to England only: he endeavoured to excite freſh diſturbances in Scotland; large ſupplies were promiſed by the governor of the Netherlands if the catholics would attempt to wreſt the ſceptre from James, and give it to a prince of the Romiſh perſuaſion. The project, however, was principally levelled againſt England; for though the Spaniards promiſed to ſend an army into Scotland, it was only to cover their enterprize againſt Elizabeth, whom they intended to aſſaſſinate; and, during the general conſternation which they imagined muſt attend her death, they propoſed to invade England, which would then become an eaſy conqueſt. The ſcheme was carried on for ſome time with apparent ſucceſs; but being at length happily diſcovered, ſeveral of the agents employed by the conſpirators were apprehended, two of whom were executed at Tyburn, where they confeſſed every particular relative to the horrid undertaking in which they had been employed.

A. D. 1595. Elizabeth was ſo enraged at the perfidious and treacherous Spaniards, that ſhe determined o carry the war into the very heart of Spain, and mmediately gave orders that all neceſſary preparaions ſhould be made for that purpoſe. During this uſineſs ſeveral noble atchievements were performed t ſea by the Engliſh; but the moſt remarkable was n expedition of Sir Walter Raleigh to Guiana, a rge tract of land in South America, rather poſſeſſed an inhabited by the Spaniards. He had, at his wn expence, ſent one Whiddon to view the coaſt, nd make all the obverſations in his power. His port confirmed Raleigh in his reſolution of endeauring to wreſt that extenſive country out of the nds of the Spaniards. His undertaking was ſo nerally applauded, that both the treaſurer and adiral of England contributed to the expences of tting out a fleet for carrying the deſign into execuon. Accordingly, on the ſixth of February, Sir Walter ſailed from Plymouth; and on the twentycond of March, took the city of St. Joſeph, in the and of Trinadada, and made Boreo, the Spaniſh vernor, priſoner. Having procured all the information poſſible with regard to the ſtrength and riches of Guiana, Raleigh manned his long-boats with about an hundred men, and proceeded above four hundred miles up the river Oroonoko; but met with ſo many difficulties from the navigation and the heat of the climate, that he did not reap all the advantages ſo brave and dangerous an undertaking deſerved. It is certain, however, that he made great diſcoveries; and though we have no authentic account of the riches he acquired in this undertaking, there is ſufficient reaſon to believe they were very conſiderable.

A. D. 1596. In conſequence of the orders iſſued by Elizabeth, the neceſſary preparations were now ready for making a forcible attack on the Spaniſh territories. A powerful fleet was equipped at Plymouth, conſiſting of one hundred and ninety veſſels, on board of which were 6360 ſoldiers, 1000 volunteers, and 6772 ſeamen. The fleet was commanded by lord Effingham, and the land forces by the earl of Eſſex. The lord Thomas Howard, Sir Walter Raleigh, Sir Francis Vere, Sir George Carew, and Sir Conniers Clifford, had commands in this expedition, and were named as counſellors to the general and admiral.

Every precaution being taken to render the expedition ſucceſsful, the fleet ſet ſail from Plymouth on the firſt of June. The general rendezvous was appointed at Cadiz, and armed tenders were diſpatched before the fleet to intercept every ſhip that could carry any intelligence to the enemy. Near Cadiz they took an Iriſh veſſel, by which they learned that the harbour was full of merchant ſhips of great value; and that the Spaniards lived in perfect ſecurity, without the leaſt apprehenſions of a viſit from the enemy. This intelligence raiſed the ſpirits of the Engliſh, and inſpired them with hopes of enriching themſelves at the expence of the Spaniards.

After making a fruitleſs attempt to land at St. Sebaſtian's, on the weſtern ſide of the iſland of Cadiz, a propoſition was made by Sir Walter Raleigh to attack the ſhips and veſſels in the bay; and he was ſtrongly ſeconded by the young earl of Eſſex, who burnt with an eager deſire of ſignalizing his courage on this important occaſion. The motion was unanimouſly agreed to; and it was determined that Raleigh ſhould lead the attack in the Warſpite, and be ſeconded by Sir George Carew in the Mary Roſe, Sir Robert Southwell in the Lion, Sir Francis Vere in the Rainbow, vice-admiral Croſs in the Swiftſure, Sir Conniers Clifford in the Dreadnought, and the lord Thomas Howard in the Nonpareil.

In the mean time the Spaniards were not idle in making proper diſpoſitions to receive the enemy. They ranged their gallies under the wall of the city, ſo as to flank the Engliſh ſhips as they paſſed: ſome culverins were planted to ſecure the channel of the harbour; and the artillery, both of Fort St. Philip and the curtain of the fortification, were brought to bear on the Engliſh fleet. Beſides theſe, the Spaniards had put guns on board all their large galleons, which were covered by Fort Puntal, ſituated in the middle of the harbour. The cannonade continued the whole night on both ſides, and the following morning, at break of day, the action began.

Sir Walter Raleigh, at the head of the Engliſh van, advanced to the attack, and received the fire from Fort St. Philip, the curtain, and ſeventeen gallies; but he anſwered only by a flouriſh of his trumpets, purſuing his courſe with amazing intrepidity, in order to encourage the ſhips that followed him, and reſerve his fire for the body of the enemy. After a long and moſt deſperate engagement, Sir Walter prepared to board the Spaniſh admiral, a ſhip of 1500 tons; but the Spaniards perceiving his intention, ran her on ſhore, and ſet her on fire. Three other galleons followed the example of their admiral, but two of them were ſaved, and brought away by the Engliſh.

During this engagement, the earl of Eſſex, with 500 men, landed at the Puntals, and marched directly to Cadiz. Five hundred Spaniards advanced about 400 paces from the city to meet him; but were ſtruck with a panic, retired into the city with the utmoſt precipitation, and were cloſely followed by the Engliſh. Cadiz was now in the utmoſt conſternation; and before any meaſures could be taken for making a proper defence, the Engliſh had forced the gate, and were ſoon in poſſeſſion of the market-place. The garriſon and inhabitants retired to the caſtle and town-houſe, but ſoon offered to capitulate; and it was agreed that their lives ſhould be ſaved on their paying 70,000 ducats. A prodigious quantity of ſilver was found in the place, and ſent immediately on board the Engliſh fleet.

While Eſſex was employed in the reduction of Cadiz, Sir Walter Raleigh was ſent to burn the merchant-ſhips at Port Real. The Spaniards offered to pay two millions of ducats for their ranſom; but Raleigh rejected the offer, ſaying, that he came to deſtroy, and not to ranſom the ſhips of the enemy. The Spaniards, however, ſound means to unload ſome of their ſhips, and ſet fire to others, in order to deprive the Engliſh of their riches. Beſides the merchant-ſhips, two galleons, thirteen men of war, eleven ſhips freighted for the Indies, and thirteen others, were taken by the Engliſh. They alſo deſtroyed a prodigious quantity of military and naval ſtores prepared for an intended expedition againſt England; and the whole loſs of the Spaniards was eſtimated at twenty millions of ducats.

The only Engliſhman of note that periſhed in this memorable conqueſt was Sir John Wingfield, who was killed in the city of Cadiz; and the victory was obtained with the loſs only of 200 men. Beſides the great riches loſt by the Spaniards, and the ruin of their trade to the New World for this year, they were obliged to ſubmit to the mortifying reflection of ſeeing one of their principal ſea-ports in the hands of an enemy whom they had hoped to conquer, and whoſe deſtruction they had flattered themſelves they ſhould eaſily accompliſh.

The earl of Eſſex conſidered the great ſucceſs of this enterprize only as a ſtep to farther conqueſts. He inſiſted on keeping poſſeſſion of Cadiz, and undertook, with 400 men and three months proviſions, to defend the place againſt all the attempts of the enemy, till ſuccours could arrive from England. But this offer was rejected; nor were his ſchemes for intercepting the carracks at the Azores, aſſaulting the Groyne, or taking St. Andero and St. Sebaſtian, accepted. All the other ſeamen and ſoldiers, ſatisfied with the honour they had acquired, were impatient to return home in order to ſecure their plunder. Eſſex complained of their want of ſpirit in this enterprize, and the queen herſelf was not pleaſed at their return without attempting to intercept the India fleet: but the great ſucceſs of the enterprize againſt Cadiz covered all their miſcarriages. Effingham was created earl of Nottingham, a promotion which gave great offence to Eſſex, becauſe it was ſaid, in the preamble to his patent, that this dignity was conferred upon him for his good ſervices in taking Cadiz, a merit which Eſſex inſiſted belonged principally to himſelf.

Towards the latter end of this year died that brave and experienced ſea-officer Sir Francis Drake; whoſe death was a public calamity to his country, as he was one of the beſt ſeamen England ever produced. His courage was unqueſtionable, and he had been ſucceſsful in moſt of his expeditions. He had for ſome years ſerved in parliament as a burgeſs for Plymouth, and the houſe, on many occaſions, received great lights from his information. As he had riſen from the loweſt ſphere in the navy to its higheſt honours, he had clear and diſtinct notions of its moſt minute articles.

A. D. 1597. Philip was ſo enraged at the loſſes he had ſuſtained by the taking of Cadiz, and the deſtruction of his navy, that he reſolved to make another effort for the conqueſt of England. Accordingly, in beginning of the ſpring, he aſſembled a formidable fleet, at a time when Elizabeth thought him abſolutely diſabled from executing any ſcheme of revenge. His fleet rendezvouſed at Ferrol, and having taken on board the land forces deſtined for the expedition, ſteered directly for England; but before they reached the channel, a violent ſtorm diſperſed the fleet, and their ſcheme was for the preſent rendered abortive.

In revenge for this attempt Elizabeth determined to attack Tercera, the principal iſland of the Azores, and, if poſſible, intercept the Spaniſh flota, in their return from the Weſt-Indies. A large armament, conſiſting of 122 ſhips, was accordingly fitted out with the utmoſt expedition, and ſix thouſand land forces were embarked. The command of the whole expedition was given to Eſſex, together with one of the diviſions of the fleet; the ſecond diviſion was commanded by lord Thomas Howard, and the third by Sir Walter Raleigh: lord Montjoy was appointed lieutenant-general under Eſſex: and Sir George Carew, lieutenant of the ordnance.

The fleet ſailed on the 9th of July, and its deſtination was firſt againſt Ferrol and the Groyne, in order, if poſſible, to ſurprize the Spaniſh fleet in thoſe harbours; after which they were to make an attack on the Azores. But contrary winds, ſtorms, and a fatal quarrel between the earl of Eſſex and Sir Walter Raleigh, broke theſe meaſures, and the fleet returned to England about the end of October, without having performed any memorable action.

A. D. 1598. In the beginning of this year Elizabeth received certain advice that Henry of France and Philip of Spain, equally tired out with a bloody and expenſive war between them, were deſirous of peace, and that a private negotiation was actually on foot for that purpoſe. The ſame intelligence reached the ſtates-general, who, as well as Elizabeth, was greatly alarmed at this deſign, and each immediately diſpatched an ambaſſador to oppoſe the pacific ſentiments of the French monarch. Henry ſhewed them at once the ſolidity of his reaſons and the rectitude of his views; and as Philip would not treat with the Hollanders upon the condition of acknowledging them a free people, nor Elizabeth negotiate without their concurrence, he concluded, at Vervins, a ſeperate peace; whereby he recovered poſſeſſion of all the places ſeized by Spain during the courſe of the civil wars, and procured himſelf leiſure to attend the domeſtic ſettlement of his kingdom.

Some of the chiefs of the Engliſh miniſtry, particularly lord Burleigh, who beſt merited the queen's confidence, adviſed her to embrace pacific meaſures; but all his reaſons were urged in vain. That ſpirited princeſs, at other times ſo attentive to the prevention, now liſtened not to the ears of adverſe fortune. She no longer dreaded the attempts of the Spaniards; the armada's of Philip had loſt their terror. Animated with the hopes of ſharing in the riches of America, and deeply intereſted in the new republic, ſhe preferred an honourable war to the advantage of a peace, which muſt have entailed miſery and ſlavery upon Holland. The earl of Eſſex encouraged her in theſe ſentiments. He repreſented to her, that the defence of the Hollanders was the original cauſe of the war; and that it was at once unſafe and diſhonourable to abandon the cauſe ſhe had undertaken to defend, till ſhe had placed them in a ſtate of greater ſecurity, and procured them that liberty for which they had ſo long and ſo nobly contended.

The arguments of Eſſex, whoſe perſon was very agreeable to the queen, prevailed: the favourite ſeemed daily to gain the aſcendant over the miniſter. That nobleman was no leſs diſtinguiſhed by his underſtanding than by his birth and figure. He was bold, generous, ſincere, a firm friend, active, and paſſionately fond of glory; but carried away by his paſſions, and incapable of ſubmitting to the rein of prudence. Theſe paſſions at laſt proved his deſtruction. The Hollanders conſidered Elizabeth as their guardian angel, and readily ſubmitted to any terms ſhe pleaſed to require. The debt they owed the queen was now fixed at eight hundred thouſand pounds; of which ſum they agreed to pay thirty thouſand pounds a year during the continuance of the war, and theſe payments were to be continued till they had paid four hundred thouſand pounds. They alſo agreed to pay the garriſons of the cautionary towns while England continued the war with Spain; and that if Philip ſhould attempt an invaſion of England, to aſſiſt the queen with a body of five thouſand foot and five hundred horſe.

The ratification of this treaty took place on the 8th of Auguſt; a ſhort time after which Elizabeth found herſelf delivered from her greateſt fears by the death of Philip II. king of Spain, her moſt powerful enemy, who, at the age of ſeventy-two, and the forty-third of his reign, died a moſt dreadful death, being devoured by lice, which ſwarmed from innumerable ulcers in all parts of his body.

The ſatisfaction of Elizabeth at this event was greatly leſſened by the loſs of lord Burleigh, her zealous and faithful counſellor. That truly great man had long and earneſtly requeſted his miſtreſs to grant him ſome moments of interval between buſineſs and the grave; but he aſked in vain. He continued immerſed in all the fatigues of office, till death, on the fourteenth of Auguſt, gave him that repoſe which was denied him by Elizabeth. Lord Burleigh was now on the verge of eighty, and though many miniſters have lived with leſs envy, none ever died with greater reputation. He was chiefly diſtinguiſhed for ſolidity of underſtanding, probity of manners, and indefatigable application to buſineſs; he had been regarded as the chief miniſter near forty years, and his death, by a rare inſtance of fortune, was equally regretted by his ſovereign and the people.

The credit of Eſſex would now have been firmly eſtabliſhed, had it not been for his own imprudence; but the lofty ſpirit of that nobleman could ill ſubmit to the implicit deference which Elizabeth's temper required, and which ſhe had ever been accuſtomed to receive from all her ſubjects. Diſputing, one day, on ſome affair with the queen, he carried matters ſo high, as to turn his back upon her with an air of contempt. Elizabeth's anger, which was naturally prompt and violent, roſe on this provocation, and ſhe inſtantly gave him a box on the ear. The paſſion of Eſſex was too violent to be reſtrained. He laid his hand upon his ſword, and ſwore that he would not have taken ſo groſs an affront from her father Henry himſelf. The admiral and vice-chamberlain interpoſed between the ſovereign and the ſubject, and prevented any farther conſequences at that time; but Eſſex left the court, with a ſeeming reſolution never more to return. His friend Egerton, the chancellor, exhorted him to repair his indiſcretion by proper acknowledgments, to confeſs his faults, and conſider his duty and his fortune. He conjured him not to give that triumph to his enemies, that affliction to his friends, which muſt enſue from his ſupporting a conteſt with his ſovereign, and deſerting the ſervice of his country. Eſſex anſwered, in a letter full of reſentment, and which breathed all the violence of his haughty ſoul. He was even ſo imprudent as to ſhew this letter to his friends, who, with equal imprudence, diſperſed copies of it. But, notwithſtanding this additional affront, the queen's partiality for him was ſo prevalent, that ſhe reinſtated him in all his former poſts; and her kindneſs to him appeared rather to have acquired new force from the ſhort interruption of anger and reſentment.

A. D. 1599. Eſſex was no ſooner eſtabliſhed in the queen's favour, than he abuſed it. The troubles that now ſubſiſted in Ireland opened a new ſcene for his ambition, and he raſhly engaged in an undertaking which terminated in crimes and misfortunes.

Hugh O'Neill, whom the queen had created earl of Tyrone, and whoſe treachery was equal to his ferocious valour, excited a general rebellion in that kingdom; and having received aſſiſtance from the king of Spain, gained very conſiderable advantages. He had already aſſumed the character of the deliverer of his country, and the patron of Iriſh liberty. It was therefore determined to proſecute the war with vigour, and ſubdue the rebels by extraordinary efforts. The queen caſt her eyes on Charles Blount, lord Mountjoy, as a man, who, though hitherto leſs accuſtomed to arms than to books and literature, was endowed with talents that would ſufficiently atone for his want of experience. Jealous of every occaſion that offered for diſtinguiſhing himſelf, Eſſex repreſented, that this expedition required a man of birth, experience and reputation, much ſuperior to thoſe of Mountjoy, and at laſt procured the appointment for himſelf. Had he liſtened to the advice of his enemies, he could not have engaged in a more fatal undertaking. But Eſſex was incapable of caution; he imagined that every difficulty would give way before him; and that his preſence, at the head of a numerous army, would be ſufficient to huſh the ferocious Iriſh into peace. The queen's preparations were equal to the tenderneſs ſhe cheriſhed for her favourite, and her deſire of ſubduing the flagitious rebels. She raiſed an army of twenty thouſand men, a force conſidered as abundantly ſufficient for finiſhing the war in a ſingle campaign. Eſſex was created lord-lieutenant of Ireland, and furniſhed with a commiſſion more ample than any that had hitherto been granted. He was empowered either to continue or finiſh the war; to pardon the earl of Tyrone, and other rebels; an authority never granted to any of his predeceſſors.

Soon after the commiſſion was ſigned, Eſſex ſet out for his new government, accompanied by a numerous train of nobility and gentry, who, from an affection to his perſon, had attached themſelves to his fortunes; and attended by the acclamations of the populace, by whom he was greatly beloved. The firſt act of his authority in Ireland was an indiſcretion, though of the generous kind. He appointed his friend, the earl of Southampton, general of the horſe, though the queen had enjoined him not to employ that nobleman, and even repeated orders were hardly ſufficient to induce him to revoke the commiſſion. The reſt of his conduct was conformable to this beginning. Inſtead of leading his powerful army into Ulſter againſt Tyrone, and putting an end to the rebellion, by reducing the chief, he ſuffered himſelf to be perſuaded by the Iriſh council to march into Munſter, ſituated at the other extremity of the kingdom. He indeed reduced the rebels to ſubmiſſion, but he loſt a very conſiderable part of his army in the attempt; and had no ſooner left the country, than they again revolted.

By this time the ſeaſon was conſiderably advanced, his army ſickly, and greatly reduced in their numbers;

bers; ſo that he was obliged to requeſt a reinforcement of two thouſand men, in order to enable him to march againſt Tyrone. The troops were immediately ſent by Elizabeth, and Eſſex at laſt advanced into Ulſter againſt the chief of the rebels. Tyrone, though at the head of an army greatly ſuperior in numbers to that of the Engliſh, wiſely avoided a deciſive action, and propoſed a conference with Eſſex, in order, as he pretended, to put a ſtop to the flames of civil diſcord, which had ſo long waſted Ireland. The offer was accepted, and the two generals met without any of their attendants. Tyrone behaved, during the conference, with the greateſt ſubmiſſion, and a ceſſation of arms was concluded till the firſt of May. By this treaty the expenſive expedition of Eſſex was rendered abortive, and affairs continued on the ſame footing as before.

As ſoon as Elizabeth was informed of the earl's conduct, ſhe wrote him a very ſevere letter, expreſſing the higheſt diſſatisfaction, and commanding him to continue in Ireland till farther orders. This ſufficiently alarmed the haughty Eſſex. Perſuaded that if he continued any longer at a diſtance from the court, he ſhould loſe all his influence with the queen, while his enemies enjoyed the malignant ſatisfaction of triumphing in his fall, he determined to diſobey the orders of Elizabeth. He accordingly left Ireland, and arrived at London before any one was the leaſt apprized of his intentions. He immediately repaired to court, and preſented himſelf before the queen, covered with duſt and ſweat. Whether Elizabeth's tenderneſs awaked at the ſight of her favourite, or whether ſurprize prevented her from attending to proprieties, ſhe gave him a very kind and flattering reception; and, on his departure, he was heard to thank God, that though he had met with many troubles and ſtorms abroad, he had found at home a ſweet and pleaſing calm.

This placid interval, however, was deceitful. Like the momentary ceſſations in a ſtorm, the tempeſt returned with all its force. Eſſex ſoon learned how much his preſumption and his faults had weakened his influence over Elizabeth's heart, which was leſs tender than haughty. She ordered him to be confined to his chamber, and to be twice examined before the privy council. His anſwers were calm and ſubmiſſive, but not ſufficient to ſatisfy Elizabeth: ſhe committed him to the cuſtody of the lord keeper; and none of his friends, not even his counteſs, were permitted to viſit him.

In the mean time, the earl of Tyrone, meeting with no oppoſition in his progreſs, reduced the province of Ulſter to his obedience; and being encouraged by a bull ſent from pope Clement VII. granting him and his adherents the ſame indulgencies as thoſe who fought againſt the Turks in the recovery of the Holy Land, he flattered himſelf with being ſoon maſter of the whole kingdom. He was alſo promiſed a ſupply of men and money from Spain; and having received a conſecrated plume from the pope, he called himſelf the champion of the catholic religion.

Elizabeth, alarmed at the progreſs of the rebels in Ireland, ſent the lord Mountjoy into that kingdom. The whole iſland, at his arrival, was in a very deſperate ſituation; but being a man of capacity and vigour, he was not diſcouraged. He advanced immediately into Ulſter againſt Tyrone, and, ſoon penetrated into the heart of that country, the ſeat of the rebels. He drove them from the open fields, and obliged them to take refuge in their bogs and foreſts. Sir George Carew had equal ſucceſs in Munſter, and the queen's authority was once more eſtabliſhed in Ireland.

A. D. 1600. The ſucceſs of Mountjoy rendered the conduct of Eſſex leſs excuſable at court, though his popularity increaſed with his misfortunes. He had now been confined ſix months in the houſe of the lord-keeper, on which account ſuch cabals were raiſed by his friends and domeſtics, that the miniſtry were accuſed of malice, and the queen herſelf of injuſtice. Alarmed at the prejudices of the people, Elizabeth determined to bring Eſſex to an open trial before the privy council. Coke, the attorney general, opened the cauſe againſt him, and treated him with the cruelty and inſolence which that great lawyer uſually exerciſed on the unfortunate. Eſſex made no defence; he declared he would never have any conteſt with his ſovereign, and that he ſhould readily ſubmit to any judgment they might think proper to pronounce againſt him. The chancellor's ſentence, on this occaſion, is remarkable. "If the earl of Eſſex (ſaid he) had been tried in the ſtar-chamber, my ſentence muſt have been for as great a fine as ever was ſet upon any man's head in that court, together with perpetual impriſonment in the Tower; but ſince we are now in another place, and in a courſe of favour, my cenſure is, that the earl of Eſſex is not to execute the office of a counſellor, nor that of earl marſhal of England, nor of maſter of the ordnance; and to return to his own houſe, there to continue a priſoner till it ſhall pleaſe her majeſty to releaſe this, and all the reſt of his ſentence."

The celebrated Sir Francis Bacon was ordered by the queen to draw up a narrative of the whole proceedings, in order to ſatisfy the nation that ſhe had acted with the utmoſt lenity. Bacon, who was firmly attached to Eſſex, gave the whole tranſaction a very favourable turn for his patron: he painted, in the moſt elaborate expreſſions, the dutiful ſubmiſſion made by that nobleman before the council. The queen, when Bacon read the paſſage to her, could not forbear ſmiling; and obſerved, that old love could not eaſily be forgotten.

Eſſex received his chaſtiſement with ſo much humility, that the queen, perſuaded that it was ſincere, gave him proofs that ſhe had not entirely withdrawn her countenance from him. She gave orders that his ſentence ſhould not be recorded, and reſtored him to his full liberty; but at the ſame time adviſed him to be cautious of giving farther offence, and ordered him not to appear at court. Eſſex immediately prepared for his departure into the country; but before he ſet out, he wrote a letter to the queen, in which he told her, that he kiſſed her majeſty's hand and the rod with which ſhe had corrected him; but that he never could recover his uſual chearfulneſs till ſhe deigned to admit him to that preſence which had ever been the chief ſource of his happineſs and enjoyment; and that, in the mean time, he would retire into a country ſolitude, and labour aſſiduouſly to atone for his former offences.

Pleaſed with theſe ſentiments, the queen replied, that ſhe wiſhed his actions might be conformable to his expreſſions; but as he had ſo long abuſed her patience, ſhe would take ſome time to try his ſincerity. She added, "That if the furnace of affliction produced ſuch good effects, ſhe ſhould ever after have the better opinion of her chemiſtry."

Happy had it been for Eſſex could he have conformed to that ſubmiſſion he knew ſo well how to deſcribe; but his reſtleſs paſſions were too powerful to be guided by the reins of prudence. Though bleſſed with the ſociety of an amiable and ſenſible wife, with whom he peruſed the writings of the antients, ſo capable of healing the diſeaſes of the mind by leſſons equally ſolid and agreeable, he could not eſcape the illuſions of ambition; he cheriſhed a paſſion that preyed upon his repoſe. Elizabeth reflected not, that this haughty ſpirit, when driven to extremities, was capable of trampling under foot every ſpecies of duty, as well as the laws of his country. By puſhing her precautions too far, ſhe inflamed his reſentment. He loſt all hopes of her favour, forgot her former kindneſſes, and flew to revenge. He imprudently followed the intereſted counſels of ſome needy friends who lived upon his bounty, and determined to have recourſe to violent meaſures. To increaſe the number of his partizans, he paid his court to the catholics, and ſecretly ſolicited the king of Scotland's aſſiſtance. He acquainted him, "that whatſoever appearances the Engliſh court affected, a reſolution was formed to place the Infanta of Spain on the throne of England; that to facilitate this deſign, all places of power, all poſts of importance, were in the hands of thoſe who were ſworn enemies to the Stuart family; the lord high-admiral had the command of the navy and army; Buckhurſt was at the head of the treaſury; Cobham was warden of the cinque ports; Cecil, lord lieutenant of the north; Raleigh governor of the iſlands of Guernſey and Jerſey; and Carew preſident of Munſter; places very favourable for landing the Infanta." He added, "the queen's underſtanding as ſo greatly impaired, that ſhe was incapable of cting for herſelf, and was entirely guided by her iniſters; that it was therefore abſolutely neceſſary or him to act openly againſt this conſpiracy, by ſend- ng ambaſſadors immediately to the Engliſh court, o demand a public declaration of his title to the ucceſſion, and the removal of his enemies, all crea- ures and penſioners of Spain, from the court and ouncil."

But Eſſex placed his chief dependence for ſupport n the puritans, whoſe manners he now entirely dopted. The moſt celebrated preachers of that ſect ſorted to his houſe, which now became a kind of lpit, where the fervours of fanaticiſm conſtantly ſcharged themſelves. The genius of the age was ſo tirely devoted to theſe rhapſodies, that the language the reformation had more attractions for the people an pleaſure itſelf: nothing more effectually ingra- ted an ambitious leader with the public than theſe ligious entertainments. The ambitious Eſſex ſpared t the queen in his diſcourſes; he repreſented her as old woman, whoſe temper was as crooked as her rſon. Elizabeth was informed of theſe liberties, ich highly incenſed her againſt him. He could t have attacked her in a more tender part. She s always fond of flattery, and loved to be complinted on her beauty; nor could either her own good ſe, or old age itſelf, cure her of this prepoſterous rmity.

A. D. 1601. Eſſex had now formed a ſelect coun- of mal-contents, conſiſting of the earl of South- pton, Sir Charles Danvers, Sir Ferdinando Gorges, Chriſtopher Blount, Sir John Davis, and John leton, of Frakel. The reſt of his friends, accord- to a liſt he produced at Drury-Houſe, the uſual ce of their meeting, conſiſted of one hundred and nty of the firſt noblemen and gentlemen in the gdom. Here all their plans were laid, and all r reſolutions formed. Among other criminal pro- s debated in this aſſembly, was that of the moſt per method of taking up arms; and it was at laſt eed, that the firſt attack ſhould be made upon the ce; that Sir Chriſtopher Blount, at the head of a ice detachment, ſhould take poſſeſſion of the gates; Davis ſhould ſeize the hall; Danvers the guard preſence-chamber; and that Eſſex, attended by lect number of his partizans, ſhould ruſh in from Meuſe, oblige the queen to remove his enemies, mble a parliament, and ſettle a new plan of go- nment.

lizabeth was informed of all theſe reſolutions, took the neceſſary precautions to render them abortive. Eſſex never doubted but the citizens of London, by whom he was greatly beloved, would take up arms at the firſt ſignal. He was, however, miſtaken. The court had taken meaſures to prevent it; and when he appeared in the city, accompanied with about two hundred men, he found that his ſeditious exhortations had no effect. They gazed at him as he paſſed along the ſtreets, but none took up arms in his defence. Diſappointed of aſſiſtance, he returned to his own houſe, which was ſoon ſurrounded by a detachment of the guards. He at firſt determined to defend himſelf to the laſt extremity, and periſh like a ſoldier with the ſword in his hand, rather than by the axe of a baſe executioner. But he ſoon after abandoned this reſolution; and, notwithſtanding all his bravery, ſubmitted at diſcretion. He and the earl of Southampton were immediately conveyed acroſs the water to the archbiſhop of Canterbury's palace at Lambeth, from whence they were the next day ſent to the Tower; and the friends of Eſſex were confined in different priſons.

The queen, who had behaved on this occaſion with the greateſt tranquillity and preſence of mind, gave immediate orders for the trial of the moſt conſiderable of the priſoners. On the 19th of February the earls of Eſſex and Southampton were arraigned before a jury of twenty-five peers, the lord-treaſurer Buckhurſt acting as lord high-ſteward. The priſoners, among other articles, were charged with conſpiring to ſurprize the queen in her palace; inciting the citizens of London to ſedition and rebellion; aſſaulting her majeſty's forces in the ſtreets, and holding out Eſſex houſe againſt Elizabeth. The guilt of the priſoner was too glaring to admit of any doubt; and even Eſſex's friends were aſtoniſhed when he inſiſted on his innocence, and ſtill more ſo, when, without the leaſt appearance of reaſon, he accuſed ſecretary Cecil of being a partizan with him in his rebellious attempts; which accuſation, on being confronted with Cecil, he could not maintain. His whole defence being as trifling as this charge, the peers found him and Southampton guilty of treaſon.

When ſentence of death was pronounced, the behaviour of Eſſex was manly and decent; he profeſſed a contempt for his life, but not for his reputation. He ſaid he ſhould be ſorry if he was repreſented to the queen as a perſon who deſpiſed her clemency, though he believed he could never purchaſe it at the expence of any mean ſubmiſſion. "If her majeſty," added he, "had ſo pleaſed, this body of mine might have "done her better ſervice, but I am happy it can ſerve "her any way." The behaviour of Southampton was more modeſt and ſubmiſſive, he intreated the good offices of the peers in ſo mild and becoming a manner, as excited pity in every breaſt.

For ſome days Eſſex maintained his pride, but at length it was ſubdued by the principles of religion. His ſpiritual directors perſuaded him, that he never could obtain the pardon of heaven, unleſs he made a full confeſſion of his diſloyalty. Convinced of this, he gave in to the council an account of all his deſigns; together with the particulars of his friendſhips and correſpondences in writing; upon which Sir Henry Nevil, Elizabeth's reſident in France, was ſent for home, and impriſoned, as being privy to his treaſons; though it appears that that gentleman had never aſſented to the propoſals made him, and was no farther criminal than in not revealing the earl's treaſon; an office to which a man of honour has always the greateſt repugnance. Lord Mountjoy was likewiſe accuſed by the earl, but the greatneſs of his ſervices in Ireland, and perhaps the fear of rendering him deſperate, prevailed with Elizabeth to overlook the accuſation, and continue him in his government.

In every great example which Elizabeth made during her reign, ſhe always appeared full of reluctance and heſitation. But what, in all probability, proceeded from art in preceding caſes was now owing to a more ſincere motive; for the preſent ſituation of Eſſex called forth all her tender affections, and kept her in the moſt real agitation and irreſolution. She felt a perpetual combat between reſentment and inclination, pride and compaſſion. She ſigned the warrant for his execution, then countermanded it; ſhe again reſolved on his death, and again felt a new return of tenderneſs. But what chiefly hardened her heart againſt him was his ſuppoſed obſtinacy in never making application to her for mercy and forgiveneſs: for after his return from Cadiz, being one day alone with her, he regretted that the neceſſity of her ſervice required him to be ſo often abſent from her, which expoſed him to all thoſe ill offices of his enemies, more aſſiduous in their attendance, employed againſt him. Elizabeth, affected by this tender jealouſy, made him the preſent of a ring, which ſhe deſired him to keep as a pledge of her affection, and aſſured him in whatever diſgrace he ſhould fall, whatever prejudices ſhe might be induced to entertain againſt him, yet if he ſent her that ring, ſhe would immediately upon the ſight of it, recollect her former tenderneſs, would once more ſee him, and lend a favourable ear to his apology. This gift Eſſex preſerved amidſt all his misfortunes, and after his condemnation reſolved to try what effect it would have on the queen. He committed the care of it to the counteſs of Nottingham, whom he deſired to preſent it to Elizabeth. The counteſs was prevailed on by her huſband, who was the mortal enemy of Eſſex, not to execute the commiſſion; and Elizabeth, who ſtill expected that her favourite would make this laſt appeal to her tenderneſs, imputed the neglect of it to his invincible obſtinacy. She, therefore, after much delay, and many internal combats, was urged by reſentment and policy to ſign the warrant for his execution.

The unfortunate Eſſex ſuffered his ſentence on the 25th of February, in the court-yard of the Tower, which was the place he had himſelf requeſted. He was attended by Aſhton, a diſſenting miniſter, and two divines of the church of England. By Elizabeth's particular order ſeveral noblemen were preſent on the ſcaffold at the execution, with ſome of the aldermen of London, and ſeveral other gentlemen belonging to the court. Among the reſt was Sir Walter Raleigh, the avowed enemy of Eſſex: but his friends telling him how invidious ſuch behaviour muſt appear, they prevailed on him to leave the ſcaffold, from whence he retired to a window, where he ſaw the head of Eſſex ſtruck off. The behaviour of the earl in his laſt moments was full of penitence and contrition. He betrayed no ſigns of fear, and acknowledged the juſtice of his ſentence.

Thus fell Robert Devereux, earl of Eſſex, in the thirty-fifth year of his age. He was deſcended from a royal lineage on the female ſide, and endowed with ſuperior talents and heroic qualities. He was generous, liberal, and humane, a patron of learning, in which he himſelf held a conſiderable rank, a warm friend and an open enemy. His foibles were vanity, ambition, and an impetuoſity of temper which he could not reſtrain. He ruined himſelf for want of knowing how to enjoy good fortune with moderation. The people, by whom he was too much beloved, were irritated at his death; and the queen, who was accuſed of cruelty, no longer heard the uſual acclamations when ſhe appeared in public.

Several of Eſſex's aſſociates were afterwards executed: Meyrick and Cuff, two of the principals, were hanged at Tyburn on the 15th of March. Sir Chriſtopher Blount and Sir Charles Danvers were beheaded on Tower-hill; Litleton, Orel, and Sir Edward Baintown were tried and condemned, but the former died in priſon, and the others were pardoned. The earl of Southampton's life was preſerved with great difficulty; but he was kept a priſoner in the Tower till the death of the queen, when he was releaſed by order of James I.

A. D. 1602. The deſigns of the Spaniards for diſturbing the peace of Elizabeth were far from terminating with the death of Philip II. The ſame councils ſtill continued, and the ſame meaſures were zealouſly purſued. The preparations for an expedition againſt Ireland had been for ſome time finiſhed, but ſuſpended on account of the troubles that broke out in Spain. Theſe having now ſubſided, Don John d'Aquila was ſent at the head of a body of troops into that kingdom, and made religion a pretence for the enterprizes of ambition and rebellion. He aſſumed the title of "General of the Holy war, for the preſervation of the faith in Ireland." Care had been taken to authorize theſe meaſures by bulls from Rome: and d'Aquila endeavoured to perſuade the people, that a queen deprived of her authority by the pope, had no longer any right to the crown; that her ſubjects, abſolved from their oaths of allegiance by the holy father, ought to take up arms againſt her, and drive her from a throne of which ſhe ought to be conſidered as an uſurper. He added, that the ſole intention of his coming was to aſſiſt them in that religious undertaking, and to deliver them from the dominion of the Devil.

Mountjoy ſaw the gathering ſtorm, and exerted all his abilities to break its force. The Iriſh ſhewed every where ſigns of a general inſurrection, and the utmoſt vigour was neceſſary to prevent it. He immediately laid ſiege to Kinſale, which the Spaniard had taken immediately after their landing; but h had hardly begun his operations before he received intelligence, that another body of two thouſand Spaniards, under the command of Alphonſo Ocampo were landed, and had taken poſſeſſion of Baltimor and Berehaven. He found himſelf therefore obliged to detach Sir George Carew to oppoſe the progreſ of the enemy. Tyrone immediately haſtened to th relief of Kinſale; but Mountjoy having receive information of his deſign, advanced to meet him a the head of part of his army, totally defeated the re bels, and took ſeveral of them priſoners. Tyron himſelf eſcaped into Ulſter, but was utterly incapabl of giving the Engliſh any farther diſturbance. Th Spaniſh general now perceived that all reſiſtanc would be in vain, and immediately offered to ſu render all places held by the Spaniards in Irelan and evacuate the kingdom. The conditions we accepted, and the Spaniards embarked for their ow country. This defeat ſtruck the rebels with terro They ſaw the foreign forces on whom they ſo great depended, incapable of giving them any ſuppor and deſpaired of ever being able to make head agai Engliſh.

Elizabeth was ſo exaſperated at the Spaniards f the difficulties in which they had involved her b fomenting the rebellion in Ireland, that ſhe dete mined to ſeek ample revenge. She accordingly o dered a ſquadron of nine ſhips to be immediately f ted out under the command of Sir Richard Leveſ and Sir Richard Monſon, with orders to ſail on expedition to the coaſt of Spain. This fleet l England early in the ſpring, and ſoon after part the ſquadron fell in with the galleons loaded w treaſure; but were not ſtrong enough to attack th with any proſpect of ſucceſs. The other diviſion a met with a fleet of very rich ſhips, and was, for t ſame reaſon, obliged to let them purſue their cou unmoleſt unmoleſted. Theſe diſappointments induced the two admirals to join the the little ſquadrons, and purſue the deſign of the expedition in company. For ſome time they met with no ſhips of the enemy, and it was determined, in order to prevent the expedition from being entirely fruitleſs, to attack the harbour of Coimbra in Portugal, where they were informed a rich carrack had taken ſhelter. The harbour was defended by a caſtle mounted with heavy pieces of cannon; eleven gallies were moored near the entrance, and the militia of the country, amounting to near twenty thouſand men, appeared on the ſhore. But all theſe indications of a powerful oppoſition were not ſufficient to intimidate the Engliſh. They broke into the harbour, diſmounted the guns of the caſtle, ſunk, burnt, and put to flight the gallies, and made themſelves maſters of the carrack. With this prize they returned to England, where her loading was valued at near a million of ducats; a very ſenſible loſs to the Spaniards, and a ſtill more conſiderable ſupply to Elizabeth.

In the mean time the lord Mountjoy improved ſo well his late victory in Ireland, that Tyrone and his friends were ſoon reduced to the greateſt diſtreſs; and many of them, after concealing themſelves in woods and moraſſes, where they lived rather like beaſts than men, thought proper to abandon their retreats, and ſubmit to the mercy of the Engliſh government. They were received with kindneſs, and the terms impoſed upon them were ſo mild and generous, that Tyrone himſelf, ſeeing all hopes either of ſucceeding, or eſcaping to the continent, were vaniſhed, applied, in the moſt abject manner, both to the queen herſelf and the governor, for pardon. The queen was long reſolved not to ſhew the leaſt favour to that ferocious and perfidious rebel, but being continually importuned by her council, who repreſented the prodigious expence ſhe had been at, in maintaining an army in Ireland to purſue the rebels, and that by ſhewing clemency to the great leader in every inſurrection, ſhe would infallibly reſtore tranquillity to that diſtreſſed kingdom, and introduce a proper legiſlation among the people, ſhe was at laſt prevailed upon to recede from her reſolution. She ſigned his pardon, and ſent it to Mountjoy; ſacrificing her reſentment to the peace of her ſubjects, who had ſo long felt all the dreadful effects of civil diſcord.

But the terms to which the lord-deputy was reſtrained were thought ſo ſevere by the council, that they apprehended Tyrone would never ſubmit to them. Had that furious leader perceived even the ſmalleſt proſpect of ſupporting himſelf againſt the Engliſh, there is not the leaſt doubt but he would have rejected the conditions with diſdain; but he was deprived of every reſource, and enjoyed only the wretched alternative of accepting the queen's pardon on her own terms, or periſh with hunger. He made no heſitation in chuſing the former, and accordingly repaired to the lord-deputy's ſeat at Malleſont, where he preſented himſelf before him on his knees, and in that ſubmiſſive poſture received his pardon. O'Rourk, another active chief in the late inſurrections, ſurrendered about a month after Tyrone; and thus that dreadful rebellion which had raged in Ireland with the utmoſt violence during eight years, and coſt the queen near four hundred thouſand pounds annually, was entirely ſuppreſſed; the whole kingdom was reduced to a ſtate of ſubjection, and the people taſted the pleaſures attendant on tranquillity.

A. D. 1603. But Elizabeth did not long enjoy the ſatisfaction of ſeeing this conſiderable part of her dominions in a ſtate of peace. An incident now happened that not only rendered her inſenſible to every degree of pleaſure, but in a very ſhort time deprived her of her exiſtence. The counteſs of Nottingham had been for ſome time afflicted with a violent diſtemper, and finding her life was drawing towards a period, ſhe was ſeized with remorſe for her cruelty to Eſſex in not delivering the ring to the queen according to his earneſt requeſt. She petitioned therefore, and at laſt obtained a viſit from Elizabeth, when ſhe craved her pardon, and revealed the fatal ſecret. Aſtoniſhed with this deteſtable inſtance of treachery, the queen burſt into the moſt violent paſſion of rage: ſhe ſhook the dying counteſs in her bed, ſaying, "that God might pardon her, but ſhe "never could;" and breaking from her, immediately retired to her palace at Richmond.

From this moment Elizabeth gave herſelf up to the deepeſt and moſt incurable melancholy: her pride would not ſuffer her to eaſe the anguiſh of her breaſt, by diſcloſing the real cauſe of her grief. Reaſons, ſtratagems, and prayers were in vain employed to perſuade her to have recourſe to medicines for relief; and it was with the utmoſt difficulty they prevailed with her to take the food that was neceſſary for the ſupport of life. She ſeemed determined to baniſh ſleep from her eyes; nor could ſhe be prevailed upon to retire to her bed; but ſpent her tedious nights in a continued ſilence, upon cuſhions piled up in her room. But though ſilent, ſhe was not inſenſible, and perceived herſelf abandoned by many, whom her munificence had raiſed from the greateſt obſcurity.

It was now ſufficiently viſible that Elizabeth's end was near approaching; and ſeveral ſerious deliberations were held in the council with regard to the ſucceſſion. For though all the members were firmly attached to James, yet they could not tell what the ſecret intrigues of the popiſh and puritan factions might produce, and therefore reaſonably thought, that Elizabeth's own declaration in favour of James would greatly ſtrengthen his title. The lord high-admiral declared, that when ſhe was firſt ſeized with her diſorder, ſhe ſaid to him in private, "My throne has "always been filled by a ſucceſſion of princes, and "ought only to go to my next heir." But as this was not conſidered ſufficiently explicit, it was thought proper that the lord keeper, the lord admiral, and ſecretary Cecil, ſhould, in the name of the council, intreat her to ſignify her final intention with regard to this ſubject. They found her almoſt ſpeechleſs, but ſhe had ſtrength ſufficient to repeat the ſubſtance of her former declaration to the lord admiral, "that ſhe "had filled a royal throne, and deſired to have a "royal ſucceſſor." Cecil thought that this declaration was not ſufficiently explicit; and urged her for a further explanation. "I deſire (ſaid ſhe) that a "king ſhould ſucceed me, and who ſhould that be, "but my neareſt kinſman, the king of Scotland."

Though there was no great danger of any oppoſition being made to the Scottiſh ſucceſſion, the council thought proper to take every precaution for ſecuring the peace and ſafety of the kingdom: great numbers of idle and ſuſpected perſons, who ſwarmed in the metropolis and the adjacent villages, were ſeized and ſent to Holland, for the Dutch ſervice. The fleet which lay ready equipped, was ordered to guard the mouth of the Thames; and all the ſea ports were ſhut throughout the kingdom. It was alſo reſolved to ſummon all the peers to town, and if any commotion ſhould happen on the queen's death, which was now hourly expected, to make the earl of Northumberland general of the forces.

In the mean time the queen's ſituation was truly deplorable: ſhe had ſat dreſſed and penſive ten ſucceſſive days and nights, without having an hour's reſt during the whole time. On the 21ſt of March ſhe was put into bed by force, and, though ſhe then ſeemed to be better, ſhe lay on her ſide without ſpeaking to, or taking the leaſt notice of, any one about her; only ſhe cauſed ſome meditations to be read to her, particularly thoſe of M. du Pleſſis. The archbiſhop of Canterbury attending her on this occaſion, ſhe heard his exhortations, and joined him in prayer, with great humility and devotion. On the 23d of the ſame month ſhe was ſpeechleſs all the day; and having in the night got a continued ſleep of five hours, waked only to die, in the calmeſt manner and almoſt inſenſibly, about two o'clock the next morning, in the 70th year of her age, and the 45th of her reign.

Her corpſe, without being opened or embalmed, was removed, on the 28th of March, from Richmond to Whitehall; but as Elizabeth had given orders that it ſhould be neither opened or viewed after her deceaſe, no perſon was permitted to ſee it. It is conjectured by ſome that her reaſon for leaving this injunction was, that the world might not be ſatisfied with reſpect to her virginity; while others are of opinion that ſhe had about her perſon ſome imperfections that rendered her very unfit for marriage; and which was the cauſe of her being ſo unwilling to have her body expoſed after her deceaſe. She was interred on the 28th of April, in the chapel of Henry VII. with great magnificence, king James having given orders that no expence ſhould be ſpared on the occaſion.

Elizabeth mounted the throne when it was tottering under the misfortunes of an ill-conducted war, and its pillars were weakened by ſuperſtition and cruelty; it had been rifled of its ornaments by impious hands, and all its glories were blaſted by the cankering breath of religious fury. How artfully, how graceſelly, how nobly ſhe recovered its ſtrength, repaired its beauty, and retrieved its honours, have been ſufficiently diſplayed in the preceding pages. Steadineſs was the characteriſtic of her reign; œconomy the great ſecret of her government; and the art in dividing her enemies among themſelves, the inſtrument of her ſucceſs.

Few great perſonages have been more expoſed to the calumny of enemies and the adulation of friends, than Elizabeth; though there were ſcarce any whoſe reputation has been more certainly and more unanimouſly determined by the joint conſent of poſterity. Her vigilance, her conſtancy, her magnanimity, her peneration, and addreſs, are allowed to merit the higheſt praiſes; nor do they appear to have been ſurpaſſed by any perſon that ever filled a throne. By the aſſiſtance ſhe gave to France, ſhe diſappointed the ambitious ſchemes of her mortal enemies the Guiſes: by her ſupporting the Scottiſh reformers, ſhe ruined her formidable rival the queen of Scots; and by protecting the revolters in the Netherlands, ſhe gave a fatal blow to the power of Spain, whoſe throne was then filled by the moſt powerful and moſt ambitious monarch in Europe. Her credit in Germany balanced the influence of Charles, and eſtabliſhed the Proteſtant intereſt. The Turks, the Poles, the Swedes, and many other princes and ſtates appealed to her throne as to the grand tribunal of juſtice here below, nor did they believe her mortal, till death convinced them of the fatal truth. She ſeemed to have ſnatched the diſtaff from the hand of deſtiny, in order to abridge or prolong, at her pleaſure, the thread that formed the fate of empires.

But we muſt at the ſame time acknowledge, that Elizabeth was too rigorous, and too imperious towards her dependents; too regardleſs of the conſtitution, and too little concerned for the liberties and privileges of her ſubjects. Her prerogative ſwallowed up every thing that came in competition with it; and ſhe thought her people were entitled to no greater liberty than had been enjoyed by their anceſtors.

With reſpect to the perſon of Elizabeth, ſhe is deſcribed by thoſe who knew her to have been handſome, well made, ſtrong limbed, and rather tall than middle ſized; her forehead high and round, her eyes brown and lively, her complexion fair, her hair of a lightiſh yellow, her fingers long and taper, her voice clear and ſhrill: ſhe had a fine ſet of teeth, and her outward form was much ſet off by an air that was exceeding agreeable.

She was fond of being thought learned and ſpoke with great fluency the Greek, Latin, Italian and French languages, underſtood the Spaniſh, and tranſlated ſeveral pieces from the antient writers with judgment and fidelity. Nor muſt it be forgotten, that by her influence genuine literature was revived and improved. She was, indeed, more penetrating to diſcover, than ready to reward merit; but ſhe entruſted the care of the latter to perſons who diſcharged it nobly.

Elizabeth's predominant paſſions were, jealouſy and avarice, the former of which hurried her, in ſome caſes, into acts of tyrannic cruelty. Her vanity appeared in her love of flattery, which ſhe greedily ſwallowed, even when it was fulſome and abſurd; and in the variety and richneſs of her apparel, which ſhe continued to wear long after her declining years ſeemed to require a more decent garb, and a much graver deportment. In a word, the private character of Elizabeth is certainly, in ſome reſpects, very exceptionable; but at the ſame time it muſt be acknowledged by the impartial, that the princely qualities with which ſhe was poſſeſſed render her the object of undiſputed applauſe.

The moſt remarkable occurrences that happened, during the reign of Elizabeth, were as follow:

In her third year (1561) on the 15th of June, the ſpire of St. Paul's Cathedral was totally deſtroyed by fire, which aroſe from the careleſsneſs of a plumber, who left a pan of coals in the ſteeple when he went to dinner.

In 1563 an order was iſſued by her majeſty for aſcertaining the number of Scotchmen in London, when it appeared that only 58 could be found throughout the whole metropolis.—This year alſo gave riſe to the manufacturing of knives in England, which was executed by Thomas Matthews, on Fleet-bridge, London. Before this time they were imported from Germany; but the art was ſoon improved by the Engliſh, and large quantities were ſhortly after exported to different parts of the world.

In 1565 Tobacco was firſt brought into England by Sir John Hawkins.

The year 1569 furniſhes us with the firſt inſtance o a lottery in England. It began drawing at the weſtern door of St Paul's cathedral on the 11th o January, and continued day and night till the 6th o May following.

In 1571 a remarkable circumſtance happened i the county of Hereford. On Saturday evening February 17th, Marcley-hill, near the city of Hereford, was moved from its ſituation. It continued i motion till the Monday following, carrying along wit it the trees, hedges, and cattle on its ſurface. I its way it threw down a chapel, and at length forme a hill twelve fathom high where it ſettled, and left chaſm in its original ſituation thirty feet long an forty feet deep.

In 1583 a ſimilar prodigy happened at Blackmoor: a field of three acres, with the trees and fence moved from its ſituation, paſſed over anothe fiel and ſettled in the highway to Hearn.

In 1586 potatoes were firſt brought to England from America by Sir Francis Drake; but not cultivated in the kingdom till the beginning of the following century.

In 1589 William Lee, M. A. of St. John's college Cambridge, invented an engine, or ſteel-loom called the Stocking-frame, for knitting or weaving of ſtockings. This was not above twenty years after the Engliſh had been taught the art of knitting them with wires or needles, by the Spaniards. Mr. Lee's invention has been of great advantage to the ſtocking manufacture, by enabling the Engliſh to export great quantities of all kinds to foreign countries.

In the following year mills were firſt erected in England, by Godfrey Box of Liege, for cutting iron into bars for the uſe of the Smiths.

In 1594 the plague raged with great violence in London and it ſuburbs. The number of people who died of this dreadful diſeaſe amounted to 17,890.

In 1597 watches were firſt brought into England from Germany.

The year 1599 gave riſe to that uſeful inſtrument the teleſcope, which was diſcovered by one Janſſen, a ſpectacle maker at Middleburgh, in Zealand. He knew not, however, the theory on which the inſtrument depended, and therefore never made them of any conſiderable length: eighteen inches was the utmoſt extent of his inſtruments. Galileo, aſtronomer to the grand duke of Tuſcany, was the artiſt that perfected the diſcovery, and rendered it of the greateſt ſervice in aſtronomical obſervations; and hence the teleſcope has acquired the name of Galileo's tube.

In the commencement of this century learning began to revive throughout Europe, when the Engliſh ſovereigns and nobility took a diſtinguiſhed part in giving it the utmoſt encouragement. Henry VIII. was conſidered as one of the moſt learned perſons of his time. Queen Catherine Parr tranſlated a very uſeful treatiſe into Engliſh in the beginning of the reign of Edward the VI. Lady Jane Gray, conſidering her age, her ſex, and her ſtation, may be conſidered as a prodigy of learning. She was familiarly acquainted with the writings of the antients, and catched their noble ſentiments at a very early age. Elizabeth wrote and tranſlated ſeveral books, and was familiarly acquainted both with the Greek and Latin languages. But cardinal Wolſey may be conſidered as the father of revived learning in England. Wolſey had a ſoul exquiſitely ſuſceptible of the glory ariſing from a patronage that gives a ſurer immortality than power or titles can communicate. The fame of Leo X. who reſtored the arts in Italy, excited his emulation; he was deſirous of diſſeminating the ſeeds of literature in his native country. The learning of the Engliſh was then uſeleſs and heavy; they were totally ſtrangers to taſte. Wolſey ſaw this, and had the virtue to attempt the improvement of the one, and the introduction of the other. He was himſelf well acquainted with many branches of learning, as well as maſter of all the qualities of a fine gentleman and a polite courtier. But it was not enough for Wolſey to confine his love of learning, and the muſes to his own example and munificence, without planting thoſe ſeminaries which, in ſucceeding ages, were productive of many of the nobleſt fruits of ſtudy. He ſearched for men of genius and letters, as the lord of the ſoil does for a mine of treaſure. His houſe, like Cicero's Tuſculaneum, was the retreat of the learned. Whenever he found a foreigner celebrated for his literary acquiſitions, he ſettled on him a handſome ſalary, and invited him to England. He intended to procure copies of all the MSS. in the Vatican for his college at Oxford; which, if finiſhed according to his plan, would have been the nobleſt foundation in the world.

The other perſonages who moſt diſtinguiſhed themſelves for their learning, during this period, were as follow:

John Collet dean of St. Paul's, of whom no higher teſtimony need be given of his merit, than his intimacy with Eraſmus. There was a remarkable ſimilitude of manners, of ſtudies, and of ſentiments in religion, between theſe illuſtrious men, who ventured to withdraw the veil of ignorance and ſuperſtition, and expoſe them, in their genuine colours, to the eyes of the world; and to prepare the minds of the Engliſh for that reformation in religion, and the reſtoration of learning, which ſoon after followed. Collet, Lynacre, Lilly, Grocyn, and Latimer, were the firſt that revived the literature of the antients in England. He founded St. Paul's ſchool, and died 1519.

Archbiſhop Wareham ſhone as a divine, a lawyer, and a ſtateſman; but was at laſt ſupplanted in the king's favour by Wolſey. Eraſmus makes honourable mention of this prelate, whom he eſteemed a perfect model of the epiſcopal character. He died on the 23d of Auguſt, 1532.

Sir Thomas More was a great maſter of the elegant learning of the antients. His Utopia, a kind of political romance, which gained him the higheſt reputation as an author, is an idea of a perfect republic, in an iſland ſuppoſed to be newly diſcovered in America. He was beheaded, for denying the king's ſupremacy, on the ſixth of July, 1535.

Sir Thomas Smith, Sir John Cheke, and Roger Aſcham, tutor to queen Elizabeth, were the politeſt ſcholars of their time in the univerſity of Cambridge. Among other uſeful attempts for the improvement of learning, they introduced the true pronunciation of the Greek in that ſeat of the muſes.

William Tindale, canon of Chriſt-church, Oxford, and deſervedly ſtiled the Engliſh apoſtle, was the firſt that tranſlated the New Teſtament into Engliſh from the Greek. This work appeared in 1526; and three or four years after, he publiſhed an Engliſh tranſlation of the Pentateuch from the original Hebrew, and intended to have gone through with the whole: but his attempt provoked the catholic clergy, and he was burnt for hereſy at Wilford, near Bruſſels, in 1536.

Henry Howard, earl of Surry, was one of the greateſt ornaments in the court of Henry VIII. He was famous for the tenderneſs and elegance of his poetry, in which he excelled all the writers of his time. His great merit excited the jealouſy of Henry; and, after the formality of a trial, he was condemned and executed for high treaſon on the nineteenth of January, 1547.

Archbiſhop Cranmer was one of the moſt learned perſons of his age, and has been juſtly eſteemed one of the chief ornaments of our church and nation. He was in high eſteem with Henry VIII. for his learning, his ſincerity, his prudence, and his moderation. But he fell a ſacrifice to the bigotted fury of queen Mary, on the 21ſt of March, 1556.

Cuthbert Tonſtal, biſhop of Durham, was a polite ſcholar, and one of the moſt perfect characters of his age. The celebrated Eraſmus, one of whoſe excellences conſiſted in doing juſtice to the merit of his friends, tells us, that he was comparable to any of the antients.

Sir Philip Sidney was the delight and admiration of the court of Elizabeth. He was the ornament of the univerſity, and appeared with equal advantage in a field of battle, at a tournament, in a private converſation among his friends, or in a public character as an ambaſſador. His talents were equally adapted to proſe or verſe, to original compoſition or tranſlation. His Arcadia was not only admired for its novelty, but continued to be read longer than ſuch compoſitions generally are, and has paſſed through many editions. He died the 16th of October, 1586.

John Gerrade, a ſurgeon of London, was the greateſt Engliſh botaniſt of that age. He publiſhed his Herbal in 1597, which has, ever ſince its firſt appearance, been conſidered as a very uſeful work.

Edmund Spencer, the celebrated author of the "Fairy Queen," was the father of the Engliſh heroic poem, and of true paſtoral poetry in this iſland. He ſtands diſtinguiſhed from almoſt all other poets, by that faculty by which a poet is diſtinguiſhed from other writers, namely, invention; and excelled all his cotemporaries in harmonious verſification. The ſtanza of Spencer, and the old words which conſtantly occur, contribute to give that great poet an air of peculiarity; and hence all the imitations of him reſemble the original. But Parnaſſus proved a very barren ſoil to Spencer. Elizabeth was far from having a juſt ſenſe of his merit. After the death of Sir Philip Sidney he languiſhed without a patron, and died in want of bread, in 1599.

Richard Hooker, ſome time maſter of the Temple, and afterwards rector of Biſhop's Bourn, in Kent, was one of the moſt celebrated writers of the age in which he lived. His "Eccleſiaſtical Polity," which is a defence of the government of the Engliſh church againſt the cavils of the diſſenters, is written with a claſſic ſimplicity, and eſteemed one of the completeſt works, both for ſtyle and argument, that ever appeared in the Engliſh language. Queen Elizabeth uſed to call him "The judicious Hooker", an epithet by which he is ſtill diſtinguiſhed. He died on the ſecond of November, 1600.

Sir Thomas Bodley deſerves to be mentioned here, as a man of letters; but much more for the ample proviſion he has made for literature, by the library he founded at Oxford, and in which he ſtands unrivalled. In 1599, he opened his library, a mauſoleum which will perpetuate his memory as long as books themſelves endure. He died the twenty-eighth of January, 1612.

Beſides the writers already mentioned, many others flouriſhed during this period. John Rogers, a clergyman of Lancaſhire, tranſlated the Bible into Engliſh, with notes. Thomas Sternhold and John Hopkins tranſlated ſeveral of the pſalms into Engliſh metre, which are ſtill ſung in moſt of the churches.

Elizabeth's reign produced a number of excellent poets; particularly Spencer already mentioned, Sidney, Donne, Johnſon, Shakeſpeare, Beaumont, and Fletcher. Fairfax tranſlated Taſſo with great eaſe and elegance; and Harrington tranſlated Arioſto with tolerable accuracy. Bacon acquired immortal renown by his philoſophical writings; and Camden excelled as an antiquary and hiſtorian.

BOOK XI.

From the Acceſſion of James I. to the Death of Charles I.

SECTION I.

JAMES I.

THE direct line of the royal family being extinct by the death of Elizabeth, the ſucceſſion was peaceably admitted to be in James VI. of Scotland, as great grandſon of Margaret, eldeſt daughter of Henry VII. Accordingly, as ſoon as the queen's death was notified, that monarch was proclaimed king of England by the name of James I.

Meſſengers were immediately diſpatched to inform James of his acceſſion to the Engliſh throne, and to haſten his journey to London. The whole nation appeared greatly intereſted in favour of their new monarch. On his arrival he was received in the capital with the greateſt rejoicings, and was crowned at Weſtminſter on the 25th of July, amidſt the univerſal acclamations of the people.

James began his reign with laviſhing a profuſion of titles on his courtiers; no leſs than 239 perſons received the honour of knighthood within ſix weeks after his acceſſion. Theſe honours were chiefly conferred on the Scots, which gave great offence to the Engliſh, and might have produced national quarrels, had not James prudently reſolved to employ only Engliſhmen in the adminiſtration.

The moſt diſtinguiſhed among the king's miniſters was ſecretary Cecil, created ſucceſſively lord Effingdon, viſcount Cranborne, and earl of Saliſbury. This nobleman was the ſon of the famous Burleigh whoſe name, it was natural to ſuppoſe, muſt be odiou to James, as the declared enemy of his mother, an the chief cauſe of her tragical cataſtrophe; but Cec had taken care to make his peace with James befor the death of Elizabeth. Skilled in the arts of cun ning and duplicity, he had, for ſome time before th queen's deceaſe, kept up a correſpondence wit James, and informed him of every thing tranſacte in the Engliſh council that regarded his intereſt. S Walter Raleigh, lord Gray, and lord Cobham, wh had not taken the wiſe precautions of Cecil, and ha been at the head of the faction that brought the ea of Eſſex to the ſcaffold, immediately felt the effe of James's prejudice, by being all diſmiſſed fro their reſpective employments.

No ſooner did James aſcend the Engliſh thro than all the ſovereigns of Europe were filled with t moſt anxious expectations: they beheld in him t ſon of a princeſs who died a martyr to the cauſe popery, and who had ſuffered a long ſeries of troub in a kingdom whither ſhe had fled for protectio The hopes of the catholics and the fears of the pr teſtants were equally excited on this occaſion; a ambaſſadors from almoſt all the princes and ſtates Chriſtendom ſoon appeared at the Engliſh court, ord order to compliment the King on his new acquired dignity, and to conclude with him new alliances.

Henry IV. of France could not reflect without concern, that James, in one part of his life, had entered into negotiations with Spain, and thought he had every thing to dread from ſuch an union, eſpecially if James, whoſe real diſpoſition was as yet unknown, ſhould diſcover an enterprizing genius. The marquis of Roſny, afterwards the famous duke of Sully, a miniſter worthy of Henry IV. was charged with the affairs of France in the Engliſh court. That able ſtateſman propoſed a league with James, in conjunction with Venice, the United Provinces, and the northern crowns, in order to invade the territories of the houſe of Auſtria on every ſide, and humble the exorbitant power of that ambitious family. But the genius of the Engliſh monarch was little adapted to ſuch vaſt enterprizes; the love of peace was his ruling paſſion, and Roſny found James to be maſter of ſo much art and diſſimulation, that his addreſs was inſufficient to diſcover the real intentions of the Engliſh monarch. He refuſed to make any declaration but in general terms, of his ſincere deſire of living in friendſhip with France. A ſolemn conference was, however, at laſt held, and it was agreed that the Dutch ſhould have the liberty of levying forces both in France and England; that the two monarchs ſhould ſupply that republic with the ſum of one million four hundred thouſand livres a year for the maintenance of their forces; that the whole ſum ſhould be advanced by the king of France, but that one third of it ſhould be deducted to diſcharge a debt due from that monarch to Elizabeth; and that if the Spaniards attacked either the territories of France or England, the contracting princes ſhould aſſiſt each other, Henry with a force of ten thouſand, and James with that of ſix thouſand men.

Soon after the ſigning of this treaty, the tranquillity of England was greatly interrupted by a conſpiracy ſaid to have been formed in the kingdom againſt the government. The deſign was to place Arabella Stuart a near relation of James, and deſcended equally with him from Henry VII. on the Engliſh throne. She had been long a ſtate priſoner in the Tower, and poſſibly never knew that the leaſt deſign was formed for her liberty. Indeed the whole conſpiracy is ſtill a myſtery; time itſelf has afforded no clue that will help us to unravel it. But however that be, Sir Walter Raleigh, with his friends the lords Cobham and Gray, Sir Griffith Markham, Sir Edward Parham, Sir George Brooke, Bartholomew Brookſby, and Anthony Cappely, with two prieſts, Watſon and Clarke, were ſent to priſon. The trial of theſe conſpirators, if indeed any conſpiracy ever exiſted, was imperfect and confuſed; no ſigns of guilt appeared; no regular plot had been formed. A few paſſionate words, flowing from the diſappointed ambition of the diſmiſſed courtiers, compoſed, perhaps, their whole crime. Sir Edward Coke, the celebrated lawyer, who managed the proſecution on the part of the crown, uſed the moſt violent and opprobrious terms on this occaſion. He called Raleigh a traitor, a monſter, a viper, a ſpider of hell; terms that ſufficiently point out the manners of the age, and will for ever throw a ſtain on the character of that famous pleader. Raleigh, however, defended himſelf with ſurpriſing temper, eloquence, and courage; but, notwithſtanding the force of his arguments, he was found guilty by his jury, contrary to all law and the principles of equity. The two prieſts were executed; Cobham, Gray and Markham were pardoned on the morning of their execution, but not before they had laid their heads on the block, and were prepared to receive the fatal ſtroke. Raleigh alſo was reprieved, but not pardoned, and he continued many years after in confinement.

A. D. 1604. James now turned his thoughts towards theological diſputation, of which he was not only very fond, but capable of acquitting himſelf with diſtinguiſhed eclat. The ſeverities of Elizabeth had reſtrained the partizans of the Romiſh church; but the fanaticiſm of the puritans was not to be ſubdued. Theſe fiery diſciplinarians had flattered themſelves with receiving protection from a prince who had been trained up by their own ſect in Scotland. But James was too well acquainted with their independent principles, was too jealous of his new authority, and too much a friend to pleaſure, to ſhew them any favour in a country where they were not the predominant party. He, however, ordered a conference to be held at Hampton-court, between a certain number of biſhops and puritanical miniſters, and engaged to attend himſelf as moderator.

The conference was accordingly held at the place appointed on the 14th of January. In the courſe of the debates, James ſhewed uncommon talents of diſputation; and it may be ſaid with juſtice that his talents would have been great, had he governed a college inſtead of a kingdom. His eloquence, like a powerful charm, diſſipated every phantom of doubt, which either he himſelf, or the other diſputants, had raiſed; the non-conformiſts were ſilenced; and the king aſſigned the victory to the prelates. He even threatened the diſſenters to uſe more formidable arguments if they did not conform, and cloſed the conference with this grave aphoriſm: "no biſhop, no king."

Soon after this conference James opened the parliament, whoſe meeting had been deferred on account of the plague, which raged with ſuch violence in London, that 30,000 perſons died of it within the ſpace of twelve months. The ſpeech his majeſty delivered to the members on opening the ſeſſion ſufficiently diſplayed his character, and proved him to have more knowledge and greater parts, than prudence, or any juſt ſenſe of decorum or propriety. The ſtile and manner of it were excellent, but it was deſtitute of that majeſtic reſerve which ſhould always be obſerved by a king in his addreſſes to the great council of the nation. The general propoſitions, however, were juſt, and the following paſſages demand the applauſe of every lover of Engliſh liberty: "When I have done all that I can do for you, I do nothing but what I am bound to do, and am accountable to God ſhould I do the contrary; for I acknowledge that the moſt eſſential difference between a lawful king and an uſurping tyrant, conſiſts in this; that whereas the proud and ambitious tyrant thinks that his kingdom and people are only ordained for the gratification of his deſires and unreaſonable appetites; the righteous and juſt king, on the contrary, acknowledges, that he himſelf is only ordained for promoting the wealth and proſperity of his people; and that his greateſt and principal happineſs muſt conſiſt in their proſperity. If you are rich, I cannot be poor; if you are happy I cannot be unfortunate: and I proteſt that your welfare ſhall be the conſtant object of my ſtudy and attention. That I am a ſervant is moſt true; and that as I am head and governor of all the people in my dominions, conſidering them in number and in different ranks; ſo, if we will take the people as one body and maſs, then as the head is ordained for the body, and not the body for the head, ſo muſt a righteous king acknowledge himſelf to be ordained for his people, and not his people for him: For though a king and people are relative, yet can he be no king if he is deſtitute of ſubjects; but there are many people in the world, that are without a king. I ſhall therefore never be aſhamed to confeſs it my principal honour to be the great ſervant of the commonwealth, and ever think the proſperity thereof to be my greateſt felicity." The remainder of this ſpeech was calculated to effect an union between the two kingdoms of England and Scotland; and in the concluſion of it he dropped ſome ſevere expreſſions againſt the puritans, which rendered that ſect and their friends very diffident of his intentions during the ſubſequent part of his reign.

No material buſineſs was done during this ſeſſions; but ſoon after the prorogation of the parliament, a peace with Spain was finally concluded. This treaty contained ſome articles not at all favourable to the ſtates of the United Provinces; but as they were never executed, nor any complaints made on that head by the Spaniards, it is natural to imagine, that, by ſome ſecret agreement between the contracting parties, they were never intended for any thing more than mere form. About the time this treaty was concluded, the town of Oſtend capitulated, after a three years ſiege. The Spaniards found nothing in the place but heaps of ruins to recompenſe them for the vaſt ſums of money, and the incredible number of lives they had loſt in making the conqueſt. James gave himſelf no concern about the loſs of this fortreſs, reſolving to improve his preſent connection with Spain. He accordingly diſpatched the earl of Nottingham, lord high admiral, with the character of ambaſſador extraordinary, to that court, attended by a numerous and magnificent retinue. The Spaniards were extremely ſurprized on their arrival, when they beheld the blooming countenances, and graceful appearance of the Engliſh, whom their bigotry, inflamed by their prieſts, had repreſented as the moſt infernal demons.

A. D. 1605. We come now to a period that furniſhes us with an event not to be paralleled in hiſtory; namely, the Gun-powder plot, which affords a ſtriking inſtance of the depravity of the human mind, when blinded by religious prejudices. The catholics, perſuaded at firſt that the ſon of Mary Stuart would mitigate the ſeverity of the laws in their favour, were enraged to find themſelves treated with the ſame rigour: they forgot the real duties of religion to indulge the principles of a blind and headſtrong zeal.

Cateſby, a gentleman deſcended from an antient family, of good parts, and maſter of a conſiderable eſtate, had formed a plan for overturning the Engliſh government; and in order to carry the deſign into execution, had made ſeveral journies to the court of Philip, in order to procure an army of Spaniards to land in England: but the late peace having rendered his plan of an invaſion abortive, he formed a moſt extraordinary method of revenge; and declared his intention to Piercy, a deſcendant from the illuſtrious houſe of Northumberland. The hardſhips under which the catholics laboured was often the ſubject of their converſation; and Piercy, in a fit of enthuſiaſtic zeal, hinted a deſign of aſſaſſinating the king. Cateſby anſwered, "That the attempt, if ſucceſsful, could not poſſibly remove the evil; that a more general revenge was neceſſary, in order to reſtore the catholic religion in England. The whole royal family, the nobility, and the parliament, are (ſaid he) equally infected with the ſame hereſy, and muſt all be deſtroyed, before a catholic prince can be placed upon the throne, and religion reſtored to its antient purity. Nor is this undertaking either impoſſible or difficult. They will aſſemble on the firſt meeting of the parliament, and afford us an opportunity of a ſure and ample vengeance. A mine may eaſily be run under the parliament-houſe; and a few barrels of powder, properly placed, will bury all our enemies in one common ruin." Piercy was highly pleaſed with the contrivance of Cateſby; and it was agreed between them to communicate the deſign to a few of their friends, and, among the reſt, to Thomas Winter, who was immediately diſpatched to Flanders in ſearch of Guy Fawkes, an officer in the Spaniſh ſervice, with whoſe zeal for the catholic religion, and courage to execute any deſperate enterprize, they were well acquainted.

Fawkes was ſoon found, and immediately entered into the conſpiracy with all the ardour of bigotted enthuſiaſm. A houſe was hired in Piercy's name, adjoining to that in which the parliament was to aſſemble; and it was agreed to carry a mine from the cellar under the room in which the parliamet met; and the very moment when the king was delivering his ſpeech to both houſes, to ſet fire to the magazine, and deſtroy the whole aſſembly by one dreadful blaſt: thus making the very ſpot, where the edicts for proſcribing the catholic religion had received their ſanction, the ſcene of this dreadful cataſtrophe.

Theſe conſultations were held in the month of December of the preceding year; and it being expected that the parliament would meet in February, the work was immediately begun, and carried on with aſtoniſhing perſeverance. They never deſiſted from their labour, relieving one another by turns; and that no alarm might be given to the neighbourhood, they entered Piercy's houſe by night, and carried with them proviſions ſufficient to ſupport them till the mine was compleated. They had alſo provided themſelves with fire arms and ammunition, fully determined, in caſe of being diſcovered, to periſh rather than be taken.

When they had penetrated a conſiderable way into the wall which divided the cellar of Piercy's houſ from that under the Houſe of Lords, they were greatly terrified at hearing a noiſe, which they knew not how to account for, as it ſeemed to proceed from the other ſide of the wall. A diſcovery was now greatly feared, and the conſpirators prepared to defend themſelves to the laſt extremity; but, upon inquiry, it was found, that the place from whence th noiſe proceeded was a large vault under the houſ of lords, filled with coals, which were now ſelling off and that the vault was to be let to the higheſt bidder. This opportunity was not to be neglected; Piercy immediately hired the place, depoſited in it thirty-fi barrels of powder, and covered the whole with faggots. Every thing was now ready for the dreadfu blaſt; but the parliament being prorogued to the fift of November, the conſpirators had more time to finiſ their diabolical undertaking. More faggots wer carried into the vault, and the door boldly throw open, as if it contained nothing dangerous, or th ought to be concealed.

The great ſucceſs the conſpirators had hitherto me with in their infernal undertaking rendered them con fident of ſucceſs; and they began to deliberate on th beſt method of executing the remaining part of thei project. The duke of York, whoſe tender age woul not ſuffer him to be preſent at the opening of th parliament, muſt be ſecured, as well as his ſiſter th princeſs Elizabeth, then at lord Harrington's hou in Warwickſhire. Piercy undertook to ſecure o aſſaſſinate the duke; and Sir Everard Digby, Rook wood, and Grant, who were now let into the ſecr of the conſpiracy, engaged to aſſemble their friend under pretence of a hunting-match, ſeize that pri ceſs, and immediately declare her queen. Som propoſed to apply immediately to foreign courts f aſſiſtance; but this was thought too dangerous; a it was reſolved to make no application of that kin till the plot had taken effect.

The conſpirators waited impatiently for the day th was to involve all their enemies in deſtruction; a they had now the proſpect of its near approac The dreadful ſecret, though commmunicated above twenty perſons, had been religiouſly kept f almoſt a year and a half. No remorſe, no pit no fear of puniſhment, no hope of reward had yet induced any ſingle conſpirator either to aband the enterprize or diſcover the horrid ſecret. R ligio ligious bigotry had extinguiſhed every other motive in their breaſts, and it was an indiſcretion at laſt, proceeding from theſe very enthuſiaſtic perjudices, that ſaved the nation from inevitable deſtruction.

About ten days before the meeting of the parliament, lord Monteagle, a catholic peer, ſon to lord Morley, received the following letter, which had been delivered to his ſervant by a perſon unknown:

“ My Lord,

“ Out of the love I bear to ſome of your friends, I have a care for your preſervation; therefore I would adviſe you, as you tender your life, to deviſe ſome excuſe to ſhift off your attendance at this parliament, for God and man have concurred to puniſh the wickedneſs of this time: and think not ſlightly of this advertiſement, but retire yourſelf into your country, where you may expect the event in ſafety; for though there be no appearance of any ſtir, yet I ſay they will receive a terrible blow this parliament, and yet they ſhall not ſee who hurts them. This counſel is not to be contemned, becauſe it may do you good, and can do you no harm; for the danger is paſt as ſoon as you have burnt this letter; and I hope God will give you grace to make good uſe of it, to whoſe holy protection I commend you.”

Monteagle was for ſome time at a loſs what judgement to form of this letter, and unreſolved in what manner to proceed. It had been delivered to his ſervant by an unknown hand, and ſeemed to contain ſome myſtery which it was not eaſy to explain. Had his own ſafety alone been concerned, in all probability he would have ſlighted the notice, as he was inclined to think it was nothing more than an attempt of his enemies to prevent his attendance in parliament; but fearing leſt the king's life might be in danger, he carried it directly to lord Saliſbury, ſecretary of ſtate. The miniſter was alſo inclined to treat it with neglect: but as the words ſeemed to convey an ambiguous meaning, he determined to lay it before his majeſty. The king was of a different opinion: he conjectured, from the ſerious and earneſt ſtile of the letter, that ſomething very dangerous and important was intended; and that the effect, which was repreſented to be at once both ſudden and terrible, ſeemed to denote ſome contrivance by gun-powder. He was, however, of opinion, that either nothing ſhould be done, or enough to prevent the danger; and that therefore the ſearch ſhould be deferred till the day before the meeting of the parliament, when the vaults under the parliament-houſe ſhould be carefully inſpected.

Accordingly, on the fourth of November, the lord chamberlain, who was obliged by his office to ſee every thing in readineſs for his majeſty's coming, viſited all the places about the parliament-houſe. He ſlightly inſpected the cellar, in one of the corners of which ſtood Fawkes, who paſſed for Piercy's ſervant. The lord chamberlain was ſtruck with the appearance of the man, in whoſe countenance all the marks of ferocious courage were conſpicuouſly painted. Piercy was known to be a very rigid papiſt, and to reſide very little in town: the large quantity of fuel was, therefore, conſidered as ſomething extraordinary, and it was thought neceſſary to make a more particular inſpection of the cellar; but, at the ſame time it was reſolved, that this ſearch ſhould be made in ſuch a manner as ſhould render it effectual, without giving the leaſt alarm.

Theſe reſolutions being taken, Sir Thomas Knevet, a juſtice of the peace, with proper attendants, was ſent about midnight to examine the cellar, under pretence of ſearching for ſtolen goods. Fawkes had juſt finiſhed all his preparations, and was coming out of the cellar when Knevet arrived. The daring conſpirator was immediately ſeized; and, after removing the billets, the barrels of powder were diſcovered. Fawkes had a dark lantern in his hand; and the matches, with every thing neceſſary for ſetting fire to the powder, were found in his pockets. The guilt of this determined conſpirator was now ſufficiently apparent; and knowing that all denial would be in vain, he avowed the deſign, and that it would have been executed on the morrow; at the ſame time, expreſſing the utmoſt regret that he had loſt the opportunity of ſetting fire to the powder, and of ſoftening his own death with the pleaſure of periſhing with his enemies. He expreſſed the ſame intrepid boldneſs when examined before the council. This obſtinacy continued two or three days; but being cloſely confined in the Tower, and the rack placed before him, his courage at laſt forſook him, and he not only made a full diſcovery of the whole plot, but related the name of every perſon concerned in it.

The principal part of the conſpirators at this time reſided in town; and though they knew that the letter to Monteagle had alarmed the miniſtry, and even that a ſearch was intended to be made by the lord chamberlain, yet they never abandoned their hopes of ſucceſs till they heard that Fawkes was taken. It was then, indeed, too evident that the whole plot was diſcovered; and they fled immediately into Warwickſhire, where Sir Everard Digby, perſuaded that the attempt had ſucceeded, was already in arms to ſeize the princeſs Elizabeth, who had prevented their deſign by taking refuge in Coventry. The whole country was now alarmed; and Sir Richard Walſh, high conſtable of Worceſterſhire, aſſiſted by a great number of the inhabitants, ſurrounded the conſpirators in Holbeach, the ſeat of Sir Stephen Littleton. Their number, including all their attendants did not exceed eighty; but notwithſtanding their inferiority, they prepared for a vigorous defence, determined either to periſh or eſcape. But misfortune ſtill purſued them. They had put ſome moiſt powder before a fire to dry, and a ſpark from the coals ſetting it on fire, ſome of them were ſo burned, that they were ſcarce able to handle their weapons. Their caſe was deſperate, and no means of eſcape appearing, unleſs by forcing their way through the aſſailants, they made a deſperate ſally for that purpoſe. Cateſby (who firſt propoſed the manner of the plot) and Piercy, were both killed. Thomas Winter, Grant, Digby, Rookwood and Bates, were taken priſoners and brought to London, where the former made an ample confeſſion of the whole conſpiracy. Several others were confined in the country; and ſome few, making their eſcape, fled to the continent.

In conſequence of this aſtoniſhing diſcovery, the meeting of the parliament was poſtponed to the 9th of November, when the king opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, in which he endeavoured to reſtrain the fury of the Engliſh againſt the catholics. He obſerved, that it would be highly unjuſt, it would be criminal, to involve the whole body of catholics in the guilt of a few; that it could not be ſuppoſed they were all diſpoſed to engage in committing ſuch horrid barbarities; that all men, who embraced the tenets of the Roman church, ſhould not be conſidered as ſupporters of the pope's power of dethroning kings, or ſanctifying aſſaſſination; for though the wrath of heaven is denounced againſt crimes, yet innocent error may obtain favour. “ For my own part, added he, conſpiracy, however attrocious, ſhall never alter my plan of government: while I puniſh guilt with one hand, I will ſupport and protect innocence with the other.”

A. D. 1606. The parliament granted the king a very conſiderable ſupply; and after having paſſed ſeveral acts of a public nature, directed their attention to the late horrid conſpiracy.On the 27th of January eight of the conſpirators were tried and convicted; among whom was Sir Edward Digby, the only one that pleaded guilty to the indictment, though all the reſt had previouſly confeſſed their guilt. Digby was executed on the 30th of the ſame month, with Robert Winter, Grant and Bates, at the weſt end of St. Paul's Church-yard: and Thomas Winter, Keys, Rookwood, and Fawkes, were executed the following day in Old Palace-yard.

Garnet was tried on the 28th of March, and being found guilty received ſentence of death; but he was not executed till the 3d of May, when, confeſſing his own guilt and the iniquity of the enterprize, he exhorted all Roman catholics to abſtain from the like treaſonable practices. Sir Stephen Littleton, and ſeveral others, were tried in the country, all of whom being found guilty, were hanged.

The earl of Northumberland was fined 30,000l. under pretence of his having been acquainted with the conſpiracy, though the only grounds of ſuſpicion were, his having admitted Piercy, his kinſman, into the number of gentlemen penſioners, without tendering him the oath of ſupremacy. The lords Mordaunt and Sturton, two catholic noblemen, were alſo tried in the ſtar-chamber, and fined, the former in ten thouſand, and the latter in four thouſand pounds. The lord Monteagle had a grant of 200l. a year in land, and a penſion of 500l. a year for life, as a reward for diſcovering the letter which occaſioned the whole conſpiracy to be rendered abortive. And the anniverſary of this providential eſcape was ordered to be for ever commemorated.

While the parliament were cloſely engaged in the buſineſs of the nation, and the paſſions of the people were warmed by the recent guilt of the conſpirators in the Gunpowder-plot, a report was ſuddenly ſpread, that James and his principal favourites were aſſaſſinated at Oking, about twenty miles weſt of London. The account was very circumſtantial; James was ſaid to have been ſtabbed with a poiſoned knife, and that the murderers were compoſed of Engliſh Jeſuits, Scots in diſguiſe, Frenchmen and Spaniards. The court and city gates were inſtantly ſhut; the guards at both were doubled; the citizens were put under arms; and Sir William Wade, lieutenant of the Tower, made the neceſſary diſpoſitions for preventing a ſurprize, and ſtanding a ſiege. The parliament was ſitting when the report arrived, and all buſineſs was immediately ſuſpended. Sir Maurice Berkley and two other perſons were diſpatched to know the truth, while terror and confuſion ſeemed to have ſeized every order and rank of men. A ſmall ſpace of time was, however, ſufficient to remove this univerſal conſternation. In about two hours the report became doubtful, and in three a proclamation was publiſhed by the privy-council, informing the people that no unfortunate event had happened. James himſelf reached London about two in the afternoon, and was met at Hyde-park by the whole houſe of commons, with the ſpeaker at their head; intimation of which being ſoon circulated throughout the metropolis, all fears ſubſided, and the people expreſſed the higheſt ſatiſfaction at the ſafety of their ſovereign.

A. D. 1607. In the beginning of this year the tranquillity of the nation was interrupted by an inſurrection which happened in the counties of Northampton, Warwick, and Leiceſter, occaſioned by large tracts of land being incloſed, whereby the people were deprived of their right of commonage. A body, conſiſting of three or four thouſand men, roved about the country, demoliſhing incloſures, and laying open the lands that had been taken from them. They were headed by one John Reynolds, a perſon of very low condition, but who had acquired great authority among the multitude. Several proclamations were publiſhed, and the ſheriffs raiſed the poſſe of their reſpective counties againſt them, but carefully avoided a general engagement. At laſt James publiſhed a conciliating proclamation, expreſſing his unwillingneſs to proceed againſt them by martial law, and promiſing them mercy, and redreſs of their grievances. This produced the deſired effect: the people laid down their arms, and peaceably returned to their habitations.

The only material circumſtance that happened in the following year, 1608, was the death of Thomas Sackville, earl of Dorſet, lord high-treaſurer. He was ſucceeded by Robert Cecil, earl of Saliſbury, a nobleman of great talents, and every way qualified for diſcharging the duties of ſo important an office.

A. D. 1609. In the beginning of this year was concluded, by a truce of twelve years, that memorable war, which had, for near half a century, been carried on with the utmoſt fury, between Spain and the ſtates of the United Provinces. Every ſtratagem had been tried, and every force exerted to annihilate a people who had made ſuch uncommon efforts in defence of their independence. At laſt the haughty Spaniard, finding the commerce of his kingdom entirely ruined, and his provinces expoſed to the moſt imminent danger from the maritime forces of the ſtates, conſented to acknowledge as a free people, thoſe whom he had ſo long treated as rebellious ſubjects, and ſolemnly to relinquiſh all pretenſions to ſovereignty over them. This event was at once mortifying and diſſatisfactory to James, who always conſidered the Hollanders as rebels. It was his avowed maxim, in all debates concerning his prerogative, that ſubjects ought not to withdraw their allegiance from their princes on any account whatever. He therefore conſidered this treaty as a dangerous precedent, and prejudicial to the ſovereign authority of kings.

A. D. 1610. By this time, the immoderate expences of the court had nearly emptied the exchequer, and the king was obliged to ſummon a parliament in order to obtain the neceſſary ſupplies. Œconomy, indeed, was not one of James's virtues: he was laviſh of his treaſures to his rapacious courtiers, and always in want, becauſe he wanted ſufficient fortitude to reſtrain, within proper bounds, his paſſion for conferring favours. The taſk of procuring a ſupply to his majeſty was undertaken by the earl of Saliſbury, who, in order to conciliate the affections of the commons, aſſured them that the king was reſolved to redreſs all their grievances, and then proceeded to explain the cauſes which obliged his majeſty to have recourſe to his parliament for a ſupply. He enumerated the debts of the late queen, which the king had diſcharged; the maintaing an army of nineteen thouſand men in Ireland; the great ſums he had expended in his own journey, and that of his houſhold, from Edinburgh to London; in ſupporting three courts, for himſelf, the queen, and the prince of Wales; in ſending envoys to different courts on the continent; and in liberalities to his officers and dependents. He repreſented to them, that Elizabeth, though a ſingle woman, had received very large ſupplies during the latter part of her life, which alone was expenſive to her; and that ſhe had, notwithſtanding, alienated a great part of the crown lands, an expedient, which, though it ſupplied the preſent neceſſities, multiplied thoſe of her ſucceſſor.

Theſe, and ſeveral other reaſons, were urged b the treaſurer, to obtain a large ſupply from the pa liament; but they were urged in vain; the common determine determined to avail themſelves of the king's poverty in order to keep him in dependence. They complained loudly of the king's prodigality, and exceſſive profuſion towards his own countrymen: while others affirmed that his real intention was to ſap the privileges of the ſubject by gradual uſurpations, and, at laſt, to bury the liberties of Engliſhmen in the gulph of prerogative. But being unwilling to ſhock the king with an abſolute denial, they voted him one ſubſidy and one fifteenth, which did not amount to above a ſixth part of the ſum required. Thus James received the mortification of having diſcovered all his wants, and of begging aſſiſtance from his ſubjects, in vain; at which he was ſo irritated, that he immediately diſſolved the parliament.

We cannot cloſe the tranſactions of this year without taking notice of a memorable and melancholy event that happened on the continent, and which greatly alarmed the Engliſh. The eyes of all Europe had been for ſome time fixed on Henry IV. of France, who, by his experience and good ſenſe, was become one of the greateſt politicians, and moſt able generals, of the age. That prince ſaw, that while the Houſe of Auſtria was always ready to embrace every opportunity of aggrandizing itſelf, France had every thing to fear from its ambition; and he had formed a noble plan for humbling that ambitious family. But all his great deſigns were blaſted in a moment by the poniard of the fanatical Ravaillac. That infamous miſcreant had for ſome time followed the king in his incurſions, in queſt of an opportunity of perpetrating his horrid purpoſe. He intended to have ſtabbed him in the morning at the Feuillans, where he went to hear maſs; but was prevented by the interpoſition of the duke de Vendome. After dinner, of the ſame day, the king appeared extremely uneaſy, and leaning his head upon his hand, was heard to ſay, "My God! what is this that will not ſuffer me to be at quiet?" About four in the afternoon he went into his own coach with the duke d'Epernon, and ſeveral other noblemen. In paſſing through the ſtreet de la Roquelaer, which is very narrow, a ſtop was made by two loaded carts: the king had ſent away his guards, and ordered the coach to be opened, that he might ſee the preparations that were making for the queen's entry; all the pages were gone round another way, except two, one of whom went before to clear the ſtreet, while the other ſtept behind to tie his garter. Ravaillac, who had followed the carriage, took this opportunity to perpetrate his horrid purpoſe. He mounted on the coach-wheel, and, with a long knife, ſharp on both ſides, ſtruck the king over the ſhoulder of the duke d'Epernon. Henry exclaimed, "I am wounded!" The aſſaſſin repeated the blow with greater violence, and the knife, penetrating the thorax, divided the vena cava, ſo that the king expired immediately. Ravaillac was not perceived by any perſon while he perpetrated this atrocious murder; ſo that had he thrown the knife under the coach, he might have eſcaped unnoticed: but he ſtood upon the wheel fixed like a ſtatue, with the bloody knife in his hand. A gentleman coming up would have put him to death immediately, but the duke d'Epernon called aloud, "Save him on your life!" On his examination he boldly confeſſed he perpetrated the murder, becauſe the king would not take up arms againſt the Hugonots, and that making war againſt the pope was nothing leſs than making war againſt God; becauſe the pope was God, and God was the pope." The fanatical villain ſoon after ſuffered for his treachery, being put to death in the moſt horrid manner. The principles on which this regicide had been committed gave James great uneaſineſs; and as the Jeſuits were univerſally believed to have been the authors of it, he thought it abſolutely neceſſary to remove from his perſon men who held ſo deteſtable a doctrine. A proclamation was accordingly iſſued, commanding all Jeſuits and prieſts of the Romiſh perſuaſion to depart the kingdom immediately, and all recuſants not to come within ten miles of the court. At the ſame time time the juſtices of the peace in every county were ordered to adminiſter the oath of allegiance to all catholics.

A. D. 1611. Though the timidity and haughtineſs of James made him, during the greater part of his reign, inattentive to foreign affairs, there happened about this time an event of ſuch great conſequence as to rouſe him from his lethargy, and ſummon up all his zeal and abilities. The famous preacher Arminius, of Amſterdam, had been choſen profeſſor of divinity at Leyden, and was accuſed by the Calviniſts with teaching abſurd doctrines concerning free-will and predeſtination. Before his death, which happened in 1608, his party remained maſters of the field of diſputation, and his chair was now filled by Vorſtius, who had publiſhed ſeveral treatiſes in defence of the Arminian principles. James oppoſed the doctrine of Arminius, and conſidered Vorſtius as a dangerous rival in ſcholaſtic reputation. The royal diſputant, therefore, attacked the profeſſor with all the rage of arrogance and preſumption. Fearful of the conſequences that might enſue from this ſcholaſtic warfare, the ſtates thought proper to deprive Vorſtius of the chair he had filled with ſo much reputation. The king was appeaſed by this mark of condeſcenſion in the ſtates, though he very charitably hinted to them, "That as to the burning of Vorſtius for his blaſphemies and atheiſm, he left it entirely to their own chriſtian wiſdom; but ſurely never heretic better deſerved the flames." The ſtates, however, had too much ſenſe and humanity to underſtand his majeſty's meaning; and they even procured a chair for the ejected profeſſor in another univerſity.

Although theſe theological diſputes had greatly engaged the attention of James, yet he did not forget a project he had formed in favour of humanity, and which did him more real honour than all his ſcholaſtic divinity. This was the civilizing of the Iriſh, and making them acquainted with the happineſs that attends a well-regulated ſociety. During the ſpace of four hundred and forty years that Ireland had been ſubjected to England, the inhabitants of that iſland retained their antient manners, which had no other tendency than that of keeping the people for ever in a ſtate of barbariſm and diſorder. Involved in ſtupid ignorance, they were a wretched prey to the tyranny of their conquerors. The cuſtom of the Iriſh, like that of other barbarians who formerly over-ran Europe, was to puniſh the greateſt crimes by fines only. Murder itſelf was atoned for in this manner; and every perſon, according to his rank, had a certain rate or value affixed to him: this rate was called his Eric. When Fermanagh was formed into a county, the viceroy of Ireland told Maguire, that he ſhould ſend him a ſheriff or provoſt. "Your ſheriff (ſaid the Iriſhman) ſhall be well received; but tell me before-hand his eric, that if my people kill him, I may be able to levy the money upon the county." James aboliſhed this, and many other barbarous cuſtoms, ſecured and determined their property, defended the people from the oppreſſions of the nobility, puniſhed all crimes with ſeverity, introduced agriculture into that fruitful but uncultivated country, maintained a ſufficient number of troops to keep good order among the people, aboliſhed their prejudices, and enlightened their underſtandings with the rays of learning. In a word, after proceeding regularly, during the courſe of a few years, he came, at length, to govern, by juſtice and the laws, a people who appeared incapable of acknowledging them. He frequently very conſiderable ſupply; and after having paſſed ſeveral acts of a public nature, directed their attention to the late horrid conſpiracy. On the 27th of January eight of the conſpirators were tried and convicted; among whom was Sir Edward Digby, the only one that pleaded guilty to the indictment, though all the reſt had previouſly confeſſed their guilt. Digby was executed on the 30th of the ſame month, with Robert Winter, Grant and Bates, at the weſt end of St. Paul's Church-yard: and Thomas Winter, Keys, Rookwood, and Fawkes, were executed the following day in Old Palace-yard.

Garnet was tried on the 28th of March, and being found guilty received ſentence of death; but he was not executed till the 3d of May, when, confeſſing his own guilt and the iniquity of the enterprize, he exhorted all Roman catholics to abſtain from the like treaſonable practices. Sir Stephen Littleton, and ſeveral others, were tried in the country, all of whom being found guilty, were hanged.

The earl of Northumberland was fined 30,000l. under pretence of his having been acquainted with the conſpiracy, though the only grounds of ſuſpicion were, his having admitted Piercy, his kinſman, into the number of gentlemen penſioners, without tendering him the oath of ſupremacy. The lords Mordaunt and Sturton, two catholic noblemen, were alſo tried in the ſtar-chamber, and fined, the former in ten thouſand, and the latter in four thouſand pounds. The lord Monteagle had a grant of 200l. a year in land, and a penſion of 500l. a year for life, as a reward for diſcovering the letter which occaſioned the whole conſpiracy to be rendered abortive. And the anniverſary of this providential eſcape was ordered to be for ever commemorated.

While the parliament were cloſely engaged in the buſineſs of the nation, and the paſſions of the people were warmed by the recent guilt of the conſpirators in the Gunpowder-plot, a report was ſuddenly ſpread, that James and his principal favourites were aſſaſſinated at Oking, about twenty miles weſt of London. He frequently boaſted of the management of Ireland as his maſter-piece; and it will appear, upon the neceſſary inquiry, that his vanity in this particular was not altogether without foundation.

A. D. 1612. The nation this year ſuſtained a very ſenſible loſs in the death of Henry, prince of Wales, who paid the debt of nature on the 6th of November, in the 17th year of his age. He was a youth of very promiſing talents, and of an amiable character. He ſpent his time in ſtudies becoming a prince, and exerciſed himſelf in the moſt manly diverſions. He poſſeſſed the advantage of a fine perſon, and there was a martial turn in his diſpoſition which could not fail of being very agreeable to a warlike people. His death diffuſed an univerſal grief throughout the nation, and his tomb was watered with the tears of the people.

Nor was this the only loſs that James ſuſtained in the courſe of this year: his principal counſellor, the earl of Saliſbury, died on the 14th of May. His death was a great misfortune to James, who was thereby deprived of a very able miniſter, and one perfectly acquainted with the conſtitution and genius of the Engliſh.

A. D. 1613. A treaty of marriage having been concluded between the princeſs Elizabeth, and the Elector Palatine, the ceremony was performed on the 14th of February, and the nuptials were celebrated with the greateſt rejoicings. No expence was ſpared to render the entertainments on this occaſion as magnificent as poſſible. The nation was greatly pleaſed with this match, as it promiſed the greateſt advantages to the proteſtant intereſt in Europe. But theſe hopes were, in the end, rendered abortive, and the marriage proved a ſource of diſcontent between James and his parliament.

We come now to the introduction of thoſe circumſtances which proved fatal to that great and diſtinguiſhed perſonage, Sir Thomas Overbury, who fell a victim to the malevolent diſpoſition of an impious woman. During the whole time that James reigned in Scotland, he was ſeldom without a favourite; and both the Engliſh and the Scots had, ever ſince his acceſſion to the Engliſh throne, laboured inceſſantly to ſupply this defect; but all their attempts were rendered abortive. At length, the lord Hay introduced Robert Carre, a Scottiſh gentleman deſcended from an antient family, and who had formerly been a page of honour to the king in Scotland. Hay, without mentioning him at court, aſſigned him the office, at a match at tilting, of preſenting to the king his buckler and device; and hoped he would attract the attention of that monarch. An accident, however, happened which ſeemed at firſt to deſtroy all the hopes of his patron. When Carre was advancing to execute his office, his unruly horſe flung him, and broke his leg in the king's preſence. James approached him with pity and concern, ordered him to be lodged in the palace, and carefully attended. Carre was about twenty years of age, of an eaſy air and graceful demeanor, extremely ambitious, and profoundly ignorant. After the tilting match was over, James paid him a viſit in his chamber, and returned frequently to ſee him during his confinement. The innocence and ſimplicity of the youth finiſhed the conqueſt began by his external graces and accompliſhments. Other princes have been fond of chuſing their favourites from among the lower ranks of their ſubjects, and have repoſed in them the utmoſt confidence, becauſe they received from their bounty every honour and acquiſition. James was deſirous that his favourite might derive from him all his ſenſe, experience, and knowledge. Highly conceited of his own wiſdom, he pleaſed himſelf that this raw youth, by his leſſons and inſtructions, would ſoon be equal to his wiſeſt miniſter; and be initiated into all the profound ſecrets of government, on which he ſet ſo high a value. He ſoon diſcovered an unlimited fondneſs for his minion, beyond even that he bore towards his own children. Not content with knighting this favourite, he created him viſcount Rocheſter, honored him with the garter, and brought him into the privy council.

Rocheſter had the good fortune to meet with a judicious and ſincere confident in Sir Thomas Overbury, who, building all his hopes of preferment on the young favourite, endeavoured to diſtil into him the principles of prudence and diſcretion. By zealouſly endeavouring to ſerve every body, Carre was taught to abate the envy which might otherwiſe attend his ſudden elevation: by ſhewing a preference to the Engliſh, he learned to eſcape the prejudices that had for ſome time prevailed againſt his country: and while he was contented to be ruled by Overbury's friendly counſel, he enjoyed, what is exceedingly rare, the higheſt favour of the prince without being hated by the people.

This pleaſing proſpect, however, was but of ſhort permanence to Overbury; for Rocheſter ſoon after contracting an amour with the counteſs of Eſſex, he ſacrificed at once his friend and his fortune to that unlawful paſſion. This lady had been married when only thirteen years of age to the earl of Eſſex, then only fourteen; but it was thought neceſſary for the young earl to travel for ſome years before the marriage was conſummated. At his return he was charmed with the beauty of his young counteſs; but aſtoniſhed to find that ſhe would on no account conſent to any farther familiarities. After reiterated refuſals, the earl gave over all thoughts of the happineſs he had ſo long flattered himſelf with enjoying, and left the counteſs to purſue her own inclinations.

Rocheſter had paid his addreſſes to the counteſs before the arrival of Eſſex; and this attachment was the true cauſe for her behaving in ſo ſtrange a manner to the earl. She imagined, that while ſhe refuſed the embraces of Eſſex, ſhe could never be conſidered as his wife, and that a divorce might be eaſily obtained, which would entirely remove the difficulty attending her marriage with her beloved Rocheſter. A divorce was accordingly obtained: but Rocheſter could not think of concluding an engagement of ſo much conſequence to his future happineſs, without conſulting his friend Overbury.

He accordingly informed him of his intended marriage with the counteſs of Eſſex, and begged his advice. Aſtoniſhed at this declaration, Overbury did all in his power to diſſuade him from ſo dangerous a connection. He repreſented to him how ſhameful it would appear to take to his own bed a profligate woman, who was already married to a young nobleman of the firſt rank; and to ſuch lengths did the warmth of his honeſt exhortations carry him, that he threatned Rocheſter with the loſs of his correſpondence and friendſhip, if he could ſo far forget his honor and intereſt, as to proſecute his intended marriage with a woman of ſuch abandoned principles.

Rocheſter had the weakneſs to impart this converſation to the counteſs, who inſtantly vowed the ſevereſt revenge againſt the bold arraigner of her honor and conduct. The favourite himſelf was alſo ſo infatuated by her charms, that he joined with her in reſolving the ruin of Overbury. To effect this he immediately repair to court; and after extolling, in the higheſt manner, the great abilities of Overbury, inſinuated, that he was lately grown ſo inſupportably inſolent, that he could wiſh he was removed, by ſome honourable employment, to a greater diſtance from the ſeat of power. Far from ſuſpecting the cauſe of the favourite's application, James appointed Overbury bury his ambaſſador to a foreign court. On receiving notice of the honor conferred upon him, he conſulted with Rocheſter how he ought to proceed, as he conſidered his appointment as nothing more than an honorable baniſhment. The inſidious favourite, under pretence of not being able to ſupport his abſence, perſuaded him to reject the offer. Overbury followed his advice; but the favourite repairing immediately to court, repreſented the refuſal of Overbury as the higheſt inſolence: and James, who could not bear the ſlighteſt contempt of his authority, iſſued a warrant for committing him to the Tower.

Overbury being thus removed, Rocheſter not only obtained the king's conſent to marry the counteſs, but his majeſty alſo, previous to the performance of the ceremony, created him earl of Somerſet; which was done as a compliment to the counteſs, that her ſecond huſband might not be inferior in dignity to her firſt. The nuptials were ſolemnized in the moſt magnificent manner; and nothing was now wanting to complete their triumph but the death of Overbury, without which that implacable woman could not be ſatisfied. She uſed every art to effect her bloody purpoſe; and at laſt prevailed, both on her huſband, and the earl of Northampton her uncle, to engage in the atrocious deſign of taking him off by poiſon. Several attempts were accordingly made for that purpoſe, but the ſtrength of Overbury's conſtitution as often rendered them abortive. At laſt nature gave way to repeated attacks, and he died in the Tower on the ſixteenth of September, by a poiſoned clyſter. He was buried with the utmoſt diſpatch and ſecrecy; and though this precipitate interment cauſed a ſtrong ſuſpicion in the public, the horrid action was not diſcovered till ſome years after.---It is proper to obſerve, that James was intirely ignorant of the whole affair; and that he was ſtruck with horror when he found that unknowingly, he been made the promoter of ſuch a deteſtable ſcene of barbarity.

A. D. 1614. The earl of Somerſet, deprived of the advantage of Overbury's counſel, found himſelf greatly embarraſſed in the management of public affairs. His ſmall experience rendered every thing difficult; he became odious to the court; and though the king's partiality continued, his inſolence and weakneſs gave his enemies ſo many advantages, that it was evident he muſt ſoon be removed. The queen herſelf was inſulted by the favourite minion, and joined the party formed againſt him. After many conſultations on the beſt method of effecting the ruin of Somerſet, it was agreed to give the king a new favourite. The ſcheme ſucceeded; and George Villiers, a young man remarkable for his beauty and effeminacy, was the perſon choſen for this purpoſe.

James firſt beheld this gaudy object at a comedy acted at Cambridge, where he was conſpicuouſly placed, and immediately engaged the attention of the ing. Villiers was conducted to court, and ſoon eakened the influence of the favourite. He was mmediately knighted, and made a gentleman of the ed-chamber, with a penſion of a thouſand pounds per nnum.

Somerſet ſaw his fall was approaching, and exerted ll his influence to avert it. But his efforts were in ain: the diſcovery of Overbury's murder reduced im to the level from which he had been raiſed by the and of folly. The apothecary's boy, who had been mployed in adminiſtering the poiſoned clyſter, reealed the whole ſecret to Winwood, ſecretary of ate. The evidence of the boy was confirmed by e information of the counteſs of Shrewſbury, then priſoner in the Tower. That lady had found means inſinuate herſelf into the confidence of Sir Jarvaiſe lwis, lieutenant of the Tower; and being of an intriguing diſpoſition, ſhe drew the ſecret from him. James was ſoon informed of the atrocious deed; and the lieutenant being queſtioned, could not help betraying, by his countenance, the guilt that rankled at his heart. He confeſſed all he knew, and it was now determined to proſecute all the actors in this deteſtable tragedy. Accordingly Weſton, who had given Overbury the poiſon in tarts and jellies, and at laſt in a clyſter; Mrs. Turner, chief confident of the counteſs of Somerſet; Franklin the apothecary, who had prepared the poiſon; and Sir Jarvaiſe Elwis, lieutenant of the Tower, were ordered to be apprehended. All theſe, together with Somerſet and his counteſs, were convicted of the atrocious fact, on the fulleſt evidence. Somerſet and his counteſs only were pardoned; the reſt ſuffered the puniſhment due to their crimes. After ſome years impriſonment, James ſet them at liberty, and conferred on them a ſmall penſion, on which they lived retired in the country, and languiſhed out old age in infamy and obſcurity.

A. D. 1615. After the fall of Somerſet, the fortune of Villiers advanced with amazing rapidity. He was created duke of Buckingham, lord high-admiral of England, conſtable of Windſor, and, in a few years, loaded with thoſe honors and favours that might have rewarded the merit of many illuſtrious men. His family alſo was advanced to opulence. But this ſtrange and unworthy profuſion increaſed the king's neceſſities, and obliged him to raiſe money by very obnoxious means. He reſtored to the Dutch the three important fortreſſes of Fluſhing, the Brille, and Rammakins, for three hundred thouſand pounds. Theſe places had been put into the hands of Elizabeth by the ſtates of the United Provinces, as ſecurities for the ſum of eight hundred and eighteen thouſand four hundred and eight pounds, which that princeſs had advanced during the war with Spain. The neceſſities of James obliged him to accept the ſmall ſum above-mentioned, and the places were accordingly delivered up on the fourteenth of June.

This money was ſoon expended, but in what manner no one could gueſs: none of the king's debts were paid; the navy was not repaired, nor had any money been ſent to the army in Ireland, though their want formed the chief pretence for treating with the ſtates. At length it was diſcovered, that the lord treaſurer Suffolk had converted the greater part of the money received from Holland to his own uſe. As he was father-in-law to Somerſet, and conſequently no friend to Villiers the favourite, this opportunity to ruin him was readily embraced. The lord-treaſurer was accuſed, in the ſtar-chamber, of ſeveral miſdemeanors in the execution of his office, and particularly with having ſecreted large ſums received from the Dutch. Sir Edward Coke, who carried on the proſecution againſt him for the crown, aggravated his miſdemeanors, his extortions, his miſmanagement of the king's treaſure, his boldneſs in applying it to his own uſe, and the corruptions and artifices of his deputy Bingley, to abuſe the confidence of ſuch as had any buſineſs with his maſter. He produced ſeveral precedents of treaſurers who had been puniſhed for much ſlighter crimes than thoſe of the earl of Suffolk, and diſplayed the dangerous conſequences that muſt reſult from the corrupt adminiſtration of the public money.

Had Suffolk thrown himſelf upon the mercy of the king he would have been acquitted; but he endeavoured to invalidate the evidence brought againſt him, and juſtify his conduct againſt the malignant accuſations of his enemies. He failed in the attempt; and his judges pronounced him guilty. He was fined thirty thouſand pounds, and condemned to impriſonment during the king's pleaſure. Nor did his deputy Bingley eſcape: he was ſeverely reprimanded, and fined two thouſand pounds.

A. D. 1617. This year was rendered remarkable for the laſt expedition of Sir Walter Raleigh, which produced great murmurs againſt the Engliſh government, and ended in the death of that valiant ſeaman. During his impriſonment of thirteen years in the Tower, he had applied himſelf cloſely to ſtudy, and acquired ſo great a reputation for learning, that all his faults were forgotten; and he was as much lamented as he had been before hated by the people. By the application of various friends James ſet him at liberty, but at the ſame time abſolutely refuſed to grant him a pardon.

Sir Walter's eſtate being all forfeited he was greatly embarraſſed, and determined to ſeek his fortune in a ſtrange country. He had formerly traverſed the ſeas of America, and knew all the coaſts, eſpecially that of Guiana, where he imagined there was a rich mine, of which he found means to inform the king, and at the ſame time told his majeſty that he hoped to obtain immenſe quantities of gold from it, if he would grant him a private commiſſion. The mine lying in a country belonging to the Spaniards, it could not be ſeized without breaking the peace with Spain. But the king, tempted by the golden hopes inſpired by Raleigh, not only granted him a commiſſion, but ſupplied him with ſhips and money for undertaking ſo capital an enterprize.

When his fleet, which conſiſted of twelve ſhips, was ready, he ſailed from Plymouth, and ſteered directly for Guiana in America. On his arrival he found the Spaniards had formed a ſettlement on the river Oronoko, built a ſmall town called St. Thomas, and were working ſome gold mines of ſome value in the neighbourhood.

Raleigh entered the mouth of the river with his whole fleet, but did not think it prudent to purſue his deſign againſt the rapid current of the river with his largeſt ſhips. He therefore detached five of his ſmalleſt veſſels under the command of his ſon and captain Keymis, who was ſaid to have diſcovered the mine in queſtion, during his former voyage with Sir Walter to that country, with orders to ſail up the Oronoko, as far as poſſible, in order to find the mountain in the bowels of which the mine was ſituated. But not being able to purſue their courſe, they landed near St. Thomas, where they fired upon the Spaniards. Young Raleigh, to encourage his men, called out, "that this was the true mine, and none but fools looked for any other;" and advancing upon the Spaniards, received a ſhot of which he immediately expired. Keymis and his companions were not diſmayed, they carried on the attack with the utmoſt vigour, and ſoon made themſelves maſters of the place. They found not, however, the riches they expected: the Spaniards were poor, and the produce of the mines inconſiderable. Keymis was now requeſted to lead them to the mine he had before diſcovered, but abſolutely refuſed; and the Engliſh, after burning the town, returned to the reſt of the fleet at the mouth of the river. Raleigh, finding himſelf diſappointed in the promiſes of Keymis, threatened him with the king's diſpleaſure, which that officer prevented by retiring to his cabbin, and putting an end to his own life.

Raleigh's companions now ſuſpected that they had been deceived by their leader; that he had never any aſſurance of there being any ſuch mine he pretended to be in ſearch of; that he had always intended to plunder St. Thomas; and, after encouraging his ſoldiers with the ſpoil of that place, to have proceeded to invade the other Spaniſh ſettlements; hoping by ſuch daring enterprizes to repair the ruins of his ſhattered fortune, and flattering himſelf with being able to purchaſe with his wealth the pardon he had before ſolicited in vain. They therefore abſolutely refuſed to make any farther attempts on the Spaniſh ſettlements, and obliged him to return to Plymouth, where he was arreſted by his majeſty's order, and ſent a priſoner to the Tower of London.

During the abſence of Raleigh, the Spaniſh ambaſſador had made loud complaints at the court of London, of the depredations committed by the Engliſh under that intrepid commander; and the king, in order to appeaſe him, declared that Raleigh had no orders to act in an hoſtile manner againſt his countrymen. As Raleigh returned without the gold he had promiſed his majeſty, his affairs were now rendered deſperate; but as he could not be tried for his actions during the late expedition, for which he had a commiſſion in form, it was determined he ſhould loſe his head by virtue of the ſentence pronounced upon him fourteen years before. Accordingly the king, to ſilence the clamours of the court of Spain, ſigned the warrant for his execution.

Raleigh now plainly perceived his fate to be inevitable, and therefore collected all his courage to act the laſt ſcene of his life with bravery and reſolution. When he aſcended the ſcaffold, he took up the ax by which he was to be beheaded, and feeling the edge of it, ſaid, "It is a ſharp remedy, but a ſure one for all "ills." His ſpeech to the people was calm, manly, and eloquent; and he endeavoured to revenge himſelf, and load his enemies with the public hatred. As ſoon as he had finiſhed his harangue, he laid his head upon the block, with the utmoſt indifference, and received the fatal blow.

His death was regretted by the whole body of the nobility; and the Engliſh patriots beheld the fate of Raleigh with ſilent indignation. The public clamour againſt the puſillanimous adminiſtration of James was, by this event, greatly increaſed. It was thought an inſtance of cruelty and injuſtice to execute a ſentence, which had been ſo long ſuſpended, and tacitly pardoned, by conferring on him a new truſt and commiſſion; eſpecially as he was then the only man in England who enjoyed a high reputation for valour and military experience.

Never did the notions of liberty more ſtrongly prevail in Europe than at this period; even Hungary, Bohemia, and Auſtria, were as jealous of their rights as the Engliſh themſelves. The ſpirit of independence had taken root in Germany ever ſince the reign of Charles V. The example of the inhabitants of the United Provinces was always preſent with theſe people, who pretended to the ſame privileges, and thought themſelves in a better condition to demand them, than even the Hollanders themſelves. The emperor Matthias having procured his couſin Ferdinand of Auſtria to be elected nominal king of Hungary and Bohemia, and obliged the other archdukes to yield him up Auſtria the inhabitants of theſe three ſtates joined in complaining, that ſufficient regard had not been ſhewn to their privileges; religion alſo made a part of the grievance of the Bohemians, who, inſpired with an enthuſiaſtic zeal, ſoon became furious.

In the midſt of theſe confuſions Matthias paid the debt of nature, and Ferdinand of Auſtria was placed on the imperial throne. This new dignity, however, made no impreſſion upon the proteſtants of Bohemia, whoſe power was now conſiderable. They inſiſted on having liberty to rebuild the churches which had been thrown down by the catholics; upon which the council of ſtate iſſued a declaration againſt the proteſtants, peremptorily refuſing to grant their requeſt. Exaſperated at this denial, they repaired to the palace, and threw three of the emperor's officers out of the window. This outrage expoſed them to the fury of Ferdinand. They knew they had nothing to expect from his clemency, and therefore determined either to ſucceed in an attempt to recover their liberties, or periſh in the glorious cauſe. They conſidered themſelves as entitled to depoſe a king they had not elected, and actually made a tender of their crown to the Elector Palatine, ſon-in-law to the king of England. Frederick accepted the offer, and was readily elected king of Bohemia. James complained of this proceeding in the electors as diſloyal, imprudent and diſhonorable. He could by no means approve of the maxims of elective governments, and was perſuaded that Ferdinand, by a kind of preſcriptive right, had acquired a lawful title to Bohemia. He accuſed his ſon-in-law of forcing him either to deſert his cauſe, or break off his negotiation with Spain. He alſo complained of his duplicity, in having deſired his advice with regard to his accepting the crown of Bohemia, and actually received it before the meſſenger could arrive at London. The popularity of Frederick's cauſe was, notwithſtanding theſe reproaches, ſo great in England, that James found himſelf under a kind of neceſſity of doing ſomething in his favour. He could not, however, be prevailed upon to give his his ſon-in-law the title of king of Bohemia; and iſſued orders, forbidding the clergy to pray for him in the churches under that appellation.

A. D. 1619. In the beginning of this year James ſuſtained a conſiderable loſs in the death of his queen, who paid the debt of nature on the firſt of March, in the 46th year of her age. The character of this princeſs has been variouſly drawn by different writers. Some repreſent her as a vicious lewd woman: but this, on the ſtricteſt enquiry, appears to be nothing more than the effects of calumny: others more juſtly affirming, that ſhe was poſſeſſed of many virtues, and no ſmall ſhare of underſtanding.

About the ſame time the earl of Northumberland, who had been confined in the Tower ever ſince the gunpowder plot, obtained his liberty through the interceſſion of lord Hay, who, luckily for him, had married one of his daughters.

The affairs in Germany began now to wear a very ſerious aſpect. The new emperor Ferdinand II. who poſſeſſed greater abilities than generally fall to the ſhare of the Auſtrian princes, prepared himſelf, with great diligence, for the recovery of his authority. Beſides the aſſiſtance of his ſubjects, who adhered to the catholic religion, he attached to his intereſt a powerful combination of the neighbouring potentates; all the catholic princes of the empire declared in his favour; even the Elector of Saxony, the moſt powerful among the proteſtants, and the king of Poland, eſpouſed his cauſe. The Spaniſh monarch, who conſidered his own intereſt as inſeparably connected with the younger branch of his family, ſent him powerful ſuccours from Italy, and from the Low Countries, and alſo furniſhed large ſums of money for the ſupport of Ferdinand and the catholic religion.

The Bohemians, alarmed at theſe powerful preparations, took every precaution in their power for defending themſelves againſt the ſtorm which threatened to deſtroy both their liberties and religion. They applied to all the neighbouring princes and ſtates for aſſiſtance, and repreſented their cauſe as the cauſe of the goſpel, which they aſſerted muſt either ſtand or fall as they or the emperor proved victorious.

A. D. 1620. Ferdinand having collected a powerful army, under the command of the duke of Bavaria and the count de Bucquoy, marched againſt Frederick in Bohemia. At the ſame time Spinola aſſembled an army of thirty thouſand veterans in the Low Countries; and when Edmonds, James's reſident at Bruſſels, demanded of the archduke Albert the meaning of thoſe large preparations, he was told, that Spinola had received his orders immediately from Madrid, and that the king of Spain alone knew the purpoſe for which the forces were intended. In the mean time, the Elector Palatine was put under the ban of the empire, and the execution of it committed to the elector of Saxony, who immediately entered and ſubdued Luſatia.

The war now raged with great fury in the bowels of Germany; and James, unable any longer to reſiſt the ſolicitations of his ſubjects, who offered to advance very large ſums to ſupport the right of the Elector Palatine to the crown of Bohemia, gave leave for Sir Horace Vere to command a ſmall body of forces for the preſervation of the Palatinate. This little army conſiſted of two thouſand two hundred men, compoſed chiefly of volunteers, and headed by the intrepid earls of Oxford and Eſſex: the company of the latter conſiſted of three hundred gentlemen, fifty of whom he paid out of his own pocket; and a kind of promiſe was extorted from James, that he would ſuffer two more regiments to be ſent after them. Theſe brave volunteers were landed in Holland, paſſed the Rhine below Weſel, and were eſcorted to Frankfort by a body of troops under prince Frederick Henry of Naſſau. On the firſt of October they joined the Palatine army, commanded by the Margrave of Anſpach. They arrived, however, only time enough to be the melancholy witneſſes of the deſtruction of that cauſe they came to ſupport. The duke of Bavaria having joined the imperial general in Bohemia, advanced towards Prague, in the neighbourhood of which the Elector Palatine was poſted. For ſome days the two armies faced each other; but on the eighteenth of November a battle was fought, which decided the fate of the Bohemian crown. The Elector Palatine was totally defeated, and fled, with his wife and family, to Holland. The inhabitants of Prague opened their gates to the Imperialiſts; and the unfortunate Frederick ſaw himſelf abandoned by all his friends and allies, except count Mansfeldt, who ſtill preſerved his fidelity.

The complaints of the people againſt the timid and puſillanimous conduct of James were now both loud and alarming. It was ſaid publicly, that he had not only deprived the elector of that aſſiſtance which the Engliſh were both willing and able to afford him, but had alſo deterred other princes from eſpouſing his quarrel.

It cannot be ſuppoſed that James was unwilling to preſerve the Palatinate; but he was ſo much infatuated by the perſuaſions of Gondomar the Spaniſh ambaſſador, that he believed the moſt effectual expedient for that purpoſe would be the marriage of his ſon with the Infanta of Spain; and that the treaty (which was at this time negotiating for that purpoſe) would infallibly miſcarry if he took any vigorous meaſures in favour of the elector. Beſides, his averſion to war was inſuperable: he never dreamed that his peaceable diſpoſition tended only to expoſe him to contempt: he conſidered not that the Spaniſh match itſelf would be attended with ſuch difficulties, that all his art of negotiation could never be able to remove, much leſs that this alliance could ſafely be depended upon as the means of procuring the great advantages he expected from it.

A. D. 1621. James, however, affected to purſue vigorous meaſures, hoping, by thoſe means, to receive ample ſubſidies from the parliament, which met on the 21ſt of January. He opened the ſeſſion with a long ſpeech addreſſed to both houſes, in which he expatiated on his own merit and neceſſities; and demanded ſupplies for the relief of the Palatinate, in defence of which he would hazard his crown, and even the life of his ſon, ſhould his endeavours to procure a reaſonable pacification be rendered abortive.

The commons, extremely incenſed againſt the ambitious proceedings of the houſe of Auſtria, immediately granted the king two ſubſidies, with which James was ſatisfied for the preſent. This affair being diſcuſſed, the commons received petitions againſt the increaſe of popiſh recuſants, monopolies, and projectors. The king had farmed to certain individuals the power of licenſing taverns and public houſes; and granted to Sir Giles Mompeſſon and Francis Michel an excluſive patent for the ſale of gold and ſilver lace. By virtue of this privilege, they had been guilty of ſuch ſcandalous frauds and extortion, that upon complaint being made to the upper houſe, they were ordered to be committed to priſon. Mompeſſon, however, found means to eſcape; but he was degraded from the honor of knighthood, and his eſtate confiſcated. His companion in iniquity was ſentenced to do public penance in the ſtreet, ſitting on horſeback with his face towards the tail, to pay a fine of a thouſand pounds, and to be impriſoned for life.

The ſevere proceedings of the parliament againſt theſe delinquents greatly alarmed James. and he began to fear for his favourite Buckingham, who had been the principal author of theſe monopolies. He therefore went to the houſe of peers, and ſoothed the parliament with the moſt affectionate expreſſions, aſſuring them, that if he had known of theſe grievances, he would have puniſhed the authors himſelf with the utmoſt ſeverity. But at the ſame time cautioned them againſt liſtening to thoſe who ſhould accuſe the innocent as well as the guilty. The houſe underſtood his meaning, and ſtopped the inquiry with regard to the ſource of theſe enormities.

A few days after the commons impeached lord chancellor Bacon, lately created baron of Verulam, and viſcount of St. Alban's. In conſequence of this James again repaired to the houſe, and, in a ſpeech, repreſented the neceſſity of puniſhing corrupt judges; and ſolicited farther ſubſidies, as the ſupplies granted by the commons were already expended in ſubſiſting the Elector Palatine and his family, who had taken refuge in Holland. He obſerved, that large ſums would be neceſſary for defraying the expence of ſending extraordinary ambaſſadors to all the courts of Europe, as well as in maintaining an army to act with vigour, if the negotiations proved abortive, and concluded with proteſting, that he would not diſſolve the parliament till all the affairs then under conſideration ſhould be fully determined.

The articles ſent up to the peers by the commons, againſt the lord-chancellor, were now read and examined. Conſcious of his guilt, Bacon imprecated the mercy of his judges, and endeavoured, by a general confeſſion, to avoid the ſhame of a public enquiry. But the lords were inexorable, and inſiſted on a full confeſſion of all his corrupt practices. He accordingly acknowledged twenty-eight articles, and was ſo very particular in his confeſſion, that he mentioned a dozen gold buttons which his ſervants had taken as a gift from a ſuiter in chancery. Upon making this confeſſion he was condemned to pay a fine of forty thouſand pounds, to be impriſoned in the Tower during the king's pleaſure, to be for ever incapable of holding any office, place or employment, and to be excluded from ever ſitting in parliament.

Bacon was a nobleman univerſally admired for the greatneſs of his genius, and no leſs beloved for his courteous and affable behaviour. But his want of œconomy, and his indulgence to his ſervants, had involved him in debt; and in order to ſupply his neceſſities he had been tempted to take bribes from ſuiters in chancery. It is, however, affirmed, that notwithſtanding this enormous abuſe, he always maintained, in the ſeat of juſtice, the inflexible integrity of a judge, and that his decrees were ſo juſt and equitable, that they were never queſtioned nor reverſed. He ſurvived five years the dreadful ſentence pronounced againſt him in the houſe of lords; and being ſoon after releaſed from the Tower, his genius, which was yet unbroken, ſhone out with amazing luſtre in literary productions, which, notwithſtanding all his failings, have juſtly placed him among the ornaments of the Engliſh nation. Conſcious of the great merit of Bacon, the king remitted the fine, ſettled on him a penſion of 18,00l. a year, and employed every expedient to alleviate the weight of age and misfortunes. Experience had taught Bacon the vanity of human greatneſs, and he now acknowledged that the pleaſures reſulting from ſtudy and retirement, were far ſuperior to thoſe acquired by the higheſt poſts in government.

In the mean time the commons indefatigably purſued their laudable deſign of removing all grievances complained of by the people; and diſcuſſed every complaint laid before them with the utmoſt freedom, though many of them ſenſibly affected the king or his miniſters. Some parts of the king's prerogative were attacked; and his authority, in many reſpects, warmly diſputed.

James, alarmed at theſe proceedings, ſent a very ſharp meſſage to the ſpeaker; in which he obſerved, that though he was ready to correct the abuſes of his power, he would never ſubmit to have that power itſelf queſtioned and denied. But this producing no effect upon the conduct of the commons, he prorogued the parliament.

This parliament is remarkable for being the Æra when the parties of court and country (afterwards known by the name of Tories and Whigs) were firſt regularly formed. All thoſe who favoured the hierarchy of the church, and the prerogative of the crown, adhered to the former: while the puritans and the patriots adhered firmly to the latter. The ſpirit of enthuſiaſm, bold, daring, and uncontrouled, ſtrongly diſpoſed the minds of the puritans to adopt republican tenets; and inclined them to arrogate in their affairs and conduct the ſame liberty which they aſſumed in the diſcuſſion of religious tenets. And as the court, in order to diſcourage all parliamentary oppoſition, affixed the name of puritans to its antagoniſts, that rigid ſect readily adopted this diſtinction, which was ſo favourable to their cauſe by connecting it with that of the patriots and country party.

Though James, during the receſs of parliament had revoked ſeveral of his oppreſſive patents, and removed other grievances; yet when the commons reaſſembled on the 20th of November, they were fa from entertaining any favourable idea of their ſovereign. A few days after their meeting they drew u a ſpirited remonſtrance to his majeſty, in which the repreſented, "That the power of the houſe o Auſtria threatened the liberties of Europe; that th progreſs of the catholic religion in England occaſioned the moſt alarming apprehenſions, leſt it ſhoul once more gain the aſcendant in the kingdom; tha the king's lenity towards the profeſſors of that religion had increaſed their arrogance and preſumption that the uncontrouled conqueſts made by the Auſtria family had raiſed the expectations of the Engliſh papiſts; while the expectation of the Spaniſh match inſpired them with the moſt ſanguine hopes of procuring, if not a final eſtabliſhment, at leaſt an entire toleration of their religion." They then proceede humbly to offer to his majeſty the following remedi againſt theſe growing evils: "That he ſhould immediately undertake the defence of the Palatinate b force of arms; that he ſhould declare war again Spain, whoſe arms and riches formed the chief bulwark of the catholic religion in Europe; that he ſhould engage in no negotiations for the marriage of his ſon, but with a proteſtant princeſs; that the children of popiſh recuſants ſhould be taken from their parents, and committed to the care of proteſtant teachers and ſchoolmaſters; and that the fines and confiſcations to which the catholics were ſubject by the law, ſhould be exacted with the utmoſt rigour."

James was at Newmarket when he received intelligence of this unprecedented remonſtrance, at which he was ſo exaſperated that he immediately wrote a very ſevere letter to the ſpeaker, wherein he ſharply rebuked the houſe for debating openly on matters far above their reach and capacity, and ſtrictly forbad them to meddle with any thing that regarded his government or deep matters of ſtate; and eſpecially not to touch on his ſon's marriage with a daughter of Spain, nor to attack the honour of that king, or any of his friends and confederates.

The commons were far from being intimidated at the king's letter. They knew their own ſtrength too well to be frightened at James's menaces. Inſtead of retracting what they had done, they entered with greater freedom than ever on the national grievances, and the dangerous ſtate of the reformed religion both at home and abroad. They formed a new remonſtrance, drawn up indeed in very reſpectful terms, but not leſs bold and ſpirited than the former. After reminding him of the chearfulneſs with which they undertook to aſſiſt him in the defence of the Palatinate, they obſerved, "That their zeal for the proteſtant religion, and the intereſt of his majeſty's family, had induced them to repreſent the dangers with which both were threatened, and to point out remedies for thoſe evils: that by his letter to the ſpeaker, he ſeemed determined to deprive them of the parliamentary liberty to ſpeak freely in the houſe, and alſo of the juriſdiction which the houſe exerciſed over its own members; they therefore begged he would not violate a privelege which was their undoubted right, and which they inherited from their anceſtors; a right which he himſelf had confirmed in his ſpeeches to the parliament, and without which it would be impoſſible to diſcuſs and determine the affairs that might fall under their cognizance."

This reſolute and determined remonſtrance lighted every ſpark of regal pride in the breaſt of James. His anſwer was ſhort, peremptory, and ſuitable to that ſpirit of kingly power which filled his breaſt. After explaining his intentions with regard to the prerogative in very clear and explicit terms, he concluded his reply with regard to the rights and privileges of parliament in the following manner: "And although we cannot allow the ſtyle, calling it your undoubted right and inheritance, but could rather have wiſhed you had ſaid, that your privileges were derived from the grace and permiſſion of our anceſtors and us (for moſt of them grew by precedents, which rather ſhew toleration than inheritance:) yet we are pleaſed to give our royal aſſurance, that, as long as you continue yourſelves within the limits of your duty, we will be as careful to maintain and preſerve your lawful liberties and privileges as any of our anceſtors were, nay, as to preſerve our royal prerogative; ſo as your houſe ſhall only have need to beware to trench upon the prerogative of the crown, which would enforce us, or any juſt king, to retrench them of their privileges, that would pare his prerogative and the flowers of his crown. But of this we hope there will never be cauſe given."

This anſwer, which was dated at Newmarket the 11th of December, greatly alarmed the commons. They ſaw their title to every privilege, if not plainly denied, yet conſidered at leaſt as very precarious. He plainly told them it might be forfeited by abuſe, and they had already abuſed it. They therefore reſolved to grant no ſupply till they received ſatisfaction from James for the breach of their privileges, and drew up the following proteſtation, which is ſo very remarkable, that it will be neceſſary to give it at full length. "The commons now aſſembled in parliament, being juſtly occaſioned thereunto, concerning ſundry liberties, franchiſes, and privileges of parliament, among others here mentioned, do make the following proteſtation: That the liberties, franchiſes, and juriſdictions of parliament are the ancient and undoubted birth-right and inheritance of the ſubjects of England; and that the urgent and arduous affairs concerning the king, ſtate, and defence of the realm, and of the church of England; and the maintenance and making of laws, and redreſs of miſchiefs and grievances, which daily happen within this realm, are proper ſubjects and matter of council and debate in parliament, and that in the handling and proceeding of thoſe buſineſſes, every member of the houſe of parliament hath, and of right ought to have, freedom of ſpeech to propound, treat, reaſon, and bring to concluſion the ſame; and that the commons in parliament have like liberty and freedom to treat of theſe matters, in ſuch order as in their judgment ſhall ſeem fitteſt, and that every member of the ſaid houſe hath like freedom from all impeachment, impriſonment, and moleſtation (other than by cenſure of the houſe itſelf) for or concerning any ſpeaking, reaſoning, or declaring of any matter or matters touching the parliament or parliamentary buſineſs. And that if any of the members be complained of and queſtioned for any thing done or ſaid in parliament, the ſame is to be ſhewn to the king by the advice and aſſent of all the commons aſſembled in parliament, before the king give credence to any private information."

Alarmed at theſe proceedings, James haſtened to town from Newmarket with a determined reſolution to exert his authority, and convince the commons that they had proceeded too far in aſſerting their liberties. On his arrival, he ſent immediately for the journal-book of the commons, and, before the council, tore out the above proteſtation, which he conſidered as an inſult on his prerogative. At the ſame time he declared it abſolutely null and void, becauſe it was voted tumultuouſly at a late hour, and in a very thin houſe; and becauſe it was expreſſed in ſuch general and ambiguous terms, as might be conſidered as a ſufficient foundation for the moſt enormous crimes, and extended to the moſt unwarrantable uſurpations on the prerogative of the crown. A few days after he diſſolved the parliament by proclamation, and immediately wreaked his vengeance on thoſe members of the houſe of commons who had been moſt active in taking ſuch liberties with his power and adminiſtration. He committed ſeveral of them to priſon: others were ſent to Ireland under pretence of executing ſome commiſſion in that country; and the earls of Southampton and Oxford were committed to the Tower.

In the mean time the king of Bohemia, finding all his father-in-law's pacific endeavours prove abortive, determined to make one final effort for recovering his dominions. Accordingly he levied a powerful army under three commanders, Chriſtian duke of Brunſwick, the prince of Baden Dourlack, and count Mansfeldt: but the ſame ill ſucceſs ſtill attended the unfortunate Frederick: the two former generals were defeated by count Tilly at the head of the Imperaliſts. This misfortune did not, however, intimidate Mansfeldt; he continued the war with great perſeverance, though ill ſupplied with money by the palatine, and king of England. At laſt the unfortunate Frederick determined to give over his fruitleſs efforts: he retired to Sedan, where he remained an unwelcome gueſt with his uncle the duke of Brunſwick. Count Mansfeldt was diſmiſſed the ſervice, and retired with his army into the Low-countries, where the ſtates received him into their pay.

James now gave up all thoughts of recovering the palatinate from the emperor. But he ſtill flattered himſelf that if he could accompliſh his ſon's marriage with the infanta of Spain, he ſhould be able to maintain, by the aſſiſtance of that court, the territories of his ſon-in-law, and re-inſtate him in his former dignity. Ferdinand, however, determined to prevent him from executing his project. He aſſembled a diet at Ratiſbon, in which he declared, "that the elector palatine, having been guilty of high-treaſon, his eſtates, goods and dignities were forfeited; but being unwilling to diminiſh the number of electors, he ordered that Maximilian of Bavaria ſhould be inveſted with the electorate palatine."

A. D. 1622. The eyes of the Engliſh were now turned towards Spain, where Digby, earl of Briſtol, had the ſole management of the negotiation for the marriage. Briſtol was a nobleman of great abilites, and had formerly diſapproved of entering into any engagements with Spain; but appeared now ſo convinced of the ſincerity of that court, that he wrote a letter to James, congratulating him on the entire accompliſhment of his views and projects: a daughter of Spain, whom he repreſented as extremely amiable, would ſoon, he ſaid, be conducted into England, and bring with her an immenſe fortune of two millions, a ſum four times greater than was ever given with any other princeſs. The truth is, that the court of Spain had hitherto carried on the negotiation merely to amuſe the Engliſh monarch; but perceiving that James was determined, on any terms, to complete the alliance. it was thought that ſo favourable an opportunity of reſtoring the catholic faith in England ſhould not be neglected, as it ſeemed more than probable it might eaſily be effected by means of the infanta, and her numerous train of domeſtics and dependents, who were to enjoy the free exerciſe of their religion. From theſe expectations, the behaviour of the Spaniſh court was now entirely changed, and appeared as eager to conclude the negotiation. as before to find excuſes for deferring it. The only difficulty conſiſted in extorting from the Engliſh monarch ſuch conceſſions as might contribute to complete the favourite deſign, and which the impatience of James gave the greateſt reaſon to expect.

Digby, during his reſidence in Spain, had been principally employed in ſettling the preliminaries of the marriage. At length the court of Spain made their final demands with regard to that particular, and the earl ſent them immediately to his maſter. James made ſome difficulty of agreeing to theſe articles; but his deſire of completing the marriage at laſt got the better of his prudence: he ſigned the articles, and ſent them back to Spain. Among all the conceſſions favourable to the catholics, none gave greater diſguſt to the Engliſh than that in which the king engaged that the children of the prince and the Infanta ſhould be educated by their mother till they were ten years of age; a condition which could only be ſtipulated with a view of implanting in their tender minds the ſtrongeſt prejudices in favour of the Romiſh religion; and though ſo early an age might ſeem little ſuſceptible of any laſting impreſſions, yet the ſame motive which prompted the Spaniſh monarch to inſert it, ſhould have induced the king of England to reject it. Beſides the public treaty, there were ſeveral private articles, by which both the king and prince of Wales engaged to ſuſpend the penal laws againſt the catholics, to obtain a repeal of them from the parliament, and to tolerate the exerciſe of the popiſh religion in private houſes.

Every previous ſtep being thus adjuſted, nothing was wanting to conclude the marriage but the pope's diſpenſation, which was conſidered merely as a matter of formality. Elated by this ſucceſs, James triumphed in his pacific councils, and conſoled himſelf for the contempt with which he had been treated in every court of Europe for viewing, without concern, the deplorable ſtate of the palatine. He boaſted, that by his own diſtinguiſhed wiſdom and ſagacity, he had procured advantages far ſuperior than thoſe he could have acquired by the moſt powerful armies. But all his flattering ideas of greatneſs were deſtroyed by a man, whom he had raiſed from a private ſtation to be the curſe of himſelf, his family and his people.

A. D. 1623. Ever ſince the fall of Somerſet the duke of Buckingham had ruled unrivalled in the council, and was now as much in favour with the prince of Wales as with the king: both implicitly followed his councils and adopted his opinions; while that artful favourite employed all his power to ſerve the purpoſes of his own unbounded ambition. He had been all along envious of the great credit obtained by Briſtol in the Spaniſh negotiation, and was determined to ſupplant him, or, at leaſt, to ſhare in the honour of concluding a treaty ſo agreeable to the king. He perſuaded the prince to undertake a journey to the court of Madrid in perſon, in order to bring home his miſtreſs the Infanta. He repreſented to him, that the romantic nature of the adventure could not fail of attracting the admiration and affection of that monarch and his ſubjects, and of introducing him to the princeſs under the character of a fond lover, rather than of a ſtately huſband; that the negotiation with regard to the Palatinate, which had hitherto languiſhed in the hands of miniſters, would quickly be terminated by ſo illuſtrious an agent, ſeconded by the mediation and intreaties of the grateful Infanta: that the Spaniſh generoſity, excited by ſo uncommon an inſtance of truſt and confidence, would undoubtedly make conceſſions far beyond what could be expected from the moſt political conſiderations.

Charles, inflamed with theſe generous and romantic ideas, embraced the propoſal with rapture, and it was agreed to make application to the king for leave to carry the deſign into execution immediately. They choſe the moment when James was in the moſt kind and jovial humour; and by importunities, rather than the force of their reaſons, they extorted from him a haſty and unguarded conſent.

But the prince and Buckingham had hardly left the king, before he repented of his weakneſs: every difficulty occurred with a peculiar force, and the danger to which the prince's perſon muſt be expoſed affected him in a very ſenſible manner. He reflected, that however pardonable this romantic expedition might be conſidered in youth, it muſt reflect diſgrace on mature age: that if the profeſſions of the Spaniſh monarch were ſincere, a few months only muſt finiſh the negotiation, and bring the Infanta to England, without expoſing his only ſon, the heir of his crown, the prop of his age, to ſo dangerous an undertaking.

Agitated by theſe reflections, James determined t recal his promiſe, and prevent, by a timely oppoſition an undertaking which, if unfortunate, muſt rende him at once both infamous to his people, and ridiculous to all poſterity. Accordingly, when the princ and Buckingham returned for their diſpatches, Jame informed them of the reaſons which had prevaile upon him to change his reſolution, and begged the would bury all thoughts of ſo ridiculous an adventu in the pit of forgetfulneſs. The prince was great affected at this diſappointment, but anſwered only with tears. Buckingham aſſumed the air of authority, and told the king, that this retraction of his promiſe, ſo ſoon after it was given, muſt render all his declarations for ever after ſuſpected; that the word of a king ought to be ſacred, and never broken but by the moſt powerful reaſons, or abſolute neceſſity.

James, who was unable to make an effectual oppoſition to the deſigns of the prince and favourite, renewed his conſent, proper directions were given for the journey, and the prince, with Buckingham, and their two attendants, Sir Francis Cottington, the prince's ſecretary, and Endymion Porter, gentleman of his bed-chamber, with Sir Richard Graham, maſter of the horſe to Buckingham, paſſed, diſguiſed and undiſcovered, through France. They even ventured to appear in a court ball at Paris, where Charles ſaw the princeſs Henrietta, then in the bloom of youth and beauty.

They reached Madrid on the 6th of March, eleven days after their departure from England. Their unexpected appearance ſurprized every body in that capital. As ſoon as Philip was informed of their arrival he immediately paid Charles a viſit; made him the warmeſt proteſtations of friendſhip; ſhewed him every reſpect in the power of majeſty to beſtow; and preſented him with a golden key which opened all his apartments, that the prince might have free acceſs to him at all hours. He gave him the upper hand on all occaſions, except in the apartments aſſigned for his reſidence. The ſame pomp and ceremonies were uſed, when Charles firſt viſited the palace, as were common at the coronation of the kings of Spain; and the council received public orders to obey him as the king himſelf. Every kind of rejoicing was uſed throughout the kingdom; and all the priſons were thrown open, that even thoſe who before languiſhed in confinement might ſhare in the general joy. The Infanta, however, was only permitted to ſee her lover in public, the Spaniſh ideas of decency being ſo ſtrict as not to admit of any farther intercourſe till the arrival of the diſpenſation.

In the mean time pope Gregory XV. who had granted the diſpenſation, died, and Urban VIII. was placed in the pontifical chair. This event induced the nuncio not to deliver the diſpenſation till it could receive the ſanction of Urban; who, hoping that ſome expedient might be diſcovered, during the prince's reſidence in Spain, to effect his converſion to the catholic faith, delayed the diſpenſation.

This gave great uneaſineſs both to James and his ſon; which being perceived by Philip, he took the utmoſt pains to diſſipate every apprehenſion, and endeavoured to prevail on the prince to wait till the diſpenſation could be procured from the court of Rome. Charles, however, tired with expectation, applied to Philip for leave to return home, which that monarch readily granting the prince, after having ſworn to the obſervance of all the articles in the marriage treaty, ſet out, attended by a numerous train of the Spaniſh nobility, for St. Andero, where he embarked on board a veſſel ſent by his father to convey him to England.

No prince, perhaps, ever more engaged the affections of the Spaniards than Charles. His character, compoſed of decency, reſerve, modeſty, and ſobriety, rendered him univerſally reſpected among all ranks of people. They were in love with his unparalleled confidence, and the romantic gallantry he had practiced towards their princeſs. At the ſame time, his advantageous figure, and the blooming graces of youth that adorned his countenance, endeared him to the court of Madrid, and made deep impreſſions on the heart of the Infanta. Had the character of Buckingham been equal to that of the prince, every thing had ſucceeded according to their wiſhes; but that nobleman was as much deſpiſed and hated as the prince was eſteemed and beloved. His diſſolute pleaſures, his ſallies of paſſion, his arrogant, impetuous temper, rendered him the object of the Spaniards averſion, and he was, in general, treated with contempt.

Buckingham, conſcious of the affronts he had given to the court of Spain, and fearful of the influence of the Infanta when ſhe arrived in England, determined to employ all his credit to prevent the marriage from being concluded. But it ſeemed a difficult taſk to prevail on the prince to treat a court, where he had received the moſt diſtinguiſhed favours, with ingratitude; and, if poſſible, ſtill more difficult to induce James to break off a treaty, the accompliſhment of which had ſo long been the object of his wiſhes, and which he had now ſo nearly brought to a ſucceſsful and happy iſſue.

Notwithſtanding, however, theſe obſtacles, Buckingham had ſo far got the aſcendancy over James and his ſon, that peremptory orders were ſent to the earl of Briſtol for breaking off all negotiations. Theſe orders arrived juſt at the time when that miniſter had, to all appearance, accommodated every difference between the contracting parties, and the Spaniards were on the point of delivering up the Infanta.

A. D. 1624. Philip was far from being ſurprized at this ſudden change of ſentiments in the Britiſh court: he was no ſtranger to the diſguſt of Buckingham; and believing him a man capable of ſacrificing to his own ungovernable paſſions the deareſt intereſts of his king and country, he ſuſpected his unbounded ambition would be employed to foment a quarrel between the two nations.

The pope's diſpenſation had reached Spain ſoon after the departure of Charles and Buckingham; and the Infanta immediately aſſumed the title of princeſs of Wales. Philip was therefore very unwilling to break off the treaty, eſpecially as he foreſaw that a rupture between the two crowns would be the inevitable conſequence; and he determined that nothing on his part ſhould be wanting to complete the marriage, and maintain the harmony that now ſubſiſted between Spain and England. He accordingly ſent a written promiſe to the earl of Briſtol, engaging to procure the reſtoration of the Palatinate, either by treaty or force of arms. But when he found that this conceſſion was diſregarded, he ordered the Infanta to lay aſide the title of princeſs of Wales, and to drop the ſtudy of the Engliſh language, which ſhe had been very aſſiduous in learning. At the ſame time, perſuaded that the court of England would not ſtop at the violation of the marriage treaty, he ordered the neceſſary preparations to be made in every part of his dominions, for carrying on a war with that kingdom.

As ſoon as the people of England were informed that the treaty of Spain was at an end, they celebrated the rupture with bonfires, and other public demonſtrations of joy. Buckingham, by giving a partial, and, in many inſtances, a falſe account of the negotiation, eaſily inflamed thoſe minds which were already prejudiced againſt Spain. Eulogiums were poured upon him as one of the beſt of ſubjects; and he acquired the epithet of Deliverer of his Country.

James, who wanted firmneſs of mind to reſiſt the impetuoſity of the nation, was ſwept away with the torrent, and obliged, contrary to his natural principles, to follow thoſe violent reſolutions that led inevitably to war. He aſſembled a parliament, in order to obtain ſupplies. In his ſpeech to the two houſes, he dropped ſome hints of the cauſes of complaint he had againſt Spain; and graciouſly condeſcended to aſk their advice, which he had ever before rejected, with regard to the conduct of ſo important an affair as the marriage of his ſon. The commons promiſed to aſſiſt him in revenging the affront put upon him by Spain: for Buckingham, by laying before a committee of both houſes a long and partial account, which he pretended was a true and complete narrative of all the ſteps taken in the Spaniſh negotiation, had intirely gained the confidence of that aſſembly. It contained ſo many contradictory circumſtances, that they were ſufficient to open the eyes of every reaſonable man, notwithſtanding the artful veil which was thrown over the whole proceedings. But the narrative concurred ſo well with the paſſions and prejudices of the parliament, that no ſcruple was made of immediately adopting it as a truth that could not be diſputed. Charmed with having at laſt the opportunity, ſo long and ſo ardently deſired, of going to war with papiſts, they thought not of future conſequences, but immediately adviſed the king to break off both treaties with Spain, as well that which regarded the marriage, as that for the reſtitution of the Palatinate.

The parliament, having thus given their voice for a war, preſented a petition to the king, that he would cauſe the laws againſt Romiſh prieſts and jeſuits to be ſtrictly executed: that he would iſſue orders for ſeizing the arms of popiſh recuſants, and obliging them to retire from the capital; that he would revoke all licences granted to ſuch recuſants, and put a ſtop to the great concourſe of people who reſorted to hear maſs in the chapels of ambaſſadors; that he ſhould deprive all the papiſts of the poſts they enjoyed under the government, and not relax the laws made againſt popiſh recuſants on any account whatever.

James returned a very gracious and condeſcending anſwer; but declared himſelf an enemy to all perſecution on account of religion, from a thorough conviction that it always injured the cauſe it was intended to promote; according to the received maxim, "That the blood of the martyrs was the ſeed of the church." At the ſame time, he condemned an intire indulgence to the catholics; and ſtrongly hinted, that a middle courſe ought to be choſen, as the moſt political, and at the ſame time the moſt humane.

It being now determined to purſue hoſtile meaſures, the king repaired to the parliament houſe, where he declared, in a ſpeech to that aſſembly, his reſolution of humbling the pride of Spain, provided they would engage to ſupport him. He began his harangue with lamenting his misfortune, in being obliged, in his old age, to exchange the bleſſings of peace for the inevitable calamities attendant on war. He repreſented to them the prodigious expence requiſite for maintaining military armaments; and demanded a vote of ſix ſubſidies and twelve fifteenths, as a proper ſtock before war was declared againſt Spain. He mentioned the large debts he had contracted, principally to ſupport the Elector Palatine and his family; but declared, he inſiſted not on any ſupply for himſelf; the honor and ſecurity of the kingdom was all he was deſirous of ſupporting. He even ſo far forgot his prerogative, which he had hitherto ſo ſtrenuouſly ſupported, that he made a dangerous and unexpected conceſſion, that the ſums granted ſhould be veſted in a committee of parliament, and be iſſued by them without being intruſted to his management.

Nothing could be more agreeable to the commons; they readily accepted the offer, but voted much leſs than was demanded; three ſubſidies and three fifteenths were thought a ſufficient ſum for the preſent occaſions of the ſtate; nor did they take the leaſt notice of that part of his ſpeech which regarded his own neceſſities, though he had made a conceſſion much greater than they could have expected.

Though the commons were ſo parſimonious in their ſupplies, they took advantage of the preſent agreement between the king and the parliament, to make freſh attacks upon the prerogative. James had aboliſhed all the monopolies ſo loudly and ſo juſtly complained of; but this did not ſatisfy the commons; they paſſed an act, by which it was declared, that all monopolies were contrary to the laws and liberties of the kingdom. By the ſame ſtatute it was enacted, that every man enjoyed an entire freedom with regard to his own actions, provided he did nothing detrimental to any perſon; and that no other authority but that of the laws ſhould ſtop this unlimited right; a principle which ſerved as a baſis for the civil liberties of England.

Buckingham, who was become the profeſſed enemy of the earl of Briſtol, had, ſince his arrival from Spain, threw out many ſcandalous reflections againſt that nobleman both before the council and the parliament. Orders were now ſent to the earl to leave the court of Madrid; on the receipt of which he applied for an audience, that he might properly diſcharge the ceremonial of his departure. Philip expreſſed the higheſt regret that Briſtol's ſervices ſhould meet with ſo unworthy a reward; and that his enemies ſhould have ſo far prevailed, as to infuſe prejudices into his maſter and his country againſt a miniſter who had ſo faithfully performed his duty to both. He endeavoured to prevail upon him to engage in his ſervice, promiſing to beſtow upon him every advantage of rank and fortune he himſelf could deſire. But Briſtol, though he expreſſed the utmoſt gratitude for this generous offer, refuſed every thing, and determined to return immediately to his own country, not doubting but the torch of truth would ſoon expoſe the falſhoods of his enemies in their genuine colours. Philip could not even prevail upon him to accept of ten thouſand ducats, though his circumſtances rendered ſuch a preſent neceſſary. The monarch uſed every intreaty in his power to prevail, and aſſured him that neither James, nor any one elſe, ſhould ever know he had received it. "There is one (anſwered the virtuous miniſter) who will be privy to the whole tranſaction; it is the earl of Briſtol, and he will certainly reveal it to the king of England."

The parliament being prorogued on the 29th of May, it was thought neceſſary to make ſome preparations for oppoſing the warlike armament fitting out by the court of Spain, and alſo to aſſiſt the count Palatine. Eight citizens of London were appointed as treaſurers for the money raiſed by parliament, and theſe were aſſiſted by ten other perſons from his majeſty's council of war. Without a warrant from theſe no money could be iſſued, nor even by their order, on any other account than to defray the expences of the war, as they were accountable to the commons in parliament. It was computed that the ſums granted laſt ſeſſion would be ſufficient to ſend twenty-five thouſand men into the Palatinate, under the command of an Engliſh general. Six thouſand only were, however, raiſed, and ſent into Holland to join the army of the States, commanded by the prince of Orange; while another army, under count Mansfeldt, was to penetrate into the Palatinate.

During theſe tranſactions the earl of Holland, Engliſh ambaſſador at the French court, informed James that Lewis XIII. was inclined to liſten to an overture of marriage between the prince of Wales and the princeſs Henrietta Maria. James, pleaſed with the offer, appointed the earl of Carliſle to repair to Paris in order to aſſiſt the earl of Holland in the negotiation. Accordingly, commiſſioners were appointed to treat with the Engliſh ambaſſadors: and the Engliſh monarch was ſo deſirous of terminating this affair, that the marriage articles were ſigned at Paris on the tenth of November, and were nearly the ſame in ſubſtance with thoſe which had been before concluded with Spain. For as Lewis required only the ſame conditions which had been granted to the catholic king, James made no ſcruple of complying. And as the prince, while in Spain, had given a verbal promiſe, that the Infanta ſhould be intruſted with the education of her children till they were ten years of age, the ſame article was inſerted in this treaty: and to that condition is generally, and perhaps juſtly aſcribed, the misfortunes that afterwards attended the Stuart family.

In the mean time count Mansfeldt came over to England, where he was received with extraordinary marks of reſpect, and lodged in apartments, fitted up for his reception, in the palace. After ſome conferences, it was agreed, that Mansfeldt, at the head of twelve thouſand men, ſhould carry on the war in the Lower Palatinate. The French miniſtry, during the negotiation for the marriage, made large promiſes, but always couched in general terms, not only of granting the Engliſh a paſſage through France, but alſo of re-inforcing their army with conſiderable bodies of troops during their march to the Palatinate; but on the arrival of the Engliſh, under the command of Mansfeldt, before Calais, they found that no orders had been ſent for their admiſſion. This occaſioned many diſpatches; but the French miniſtry inſiſted that they had entered into no poſitive agreement; and that the granting the count a free paſſage through France was a matter of too much importance to be haſtily admitted. This delay was fatal to the expedition. A peſtilential diſeaſe broke out among the troops, and ſwept away great numbers of them daily; and thoſe that remained were ſo weakened by ſickneſs, and diſcouraged by misfortunes, that it was thought imprudent to lead them into the Palatinate. Such was the ſhameful iſſue of this expedition, which reflected the higheſt diſgrace on the Engliſh miniſtry, who had been weak enough to conſider French profeſſions as ſolemn engagements!

Though James had laid a ſolid foundation for putting an end to the troubles in Ireland, he had not been able entirely to complete his plan. The Spaniards ſtill maintained a conſtant intelligence with the diſaffected papiſts, and kept the Engliſh government in continual alarms. The earl of Tyrone having been received into favour by James, and obtained the royal protection, on condition of not relapſing into his former rebellious practices, lived, for ſome time, in great ſubmiſſion to the government; but imputing all the marks of favour he had received to nothing more than the effects of fear, he had the boldneſs, ſoon after, to petition the king for a toleration of the catholic religion. This requeſt being refuſed, he joined the earl of Tyrconnel, and other chiefs of the Iriſh papiſts; and a deſperate confederacy was formed for aſſaſſinating the lord deputy and the council, and maſſacreing all the Engliſh in the kingdom of Ireland. This conſpiracy was happily diſcovered by a letter dropped in the council-chamber; and Tyrone, Tyrconnel, and other principal conſpirators, informed of the accident, fled to France, and afterwards to Bruſſels, where the archduke gave them a noble reception, and ſettled on them large penſions by expreſs orders from the court of Spain. Soon after Tyrone undertook to excite another rebellion, and to paſs over, with his friends, into Ireland; but the deſign being diſcovered before it was ripe for execution, the chiefs who had engaged in the conſpiracy were taken and executed.

A. D. 1625. James was now haſtily advancing towards the period of his exiſtence. The habit of his body, like the ſtate of his kingdom, was alarming. He had long addicted himſelf to thoſe pleaſures which he could not taſte, that he might baniſh from his mind the reflections which he could not bear. He had accuſtomed himſelf to the uſe of ſweet wines, and to ride hard, both before and after drinking. This irregular method of living had occaſioned ſeveral ſevere fits of illneſs, which the phyſicians had rather palliated than removed; for James was too impatient in ſickneſs to ſubmit to any troubleſome regimen, in order to obtain a cure. Infirmities therefore increaſed upon him with age, and the diſtracted ſtate of his mind facilitated the illneſs of his body. He was highly provoked at the behaviour of Buckingham; he imputed to his headſtrong paſſions all the misfortunes that now ſurrounded him. He was deſirous of humbling that haughty miniſter, but he wanted power to execute his deſign. Finding that all attempts, in the preſent ſituation of affairs, would be in vain, he compoſed himſelf with a ſullen kind of reſignation, meditating how to take the firſt opportunity of a proper revenge on his perfidious favourite.

Such was the king's ſituation when the marquis of Hamilton, who hated Buckingham, and who was as likely as any man to ſerve James in his diſtreſs, died ſuddenly, not without ſtrong ſuſpicions of poiſon. James conſidered the death of that nobleman as a ſure prelude to his own. "If the branches are cut down, (ſaid he) the ſtock cannot long ſtand." From that moment he became penſive and melancholy. He was ſeized, in the beginning of March, with a tertian ague; and when encouraged by his courtiers with the old proverb, that this diſtemper, during that ſeaſon, was health for a king, he replied, "that the proverb was meant of a young king." The counteſs of Buckingham, and ſome other ladies, who had no great opinion of regular phyſicians, but thought that life might be rendered immortal by the ſecrets of empyrics, attended James, whoſe impatience for health drove him into the ſame fatal error. Buckingham had, ſome time before, been cured of a tertian ague by an emetic, a plaiſter and a poſſet-drink, which James now inſiſted ſhould be adminiſtered to himſelf. Buckingham uſed every argument in his power to diſſuade him from taking any thing that was not preſcribed by his phyſicians. But all his reaſonings were in vain: James ſent for the medicines, and they were given him, according to his requeſt. Every ſymptom of his diſeaſe was immediately augmented, and it was ſoon evident that he could not long ſurvive. James was himſelf very ſenſible of his approaching end, and met the king of terrors with amazing fortitude. His preparations for death were extremely fervent, and he was chiefly aſſiſted in his devotions by lord-keeper Williams. When the prince of Wales was admitted to his preſence, to receive his laſt advice, he exhorted him to maintain a tender affection for his wife, but at the ſame time to preſerve a conſtancy in religion, to protect the church of England, and to extend his care to the unhappy family of the Palatine. In his laſt moments he declared that he died in the religion of the church of England, and expired at his favourite ſeat of Theobalds on the 27th of March, in the 59th year of his age, and the 23d of his reign.

The character of James has been variouſly handled by different hiſtorians, moſt of whom appear to have wrote under the influence of favourable prepoſſeſſions or extreme prejudice: ſome repreſent him as the perfect pattern of a good king; others have loaded him with reproaches by aggravating his failings. The reaſon of this diverſity proceeds from the hiſtory of his reign being penned at a time when the animoſity of parties was at a great height; therefore the character of this prince muſt not be formed either on the praiſes of the one, or the invectives of the other, but upon the manner of his governing, upon his ſpeeches and actions; and this our readers will be perfectly able to do for themſelves, by recollecting the principal circumſtances of his reign: we ſhall, therefore, only obſerve, that nature had delineated on his mind the outlines of many excellent qualities, and ſeveral virtues; but leaving her work unfiniſhed, it was ſhaded by the pencil of vice. His generoſity was blended with profuſion, his learning with pedantry, his pacific diſpoſition with puſillanimity, his wiſdom with cunning, and his friendſhip with boyiſh fondneſs and folly. He was certainly a great diſſembler: this failing accompanied him even in the moſt common tranſactions of life, and made him paſs for a worſe man than he really was; he frequently miſſed a favourite point by his duplicity, which he might have ſecured by openneſs and reſolution. His too great averſion to war, which has from ſome got him the reproach of want of courage, was certainly a defect productive of very happy conſequences to the nation he governed; the people were bleſſed with a moſt profound peace, which no troubles interrupted; they were enriched by an extenſive commerce, which few taxes oppreſſed; and, freed from the care of foreign affairs, they had leiſure to attend to their own concerns, and ſecure their liberties by many excellent and wiſe regulations.

James had ſeven children by his conſort, Anne of Denmark; but only two of them ſurvived him, namely, Charles, who ſucceeded him on the throne; and Elizabeth, married to the Elector Palatine.

The moſt remarkable occurrences that happened, during the reign of James, were as follow:

His acceſſion gave riſe to the word Sacred being added to the title of Majeſty, in the ſtile of the kings of England.

In his firſt year the officer, called "The maſter of the Ceremonies," was firſt appointed at the Engliſh court.

In his ſecond year there happened a remarkable inſtance of the puniſhment of preſſing to death inflicted on thoſe who refuſe pleading to their indictment. Hugh Calverly, of Calverly in Yorkſhire, having murdered two of his children, and ſtabbed his wife in a fit of jealouſy, being arraigned for his crime at York aſſizes, ſtood mute, and was thereupon preſſed to death in the caſtle of that city.

In his third year an act of parliament was paſſed, whereby one ſhilling was levied on every perſon found abſent from church on Sundays.

In his fourth year there was ſo great an inundation in ſome parts of Somerſetſhire and Glouceſterſhire, (owing to the overflowing of the Severn) that the water roſe above the tops of the houſes, inſomuch that there periſhed by this fatal accident no leſs than eighty perſons, and the damage done, upon the whole, was eſtimated at 20,000l.

His ſixth year is remarkable for the firſt planting of mulberry trees in England.

In his ſeventeenth year was invented the art of making tapeſtry in England; the firſt manufactory for which was eſtabliſhed at Mortlake.

In his 20th year a fatal accident happened at the houſe of the French ambaſſador in Black-friars, during the evening Veſpers. Three hundred perſons being aſſembled in an upper room, while a Jeſuit was preaching the floor gave way, and the prieſt, with above an hundred perſons of the congregation, were buried in the ruins, not any of whom were taken out alive.

SECTION II.

CHARLES I.

As ſoon as the death of James was notified, the council immediately iſſued orders for proclaiming Charles, prince of Wales, his only ſurviving ſon, king of England. The ceremony was accordingly performed at the uſual places in London and Weſtminſter; and the new monarch was received by the people with univerſal acclamations.

A few days after Charles's acceſſion he iſſued out writs for calling a new parliament; but he was obliged to poſtpone the opening of the ſeſſion on account of the arrival of the princeſs Henrietta, whom he had eſpouſed by proxy. The nuptial ceremony was performed by cardinal Richlieu, on the firſt of May,* in the church of Notre Dame at Paris; ſoon after which the young queen ſet out on her journey towards England, accompanied by her mother the queen dowager, her brother the duke of Orleans, the duke and ducheſs of Chevreuſe, and a brilliant train of Engli nobility, among whom were the duke of Buckingham, and the earls of Carliſle, Holland and Mon gomery. After ſtaying two days at Amiens, the proceeded to Boulogne, where an Engliſh fleet o twenty-one ſhips had been ſome time waiting to ta her on board. On the thirteenth of June ſhe w met by the king at Dover, and the ſame evening t marriage was conſummated at Canterbury. Thre days after their majeſties made their public entry in London, but the pomp and ceremony uſual on ſu occaſions were almoſt wholly laid aſide, owing to t plague, which at this time raged with great violence the metropolis.

The royal marriage being celebrated, Charles rected his attention to the welfare of his kingdo The parliament, (which had been poſtponed meeti on that account,) aſſembled on the 18th of June, when the king opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne, in which he diſplayed great candour and cordiality. He ſlightly mentioned the occaſion he had for a ſupply, but employed no intrigue to influence the members. He would not even allow the officers of the crown, who had ſeats in the houſe, to mention any particular ſum which might be expected by him. Secure (as he thought) of the affection of the commons, he was reſolved that their bounty ſhould be entirely their own deed; unaſked and unſolicited.

* On the 7th of the ſame month were celebrated the funeral obſequies of the late king. The body was carried from Somerſet-houſe (to which place it had been conveyed from Theobalds) to Weſtminſter, where it was interred in St. Peter's church with great pomp and ſolemnity. Charles himſelf performed the o of chief mourner, though contrary to the cuſtom of crow heads; but he rather choſe to curtail his dignity on this occaſio than to be ſeen deficient in filial affection.

The commons affected to be highly pleaſed with his majeſty's ſpeech; and the ſupply was the firſt buſineſs taken into conſideration. But though they knew that all the money granted by the laſt parliament had been expended on naval and military armaments, and that very large anticipations had alſo been made on the revenues of the crown: though they were not ignorant that Charles was loaded with a large debt contracted by his father; that the public revenues were hardly ſufficient for ſupporting the dignity of the crown, even under the ordinary charges of government; and that the preſent war, againſt the whole power of the houſe of Auſtria, had been undertaken by their importunate applications and intreaties; yet they thought proper to grant their young monarch no more than 112,000l.

It is probable that this extraordinary reſolution of the parliament was occaſioned by the libertine principles of the duke of Buckingham, who was now become odious for his vices. The marriage of the king with a catholic princeſs had alſo too much diſpleaſed the puritans to render them indulgent to the court. Independent of theſe motives, the principal members of the lower houſe extended their views to future times. Perſuaded that the power of the crown had been increaſed at the expence of the liberties of the people, their object was to confine it within narrow limits. Their right to grant or refuſe the neceſſary ſupplies was conſidered as an infallible means of gaining the moſt important conceſſions.

Theſe proceedings of the commons greatly diſconcerted the hopes of Charles. He had formed the warmeſt expectations of receiving the moſt convincing proofs of the love of his ſubjects; but found that the ſupplies they granted him were rather a mockery of his wants than a ſerious deſign of ſupporting him in a war which might juſtly be ſtiled their own.

The plague continuing to rage with the moſt dreadful violence in London, Charles adjourned the parliament to Oxford, where he flattered himſelf with receiving farther aſſiſtance from the commons. But the change of place made not the leaſt alteration in their ſentiments. Determined to carry their favourite point with regard to the prerogative, they abſolutely refuſed to make any addition to the ſupply they had voted: even the trifling ſum of 40,000l. was refuſed; though the parliament well knew that a fleet and an army were lying at Portſmouth, in great want of pay and proviſions; and that Buckingham the admiral, and the treaſurer of the navy, had advanced, on their own credit, near 100,000l. for the ſea ſervice. In vain were all the arguments of the courtiers to prevail over the obſtinacy of the commons. Governed by a ſet of men of the moſt uncommon capacity, formed into a regular party and united by fixed aims and projects, it was impoſſible to change them from their purpoſe. They perſevered in their former reſolution, though the honor of their country among the potentates of Europe demanded a more liberal conduct.

Charles, who had imbibed the lofty notions of monarchical power, conſidered the refuſal of the commons as of a criminal and traiterous nature; and when he reflected that the ſupplies aſked were purely to ſupport a war entered into at their particular requeſt, their behaviour appeared cruel and deceitful. A diſcovery, however, was now made, which not only furniſhed the commons with a pretence for their refuſal, but alſo inflamed them againſt the court in general, and the duke of Buckingham in particular.

The late king ſome time before his death, had promiſed to furniſh Lewis, who was deſtitute of a naval force, with one ſhip of war, and ſeven armed veſſels hired from the merchants, which the French monarch pretended were to be employed againſt the Genoeſe, the firm allies of Spain. Charles was now called upon to fulfil the engagement, but the French made no ſecret that the ſhips were to be employed againſt the Hugonots in the ſiege of Rochelle. Vice-admiral Pennington was on the coaſt of France with a ſquadron of men of war, and received an order ſigned by Charles (at the inſtigation of Buckingham) to employ his ſhips in whatever ſervice the French ambaſſador ſhould direct, after filling them with ſoldiers and marines, under the command of the duke of Montmorency. This was no ſooner known, or rather ſuſpected, than the ſhips crews mutinied, and all, except the Vanguard, which Pennington himſelf commanded, ſtood to ſea. The admiral, however, went on ſhore, and offered to go upon any ſervice the French king ſhould order him, but refuſed to receive on board any ſoldiers. This refuſal exaſperated the ambaſſador, and he gave him to underſtand, that he was a priſoner if he did not comply; and at the ſame time informed him, that not more than fifty or ſixty Engliſhmen would be employed in the expedition. It was in vain for Pennington to remonſtrate againſt the cruelty and injuſtice of this proceeding, and to repreſent the uneaſineſs of his ſailors, who would not fail to refuſe obedience to any ſuch commands. The ambaſſador, however, was reſolute; and Pennington thought it prudent to diſſemble his real ſentiments, that he might recover his ſhip. The ſtratagem ſucceeded; but he was no ſooner on board, than he abſolutely refuſed to leave his ſhip. This produced a long negotiation between the ambaſſador and the admiral. Proteſts were taken againſt the latter; and, in the hearing of his own men, he was threatened with the puniſhment of death, as a traitor to his country. But all the menaces of the Frenchmen were in vain; Pennington refuſed his compliance, and received expreſs orders to deliver up his own, and all the merchant ſhips to the French king. This was accordingly done; but not an Engliſhman, one gunner only excepted, was found mean enough to ſerve on board the fleet, under a French commiſſion, and againſt their proteſtant brethren.

No ſooner were theſe tranſactions known in parliament, than the commons ſhewed the ſame attachment with the ſailors for the proteſtant religion. They even carried their zeal to a height that rendered their deliberations at once ridiculous and unjuſt. Montague, one of the king's chaplains, publiſhed a book, which, contrary to the rigid tenets of the puritans, ſaved virtuous catholics, as well as other chriſtians, from eternal torments. It now became evident that thoſe great men, who reaſoned ſo forcibly on the danger of the conſtitution of their country from the increaſing power of the crown, could not reaſon at all on the ſubject of religion. Montague was ordered to be proſecuted, a committee was appointed to conſider of the proceedings againſt him, and the eccleſiaſtic, for having done an important ſervice to the church of England, by exploding the adopted errors of her antagoniſts, was ordered into cuſtody of the ſerjeant, and to give bail of two thouſand pounds for his appearing at the next ſeſſion. It is no wonder that Charles was offended at theſe proceedings, and that he often put them in mind that they had buſineſs of far greater concern to engage their attention. But finding all attempts were in vain, he diſſolved the parliament.

Charles, diſappointed in the expectations he had formed of receiving aſſiſtance from parliament, was obliged to have recourſe to unconſtitutional methods for raiſing money. He iſſued privy-ſeals for borrowing from his ſubjects; but the advantages to be gained by this temporary ſupply were more than balanced by the diſguſt it occaſioned. However, by means of this ſtratagem, he was enabled to fit out a fleet of eighty ſail, on board of which were 10,000 ſoldiers. The command of the fleet was given to Sir Edward Cecil, who had lately been created viſcount Wimbleton; and the earl of Eſſex was appointed vice-admiral.

It was intended that this fleet ſhould have been ſent out early in the ſummer; but from want of money, and other obſtacles, it did not ſail till the end of October. When they arrived off Cape St. Vincent, a council of war was held in order to form a plan for their future operations. The earl of Eſſex gave his voice for attacking Cadiz, and his propoſal being accepted, the whole fleet ſtood towards that port. But by this time all Spain was alarmed, and ſo dreadful to the Spaniards was the remembrance of the Engliſh valour under queen Elizabeth, that their king was ready in perſon to march down at the head of a royal army to the defence of his coaſt.

When the Engliſh reached Cadiz, they found every thing in readineſs to give them a warm reception, and the attack of fort Puntal was given to the earl of Eſſex. He advanced with twenty Engliſh and five Dutch ſhips with ſuch impetuoſity, that the Spaniſh ſhipping, which conſiſted of ſeventeen ſtout ſhips and eight or ten gallies, fearing the fatal conſequence of that fort's being taken, retired to Port Real. The fort, however, made a noble defence; and it was found impracticable to take it on that ſide where the attack was made. Upon this Sir John Burroughs, an old Engliſh officer, landed with his regiment, and driving ſome companies of Spaniſh infantry, who had oppoſed his landing, back to the fort, the Spaniſh governor thought proper to ſurrender. The taking of this fort was, however, of no other conſequence than as it opened a paſſage to Cadiz itſelf, and commanded a large extent of villages and country round; but the raw Engliſh ſoldiers could not reſiſt the temptation of the new Spaniſh wines; they drank to exceſs, and could not be brought to act with that ſpirit and reſolution neceſſary for rendering the expedition ſucceſsful. At the ſame time diſſentions prevailed among the officers, and diſeaſes among the ſoldiers; ſo that any farther ſtay appearing fruitleſs, the troops were reimbarked, and the fleet put to ſea with a reſolution of waiting for the Spaniſh galleons. But the plague breaking out among the ſeamen and ſoldiers, Cecil was obliged to return to England with infected crews, ſickly companies, a broken reputation, diſheartened officers, and national diſhonour.

A. D. 1626. The failure of this expedition greatly diſconcerted Charles, who found himſelf again obliged to have recourſe to parliament. Though his authority was greatly diminiſhed by the ill ſucceſs of his enterprizes, and the imprudence of the Spaniſh war became every day more apparent; though the increaſe of his neceſſities increaſed his dependence, and expoſed him ſtill more to the encroachments of the commons; he was reſolved once more to try that regular and conſtitutional expedient for ſupply. But the ſolemnity of his coronation was firſt to be performed; which was accordingly celebrated with great magnificence on the ſecond of February.

Four days after the king's coronation the parliament aſſembled at Weſtminſter, and the ſeſſion was opened by a ſpeech from Sir Thomas Finch, the lord-keeper, who acquainted both houſes, that as his majeſty intended the ſeſſion ſhould be very ſhort, he expected they would make all imaginable diſpatch in granting the ſupplies. But the commons, without paying any regard to the lord-keeper's ſpeech, began an enquiry into the national grievances, at the very point where they had left off the laſt ſeſſion. They, however, in a few days, voted a ſupply of three ſubſidies and three fifteenths, and afterwards added another ſubſidy; but they reſerved the paſſing that vote into a law till the end of the ſeſſion: ſo that if the king refuſed to grant them a ſufficient time to finiſh their inquiry into the national grievances, or refuſed to comply with their demands, he would have little reaſon to expect any parliamentary aſſiſtance.

It ſoon appeared that the whole ſtorm was intended againſt Buckingham, who was univerſally conſidered as the ſource of all the national grievances. His want of temper and prudence, and the uncontrouled aſcendancy which he had acquired over his maſter, rendered him every day ſtill more odious to the people. And during the ſitting of the parliament he ſuſtained two violent attacks; one from the earl of Briſtol, and the other from the houſe of commons.

When the writs were iſſued out for ſummoning a new parliament, Charles, by a ſtretch of prerogative, had ordered that no writ ſhould be ſent to the earl of Briſtol, whom he knew to be the moſt inveterate enemy to his favourite the duke of Buckingham. In conſequence of this the earl of Briſtol preſented a petition to the lords, and intreated they would, if poſſible, prevail on his majeſty to grant him what was his due as a peer of the realm. Upon this his writ was ſent him, but accompanied by a letter from the lord-keeper, forbidding him, in the king's name, to attend the parliament. Briſtol acquainted the lords with this command, and at the ſame time deſired they would adviſe him how to proceed in ſo delicate an affair. The king's prohibition was withdrawn, and Briſtol took his ſeat. Charles, enraged at ſuch proceedings, ordered his attorney-general to enter an accuſation of high treaſon againſt Briſtol; and in return Briſtol accuſed Buckingham of the ſame crime. From the earl's defence of himſelf, and his accuſation of the duke, the great imprudence of the latter was very evident; but, from thence, not one action could be collected, which, in the eye of the law, deemed him guilty of a crime, much leſs could convict him of high treaſon.

The commons, however, purſued their deſig against Buckingham with the moſt unwearied diligence; and having voted, " that common fame wa a ſufficient ground of accuſation by the commons, proceeded to frame regular articles againſt the mi niſter. They accuſed him of neglecting to guard th ſeas, inſomuch that many merchant ſhips had bee taken by the enemy; of furniſhing ſhips to th French king, in order to ſerve againſt the Hugonots of being concerned in the ſale of honours an offices; of procuring extenſive grants from th crown; of obtaining many titles of honour for hi kindred; of adminiſtering phyſic to the late kin without acquainting his phyſicians. From a caref comparison of the charge and reply, all theſe articl appeared to be at leaſt frivolous, if not falſe. T charge which ſeemed to be worth any notice wa that he had extorted the ſum of ten thouſand poun from the Eaſt-India company, and that he had co fiſcated ſome goods belonging to French merchan on pretence of their being the property of Spani ſubjects. As the impeachment was never fully d termined, it is not eaſy for a deciſive opinion to now formed; but it was at that time acknowledg e better to advance the plan care was taken to a liſt of ſuch as had freely ſubſcribed, in hopes eir example would be an inducement to others.

otwithſtanding this the ſubſcription went on very ſo that the court found themſelves obliged to violent meaſures. The common people, who d to throw in their mite to the loan were orto ſerve in his majeſty's troops. Perſons of were ſummoned to appear before the council, if they made a ſecond refuſal, they were con-to places at a conſiderable diſtance from their ations.

At the ſame time the council, in order to fit out a fleet, levied a diſtribution on all the maritime towns in the kingdom; each of which was required, with the aſſiſtance of the adjacent counties, to provide a certain number of armed veſſels. The city of London was rated at twenty ſhips. This is the firſt inſtance of ſhip-money in the reign of Charles; a taxation which had been impoſed by Elizabeth, but which, after being carried to much greater lengths by Charles, was productive of the moſt violent diſturbances.

While theſe things were tranſacting, advice was received that the king of Denmark had been totally defeated by the imperial general count Tilly. Money was now wanting more than ever, as it was abſolutely neceſſary to ſupport a prince ſo nearly related to Charles, by whom he had been chiefly drawn into the war. The council, on this occaſion iſſued a proclamation, importing, that, as the urgency of affairs admitted not the method of parliament, the moſt ſpeedy, equal and convenient way of ſupply was by a general loan from the ſubject, according as every man was aſſeſſed in the laſt ſubſidy. The ſame ſum was required, which each would have paid, had the votes of four ſubſidies been paſſed into a law. But at the ſame time the people were informed that the ſums exacted were not to be called ſubſidies, but loans.

Among other articles iſſued in this proclamation, was the following: "If any perſon or perſons ſhall "refuſe to pay the duties, ſubſidies, or impoſts "aforeſaid, unto our farmers, collectors, or officers, "in manner aforeſaid, then our will and pleaſure is, "and we do farther grant, by theſe preſents, unto "the lords, and others of our privy-council for the "time being, or unto the lord treaſurer of England, "or chancellor of the exchequer, now or for the time "being, full power and authority to commit all and "every ſuch perſon and perſons to priſon, who ſhall "diſobey this our order and declaration, there to "continue until they, and every one of them, ſo "diſobeying, ſhall have conformed and ſubmitted "themſelves unto due obedience."

The commiſſioners appointed to levy theſe loans received articles of ſecret inſtruction; among which was the following remarkable one: "if any man "ſhall refuſe to lend, and ſhall make delays or ex"cuſes, and perſiſt in their obſtinacy, that they ex"amine him upon oath, whether he has been dealt "with to deny or refuſe to lend, or make any excuſe "for not lending? Who has dealt with him, and "what ſpeeches or perſuaſions were uſed for that "purpoſe? And that they alſo charge every ſuch "perſon in his majeſty's name, upon his allegiance, "not to diſcloſe to any one what his anſwer was." It is aſtoniſhing that the king could be prevailed upon to ſuffer ſo impracticable an attempt to be made by his officers. A very little reflection would have been abundantly ſufficient to have convinced him, that the ſecrecy he enjoined was impoſſible; and that ſo violent an inquiſitorial power could not fail of exciting the indignation of his ſubjects.

The conſequence of theſe arbitrary proceedings was what might naturally be expected. The principal leaders in the late parliament, and others who had adopted their ſentiments, refuſed to ſubmit to an impoſition not agreed to by the legiſlature. Moſt of them were thrown into priſon; the goals were filled with illuſtrious offenders. All who petitioned the clemency of the king were releaſed; but five gentlemen, Sir Thomas Darnel, Sir John Corbet, Sir Walter Earl, Sir John Heveningham, and Sir Edward Hambden, not only refuſed to ſolicit the clemency of his majeſty, but boldly demanded their releaſement, not as a favour from the court, but as a right derived from the laws of their country. The queſtion was at laſt ſolemnly argued in the court of King's-bench, when it appeared, beyond contradiction, that the perſonal liberty of the ſubject had been ſecured againſt the arbitrary power of the crown by ſix ſeveral acts of parliament, beſides an article of the great charter itſelf, the moſt ſacred foundation of the laws and conſtitution of England. The judges, however, thought proper to remand the gentlemen to their priſons, though they refuſed to enter a general judgment, that no bail could be granted upon a commitment of the king or council.

Nor was impriſonment the only engine employed by the government to force the people to ſubmit to the arbitrary orders of the court: recourſe was alſo had to religious prejudices: the duty of unlimited obedience was preached from the pulpit. Manwaring, one of his majeſty's chaplains, diſtinguiſhed himſelf on this occaſion. Among other curious paſſages in his elaborate diſcourſes, the following are remarkable: "That the king is not bound to obſerve the "laws of the realm, concerning the ſubjects rights "and liberties; but that his royal will and command "in impoſing loans and taxes, without the common "conſent of parliament, is ſufficient to oblige the "conſcience of the ſubject, under pain of eternal "damnation. That thoſe who refuſed to pay this "loan offended againſt the law of God, and the "king's ſupreme authority, and became guilty of "impiety, diſloyalty, and rebellion. That the authority of parliament is not neceſſary for the raiſing "of aids and ſubſidies; and that the ſlow proceedings of ſuch numerous aſſemblies are not fitted for "the ſupply of the ſtate's urgent neceſſities, but "would rather occaſion many impediments to the "juſt deſigns of princes." Sibthorpe was another divine that exerted all his abilities in recommending the ſame ſlaviſh tenets. Abbot, archbiſhop of Canterbury, refuſed to licenſe theſe ſermons. This was conſidered as ſo heinous an offence, that the prelate was ſuſpended from the exerciſe of his office, and confined to one of his country-ſeats. This ſequeſtration and confinement of the firſt peer and prelate of England, were alarming monuments of Buckingham's power over the mind of his maſter. The archbiſhop had always acted with the greateſt moderation, and was conſidered by the public as a ſincere friend to the liberties of his country; but he could never be brought to offer incenſe to the favourite miniſter, and this marked him out as an object of diſgrace.

While the people were thus harraſſed with precautions with regard to the loan, vigorous preparations were making for covering the ſeas with armaments. The duke of Soubiſe, who was at this time in England, received a commiſſion from Charles for employing the ſhips, fitted out by the Hugonots, in his ſervice, and for cruizing againſt the Spaniards. This occaſioned great confuſion in the buſineſs of the Engliſh admiralty, it being difficult to diſtinguiſh between the prizes made by the Engliſh, and thoſe taken by the French proteſtants.

The court of France was at this time in a very bad condition to ſupport a war againſt England; but all the catholics in that kingdom were united, and deſirous of exerting their utmoſt endeavours againſt the enemies of their religion. On the other hand the unpopularity of Buckingham, the high exertion of the prerogative, and the impriſonment of ſome of the worthieſt men in England, rendered the ſinçereſt intention of Charles diſtruſted: little could be expected from the efforts of a nation divided within itſelf.

A. D. 1627. At the inſtigation of Buckingham, Charles was perſuaded to engage in a war with France at a time when he was at a loſs to know how he ſhould continue that already begun with the houſe of Auſtria. In the ſpring of this year a fleet of one hundred ſail, having on board an army of ſeven thouſand men, were fitted out for the invaſion of that kingdom; and both intruſted to the command of the duke of Buckingham, though he was wholly unacquainted both with the land and ſea-ſervice.

This fleet ſailed from Portſmouth on the 7th of June, and on the 20th of July appeared before Rochelle. The inhabitants of that city were at this time divided into two factions, one for the French, and the other for the Engliſh. The former endeavoured to perſuade the people, that if the Engliſh were admitted into the town, they would, by their great ſuperiority at ſea, ſeize the government, and keep poſſeſſion of the place in defiance of the whole power of France. The latter, which was headed by the mother and ſiſter of the dukes of Rohan and Soubiſe, oppoſed theſe aſſertions; declaring that the Engliſh were their friends, and were come to ſupport their religious privileges. The French party, however, prevailed, and it was determined not to admit the Engliſh.

Buckingham, who was ſurprized that the gates were not opened, ſent Soubiſe and Sir William Becher aſhore, but it was not without difficulty they were permitted to enter the city. The council was immediately aſſembled, and Soubiſe did every thing in his power to perſuade them of the friendly intentions of the Engliſh monarch, and that he had fitted out this large and expenſive armament purely for their ſervice. The council, however, thought proper to decline the proffered aſſiſtance, under pretence that they could not determine on an affair of ſuch importance without conſulting the whole body of the Hugonots.

Exaſperated at this refuſal, Buckingham determined to make a deſcent on the iſland of Rhe. It had before been agreed between him and Soubiſe that the Engliſh ſhould land on Oleron, a fertile and then defenceleſs iſland, where refreſhments of every kind might be eaſily procured, and the troops in no danger of any attack from the enemy. But the Engliſh general thought proper to alter this plan of operations, and ſtood immediately for the iſland of Rhe, then well garriſoned and fortified. Had the military abilities of Buckingham been equal to his perſonal courage, he might have acquired immortal honor both to himſelf and his country. Thoyras the French general, who commanded in the iſland, no ſooner perceived the Engliſh were preparing to land, than he drew out his forces to oppoſe them; but imagining the firſt debarkation was only a feint to draw his attention to that quarter, while the main body of the Engliſh army was landed at another, he thought imprudent to attack them, till they were followed b greater numbers. Thoyras now perceived his mi take, and marched immediately to give them battle but the Engliſh volunteers jumping aſhore, and performing wonders in their own perſons, ſo animated the ſoldiers, that they preſſed forward with the utmo intrepidity, and put the enemy to flight, though fa ſuperior in numbers.

Soubiſe, who was an excellent ſoldier, adviſe Buckingham to purſue his victory, and immediately a tack the caſtle of St. Martin's. Had this prudent advice been followed, it would probably have been a tended with ſucceſs; but Buckingham pretended th it would be imprudent to march his troops again that fortreſs, till intelligence could be procured of th enemy. By this dilatory method of proceeding fi days were loſt to the Engliſh, and that loſs was irr trievable. He alſo neglected to take fort Prie, whi was then but meanly garriſoned, and being near t ſea would, in caſe of accident, have afforded an e cellent retreat.

At length, however, the duke opened his trenches before St. Martin's, and was ſo confident of ſucceſs, that he aſſured the king, by expreſs, he would be maſter of the caſtle in eight days. This occaſioned a ridiculous proclamation to be publiſhed in England, for encouraging people to tranſport themſelves and their families to the iſland of Rhe. But Buckingham was not born to ſhine in a camp: though determined to ſtarve the enemy into a ſurrender, he took ſo little care to guard the ſeas, that the French found means to throw ammunition and proviſions into the place.

It was now ſufficiently evident that the caſtle was not to be taken in ſo eaſy a manner as Buckingham had imagined: he therefore endeavoured to make himſelf maſter of fort Prie; but the garriſon had been reinforced, and the attempt miſcarried. The French had now in the iſland an army, under the command of marſhal Schomberg, ſuperior in numbers to that of the Engliſh; but Buckingham determined to make an attack upon the place, in order to put an end to the ſiege by one deſperate attempt. He had been informed by ſome French deſerters, that there were no more than eight hundred ſoldiers in the caſtle, and that the courtin towards the ſea was but poorly fortified. It was therefore reſolved to ſtorm the courtin without attempting to make any breach in the wall. The army was accordingly divided into two bodies, one of which was to attack the caſtle on the land ſide, and the other on the ſea. The latter was the principal attack, and it was propoſed to mount the courtin with their ſcaling ladders. But the meaſures were ſo improperly taken that there were no hopes of ſucceſs. The French immediately perceived their intention, and ſuffered them to advance to the foot of the courtin, but the Engliſh ſoon found that their ladders were too ſhort for ſcaling the wall. They behaved, however, in both attacks with amazing intrepidity, but were at laſt obliged to retreat with the loſs of five hundred men killed, and fifty taken priſoners.

From this miſcarriage it was ſufficiently evident that any farther attack upon the caſtle would be the height of imprudence; and Buckingham accordingly began his march towards his ſhips, intending to paſs through a hollow way, the only paſſage by which he could retreat. The French army under marſhal Schomberg followed him at a diſtance. Buckingham perceived it, and offered the marſhal battle, which he declined, and the Engliſh continued their march towards the hollow way, their rear, by ſome ſtrange neglect, conſiſting only of the inſignificant guard of eighty horſe. When the Engliſh had advanced a conſiderable diſtance in the hollow way, they were attacked by the French cavalry, who forced the Engliſh rear-guard to break the ranks of their own men, and there being no room for the foremoſt battalions to form, a general rout enſued. But they had no ſooner paſſed the hollow way, than they faced about, and once more offered the marſhal battle, notwithſtanding the great loſs they had ſuſtained. Schomberg was too prudent to venture a general engagement; he retired with his troops, and Buckingham embarked his forces, after loſing near two thirds of his army.

Thus ended an expedition which totally diſcredited Buckingham both as an admiral and a ſoldier; he acquired no praiſe but that vulgar one of courage and perſonal bravery. If he was unpopular before, he was now deteſted by the people; the enemy triumphed in the narrow ſeas, and inſulted the Engliſh their own harbours. The inhabitants of Rochelle, who had declared for the Engliſh, were now in the moſt dreadful ſituation. They were threatened with immediate ſiege from their enraged maſter, and had expended great part of their proviſions in ſubſiſting Buckingham's forces on the iſland of Rhe. The deputies of that city were loud in their complaints; but ſo greatly was Charles infatuated with Buckingham, that all their repreſentations, joined with the general voice of his people, could not prevail upon him to cenſure the conduct of his ambitious favourite.

The miſcarriage of the French expedition produced a general diſcontent throughout the nation, and it appeared ſufficiently evident that ſomething muſt be immediately done to ſilence the clamours of the people. They believed their liberties had been raviſhed from them, and illegal taxes extorted. They ſaw their commerce daily declining, and the military honours, tranſmitted to them by their anceſtors, ſhamefully ſtained by two ill-concerted and unſucceſsful expeditions. They dreaded the calamities of a war carried on againſt two of the moſt powerful kingdoms in Europe, and feared for their domeſtic ſafety from the general clamour excited in every part of the nation. Theſe evils were ſolely aſcribed to the obſtinacy of the king in adhering to the counſels of Buckingham, whoſe abilities were far from deſerving ſuch implicit confidence. The only expedient that offered to relieve the government from this embarraſſing ſituation, was that of calling a parliament. It was expected that the miſcarriage of the attempt upon Rhe would be ſeverely cenſured, and the duke's conduct made the ſubject of the cloſeſt ſcrutiny. Sir Robert Cotton therefore adviſed his majeſty, that Buckingham ſhould make a motion in the council for aſſembling the parliament; hoping that by his appearing to favour a meaſure ſo highly agreeable to the people, his former faults would be forgotten, and that inſtead of a tyrant and oppreſſor, he would be conſidered as the deliverer of his country.

A. D. 1628. Buckingham having, at the inſtigation of Sir Robert Cotton, made a motion in the council for the parliament to aſſemble, the ſame was unanimouſly agreed to, and they were ſummoned to meet on the 17th of March. Accordingly on that day his majeſty went to the houſe, and opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne, in which he very pathetically enumerated the neceſſities of the government, and required the aſſiſtance of his parliament; but concluded with fairly telling the commons, "that if they did not do their duty in contributing to the neceſſities of the ſtate, he muſt, in diſcharge of his conſcience, uſe thoſe other means which God had put into his hands, in order to ſave that, which the follies of a few particular men would otherwiſe endanger. Take not this as a threatening, added he, for I ſcorn to threaten any but my equals; but as an admonition from him, who, by nature and duty, has more care of your preſervation and proſperity."

As ſoon ſoon as Charles had finiſhed his ſpeech, the lord-keeper, by the king's command, laid before the houſe the ſtate of affairs in Europe, and the motives which induced the king to attempt the reduction of the dangerous power of the houſe of Auſtria, and to interpoſe between the French king and his proteſtant ſubjects. He obſerved, that the powers which uſed to balance the alarming greatneſs of the houſe of Auſtria, were now otherwiſe employed; the Turk in an Aſiatic war, and the Swede in a war with Poland, fermented by Spain; that the king of Denmark was already ſtripped of great part of his dominions, and the houſe of Auſtria on the point of being maſters of all the ſea-coaſts between Dantzick and Embden: that they were arming all the ſhips they could procure in the Baltic ſeas, and endeavouring to engage the Hans Towns in their quarrel, in order to deprive the Engliſh of the Eaſtland trade, and make themſelves maſters of the ſea without ſtriking a blow: that the fleets of France and Spain were preparing in conjunction to ruin our fiſhery, and to render it dangerous for our merchant ſhips to paſs from one part of the kingdom to another: that a large armament was fitting out at Liſbon, in order, as there is the greateſt reaſon to fear, to make a deſcent either in England or Ireland. He then ſtrongly recommended unity, as the only means of diſappointing the intentions of the enemy, and preſſed them in the moſt earneſt manner to aſſiſt the government, as the moſt conſtitutional method of impoſing the neceſſary taxes. "This way "of parliamentary ſupplies, added he, as his majeſty "told you, he hath choſen, not as the only way, "but as the fitteſt; not becauſe he is deſtitute of "others, but becauſe it is the moſt agreeable to the "goodneſs of his own moſt gracious diſpoſition, and "to the deſire and weal of his people. If this be "deferred, neceſſity and the ſword of the enemy "make way to others. Remember his majeſty's "admonition; I ſay, remember it."

Notwithſtanding the members of this parliament were men of the ſame independent ſpirit with their predeceſſors, and poſſeſſed ſuch large eſtates that it was computed their riches ſurpaſſed three times that of the houſe of peers; though they were all inflamed with the love of liberty, and many of them had ſuffered by the violent meaſures of the government; yet they entered upon buſineſs with great temper and decorum. They feared that the king, diſguſted with popular aſſemblies, wanted only a fair pretence, offered by any incident or undutiful behaviour of the members, to govern alone with a deſpotic power; and ſhould that ever happen, no remedy could be hoped for, but from inſurrection and civil war; of which the iſſue would be extremely uncertain, and muſt, at all events, prove infinitely diſtreſſing to the whole nation. Decency of conduct was therefore abſolutely neceſſary to carry on the great work of reformation in the government, and to paſs ſome laws which might ſecure the privileges of parliament, and the liberties of the people.

Though the popular leaders had preſcribed a decent conduct to themſelves, they did not propoſe to ſuffer calmly the grievances under which the nation had lately groaned. They knew that the conſtitution of their country was at ſtake, and that every effort muſt be exerted in its defence. The cry of liberty was therefore echoed in the houſe of commons as it had antiently been in the Roman ſenate. "We are "called here by his majeſty, ſaid Sir Francis Seymour, to give him faithful counſel, ſuch as may "conduce to his honour and dignity, and we ought "to do it without flattery. We are ſent here by the "people to deliver them from their grievances, and "we ought to do it without fear. Not to be diſpoſed "to part with life and fortune, when the intereſt of "our king and country required the ſacrifice, were "not to be good ſubjects; but, on the other hand, "to ſuffer our property to be taken from us, inconſiſtently with liberty, our inclination, and the laws "of our country, this were to be ſlaves. While we "oppoſe ſuch encroachments, we tread only in the "ſteps of our great anceſtors, who always preferred "the public to their private intereſt, nay, even to "their very lives. It will be the higheſt injury to "ourſelves, to our poſterity, to our conſciences, if "we forego this claim and pretenſion."

"I read of a cuſtom, ſaid Sir Robert Phillips, "among the old Romans, that, once every year, "they held a ſolemn feſtival, in which their ſlaves "had liberty, without exception, to ſpeak what "they pleaſed, in order to eaſe their afflicted minds; "and, on the concluſion of the feſtival, the ſlaves "ſeverally returned to their former ſervitudes. This "inſtitution may, with ſome diſtinction, well ſet "forth our preſent ſtate and condition. After the "revolution of ſome time, and the grievous ſufferance of many violent oppreſſions, we have now, "at laſt, as thoſe ſlaves, obtained, for a day, ſome "liberty of ſpeech, but ſhall not, I truſt, be hereafter ſlaves. For we are born free. Yet, what "new illegal burthens our eſtates and perſons have "groaned under, my heart yearns to think of, my "tongue faulters to utter."

"The grievances by which we are oppreſſed, I "draw under two heads; acts of power againſt law, "and the judgment of lawyers againſt liberty."

He then mentioned three illegal judgments paſſed within his memory; after which he proceeded as follows:

"I can live, ſaid he, though another, who has "no right, be joined with me; nay, I can live, "though burdened with impoſitions beyond what at "preſent I labour under: but to have my liberty, "which is the ſoul of my life, raviſhed from me; to "have my perſon pent up in a goal, without relief "from law, and to be ſo adjudged,---O! improvident anceſtors! O! unwiſe forefathers! to be ſo "careful in providing for the quiet poſſeſſion of our "lands, and the liberties of parliament; and, at the "ſame time, to neglect our perſonal liberty, and "ſuffer us to lie in priſon during pleaſure, without "redreſs or remedy! If this be law, why do we talk "of liberties? Why trouble ourſelves with diſputes "about a conſtitution, franchiſes, properties of goods, "and the like? What may any man call his own, "if not the liberty of his perſon?"

"The ſame evil, added Sir Thomas Wentworth, "affects the king and the people, and the ſame remedy muſt heal it. We are to defend,---what? "---any new object?---no---our antient, our legitimate, our vital liberties; we muſt confirm the laws "eſtabliſhed by our anceſtors; we muſt put ſuch a "ſeal to them, as no licentious ſpirit ſhall dare to "break".

The whole houſe agreed in theſe noble and generous ſentiments; even the court party themſelves di not pretend to offer any thing but the plea of neceſſity in defence of the late meaſures purſued by th miniſtry, and to which the king had been reduced b the obſtinacy of the two laſt parliaments. No oppoſition was therefore made to a vote againſt arbitrar impriſonments, and forced loans.

But the zeal of the commons to defend their civ and perſonal liberties, did not prevent their attending to the affairs of religion. They preſented a petition to the king againſt recuſants; in anſwer to whic "he recommended them to think of a law again "popery; and aſſured his parliament, that the lenit "hitherto ſhewn to the Engliſh papiſts was only wi "a view to procure ſuitable advantages to Engli "proteſtants in popiſh countries, in which expectatio "he had been deceived; and promiſed, that unle "he ſaw better fruits for the future, he would ex "cute the laws againſt the papiſts to a greater degr "of ſeverity than was craved in their petition."

This anſwer had the deſired effect on the commo Pleaſed with the aſſurances his majeſty gave the they immediately proceeded to the buſineſs of t ſupply. Five ſubſidies were immediately voted him; with which, though much inferior to his wan he declared himſelf well ſatisfied; and aſked ſecreta Cook by how many voices it had been carried? Co told him, "by one;" at which Charles chang countenance: "Sir, added the ſecretary, yo majeſty hath herein the greater cauſe to rejoice, the houſe was ſo unanimous as to make but voice."

The ſupply, however, thus voted was not pa into a law; and the commons determined to emp the interval in providing ſome barrier to their ri and liberties. Forced loans, benevolences, ta with without conſent of parliament, arbitrary impriſonments, billeting ſoldiers in private houſes, and the impoſition of martial law, were the grievances complained of, and againſt theſe a permanent remedy was to be provided. After ſome debates, a committee was appointed to draw up a ſtate of the national grievances under the title of "The Petition of Right," which they purpoſed to lay before the lords for their concurrence; that having obtained the ſanction of both houſes, it might have the force of an act of parliament as ſoon as it ſhould receive the royal aſſent.

No ſooner was Charles informed of the intentions of the commons, than he employed every expedient to divert them from their purpoſe, and ſent a meſſage by ſecretary Cook, wherein he deſired both the houſes, "clearly to let him know whether they would reſt upon his promiſe in favour of their liberties; which promiſe he had given at ſeveral times, and chiefly by the lord keeper's ſpeech made in his own preſence. If they did rely on it, he aſſured them, it ſhould be really and royally performed." This meſſage, with ſeveral others, the commons received with a ſeeming deference to the king's perſon and an invincible diſtruſt of his promiſes. The peers, who had in a manner ſtood neuter, began to fear the commons would go too far, and therefore recommended to them to conſider of his majeſty's aſſurances, and depend upon them. This occaſioned freſh debates, and many reaſons were urged a-new on both ſides. But Sir Thomas Wentworth put an end to them by ſaying, "that never houſe of parliament, ſo far as regarded themſelves, truſted more than the preſent to the goodneſs of their king: but we are ambitious, (ſaid he) that his majeſty's goodneſs may deſcend to poſterity, and we are accountable for a public truſt. There hath been a public violation of the laws by the king's miniſters; and nothing can ſatisfy the nation but a public reparation. Our deſire to vindicate the ſubjects right by bill, will carry us no farther than what is contained in former laws, with ſome modeſt proviſion for inſtruction, performance, and execution." Theſe ſentiments met with univerſal approbation, and were ſent to Charles by the commons as an anſwer to his meſſage.

The king ſtill deſiring them to depend on his promiſes, Sir Edward Coke ſaid, "was it ever known, that general words were a ſufficient ſatisfaction for particular grievances? Was ever a verbal declaration of the king the word of the ſovereign? When grievances are complained of, the parliament is to redreſs them. Did ever the parliament rely on meſſages? They have ever put up petitions of their grievances, and the king has ever anſwered them. The king's meſſage is very gracious; but what is the law of the realm? that is the queſtion. I have no diffidence of his majeſty: but the king muſt ſpeak by record, and in particulars. Did you ever know the king's meſſage come into a bill of ſubſidies? All ſucceeding kings will ſay, "Ye muſt truſt me as ye did my predeceſſor, and ye muſt have the ſame confidence in my meſſages." But meſſages of love never come into a parliament. Let us put up the Petition of Right: not that I diſtruſt the king; but that I cannot give truſt except in a parliamentary way."

The Petition of Right being by this time finiſhed, the commons ſent it up to the lords for their peruſal and concurrence. The lords, ſtill deſirous to abate the over-zeal of the lower houſe, propoſed to ſubjoin the following clauſe to it: "We humbly preſent this petition to your majeſty, not only with a care of preſerving our own liberties, but with due regard to leave entire that ſovereign power with which your majeſty is intruſted for the protection, ſafety, and happineſs of your people."

The commons were by no means ſatisfied with this clauſe, which they aſſerted would leave their liberties in a ſtill more precarious ſituation than at preſent, for which reaſon they abſolutely rejected it; but not without giving the lords ample and ſatisfactory reaſons for ſo doing. All obſtacles being at length removed, the Petition of Right paſſed the commons, and was ſent up to the lords for their approbation, who immediately paſſed the ſame.

This petition, which may be called the ſecond Great Charter of England, is of ſuch importance, and forms ſo eſſential a part of the Engliſh conſtitution, that we ſhall preſerve a copy of it, as agreed to by both houſes of parliament. It is as follows:

"To the King's moſt excellent majeſty,

I. "Humbly ſhew unto our ſovereign lord the king, the lords ſpiritual and temporal, and commons in parliament aſſembled, That whereas it is declared and enacted, by a ſtatute made in the reign of king Edward I. commonly called Statutum de Tallagio non concedendo, that no tallage or aid ſhall be laid or levied by the king, or his heirs in this realm, without the good-will and aſſent of the archbiſhops, biſhops, earls, barons, knights, burgeſſes, and other the freemen of the commonalty of this realm: and by authority of parliament holden in the twenty-fifth year of king Edward III. it is declared and enacted, That, from thenceforth, no perſon ſhould be compelled to make any loans to the king againſt his will, becauſe ſuch loans were againſt reaſon, and the franchiſe of the land: and, by other laws of this realm, it is provided, that none ſhould be charged with any charge or impoſition called benevolence, or by ſuch like charge: by which the ſtatutes before mentioned, and other the good laws and ſtatutes of this realm, your ſubjects have inherited this freedom, that they ſhould not be compelled to contribute to any tax, tallage, aid, or other like charge, not ſet by common conſent in parliament.

II. "Yet, nevertheleſs, of late divers commiſſions directed to ſundry commiſſioners in ſeveral counties, with inſtructions, have iſſued; by means whereof your people have been in divers places aſſembled, and required to lend certain ſums of money unto your majeſty; and many of them, upon their refuſal ſo to do, have had an oath adminiſtered to them not warrantable by the laws and ſtatutes of this realm; and have been conſtrained to become bound to make appearance before your privy-council, and in other places; and others of them have been therefore impriſoned, confined, and ſundry other ways moleſted and diſquieted: and divers other charges have been laid and levied upon your people, in ſeveral counties, by lord-lieutenants, deputy-lieutenants, commiſſioners for muſters, juſtices of peace, and others, by command or direction from your majeſty, or your privy-council, againſt the laws and free cuſtoms of this realm.

III. "And whereas alſo, by the ſtatute called The Great Charter of the Liberties of England, it is declared and enacted, That no freeman may be taken or impriſoned, or be diſſeized of his freehold or liberties, or his free cuſtoms, or be outlawed or exiled, or in any manner deſtroyed, but by the lawful judgment of his peers, or by the law of the land.

IV. "And in the eight and twentieth year of the reign of king Edward III. it was declared and enacted, by authority of parliament, That no man, of what ſtate or condition that he be, ſhould be put out of his lands or tenements, nor taken, nor impriſoned, nor diſherited, nor put to death, without being brought to anſwer by due proceſs of law.

V. "Nevertheleſs, againſt the tenor of the ſaid ſtatutes, and other the good laws and ſtatutes of your realm to that end provided, divers of your ſubjects have of late been impriſoned without any cauſe ſhewed; and when, for their deliverance, they were brought before juſtice, by your majeſty's writs of habeas corpus, there to undergo and receive as the court ſhould order, and their keepers commanded to certify the cauſes of their detainer, no cauſe was certified, but that they were detained by your majeſty's ſpecial command, ſignified by the lords of your privy-council; and yet were returned back to ſeveral priſons, without being charged with any thing to which they might make anſwer according to law.

VI. "And whereas of late, great companies of ſoldiers and mariners have been diſperſed in divers counties of the realm, and the inhabitants, againſt their wills, have been compelled to receive them into their houſes, and there to ſuffer them to ſojourn, againſt the laws and cuſtoms of this realm, and to the great grievance and vexation of the people.

VII. "And whereas alſo, by authority of parliament, in the five and twentieth year of the reign of king Edward III. it is declared and enacted, That no man ſhould be fore-judged of life or limb againſt the form of the great charter and law of the land: and by the ſaid great charter, and other the laws and ſtatutes of this your realm, no man ought to be judged to death but by the laws eſtabliſhed in this your realm, either by the cuſtoms of the ſame realm, or by acts of parliament: and whereas no offender, of what kind ſoever, is exempted from the proceedings to be uſed, and puniſhments to be inflicted by the laws and ſtatutes of this your realm: nevertheleſs, of late, divers commiſſions, under your majeſty's great ſeal, have iſſued forth, by which certain perſons have been aſſigned and appointed commiſſioners, with power and authority to proceed within the land, according to the juſtice of martial law, againſt ſuch ſoldiers and mariners, or other diſſolute perſons joining with them, as ſhould commit any murther, robbery, felony, mutiny, or other outrage or miſdemeanor whatſoever, and by ſuch ſummary courſe and order as is agreeable to martial law, and as is uſed in armies in time of war, to proceed to the trial and condemnation of ſuch offenders, and them to cauſe to be executed and put to death according to the law martial.

VIII. "By pretext whereof ſome of your majeſty's ſubjects have been, by ſome of the ſaid commiſſioners, put to death, when and where, if, by the laws and ſtatutes of the realm, they had deſerved death, by the ſame laws and ſtatutes alſo they might, and by no other ought, to have been judged and executed.

IX. "And alſo ſundry grievous offenders, by colour thereof claiming an exemption, have eſcaped the puniſhments due to them by the laws and ſtatutes of this your realm, by reaſon that divers of your officers and miniſters of juſtice have unjuſtly refuſed or forborn to proceed againſt ſuch offenders, according to the ſame laws and ſtatutes, upon pretence that the ſaid offenders were puniſhable only by martial law, and by authority of ſuch commiſſioners as aforeſaid: which commiſſions, and all other of like nature, were wholly and directly contrary to the ſaid laws and ſtatutes of your realm.

X. "They do therefore humbly pray your moſt excellent majeſty, that no man hereafter be compelled to make or yield any gift, loan, benevolence, tax, or ſuch like charge, without common conſent, by act of parliament; and that none be called to make anſwer, or take ſuch oath, or to give attendance, or be confined, or otherwiſe moleſted or diſquieted concerning the ſame, or for refuſal thereof: and that no freeman, in any ſuch manner as is before-mentioned, be impriſoned or detained: and that your majeſty would be pleaſed to remove the ſaid ſoldiers and mariners, and that your people may not be ſo burthened in time to come: and that the aforeſaid commiſſions, for proceeding by martial law, may be revoked and annulled: and that hereafter no commiſſions of like nature may iſſue forth, to any perſon or perſons whatſoever, to be executed as aforeſaid, leſt, by colour of them, any of your majeſty's ſubjects be deſtroyed, or put to death, contrary to the laws and franchiſe of the land.

XI. "All which they moſt humbly pray of your moſt excellent majeſty, as their rights and liberties, according to the laws and ſtatutes of this realm: and that your majeſty would alſo vouchſafe to declare, That the awards, doings, and proceedings to the prejudice of your people, in any of the premiſes, ſhall not be drawn hereafter into conſequence or example: and that your majeſty would alſo be pleaſed, for the further comfort and ſafety of your people, to declare your royal will and pleaſure, That in the things aforeſaid, all your officers and miniſters ſhall ſerve you according to the laws and ſtatutes of this realm, as they tender the honour of your majeſty, and the proſperity of this kingdom."

Nothing was now wanting but the royal aſſent to give this famous petition the force of a law. On the 2d of June the king went to the houſe of peers, and being ſeated in the chair of ſtate, the petition was read to him; but, to the aſtoniſhment of the whole aſſembly, inſtead of the clear, conciſe, and uſual form by which every bill is confirmed or rejected, Charles returned the following anſwer: "The king willeth that right be done according to the laws and cuſtoms of the realm; and that the ſtatutes be put in due execution, that his ſubjects may have no cauſe to complain of any wrong or oppreſſions, contrary to the juſt rights and liberties, to the performance whereof he holds himſelf in conſcience as much obliged as of his own prerogative."

This anſwer was far from being ſatisfactory to the parliament; and ſoon after both houſes agreed in preſenting a joint petition to his majeſty, "for a clear and ſatisfactory anſwer to the Petition of Right, in full parliament."

In the mean time the commons commenced a vigorous proſecution againſt Dr. Manwaring, who had preached a ſermon, which, upon enquiry, they found to be printed by ſpecial command from the king. This diſcourſe contained doctrines ſubverſive of all civil liberty. It was therein advanced, "That though property was commonly lodged in the ſubject, yet, whenever any exigency required ſupply, all property was transferred to the king; that the conſent of parliament was not neceſſary for the impoſition of taxes; and that the divine laws required compliance with every demand, however irregular, which the prince ſhould make upon his ſubjects." The commons having impeached him before the peers, they pronounced the following ſentence: "That he ſhould be impriſoned during the pleaſure of the houſe, be ſuſpended during three years, be incapable of holding any eccleſiaſtical dignity or ſecular office, and that his book ſhould be called in and burnt."

Sir Edward Coke then made a motion in the houſe for impeaching the duke of Buckingham as the author of many of thoſe grievances under which the nation laboured. But Charles reſolved to put a ſtop to theſe proceedings, and accordingly ſent a meſſage to the commons acquainting them that he deſigned in a few days to put an end to the ſeſſion, and deſired that they would not enter upon new buſineſs, nor caſt any aſperſions on his government and miniſtry. The commons, enraged at this meſſage, which they looked upon as preſcribing to them their method of proceeding, paid no regard to it; and it was foreſeen, that a violent tempeſt was ready to burſt on the duke. In order to prevent this, the king thought proper to gratify their wiſhes with regard to the petition of Right. For this purpoſe he came to the houſe of peers on the ſeventh of June, and pronouncing the uſual form of words: "Let it be law as is deſired," gave full ſanction and authority to the petition.

This aſſent was received with loud acclamations in the houſe, and public rejoicings were made throughout the kingdom. The commons immediately paſſed the bill of ſubſidies; but they were far from being ſatisfied by the important conceſſion which Charles had made. Their ill humour had been ſo much heightened by the king's frequent evaſions and delays, that it could not be preſently appeaſed by an aſſent, which he allowed to have been extorted from him. Though they had granted the king this aid, yet they ſtill retained a pledge in their hands, which they imagined, would inſure the ſucceſs of all their applications. Tonnage and poundage had not yet been granted by parliament; and the commons had artfully concealed their intention of attacking that branch of the revenue, till the royal aſſent had been given to the Petition of Right, which they juſtly conſidered as of the utmoſt importance. They then openly aſſerted that the levying tonnage and poundage without conſent of parliament, was a palpable violation of the antient privileges of the people, and an open infringement of the Petition of Right ſo lately granted.

They next reſumed the cenſure of Buckingham's conduct and behaviour, and againſt whom they had conceived a moſt implacable hatred. They drew up a remonſtrance to the king, in which they recapitulated all national grievances and misfortunes, and omitted no circumſtance, which could render the whole adminiſtration deſpicable and odious. In the concluſion of this remonſtrance they aſſerted, "the excluſive power of the ſaid duke, and the abuſe of that power, to be the principal cauſe of all the evils and dangers therein maintained; and therefore they humbly ſubmitted it to his majeſty's wiſdom, whether it can be ſafe for himſelf, or for his kingdom, that ſo great power both by ſea and land, as reſts in him, ſhould be truſted in the hands of any one ſubject whatſoever."

This remonſtrance was preſented to the king on the 17th of June. Charles received it with the utmoſt chagrin, and informed the houſe of commons that he ſhould ſoon put an end to the ſeſſion. Upon which they immediately applied themſelves to the finiſhing of the remonſtrance againſt tonnage and poundage. The king was highly incenſed when he heard of this remonſtrance; and well knowing what the event would be, if compleated by the commons and rejected by him, he reſolved to cut the ſeſſion ſhort before it could be perfected: for this purpoſe on the twenty-ſecond of June, while the remonſtrance was reading in the lower houſe, he came unexpectedly to the houſe of peers, and ſending for the commons, prorogued the ſeſſion to the twentieth of October.

Charles, being now freed from the embarraſſment of this aſſembly, turned his attention to foreign affairs, in which he was equally unſucceſsful as in thoſe at home. Rochelle had for ſome time been inveſted, and it was apparent, by Richlieu's taking the conduct of the ſiege upon himſelf, that he intended to exterminate the Hugonots, whoſe whole dependence was now upon the Engliſh. Charles was ſincerely deſirous of relieving them; and for that purpoſe diſpatched a fleet under the command of the earl of Denbigh, brother-in-law to the duke of Buckingham. This armament conſiſted of ten ſhips of the line, and about ſixty ſmaller veſſels, moſt of them tranſports, carrying about two thouſand two hundred ſoldiers. As ſoon as the fleet reached Rochelle, Denbigh found means to inform the inhabitants of that city, that he was come to their relief, and deſired they would place lights on as many of the ſteeples as the months for which they had ſtill proviſion; but no ſuch ſignals appearing, it was concluded that they were already in the greateſt want of neceſſaries. The Engliſh admiral found the entrance into the harbour guarded by a great number of French ſhips; and promiſed the Rochellers, that he would, upon the return of the tide, attack the fleet of the enemy. During the night, a battery of nine pieces of cannon was erected at the mouth of the harbour, and played furiouſly on the Engliſh; and before noon the next day, the French ſhips were filled with troops; an army of land forces was drawn up upon the ſhore to oppoſe their landing, and all the neceſſary diſpoſitions were made for a vigorous defence, in caſe any attack ſhould be made by the Engliſh. Theſe difficulties did not, however, intimidate the Engliſh admiral; he prepared to relieve the place, and to ſink the French ſhips that guarded the paſſage into the harbour; but the wind changing, he was obliged to lay aſide his deſign. Three days after, he attacked the French ſhips on one ſide, while the Rochellers cannonaded their land forces on the other, and brought up four of their largeſt veſſels, which had been purpoſely built to draw as little water as poſſible, in order to paſs the bar; but found the attempt impracticable, not only for want of water, but alſo from the diſpoſitions the French had made to defend the paſſage. A few of the ſmaller ſhips, however, paſſed the bar, but were ſo warmly oppoſed by the French artillery, that they were obliged to return. Upon this miſcarriage, a council of war was held; where ſome of the Engliſh captains were of opinion, that the relief of the place was impracticable, and that the Rochellers had deceived them with regard to the facility of entering the harbour. This opinion was, however, by no means unanimous; for the Engliſh vice-admiral, and one captain Carr, exclaimed againſt the puſillanimity of the reſt; and the few ſmall ſhips in the fleet, belonging to the French proteſtants, offered, by the aſſiſtance of four merchantmen well armed, with three fire ſhips, and a proportial number of land forces, to throw a quantity of proviſions into the town. The earl of Denbigh, however, refuſed the offer, notwithſtanding the Rochellers agreed to pay for all the Engliſh ſhips that might miſcarry in this attempt. But neither this offer, nor the tears and prayers of the deputies of Rochelle, could prevail upon Denbigh. He returned to England, where he was loaded with calumny and diſgrace.

The failure of this expedition tended farther to prejudice the minds of the people againſt the duke of Buckingham. The enemies of that nobleman had induſtriouſly circulated the remonſtrance of the commons againſt him in every part of the kingdom. He perceived his ſituation; and found the wings of royal authority, broad as they were, too narrow to ſhelter him from the dreadful ſtorm raiſed againſt him by the parliament. He plainly ſaw that no efforts of his own, no conceſſions of his maſter, could recover his credit, and that nothing leſs than his blood could ſatisfy his enemies. He therefore threw aſide all other conſiderations, and reſolved, if poſſible, to ſignalize himſelf, and recover the favour of the people, however he might ſtand with the parliament; and well knew, that nothing could ſo readily effect this as his relieving Rochelle. He accordingly cauſed ten ſhips of a particular form, and peculiarly adapted to paſs the bar, to be built with the utmoſt expedition, and made the neceſſary diſpatches for ſailing, to relieve that place, now reduced to the laſt extremity. But a fixed gloom was ſettled on his countenance; he appeared abroad with omens of misfortune in his aſpect; his unſteady motions, his dark expreſſions, his earneſtly recommending his wife and children to Charles, his frequent ſolitary entertainments with his mother, his reflections on the tender ties of nature, and the ſoft endearments of life, which he was juſt going to leave behind him, ſufficiently declared that he feared ſomething of the moſt alarming nature. The fleet being ready to ſail, he repaired to Portſmouth, with a reſolution of relieving Rochelle, or periſhing in the attempt. But before he could ſet out on his expedition he met with that fate from the hand of an aſſaſſin, which, had he lived much longer, he would in all probability have ſuffered from the general reſentment of the nation.

This aſſaſſin was one John Felton, (a man of a good family, but of a gloomy, enthuſiaſtic diſpoſition) who had ſerved in the ſtation of lieutenant under the duke, in his late expedition to Rhe. His captain being killed in the retreat, Felton applied to Buckingham for the company; but being refuſed, he threw up his commiſſion, and retired, diſcontented, from the army. The remonſtrance of the commons rouzed at once both his reſentment and enthuſiaſtic fury: he was now convinced, that it would be a meritorious ſervice in the ſight of heaven to murder Buckingham, whom the parliament had accuſed as the author of all the misfortunes of his country. Filled with theſe ideas, he repaired to Portſmouth, fully determined to put his bloody deſign into immediate execution.

On the 23d of Auguſt Buckingham received ſome advices, informing him, that a ſmall convoy of proviſions had got ſafe into Rochelle. This intelligence he communicated to the duke of Soubiſe, and other French gentlemen in his train, who inſiſted, with great vehemence, that the whole was falſe, and calculated only to retard the ſailing of the fleet. During theſe aſſeverations, the duke drew towards the door; and turning himſelf in the paſſage, to ſpeak to Sir Thomas Fryar, a colonel in the army, he was ſtabbed by an unknown hand, over Sir Thomas's ſhoulder. The knife, with which the wound was given, reached his heart; and, without uttering any other words, than "The villain has killed me," he drew out the knife, and immediately expired.

As no perſon had ſeen the hand that gave the blow, it was conjectured that the murder had been perpetrated by the French gentlemen, whoſe angry tone of voice had been heard, while their words had not been underſtood by the people. Some were for putting them to death immediately, but were prevented by the more conſiderate part, who thought it highly reaſonable they ſhould undergo a lawful trial. In the midſt of this confuſion, a hat was found near the door, in the inſide of which was ſewed a paper, containing three or four lines of the remonſtrance of the commons, which declared Buckingham an enemy to the kingdom. All were now convinced that this hat belonged to the aſſaſſin; but there was ſufficient reaſon to think he had eſcaped far enough, during the tumult, not to be found without a hat. They were, however, miſtaken; Felton never attempted to fly from juſtice, and he was ſoon perceived walking very ſedately before the door without his hat. He was immediately ſeized, confeſſed the murder, and ſeemed to triumph in the action. The enraged ſoldiers drew their ſwords, and were for ſacrificing him immediately on the ſpot. Their fury had no effect upon Felton; he readily expoſed his breaſt to their ſwords, and ſeemed willing to fall a preſent victim to their anger. Their fury was, however, prevented, and the aſſaſſin was ſecured. Some gentlemen, deſirous of finding whether Felton had any accomplices, hinted that Buckingham, though dangerouſly wounded, was not dead, and that there were great hopes of his recovery. Felton ſmiled at this, and replied, in words very expreſſive of his enthuſiaſm, "I know that he is dead, (ſaid he) for I had the force of forty men when I ſtruck the blow." Being queſtioned with regard to the perſons by whoſe inſtigations he had performed the horrid deed, he told them, that their inquiries were uſeleſs; that no perſon upon earth had credit ſufficient with him to have diſpoſed him to undertake ſuch an action; that no man living was privy to his purpoſe; that the reſolution proceeded wholly from the impulſe of his own conſcience; and that if his hat was found, his motives would ſufficiently appear; for, thinking he ſhould periſh in the attempt, he had there taken care to explain them.

Charles was at church when the news was brought him of his favourite's death; but he was ſo earneſt in his devotions, that no diſcompoſure appeared in his actions, nor alteration in his countenance. The ſervice, however, was no ſooner over, than he retired to his chamber, and gave vent to his ſorrows in a flood of tears. During his whole life, he expreſſed his regard for Buckingham by a ſeries of munificent acts towards his widow, his children, and his friends. Some of the council, and biſhop Laud in particular, threatened Felton with the rack, if he did not diſcover his accomplices. But this had no effect upon the aſſaſſin: he calmly replied, "that if he was put to the torture, he did not know whom he might name in the extremity of anguiſh, perhaps the biſhop himſelf." The judges, however, being conſulted, declared, that though that practice had been formerly common, no man, by the laws of England, could be put to the torture. Reflection and confinement had more effect on the enthuſiaſtic ſpirit of Felton than all their threatenings. He ſeemed, in ſome meaſure, to recover from his deluſion, expreſſed remorſe for what he had done, and ſuffered death with compoſure and reſignation.

Thus fell, in the 37th year of his age, the celebrated George Villiers, duke of Buckingham, whoſe riſe was ſudden, his promotions rapid, and his end untimely. Notwithſtanding the load of public cenſure heaped upon this great favourite and miniſter, there is reaſon to believe that he meant well both to his maſter and his country; and that his chief misfortunes proceeded from jealouſy in others, who thought the great and extenſive power he enjoyed dangerous to the rights of a free people. It is poſſible, if he had lived a few years longer, he might have ſeen through the temptations of greatneſs, and have proved as great a pillar of the ſtate as any of his predeceſſors. He was of a moſt noble and generous diſpoſition: he ſeldom ſtudied to conceal his reſentments, either of love or hatred; in the former he was immoderate, in the latter he was not ſanguinary; but once offended, he never could forget: his courage was great, but it ſometimes tranſported him to fear, for if he had a little yielded to the times, and withdrawn from thoſe ſtorms he could neither prevent nor allay, he might, perhaps, have found a milder fate.

Though the death of Buckingham greatly affected Charles, yet it did not extinguiſh his deſire of relieving Rochelle. He gave the command of the fleet to the earl of Lindſay, and repaired in perſon to Portſmouth, in order to haſten the ſailing of the fleet. His preſence had ſuch effect, that more was done in ten or twelve days, than in almoſt as many weeks before. It was, however, the eighth of September before the fleet ſailed from Portſmouth, when the vaſt genius of Richelieu had finiſhed a work thought impoſſible to be executed in ſo ſhort a ſpace of time: this was a mole of more than a mil in length, carried acroſs the mouth of the harbou in the boiſterous ocean, and by means of which al relief by ſea was cut off. On the eighteenth of September the fleet reached the road of Rochelle; bu a calm coming on, it was the twentieth before th ſhips approached the mole, when a furious cannonad bega began, and continued for two hours, without any great loſs on either ſide. Next day the cannonading continued, but with leſs vigour; though it was known, by a gentleman who had found means to eſcape from Rochelle, that the inhabitants, unleſs relieved in two days, muſt ſurrender. But even this intelligence produced no effect on the Engliſh captains, who appear to have been deſtitute of experience, and ſome of them courage. The duke of Soubiſe offered to attempt the mole with the French ſhips, provided the Engliſh would promiſe to follow him; but this propoſal was rejected in a council of war, by a majority of the Engliſh captains. The count Laval next propoſed, with the help of artificial mines, contrived in three ſhips, to attempt to blow up the mole; but this was alſo rejected, and the time was ſpent in fruitleſs cannonading. At laſt it was determined, in a council of war, to make one general and deciſive attack upon the mole; but before the deſign could be carried into execution, the beſieged were obliged to capitulate. Of fifteen thouſand perſons who had been ſhut up in the town, four thouſand only ſurvived the fatigues and famine they had undergone. A more ſhocking ſcene of calamity was never beheld than Rochelle preſented at the time of its ſurrender. The living were not ſufficient to bury the dead, ſo that vermin and birds of prey devoured the uninterred bodies in the ſtreets. Many carried their coffins into the church-yards, to lie down in them, never more to riſe: and the few inhabitants who ſurvived appeared rather as ſpectres and ſkeletons than men.

The diſguſt which the failure of this expedition occaſioned in the nation made Charles think it improper to let the parliament meet according to their adjournment, which was in October. He therefore farther prorogued that aſſembly to the twentieth of January.

A. D. 1629. The parliament being met on the day appointed, the grand committee were very buſy and active in traverſing whatever views they thought the council might have adopted. They pretended that religion was much injured by the growth of popery and arminianiſm. Buckingham, the great object of their hatred, being now removed, their reſentment glowed with double rancour againſt Laud, biſhop of London, who, as the king's ſpiritual director, encouraged all his high notions of hierarchy and prerogative. He was branded as a ſuperſtitious eccleſiaſtic, chief of the Arminian ſect, by whoſe intereſt Montague, Cozens, Sibthorpe, and Manwaring had been pardoned, and even promoted to biſhoprics, or rich benefices; and they exclaimed againſt him as an implacable foe, not only to the puritans, but alſo to the liberty of his country.

While the committee were thus employed in examining religious grievances, the reſt of the houſe were no leſs active in their enquiries concerning civil affairs. Though the remonſtrance againſt tonnage and poundage had not been preſented to the king, it was made public, and, by it, the people could eaſily judge what were the ſentiments of the commons. Upon this foundation ſeveral merchants refuſed to pay this duty to the king, among whom were Rolles, Chambers and Vaſſal. Rolles was a member of the houſe, notwithſtanding which, on his refuſal, his warehouſe was ſealed up by the officers of the cuſtoms; and Chambers and Vaſſal were condemned by the barons of the exchequer, who ordered their goods to be detained. The affair of Rolles was, by the commons, adjudged a breach of the privilege of their houſe, and the cuſtom-houſe officers were ſummoned before the houſe to anſwer their miſdemeanor therein. But Charles ſupported his officers, and, in a meſſage he ſent to the commons, informed them, that what theſe men had done was only in compliance with his orders. This heightened the quarrel between him and his parliament. A motion was made in the houſe to impeach Sir Richard Weſton, lord treaſurer; and the king began to entertain thoughts of finiſhing the ſeſſion by a diſſolution.

The commons now reſolved to proceed to a remonſtrance againſt the ſubſidies of tonnage and poundage being levied without conſent of parliament. The king, finding them thus refractory, adjourned the parliament to the twenty-fifth of February, and afterwards to the ſecond of March. At their meeting the ſame buſineſs was again brought on the carpet. Sir John Elliot had framed the intended remonſtrance, and offered it to the clerk to read; which he refuſing, he read it himſelf. The queſtion being then called for, Sir John Finch, the ſpeaker, ſaid, "that he had a command from the king to adjourn, and to put no queſtions," and immediately left the chair. This occaſioned a violent uproar in the houſe. The ſpeaker was forced back into the chair, and forcibly held in it by two of the members, till the following ſhort proteſtation was drawn up and read.

I. "Whoſoever ſhall bring in an innovation of religion, or by favour ſeek to introduce popery, or arminianiſm, or other opinions diſagreeing from the true and orthodox church, ſhall be reputed a capital enemy to the kingdom and commonwealth.

II. "Whoſoever ſhall counſel or adviſe the taking or levying, of the ſubſidies tonnage and poundage, not being granted by parliament, or ſhall be an actor or inſtrument therein, ſhall likewiſe be reputed a common enemy to the commonwealth.

III. "If any man ſhall voluntarily yield to pay the ſaid ſubſidies of tonnage and poundage, not being granted by parliament, ſhall be reputed a betrayer to the liberties of England, and an enemy to the commonwealth."

This remonſtrance was paſſed by acclamation rather than by vote, while many of the members, thinking the leaders had gone too far in their oppoſition, expreſſed their diſlike of the whole proceeding, and the greateſt indecencies, even to blows, were committed. The king ſent the gentleman uſher of the houſe of lords, but the doors were locked, and he could obtain no admittance till the remonſtrance was finiſhed. As ſoon as the door was opened, he, by the king's order, took the mace from the table, which put an end to their proceedings; and a few days after the parliament was diſſolved.

This violent rupture between the king and his parliament alarmed the nation; but Charles took no care to make uſe of lenient meaſures, which might, perhaps, have effected a reconciliation. On the contrary, he inflamed the diſcontents of the people by acts of ſeverity. Sir Miles Hobart, Sir Peter Hayman, John Selden, eſq; William Coriton, Walter Long, and William Strode, were committed to priſon, on account of the late tumult in the houſe, which was called ſedition, and with great difficulty, after ſeveral delays, they were releaſed. Sir John Elliot, Denzil Holles, and Benjamin Valentine were ſummoned to their trial in the king's bench, for ſeditious ſpeeches and behaviour in parliament; but refuſing to anſwer before an inferior court for their conduct, as being members of a ſuperior, they were condemned to be impriſoned during the king's pleaſure, to find ſureties for their good behaviour, and to be fined, the former in a thouſand pounds each, and the latter in five hundred.

A. D. 1630. Charles, deprived of all hopes of ſupply, was now forced to conclude a peace with the two crowns againſt whom he had hitherto carried on a war, begun without neceſſity, and proſecuted with, out glory. The crown of France, though victorious over its proteſtant ſubjects, was greatly weakened by civil diſſenſions which prevailed among the princes of the blood: it was alarmed by the greatneſs of the houſe of Auſtria, and on the point of engaging in a war with Italy. In ſhort, Lewis wanted a peace as much as Charles; and it was accordingly agreed, that the Venetians ſhould interpoſe their good offices for a peace between the two crowns. The articles were therefore ſoon adjuſted; but contain nothing remarkable. Charles could not, in his preſent circumſtances, pretend to inſiſt on any terms for the Hugonots: they were left to the mercy of their own ſovereign.

The Spaniards, having been very unfortunate in Italy for above two years, liſtened to the advances made by Charles for a peace. The articles, however, had nothing advantageous, either to Charles or his allies; nothing was ſtipulated in favour of the prince palatine, except a promiſe from Philip III. to uſe his good offices in order to reſtore him to his electorate.

While theſe things were tranſacting, Charles was ſtudying the means of raiſing money, and eſtabliſhing his own authority by puniſhing all who dared to oppoſe it. Among other methods of filling his coffers was that of appointing commiſſioners to compound with thoſe, who, though ſummoned at his coronation to receive the honour of knighthood, had neglected to appear. In the reign of Edward the ſecond, an old cuſtom was enacted into a law, importing, that every man who poſſeſſed twenty pounds a year in land ſhould be knighted; and moſt of the ſucceeding monarchs had carried this law into execution. Charles, conſidering the value of money between that reign and the preſent time, ſummoned thoſe only whoſe yearly rent amounted to forty pounds; yet even this mitigation was conſidered as a hardſhip; becauſe, the value of twenty pounds in the time of Edward was equal to four times that ſum in the reign of Charles. A great number had therefore refuſed to obey the mandate, and theſe were now fined for their diſobedience.

Theſe proceedings occaſioned many complaints, which were greatly encreaſed by the king's giving orders for levying the tonnage and poundage with the utmoſt rigour. The officers of the cuſtoms were impowered to enter houſes, and break open warehouſes, cheſts, and cloſets, to ſearch for goods which had not paid duty: and under pretence of ſearching they committed innumerable acts of fraud and oppreſſion. This encreaſed the popular clamour to an enormous height, and the council, in order to prevent any dangerous inſurrection, iſſued orders for arming and reviewing the militia, from a perſuaſion that their appearance would ſufficiently intimidate the populace; while they were, on the other hand, amuſed with public orders for putting in execution the laws againſt papiſts. At the ſame time the king endeavoured to fill his coffers by granting excluſive privileges for the ſale of various ſpecies of commodities and proviſions, to the unſpeakable prejudice of trade and manufactures.

Charles was better pleaſed to govern by his prerogative alone, than in conjunction with his parliament; and leſt the hopes of relief or protection from the commons might encourage oppoſition, he iſſued a proclamation, in which he declared, "That whereas, for ſeveral ill ends, the calling again of a parliament is divulged; though his majeſty has ſhewn, by frequent meeting with his people, his love to the uſe of parliaments: yet the late abuſe having, for the preſent, driven him unwillingly out of that courſe, he will account it preſumption in any one to preſcribe to him any time for the calling that aſſembly." This was generally conſidered as a declaration that, during this reign, no more parliaments were intended to be ſummoned.

A. D. 1631. The eyes of the Engliſh were now turned toward their beloved object the queen of Bohemia; and the king was very deſirous of procuring ſome relief for his unfortunate ſiſter and her family. He joined his good offices with thoſe of France, and mediated a peace between the kings of Poland and Sweden, in hopes of engaging the latter to protect the oppreſſed proteſtants of the empire, and reſtore the elector palatine to his dominions. This was the celebrated Guſtavus Adolphus, whoſe military genius, ſeconded by the wiſeſt policy, rendered him, in a ſhort time, the moſt diſtinguiſhed monarch of the age, and rendered his country, formerly unknown and neglected, of great weight in the balance of Europe. To encourage and aſſiſt him in his projected invaſion of Germany, Charles agreed to furniſh him with ſix thouſand men; but, at the ſame time, to preſerve the appearance of neutrality, he made uſe of the marquis of Hamilton's name, a nobleman allied to the crown. Hamilton entered into an engagement with Guſtavus, and after enliſting theſe troops in England and Scotland, at Charles's expence, he landed them in the Elbe. The deciſive battle of Leipſic was fought ſoon after; where the conduct of Tilly and the valour of the imperialiſts were overcome by the ſuperior conduct of Guſtavus, and the ſuperior valour of the Swedes. What remained of this hero's life was one continued ſcene of victory; for which he was leſs beholden to fortune than to thoſe perſonal endowments which he derived from nature and from induſtry. That rapid progreſs of conqueſt which we ſo much admire in antient hiſtory, was here renewed in modern annals; and without that cauſe to which in former ages it had been owing. Military nations were not now engaged againſt an undiſciplined and unwarlike people, nor heroes ſet in oppoſition to cowards. The veteran troops of Ferdinand, conducted by the moſt celebrated generals of the age, were foiled in every encounter, and all Germany wa over-run in an inſtant by the victorious Swedo This rapid ſeries of conqueſts brought at laſt the elector palatine to Munich. That unfortunate princ now ſaw himſelf on the point of being reſtored to hi dominions, and even to the crown of Bohemia, b the hand of the conqueror: when in the ſecond batt near Leipſic, fought in the plains of Lutzen, Guſta vus was ſlain in the midſt of a victory he had alread gained.

The death of Guſtavus proved fatal to Frederi who now deſpairing of any further reſource, was ſe zed with a violent fever, occaſioned by his immode rate grief, which, in a few months, but a period to life filled with perpetual croſſes and diſappointment

A. D. 1632. Charles, ſince the diſſolution of th laſt parliament, had brought over to his intereſt ſev ral of the principal leaders who oppoſed his meaſure One of the moſt diſtinguiſhed among theſe was S Thomas Wentworth, now become ſo zealous a d fender of the royal authority, that the king made hi preſident of the council of York. This court h been erected, after a rebellion in the north, by patent from Henry VIII. without any authority parliament; and this exerciſe of power, like ma others, was indulged by that arbitrary monarch. T council of York had long acted chiefly as a crimin court; but beſides ſome innovations introduced James, Charles thought proper, on Wentwort being made preſident, to extend its powers, a to give it a large civil juriſdiction, and, in ſo meaſure, a diſcretionary power. Poſſibly the kin intention in this was nothing more than to free inhabitants of the northern counties from the troub expence, and fatigue, of attending the courts at Weſtminſter. But it ſoon appeared that the inhabitants were, by this means, deprived of the protection of the ordinary law, and ſubjected to an arbitrary authority. And accordingly ſome irregular proceedings in that court were now complained of, and tended to exaſperate the people ſtill more againſt the government.

When Wentworth was gained over to the court party, Sir Dudley Digges was made maſter of the rolls, Noy attorney-general, and Littleton ſolicitor-general. All theſe were leading men in the houſe of commons. But it ſoon appeared, that the ſame abilities which are ſufficient to perplex a court by their oppoſition, are not capable of effectually ſerving it by their compliance. Charles flattered himſelf, that by engaging theſe eminent leaders in his ſervice, his government would meet with no more oppoſition, and that a calm tranquillity would be eſtabliſhed in his kingdom during the remainder of his reign; but his own upright intentions to make the virtues of his miniſters ſupply the laws of his country fatally deceived him. Laud purſued the puritans with unremitting fury, and was fond of introducing new ceremonies into the church, and of carrying to the utmoſt height the power of the prieſthood

A. D. 1633. Charles had been for ſome time deſirous of viſiting his antient kingdom of Scotland; and as there was no parliament now ſitting, he determined to embrace this opportunity of gratifying his inclinations. He accordingly ſet out for that kingdom about the middle of May, and was attended by the whole flower of the Engliſh nobility, who vied with each other in the ſplendor of their equipages. It was the fifteenth of June before he reached Edinburgh; and on the tenth of the ſame month he was crowned in that city, with the utmoſt pomp and magnificence. On the 20th the parliament met, and granted the king a larger ſubſidy than had ever been given to any other monarch of that realm.

Charles inherited his father's deſign of bringing he religion of Scotland to a conformity with the nglish church; and Laud, biſhop of London, accompanied him in this journey to facilitate the execuon of his ſcheme. As a preparatory ſtep, two acts ere paſſed in the Scottiſh parliament, the firſt enti-ed "Concerning the king's prerogative, and the abits of the clergy." This was no other than the onfirmation of another ſtatute enacted in the prece-ng reign, empowering the king to give what orders e ſhould think proper, with regard to the dreſs of e clergy. The other ratified and improved all the atutes which had been made concerning the liberties d franchiſes of the true church. But theſe acts met th great oppoſition from the preſbyterians. They nſidered the firſt as a prelude to the uſe of the ſurce, which they looked upon as an abomination: d the words "at preſent profeſſed," they conſider- as an equivocal expreſſion, calculated to reſtore iſcopal government. Their church was governed provincial ſynods, and general aſſemblies; but the hops ſtill ſubſiſted, though without the leaſt juriſtion or influence. The bill was, however, paſſed, t occaſioned great heats and diſcontents among the ople.

The fears entertained by the Scotch religioniſts were ill-founded. The king's real intention was to roduce the rites of the Engliſh church, and reabliſh epiſcopacy in all its former power and ſplen-. Biſhop Laud preached in the royal chapel at inburgh on the benefit of conformity, and the ſad ceremonies of the church. He propoſed to the ttiſh biſhops, that the Engliſh liturgy ſhould be ived in their ſervice. They objected to this propoſal, as ſuch a ſtep could not fail of alarming the nation, as the reception of the Engliſh liturgy would be conſidered as the fore-runner of Engliſh laws, and an encroachment on the independency of the kingdom. They therefore requeſted that another form might be compoſed for the uſe of the Scottiſh church, that ſhould be the ſame in ſubſtance, but different in ſome particulars of little conſequence. The king embraced this advice, though contrary to the inclination of Laud. He was was himſelf jealous of the independence of his native kingdom; and accordingly appointed a ſelect number of the Scottiſh biſhops to form a new liturgy for their own ſervice. At the ſame time he erected Edinburgh into a biſhopric, created the archbiſhop of St. Andrew's chancellor of the kingdom, and admitted ſeveral other prelates to ſeats in the privy council, and in the college of juſtice: a very unſeaſonable mark of his regard for the hierarchy, while the biſhops by this promotion incurred the hatred and envy of the nobility, who, though they reſpected them in their eccleſiaſtical capacity, could not bear to ſee them in civil ſtations to which they thought themſelves better entitled.

Charles, having partly ſucceeded in his attempt to reſtore epiſcopal government in Scotland, returned to London, and immediately beſtowed the archbiſhopric of Canterbury (vacant by the death of Abbot) on his favorite Laud, who, by this acceſſion of authority, was now enabled to ſupport eccleſiaſtical diſcipline with the greateſt vigour.

On the elevation of Laud to the archiepiſcopal ſee, Dr. Juxon was placed in the ſee of London, and at the ſame time was made lord high treaſurer. He was a perſon of great integrity, mildneſs, humanity, and underſtanding; but all his virtues could not procure him the friendſhip of the puritans. He was a lover of hunting, and other ſports of the field; a ſufficient reaſon, however eminent in virtue, to procure him the hatred of thoſe whoſe religion admitted not of the leaſt relaxation.

Charles was very deſirous of introducing a chearfulneſs into the national religion. He renewed his father's edict for allowing ſports and recreations on Sunday, after the ſervice was over, to ſuch as attended the public worſhip; and ordered his proclamation for that purpoſe to be publicly read by the clergy after divine ſervice. Thoſe who were puritanically affected refuſed obedience, and were puniſhed by ſuſpenſion or deprivation. This tended greatly to widen the breach between the church and the diſſenters, and promote that ill humour and diſcontent already too predominant in the nation. The queen, though ſtrictly virtuous, was immoderately fond of pleaſure, particularly the entertainments of the ſtage; and her example was followed by the whole court, and the greateſt men in the nation.

In the midſt of this diſſipation, William Prynne, a puritanical barriſter of Lincoln's-inn, publiſhed an enormous quarto of a thouſand pages, intituled, Hiſtorio-Maſtyx. Its profeſſed purpoſe was to decry ſtage-plays, comedies, interludes, muſic, dancing, and other diverſions of that kind; but he alſo took occaſion to declaim againſt hunting, public feſtivals, Chriſtmas-keeping, bonfires, and may-poles. The author tells us, in his preface, that he was excited to write againſt theſe enormities, by obſerving that plays ſold better than the choiceſt ſermons, and that they were frequently printed on finer paper than even the Bible itſelf. He maintained that moſt of the players were papiſts, and all of them deſperately wicked; that the play-houſes were Satan's chapels, the frequenters of them little better than devils incarnate, and every ſtep in a dance was a ſtep to hell; that the principal crime of Nero was that of frequenting and acting of plays; and that thoſe who conſpired his death were chiefly excited to it by their indignation at that enormity. This publication gave ſo much offence to the court, that Prynne was indicted before the ſtar-chamber, where his behaviour was remarkably obſtinate and petulant, which tended to increaſe the rigour of his ſentence. He was condemned to pay a fine of 5000l. to the king, to be put from the bar, and rendered incapable of his profeſſion; to be excluded from the ſociety of Lincoln's Inn, and degraded in Oxford; to ſtand on the pillory in Weſtminſter and Cheapſide, to loſe an ear at each place, and to ſuffer perpetual impriſonment.

The diſtinguiſhed ſeverity of this ſentence raiſed the government many enemies, and greatly augmented the members of the puritan party. It was thought extremely hard that an invective againſt plays ſhould merit a puniſhment proper only for the greateſt criminals. But it muſt be obſerved, that this ſatire againſt the diverſions in vogue, though the pretended, was not the real crime for which Prynne was condemned. He had ſeverely cenſured the practices of the new hierarchy, and the ceremonies introduced by Laud; a crime which that imperious prelate could not forgive.

A. D. 1634. Freſh troubles now aroſe in conſequence of the Dutch, who were become the moſt diſtinguiſhed rivals to the Engliſh in point of commerce. James had made ſeveral attempts for hindering them from fiſhing on the coaſt of England, but all his prohibitions were in vain; the Dutch, after various pretences, at laſt aſſerted they had a right to fiſh upon the Britiſh coaſts, which right, they ſaid, was founded on immemorial poſſeſſion. The ſtates of Holland, however, diſavowed this plea of their commiſſioners; but at the ſame time declared, that however unjuſt, and however contrary to the rights of ſovereignty in the crown of England their practice of fiſhing on the Britiſh coaſts might be, it was ſo abſolutely neceſſary to the very exiſtence of their ſtate, that they dared not give it up, or pay any acknowledgment for it, leſt their people ſhould riſe in open rebellion againſt them.

This was an argument not to be anſwered by reaſon, and Charles was determined to drive them by force from the Britiſh coaſts. Vigorous meaſures were, therefore, begun in ſeveral parts of the kingdom; but theſe could not be carried on without proportional revenues; and thoſe of Charles were only barely ſufficient for maintaining the ſplendor of the court, performing his engagements with foreign princes, and defraying the neceſſary expences of his government. Noy, the attorney-general, was therefore deſired to project ways and means for fitting out a fleet ſufficiently powerful to execute his purpoſe. Noy fell upon the expedient of ſhip-money, grounded upon obſolete uſages and records, which juſtified a tax upon the people for furniſhing a certain number of ſhips for the defence of the ſeas.

In conſequence of this, writs were immediately iſſued, with which were given inſtructions and directions from the lords of the council for the aſſeſſing and levying the ſhip-money. Theſe inſtructions were directed to the ſheriffs of the ſeveral counties; and the reſpective officers appointed to gather the tax were inveſted with the moſt arbitrary powers. Thoſe who refuſed to pay their proportion were to be diſtreſſed, and their goods ſold for payment, without any reſpect of perſons. The writ being ſerved upon the lord-mayor of London, he immediately ſummoned a common-council, when it was agreed to preſent the following petition to the king:

"To the king's moſt excellent majeſty,

"The humble petition of your faithful ſubjects, "the mayor, commonalty, and citizens of your city "of London, moſt humbly ſheweth,

"That whereas your majeſty, by writ bearing teſte "20 Octobris laſt, commanded your petitioners, at "their own charge, to provide ſeven ſhips of war furniſhed with men, victuals, and all warlike proviſions, to be at Portſmouth by the firſt of March "next, and to continue from that time during the "ſpace of twenty-ſix weeks in your majeſty's ſervice, "upon the defence of the ſeas, and other cauſes in "the ſaid writ contained:

"Your petitioners do, in all ſubmiſſive humbleneſs, and with acknowledgements of your ſacred "majeſty's favours unto your ſaid city, inform your "majeſty, that they conceive, that by antient privileges, grants, and acts of parliament, which they "are ready humbly to produce, they are exempt, and "are to be freed from that charge.

"And do moſt humbly pray,

"That your majeſty would be graciouſly pleaſed, "that the petitioners, with your princely grace and "favour, may enjoy the ſaid privileges and exemptions, and be freed from providing of the ſaid ſhips "and proviſions."

Charles, however, notwithſtanding this oppoſition of the capital, proceeded with as much violence as i ſhip-money had always been an eſtabliſhed tax, and as if he did not expect to meet with any oppoſition to his arbitrary proceedings. Noy, the attorney-general, dying about this time, left the affair unfiniſhed; but the neceſſities of Charles increaſing, he reſolved that ſhip-money ſhould be extended t the inland as well as the marine counties. But i order to this, it was neceſſary to employ proper per ſons, and to invent plauſible pretences. Sir Rober Heath, lord chief juſtice, had, in many reſpects, bee found untractable, and was accordingly removed fro his office, and his place ſupplied by Sir John Finch a lawyer of great eloquence, and a firm friend to th court; and Sir John Banks was made attorney-gene ral. It was, probably, owing to the opinion of tho lawyers, who were far inferior in abilities to Noy, th Charles made ſhip-money a general tax; but eve this attempt did not alarm the nation ſo much as w expected. The merchants, who generally take th lead on theſe occaſions, were too well acquainted wi the advantages of commerce to riſque them by a oppoſition which might have given the court a pr tence for impoſing heavier duties upon goods; a as the tax propoſed fell more heavy on the land than the trading intereſt of the kingdom, they did n for ſome time, conſider it as a ſtretch of arbitra power. This acquieſcence gave the court a perf ſecurity. Charles endeavoured to fill the kingdo with apprehenſions, that the Dutch and the Fren having entered into a new alliance, would certain attempt to make themſelves maſters of the narro ſeas; and a proclamation was accordingly publiſhe commanding all Engliſh ſeamen and ſhip-wrig who were in foreign ſervices, to return home i mediately.

A. D. 1636. In the ſpring of this year a flee ſixty ſail of large ſhips was fitted out, under the co mand of the earl of Northumberland; and a p clamation was iſſued, ſtrictly forbidding all perſo not the natural-born ſubjects of theſe kingdoms, fr fiſhing on the Britiſh coaſt, without proper licen from the king, who farther declared, that he inten always to keep a ſtrong ſquadron at ſea, in orde prevent all ſuch encroachments for the future, an protect thoſe ſhips of his friends and allies who ſho take out licences. The earl of Northumberl ſailed in the month of May; and coming up ſome of the Dutch ſhips, he ſunk all that refuſe leave the coaſts, and diſcontinue their fiſhery.

This ſpirited conduct ſtruck a terror into all the maritime powers of Europe; even the haughty Richlieu himſelf, who had formed a deſign of rendering the Dutch the rivals of the Engliſh on the ocean, was obliged to abandon his project. The Dutch themſelves applied to Charles in the moſt earneſt manner; and at laſt conſented to pay thirty thouſand pounds for a licence to fiſh during the remainder of the year, when it was hoped a proper regulation would be made for fixing an annual tribute for the neceſſary licences.

A regular diſtribution was now drawn up of ſhips adapted to the ſeveral ſhires of England and Wales, with their tonnage, number of men, and monthly expence; together with the ſums charged upon the reſpective corporate towns in each county. And Charles, that he might proceed with more ſafety, and remove the ſeveral objections that had been ſtarted againſt paying the tax, procured the opinion of the judges, "that when the good and ſafety of the kingdom in general is concerned, and the nation in danger, the king might lawfully levy a tax for fitting out ſuch a number of ſhips as ſhall be neceſſary for the defence of the nation; and that his majeſty is the ſole judge both of the danger, and when and how it is to be prevented."

Charles took particular care to publiſh and circulate this deciſion of the judges. He ſeemed ſatisfied that he had not acted contrary to the laws, and determined to puniſh, with the utmoſt ſeverity, all who ſhould, for the future, dare to oppoſe his royal pleaſure. It is little to be wondered at that the people paid this tax with the greateſt reluctance; but they had no recourſe to avoid ſubmitting to the proſtitution and perverſion of the laws of their country. Their uſual aſylum, the courts of law, were ſhut againſt them, and there was no medium; they muſt either ſubmit, or have recourſe to violence, an expedient which no wiſe man would chuſe. A choſen few, however, were ſtill in reſerve; men who dared to think with juſtice, and act with intrepidity; who, armed with the principles of civil and natural liberty, were determined to ſupport the cauſe of their country, and not tamely ſubmit to the arbitrary power of the crown. Strong reaſonings, bold elocution, deep learning, and upright intentions, were not, however, ſufficient to ſuſtain this dreadful combat; a leader muſt be found, who, beſides all theſe accompliſhments, had intrepidity ſufficient to ſtand forth in the cauſe of his country. Such a man was John Hambden, a gentleman poſſeſſed of a conſiderable eſtate, and deſcended from an antient family in Buckinghamſhire; which, being an inland county, afforded him the better pretence for refuſing to pay the tax of ſhip-money. His ſhare did not amount to more than thirty ſhillings, yet he abſolutely refuſed payment, and determined to venture a trial, the event of which would clearly point out to the whole kingdom, whether arbitrary power was to prevail over juſtice.

After many pleadings and traverſes, the caſe was argued, during twelve days, in the exchequer-chamber, before all the judges of England; and the nation regarded, with the utmoſt anxiety, every circumſtance of this celebrated trial. It will be eaſily conceived, from the opinion of the judges, that the great queſtion in this cauſe was, Whether the kingdom was in ſuch imminent danger, that the king had a right to aſſeſs his ſubjects, without waiting for the neceſſary forms of parliamentary proceedings? It was confeſſed on all hands, that both public and private dangers may be ſo great, that all property may ceaſe, while the parties are providing for their own ſafety. But one of the crown lawyers pretended, that the danger of the kingdom was then ſo preſſing, as to give the king a right to the property of the ſubject; and the ſmall portion of Mr. Hambden's aſſeſſment was no argument for his paying it, unleſs they could prove it to be according to law. Whether the king was, or was not, the ſole judge of the public neceſſity, was ſtrongly debated, but greatly to the diſadvantage of the court; ſince nothing could be more obvious than this, that when public danger becomes ſo preſſing as to confound all property, the caſe will be notorious, and ſelf-preſervation becomes the common principle with both prince and people.

Notwithſtanding the arguments uſed by Hambden's council were much more forcible than thoſe of his opponents, yet the event was what had been long foreſeen. The prejudiced or proſtituted judges, four of them excepted, gave the ſentence in favour of the crown. Hambden, however, obtained, by the trial, the end for which he had ſo generouſly ſacrificed his ſafety, and his quiet: the people were rouzed from their lethargy, and became fully ſenſible of the danger to which their liberty was expoſed. Theſe national queſtions were canvaſſed in every company; and the more they were examined, the more evidently it appeared to many, that liberty was totally ſubverted, and an unuſual and arbitrary authority exerciſed over the kingdom. Slaviſh principles, it was ſaid, concurred with illegal practices; eccleſiaſtical tyranny lent aſſiſtance to civil uſurpations; iniquitous practices were ſupported by arbitrary puniſhments; and all the rights of the nation, tranſmitted through ſo many ages, ſecured by ſo many laws, and purchaſed by the blood of ſo many heroes and patriots, now lay proſtrate at the feet of the monarch.

A. D. 1637. We have already obſerved how deſirous Charles was of eſtabliſhing in Scotland the diſcipline and worſhip of the church of England. He was fond of epiſcopacy, and inveſted the biſhops with an authority which he thought equally advantageous to religion and government. He loved church ceremonies, and wanted to have them received as eſſentials in divine ſervice. Without reflecting how much all men are attached to their particular mode of worſhip, Charles, confident of his own power, now ſent down canons for the government of the church of Scotland, and a new liturgy for regulating the manner of worſhip. The people were far from being diſpoſed to receive them. The nobility, from a jealouſy of power, and the diſſenting clergy from principles of equality, were enemies to the hierarchy; and their univerſal hatred of the church of Rome made them abhor whatever had the leaſt reſemblance to the method of its worſhip. On the ſixteenth of July, public intimations were given from the pulpits, that on the following Sunday the new liturgy would be introduced into the principal churches. Both the biſhop and dean of Edinburgh attended to give the greater ſolemnity to this new form of worſhip. The latter, dreſſed in a ſurplice, began the liturgy. But he had not proceeded far in the ſervice, before the people cried out, "A Pope! a Pope! ſtone him!" The biſhop, however, mounted the pulpit, and attempted to appeaſe the tumult. But his endeavours were in vain: they threw a bench at his head, and it was with the utmoſt difficulty that both him and the dean eſcaped with their lives.

The period was now approaching which was to decide the fate of the eſtabliſhed religion in Scotland. The ſpirit of oppoſition to the new liturgy daily increaſed among the common people, and the repeated commands of the court to introduce it proved at once ineffectual, and dangerous to the biſhops. The magiſtrates of Edinburgh, where theſe diſturbances chiefly prevailed, were, in ſecret, enemies to the liturgy, but, in public, they expreſſed the utmoſt abhorrence of the riotous proceedings of the populace, and frequently aſſembled in order, as they pretended, to concert meaſures for putting a ſtop to thoſe alarming attempts of the multitude. They even promiſed to aſſiſt the king to the utmoſt of their power to appeaſe the tumultuous populace, and introduce the new liturgy. But in the mean time a breach enſued between the biſhops and miniſters of Scotland, and ſoon after another between the biſhops and the nobility of that kingdom. The counſel of the moderate biſhops, who had always oppoſed the violent methods of introducing the liturgy, was diſregarded by the new prelates promoted by Laud, and who were perſuaded that the intereſt of their patron with the king was abundantly ſufficient to ſupport them. This induced them to diſregard not only the advice of their more moderate brethren, but alſo that of the nobility, who took advantage of this neglect to withdraw their countenance entirely from the proceedings of the clergy.

The people, animated by the countenance of their miniſters and the nobility, began to unite, and to encourage one another to oppoſe the religious innovations introduced into the kingdom. Petitions to the council were ſigned and preſented by perſons of the higheſt quality: the women, as is common in every religious diſturbance, joined with great violence in the oppoſition: the puritan miniſters declaimed vehemently againſt popery; and the pulpits reſounded with the moſt violent invectives againſt anti-chriſt. In a word, fanaticiſm mingling with faction, and private intereſt with the ſpirit of liberty, ſoon produced the ſymptoms of the moſt dangerous inſurrection and diſorder in every part of the kingdom.

A. D. 1638. Neither the defection of the nobility, nor the threats of the vulgar, made any impreſſion on Charles: he ſeemed to deſpiſe both, and fully determined to perſevere in this religious enterprize. The primate of Scotland, a man of great temper, wiſdom, and religion, always averſe to the introduction of the new liturgy, repreſented to his majeſty, in faithful colours, the ſtate of the nation. The earl of Traquair, lord treaſurer, repaired to London, in order to lay the matter more fully before the king. But all their repreſentations were in vain: Charles was inflexible. He had, however, nothing to oppoſe to ſo violent a combination of the whole nation but a proclamation, wherein he promiſed pardon for all paſt offences, and exhorted the people to be more obedient for the future, and to ſubmit peaceably to the uſe of the liturgy. But this was ſo far from producing the deſired effect, that it was immediately oppoſed by a public proteſtation, preſented by the earl of Hume and lord Lindeſey. This was the criſis of the oppoſition: the inſurrection which had been gathering by degrees, now broke out at once; the ſtandard of rebellion was diſplayed, and the ſword of civil diſcord on the point of being ſheathed in the bowels of that unhappy country.

A new order, or rather a new adminiſtration, now took place; a ſufficient indication that this diſturbance had been ſecretly fomented by perſons in a ſtation far exalted above the common people. Four tables, as they were called, were formed in Edinburgh: one conſiſted of nobility, another of gentry, a third of miniſters, and a fourth of burgeſſes; and in the hands of theſe four tables was placed the whole authority of the government. One of their firſt, and, at the ſame time, the greateſt act they performed, was that of the Solemn League and Covenant. This celebrated compact conſiſted, firſt, of a renunciation of popery formerly ſigned by James in his youth, and compoſed of many invectives calculated to inflame the minds of the people. Then followed a bond of union, by which the ſubſcribers bound themſelves to reſiſt all religious innovations, and to defend each other againſt all oppoſition whatever: "And all this for the greater glory of God, and the greater honour and advantage of their king and country."

All ranks and conditions, young and old, of both ſexes, flocked to their ſubſcription of this covenant. Few there were who diſapproved of it, and the ſmall number that did were afraid openly to condemn it. The king's miniſters and counſellors themſelves were ſeized with the general contagion: and it was thought, that none but rebels to God, and traitors to their country, would withdraw themſelves from ſo ſalutary and pious a combination.

Charles was ſo alarmed at theſe proceedings, that he offered to ſuſpend the introduction of the liturgy, provided they would retract the covenant. Their anſwer was, that they would ſooner renounce their baptiſm. He then relaxed in other matters, and permitted a general aſſembly to be ſummoned at Glaſgow. By this unadviſed meaſure the whole deſign was finiſhed. The laity, whom the preſbyterians admitted, and who formed the ſtrongeſt part, began with impeaching the biſhops, whom they charged indiſcriminately with all ſorts of crimes. They afterwards declared all acts with regard to eccleſiaſtical matters, made ſince the advancement of James to the crown of England, null and void. Thus the canons, the liturgy, the court of high commiſſion, and even epiſcopacy itſelf, were aboliſhed in Scotland at one ſtroke.

A. D. 1639. As the Scots knew that Charles would not eaſily ſubmit to ſuch flagrant breaches of the conſtitution, they put themſelves in a poſture of defending by arms, what they deſpaired of obtaining by favour. Cardinal Richlieu, who had from the beginning fomented the troubles in Scotland, ſupplied the covenanters with money; and they invited home many commanders of their own nation who had diſtinguiſhed themſelves under the famous Guſtavus, in the wars of Germany.

Theſe precautions being taken, they ſeized on the caſtles of Edinburgh, Dumbarton, and ſeveral other places of ſtrength; took Dalkeith, and converted to their own uſe all the arms and ammunition depoſited there. They choſe Alexander Leſley, an old experienced officer, to be captain-general of their armies, to whom all who took arms ſolemnly ſwore obedience; and he, in return, ſwore to execute his charge with fidelity.

In the mean time the greateſt expedition was uſed to repair the fortifications in different parts of the kingdom. Beſides the perſons who were hired for this purpoſe, great numbers of volunteers, and even the nobility, aſſiſted in the work, and conſidered the moſt abject employment as dignified by the ſanctity of the cauſe. Nor were the women idle ſpectators; even thoſe of rank and condition, forgetting the delicacy of their ſex, and the decorum of their character, were intermingled with the loweſt rabble; and carried on their ſhoulders the rubbiſh and other materials neceſſary for completing the fortifications.

Though Charles was fond of peace, and of his native country, yet he could not avoid raiſing troops to reduce his rebellious ſubjects to reaſon, and ſubdu the refractory ſpirit of the Scots. By his œconomy he had ſaved two hundred thouſand pounds; and the queen, by her influence with the catholics, engage them to grant the king a conſiderable ſupply. Th English fleet was very formidable, and well provide with every neceſſary. Five thouſand land force were embarked on board this ſquadron, the comman of which was given to the marquis of Hamilton who had orders to ſail to the Frith of Forth, an cauſe a diverſion in the forces of the rebels. A army of near twenty thouſand foot and three thouſan horſe was levied, and commanded by the earl Arundel, a nobleman of great family, but famou neithe neither as a ſoldier nor a ſtateſman. The earl of Eſſex, a nobleman extremely popular, and of great military abilities, was appointed lieutenant-general, and the earl of Holland general of the horſe. On the twenty-ninth of May, the king himſelf joined the army, and ſummoned all the peers of England to attend him. Few diſregarded the ſummons; ſo that the Engliſh army reſembled rather the court of an eaſtern prince than a military expedition againſt an enemy.

The forces of the mal-contents were little inferior in numbers to that of the Engliſh, but almoſt deſtitute of cavalry. The infantry conſiſted, indeed, of an undiſciplined and ill-armed rabble, but animated with a religious fervour, which, in ſome meaſure, ſupplied the want of diſcipline, and rendered them very formidable. The declamations of the clergy had greatly aſſiſted the officers in gaining recruits, by thundering out anathemas againſt "all who went not out to help the Lord againſt the mighty." But the leaders of the mal-contents did not omit the more ſafe and prudent method of negotiation. They knew that a defeat muſt be fatal; and however their troops might be inſpired with an enthuſiaſtic fury, they were unable to ſtand the regular attacks of diſciplined forces. They therefore immediately ſent very ſubmiſſive meſſages to the king, in which they begged leave to be admitted to a treaty in order to reſtore tranquillity to their native country, and ſheathe the deſtructive ſword of civil diſcord.

Charles, who was deſirous of terminating a war in the very bowels of his kingdom, liſtened to the covenanters, and concluded a ſudden pacification, in which it was ſtipulated, that he ſhould withdraw his fleet and army; that the Scots ſhould diſmiſs their army within eight and forty hours; that the king's forts ſhould be reſtored to him; his authority acnowledged; and that both a general aſſembly and parliament ſhould be immediately ſummoned in order o adjuſt all differences.

The Scottiſh deputies were at a loſs how to appeaſe heir principals with regard to theſe articles, which ell far ſhort of what their ſanguine hopes had taught hem to expect. Accordingly, the earl of Caſſils, nd ſeveral other noblemen and heads of the mal-conents, loudly exclaimed againſt a pacification, which as to diſarm them, and leave them, in that conition, to the mercy of the court. No abolition of piſcopacy, nor acknowledgment of the aſſembly at lasgow, had been ſtipulated, as they had been ade to believe; and the drawing off the Engliſh eet from the coaſt was of little importance, becauſe e ſhips might return whenever his majeſty pleaſed. dd to theſe conſiderations, that Charles, in one of e anſwers he had given to the deputies, had actually ſowned the aſſembly at Glaſgow; nor would he onſent to any thing farther than to refer civil matters a parliament, and eccleſiaſtical affairs to a general embly; both of which he could call or diſſolve at eaſure.

The Engliſh exclaimed againſt the peace with no s vehemence than the Scots; and there ſeemed ry little hopes that it would be of any long continuce: the ſeeds of diſaffection were ſown in Scotd, and it was no eaſy taſk to prevent their owth.

In the mean time an incident happened on the aſt of England, which ſeemed to threaten the moſt rming conſequences. The firmneſs of Charles in adily preſerving his neutrality diſconcerted Richu's plan for attacking the ſea coaſt of Flanders; d the count d'Eſtrades was ſent to conclude a new aty of ſubſidy with the prince of Orange, in order enable the Dutch to attack Antwerp, while the ench were to beſiege St. Omer's. But the ſucceſs of thoſe attempts are foreign to this hiſtory. It will be ſufficient to obſerve, that theſe diſpoſitions induced the court of Spain to fit out a ſtrong ſquadron at Corunna, conſiſting of fifty ſhips, under the command of Don Antonio Doguendo, a celebrated ſea officer. Twelve thouſand foot were embarked on board this ſquadron, which was deſigned to join another fleet of Spaniſh ſhips at Dunkirk. Richlieu gave immediate notice of the ſailing of this fleet to the prince of Orange, who ſoon after diſcovered that the Spaniſh admiral was ordered not to fight, if he could poſſibly avoid it; but put himſelf under the protection of the Engliſh, and land his men upon the coaſt of Flanders. This armament, and the fear of its being joined by the Engliſh fleet, greatly alarmed both the French and Dutch; and extraordinary efforts were made to put their fleets to ſea, in order, if poſſible, to render any attempt of the Spaniards abortive. A ſmall ſquadron of Dutch, then at ſea, fell in with, and attacked the Spaniſh fleet, but with conſiderable loſs to themſelves. Soon after, the Spaniſh admiral came to anchor near Dover, where he thought himſelf ſafe under the protection of the Engliſh. But the ambitious Richlieu had no regard to the rights of neutrality, when they oppoſed his views. He ordered d'Eſtrades to lay before the prince of Orange, "the glory that would attend his defeating the meaſures of two great monarchs, and of crowning all his noble exploits in war by a victory over the fleet of Spain under the protection of the Engliſh, and, perhaps, actually aſſiſted by their ſhips." He added, "that ſuch an action would infallibly lay Flanders open to the united forces of France and Holland."

The prince of Orange, fond as he was of glory, eſpecially when acquired againſt Spain, was ſtartled at the thoughts of committing ſo groſs an inſult on the Engliſh flag; and aſked d'Eſtrades, with ſome emotion, "Whether Richlieu was in earneſt?" D'Eſtrades aſſuring him he was, the prince ſent orders to Van Tromp the Dutch admiral, to haraſs the enemy, but by no means to venture a general engagement, till he was joined by admiral Evertſon. As ſoon as this junction was performed, Tromp was ordered to ſend a meſſage to the Engliſh admiral, acquainting him, that having received orders from his maſters to attack their enemies wherever he found them, he requeſted that the Engliſh ſhips might leave the Spaniſh ſquadron, becauſe he was commanded not to attack them, unleſs they aſſiſted the enemy, and in that caſe his orders were to attack both without diſtinction. Charles was in the utmoſt perplexity how to behave on this alarming occaſion. The haughty republicans were now at the height of their power: their fleet, when united, conſiſted of one hundred and fifty ſail of ſhips of war, commanded by the beſt ſea-officers in the world; they were highly exaſperated againſt Charles for refuſing them the liberty of fiſhing on the Britiſh coaſts, and wiſhed for an opportunity of revenging the affront, by deſtroying his fleet. At the ſame time, the public were perſuaded, that the Spaniſh fleet was either intended to conquer England, or aſſiſt the king in ſubduing his rebellious ſubjects. Charles, therefore, knew that he could not truſt to the fidelity of his ſeamen, even if the Dutch ſhould violate their neutrality. At the ſame time, he knew that the Spaniſh fleet, which conſiſted of ſixty-ſeven large ſhips, was in want both of cannon and ammunition; while the Dutch were liberally ſupplied with both from Calais, and other ſea port towns in France. It was ſome time before the whole Dutch fleet appeared, and made the proper diſpoſitions for attacking the enemy. During this interval, the Spaniſh miniſter preſented repeated memorials to Charles, for his protecting the Spaniſh fleet, which was now riding at anchor under the guns of the Engliſh caſtles near the South Foreland, while the Dutch remonſtrated ſtrongly againſt any Engliſh ſhip being employed in the Spaniſh ſervice. Charles knew not how to behave in this critical conjuncture, but at laſt determined to obſerve a ſtrict neutrality; and immediately iſſued orders, that no Engliſh ſhips ſhould take any Spaniards on board, or paſs from London below Graveſend, without a licence. At the ſame time, he acquainted the Dutch ambaſſador, that he could not, without the higheſt diſhonour, refuſe the Spaniards that protection on his coaſts they had a right to demand from the law of nations; and that he had ſent orders to Sir John Pennington, who lay in the Downs with thirty-four ſail of Engliſh men of war, to join that fleet which ſhould be firſt attacked. This declaration leſſened the ardour of the Dutch, and the Spaniſh admiral found means to ſend twelve large ſhips and four thouſand men to Dunkirk. Charles was, however, fearful of the conſequences; and ſent the earl of Arundel to perſuade the Spaniſh admiral to ſlip away the firſt fair wind, as he could not be anſwerable for the ſucceſs of an engagement, if the Spaniards were attacked by the Dutch. Doguendo would gladly have followed this advice, but could not, on account of contrary winds: and the Dutch fleet being now completely reinforced, Van Tromp ſent a letter to Pennington, demanding the benefit of his neutrality, under pretence of the Spaniards violating their privilege of protection, by firing on the Dutch admiral's barge, and killing one of his men. Tromp accordingly attacked the Spaniſh fleet with the utmoſt fury, forced them to cut their cables, and drove twenty-three ſhips a-ſhore, of which three were burnt, and two ſunk. The Thereſa, mounted with an hundred braſs guns was burnt, fixteen were taken, and ſent to Fluſhing, with four thouſand five hundred priſoners, and fourteen ſhips were loſt near Boulogne; the Dunkirk ſquadron, under Doguendo, only eſcaping. The victory was complete on the ſide of the Dutch, though it was not obtained without ſome loſs; ten of their ſhips periſhing in the action.

Charles did not fail to repreſent this conduct of the Dutch as an inſult upon the Britiſh flag; and made uſe of it as a argument for enforcing the payment of ſhip-money, in order to be able to keep a ſufficient fleet at ſea, to curb the inſolence of thoſe republicans. New writs were accordingly iſſued, and ſent to all the counties of England and Wales for collecting the tax.

Notwithſtanding this, and other acts of deſpotic power, were daily exerciſed, the people diſcovered no remarkable uneaſineſs at the neglect of parliaments, and the unconſtitutional meaſures of the government. Peace and plenty reigned in the kingdom, and the wars that raged in other nations of Europe made England the repoſitory of riches from every part of the world. This gretaly tended to render the people almoſt paſſive in their preſent ſituation. They knew, indeed, their rights; they murmured at their being violated; they publicly proclaimed their grievances; they proteſted againſt illegal executions; but this was nothing more than forming a rope of ſand; a parliament was wanting to give their complaints ſtrength and conſiſtency.

The patriots were highly pleaſed with Charles's conduct with reſpect to Scotland; and the diſpoſitions of the Scots were equally favourable for bringing matters to the criſis they deſired. The nobility and perſons of conſequence in that kingdom, were perſuaded they had ſufficiently guarded againſt all reſumptions of church revenues by exacting a promiſe from Charles to call a free parliament and an aſſembly of the clergy. They would willingly have waited the reſult of both; and that great point, the only one they dreaded, being gained, they would equally have concurred and acquieſced in every dutiful meaſure towards the crown. But they found the people untractable: they refuſed to ſtop till epiſcopacy was totally abrogated, and the principles of civil liberty founded on a more ſolid baſis than at preſent. This ſcheme might have anſwered the juſt expectation of men of property, and, at the ſame time, if not have fully ſatisfied the wiſhes, have calmed the ſpirit of the people; but the whole was defeated through a want of moderation on the part of government. The marquis of Hamilton laid before Charles the deſtructive conſequences that muſt attend his not acting with ſincerity, by leaving the approaching parliament and aſſembly in Scotland at free liberty to gratify the people, with regard to every thing that had been underſtood to have been granted by the late pacification. By this he meant the total abolition of the epiſcopal order, both in church and ſtate; but he perceived, by the manner in which the king received his repreſentation, that this would not be granted. He therefore reſigned the office of high commiſſioner in Scotland; and the earl of Traquair was appointed in his ſtead.

Charles, who had been for ſome time at Berwick, ſent an order to Edinburgh, commanding fourteen of the chief covenanting lords to attend him, in order to conſult the proper meaſures for ſettling the affairs of Scotland. The people were alarmed at this meſſage, and openly declared, that it had been propoſed by their own leaders in order to elude the force of the covenant. This ſo greatly intimidated the noblemen, that three only of the fourteeen lords could be prevailed on to obey his majeſty's orders. Montroſe, Loudon, and Lothian, were the perſons who deſpiſed the fury of the populace when it tended to prevent their obedience to the king. The buſineſs of Charles was ſerious and important: he was deſirous of learning the whole deſign of the covenanters, and wha they intended to demand in the approaching parliament and aſſembly. Montroſe was one of thoſe noblemen who thought the king had done enough t ſatisfy all his Scottiſh ſubjects, who had no dangerou or fanatical views. His two companions, particularl the earl of Loudon, were of the ſame opinion, bu wiſhed to have ſecurity for the performance; and thi they thought could only be effected by ſome additional bulwarks to the liberties of their country, eſtabliſhed in a full and free parliament.

Theſe noblemen laid before Charles the grievance they expected would be redreſſed in the enſuing pa liament; the firſt of which was, that of the comman of their garriſons being given to ſtrangers. Bo James and Charles had, indeed, broken down th partition-wall between the two kingdoms; and th Scots had poured by multitudes into England, whe they enjoyed a great number of offices, both civ and military. But the wiſeſt men in both natio condemned the partiality in favour of the nativ country of their prince; and even the generality the Scots themſelves were diſſatisfied with the enco ragement many of their great men met with in En land, which induced them to ſpend both their mon and eſtates in that country. The Engliſh, a gre and powerful people, had far leſs to apprehend fro the Scots than the Scots from them. The garriſo of Edinburgh and Dumbarton were already garriſo ed by the Engliſh; and it was always eaſy for th navy to deſtroy the commerce of Scotland. T Scots therefore thought it reaſonable, that no ſtrang ſhould be entruſted with the government of any their caſtles, unleſs by the advice of the ſtates.

The heritable juriſdictions of Scotland were thoug even by the natives themſelves, to be dangerous, b cauſe they created too great a dependence of t inferior people on particular families. They demanded, therefore, that no commiſſion of juſticiary or lieutenant might be granted, but for a limited time. Laſtly, they excepted againſt the precedency of the lord-treaſurer and the lord privy-ſeal, as not being warranted by any poſitive law. This exception was, probably, intended to prevent arbitrary promotions, which might eclipſe the luſtre of their antient nobility, and create too powerful an influence of the crown in parliament.

Theſe were the demands intended by the Scots to be made in the enſuing parliament; and, poſſibly, if Charles had acted with ſincerity, they had ſtopped there; but he could not be prevailed upon to conſent to the abolition of epiſcopacy. The covenanters ſaw this, and were convinced that all conceſſions made by the king muſt be forced, and that he would retract them the firſt favourable opportunity. Their chiefs, therefore, thought they had no ſafety but in uniting more cloſely than ever, and openly oppoſing the power of the crown itſelf. Though their army had ſeparated on the concluſion of the late treaty, they continued ſtill in large bodies; the fortifications of Leith were continued; they iſſued commiſſions for purchaſing large quantities of arms and ammunition abroad; and Leſley ſtill kept up the character and title of general.

No ſooner did Traquaire receive his commiſſion, than he repaired to Edinburgh, where both a parliament and an aſſembly were held. They immediately paſſed a bill for aboliſhing epiſcopacy, and another for removing the grievances already mentioned. The king was greatly exaſperated at theſe precipitate proceedings, and Traquaire received orders to prorogue both the parliament and aſſembly; but his authority was diſregarded; they continued their ſeſſion, and ſent the bill they had paſſed to Charles for the royal aſſent, pretending that no prorogation could take place without the conſent of the eſtates of the kingdom in parliament aſſembled.

The aſſembly were no leſs violent in their proceedings than the parliament. They voted epiſcopacy to be unlawful in the church of Scotland: the king was willing to allow it contrary to the inſtitution of that church. They ſtigmatized the liturgy and canons as popiſh: he agreed ſimply to their being aboliſhed. They denominated the high commiſſion tyranny: he was willing to ſet it aſide. In ſhort, both the parliament and aſſembly were determined to oppoſe the meaſures of Charles; on which account, recourſe was again had to arms, and it was now ſuppoſed the ſword alone muſt determine the diſpute.

A. D. 1640. As Charles had diſbanded his army after the ſigning of the late pacification, a very conſiderable ſum of money was neceſſary for raiſing another, and the council were greatly perplexed to diſcover neceſſary ways and means for that purpoſe. The only conſtitutional method (by ſummoning a parliament) was thought a dangerous experiment; but the neceſſities of the crown were ſo preſſing, that it was determined to ſummon that aſſembly. It was, however, thought, that there was a neceſſity for ſtriking ſome bold, ſpeedy, and effectual blow, to intimidate the nobles; and that the parliamentary ſupplies would be too ſlow and uncertain to anſwer the purpoſe. The earl of Strafford, therefore, propoſed a ſubſcription, and generouſly opened it with twenty thouſand pounds. The young duke of Richmond followed his example, and ſubſcribed the ſame ſum. Their examples influenced many of the nobility and clergy; ſo that a large ſum was ſoon ſubſcribed, in order to enable the king to oppoſe his rebellious ſubjects.

The parliament met on the thirteenth of April, when the lord-keeper Finch informed them, that the king had been able to aſſemble and ſupport his army, not by any revenue he poſſeſſed, but by means of a large debt, amounting to three hundred thouſand pounds, which he had contracted, and for which he had given ſecurity upon the crown lands. He repreſented, that it was neceſſary to grant ſupplies for the urgent demands of his military armaments: that the ſeaſon was far advanced, the time precious, and that none of it muſt be loſt in deliberations: that though his coffers were empty, they had not been exhauſted by unneceſſary pomp, ſumptuous buildings, or any other kind of magnificence: that whatever ſupplies had been levied from his ſubjects had been employed for their advantage and preſervation; and, like vapors ariſing out of the earth and gathered into a cloud, had fallen in ſweet and refreſhing ſhowers on the ſame fields from which they had, at firſt, been exhaled: that though the king deſired ſuch immediate aſſiſtance, as might, for the time, prevent a total diſorder in the government, he was far from any intention of precluding them of their right to enquire into the ſtate of the kingdom, and to offer him petitions for the relief of their grievances: that as much as was poſſible of this ſeaſon ſhould be allowed them for that purpoſe: that as he expected only ſuch ſupplies at preſent as the current ſervice abſolutely required, it would be neceſſary to aſſemble them again next winter, when they ſhould have full leiſure to conclude whatever buſineſs had been left imperfect and unfiniſhed: that the parliament of Ireland had twice put ſuch truſt in his good intentions, as to grant him, in the beginning of the ſeſſion, a very large ſupply, and had always experienced good effects from the confidence repoſed in him: and that in every circumſtance his people ſhould find his conduct ſuitable to a juſt, pious, and gracious king, and ſuch as was calculated to promote an entire harmony between prince and parliament.

But theſe topics, however plauſible, produced not the deſired effect. The leaders of the diſcontented party began to foreſee the conſequences of the Scottiſh inſurrection, and to hope that the time ſo long wiſhed for was at hand, when royal authority muſt become wholly ſubordinate to popular aſſemblies; and when public liberty muſt acquire the full aſcendant. A reaſonable compliance with the meaſures of the court was now conſidered as ſlaviſh dependence; a regard for the king, ſervile flattery; a confidence in his promiſes, ſhameful proſtitution. It was hoped, that by reducing the crown to neceſſities, the king would be puſhed into violent meaſures, which could not fail of ſerving their purpoſes; and that by multiplying theſe neceſſities, his prerogative, undermined on all ſides, muſt at laſt be overthrown, and rendered no longer dangerous to the privileges of the people.

Full of theſe ſentiments, every meaſure that had a tendency to preſerve the government in its preſent form was zealouſly oppoſed by the popular leaders. Inſtead, therefore, of taking notice of the king's complaints againſt his Scottiſh ſubjects, or his applications for a ſupply, the houſe entered immediately upon grievances, and a ſpeech made by Pym upon that ſubject was much more attended to than the harangue delivered by the lord-keeper in the name of their ſovereign.

In conſequence of Pym's ſpeech the houſe divided the public grievances into three claſſes, namely, the infringement of parliamentary liberties, innovations in religion, and grievances againſt property and the common liberties of the kingdom. Each of theſe branches was referred to a proper committee; and it was determined to apply themſelves to remove the grievances of the nation, before they granted any ſupplies to his majeſty.

Charles was highly diſpleaſed at this perverſe behaviour of the commons; but he was more particularly exaſperated on hearing they intended to aboliſh ſhip-money, and all the other bracnhes of the revenue. Determined, however, to prevent any attempt of that kind, he went the next morning to the houſe of lords, and, having ſent for the commons, diſſolved the parliament.

During theſe tranſactions in England, the Scottiſh covenanters were not idle; they proceeded in their preparations with a ſpirit far above their ſtrength. The noblemen and gentry of that party ſtripped themſelves of every luxury, and the ladies of their jewels and ornaments, in order to ſupport the neceſſary expences of what they termed a holy war. Some of the fortifications of Edinburgh having fallen down, the covenanters not only refuſed to ſuffer them to be rebuilt, but openly oppoſed an order ſent by the king, for throwing in ſtores, proviſions, and ſoldiers, to reinforce that fortreſs. Men, women, and children, worked with amazing alacrity on the fortifications of Leith; and the covenanters having demanded that the caſtle of Edinburgh ſhould be delivered into their hands, declared Ruthven, the governor, a traitor, for refuſing to deliver up the fortreſs.

As Charles had not received any aſſiſtance from his parliament, he was now reduced to the neceſſity of calling upon his friends for their ſubſcriptions; and ſuch was their ardour, joined with that of the public, that in a few weeks no leſs than three hundred thouſand pounds were brought into the exchequer. This ſum, with the aſſiſtance he expected from Ireland, both of men and money, enabled him to purchaſe arms, erect magazines, and levy forces in every part of England. The earl of Northumberland was appointed general, the earl of Strafford lieutenant-general, and Conway general of the horſe. According to the original plan of this campaign, an army of twenty thouſand horſe was deſigned to act on the borders of Scotland near Berwick; ten thouſand foot and five hundred horſe were to be landed from Ireland, and to take poſſeſſion of the town of Aire, in Scotland; ten thouſand foot and five hundred horſe were to be ſent into the north of that kingdom; and a fleet of ſhips, having a conſiderable number of ſoldiers on board, were to ſail into the Frith of Forth.

In the mean time the Scottiſh covenanters were very aſſiduous in modelling their church, their ſtate, and their army, according to their own pleaſure, without the leaſt regard to the royal authority. They had blocked up the caſtle of Edinburgh, impriſoned ſeveral noblemen who were friends to the king; and a reſolution was taken, in a meeting at Edinburgh to march their army into England, under the command of Leſley their former general. Their parliament met on the ſeventh of June, purſuant to their former prorogation; and though an order was ſent down from the king to prorogue it for a longer time, the king's meſſage was diſregarded, under pretence of its being defective in form. They endeavoured to excuſe this proceeding in a letter to the ſecretary of ſtate; but added the ſevereſt menaces, if the king did not order Ruthven to deliver up the caſtle of Edinburgh, and withdraw his ſhips from their coaſt, where they did infinite prejudice to their commerce. They conſidered the diſſolution of the late parliament in England, as a proof of their ſtrength in that kingdom; and looked upon the queen, Laud, and Strafford, as the only enemies in the nation. This opinion, however unjuſt, gave them infinite ſpirits; and it is aſtoniſhing with what alacrity the gentry, the citizens, and even the lower ranks of people, threw their plate and money upon the tables of the covenant, taking only the bonds of the chiefs for their ſecurity.

Notwithſtanding the great aſſiſtance Charles had received from his friends, yet it was manifeſtly evident that the ſums already brought into the exchequer were very inſufficient to anſwer the expences of an offenſive war againſt Scotland. Recourſe was, therefore, had to a cabinet-council; the fatal reſult of which was, to employ the whole force of the prerogative in raiſing money. All the various oppreſſive methods already enumerated were accordingly employed in the moſt execrable manner. The feudal grievances were revived, knight-money was exacted, the tenants who held of the king in capite were unreaſonably taxed for men, horſes, and arms. Privy-ſeals were every where circulated for a loan; ſhip-money was rigorouſly exacted; cart and conduct-money for the ſoldiers was levied, under the empty promiſe, indeed, of re-payment. It was with great difficulty that Charles was diſſuaded by the merchants from ſeizing all the bullion in the Tower, and to content himſelf with forty thouſand pounds. Commiſſions were renewed for compounding with recuſants: patents, and pardons of all kinds, were ſold for money, and great quantities of India goods were purchaſed upon credit by the king's officers, and ſold at a vaſt diſcount for ready money. But what was of ſtill worſe conſequence to the royal cauſe, an order was iſſued, commanding the city of London to furniſh four thouſand men with cart and conduct-money for the expedition againſt Scotland. The lord mayor and aldermen were alſo ſummoned by the council to give in the names of ſuch citizens as were beſt able to lend the king two hundred thouſand pounds; and, upon refuſal, Sir Nicholas Rainton, and the aldermen Soams, Atkins, and Geere, were ſent to the Tower.

It is little to be wondered at that theſe violent meaſures ſhould produce an univerſal diſguſt. The very ſoldiers catched the infection, and repaired ſo unwillingly to the ſeveral places of rendezvous in the north, that in ſome of the towns they mutinied, and murdered their commanders, and in others were guilty of the greateſt diſorders. Notwithſtanding this, an army of twenty thouſand men was raiſed, and continued their march to the northward. In the mean time the earl of Northumberland was taken dangerouſly ill; and Strafford being lately recovered from a very alarming diſtemper, was unable to join the army; ſo that the active part of the command fell upon lord Conway, who was by no means equal to the taſk.

Though the Scots army was much more numerous than the king's, yet it was ſooner ready for action, and they were now advancing with great alacrity to the borders of England. To engage them to proceed, beſides their general knowledge of the diſcontents of the kingdom, lord Saville had forged a letter, in the name of ſix noblemen, the moſt conſiderable in England, in which the Scots were invited to aſſiſt their neighbours in procuring a redreſs of their grievances. But notwithſtanding theſe warlike preparations, the covenanters ſtill made uſe of the moſt pacific and ſubmiſſive language; and entered Enlgand, as they pretended, with no other view than that of obtaining acceſs to the king's preſence, and laying before him an humble petition for the relief of their grievances.

When the Scots army reached Newborne on the Tyne, they were oppoſed by a detachment of four thouſand five hundred men, under the command of lord Conway, who ſeemed determined to diſpute with them the paſſage of the river. The Scots firſt intreated them, with great civility, not to ſtop them in their march to their gracious ſovereign; but being refuſed, they attacked them with ſuch fury, that they gained the paſſage, and drove the Engliſh from their intrenchments. A panic now ſeized the whole army, and the forces left to defend Newcaſtle fled, with the utmoſt precepitation, to Durham; but not yet thinking themſelves ſafe, they left that city, and retreated into Yorkſhire.

The Scots, after their ſucceſs at Newborne, marched immediately to Newcaſtle; and though ſufficiently elated with their victory, they preſerved an exact diſcipline; well knowing, that if they acted otherwiſe, the people would become their enemies, join the king's army, and drive them back into their own country. They alſo diſpatched meſſengers to the king, who was now arrived at York; and were particularly careful, after the advantage they had obtained, to redouble their expreſſions of loyalty, duty, and ſubmiſſion to his perſon; and even made apologies for their late conqueſt over the Engliſh.

Charles was highly exaſperated at the proceedings of his Scottiſh ſubjects, but he was in no condition to chaſtiſe their inſolence. Surrounded by counſellors whom he dared not truſt; his exchequer empty, his ſpirits low, and his cauſe diſliked by the people, to what ſide could he turn for advice? When he mentioned war, and the chaſtiſement of the rebels, he met with coldneſs in every look of his peers, more expreſſive of diſapprobation than the moſt violent debate. Such ſullenneſs forced him to aſk counſel of his faithful Strafford, who frankly confeſſed he was for fighting the rebels. This advice was, doubtleſs, the beſt that Charles could have purſued at that critical juncture. Notwithſtanding the coldneſs of his peers, and the diſlike many of them entertained againſt Strafford, the Engliſh would have gladly revenged upon the Scots the inſult of invading their country. The refinements of the great had not reached their inferiors, and every man who could ſee or feel was touched with the indignity ſuffered by the Engliſh. The emptineſs of the exchequer was no argument againſt fighting, becauſe the two armies might have met in a few days, and the conteſt have been ſoon decided. Should the attempt have been unſucceſsful, Charles, even after the loſs of a battle, could not have been more diſtreſſed, or reduced to a more deplorable ſituation: on the contrary, it would, in all human probability, have ſo exaſperated the Engliſh, that they would have forgot, at leaſt for a time, their hatred of the court, and exerted all their efforts to take a dreadful revenge on their inſulting enemy. The marquis of Hamilton retained ſtill his pacific ſentiments; he trembled for the danger of his native country ſhould the king be victorious; and for his majeſty's ſituation, ſhould the Scots ſucceed. He was therefore very earneſt for concluding a treaty; and was ſo well ſeconded by the reſt of the council, that Charles determined to embrace pacific meaſures.

While theſe things were tranſacting in the Engliſh council, the Scots actually gave themſelves over for loſt, and the heads of the army held ſeveral conſultations on the moſt eligible meaſures to be purſued in this alarming criſis. It was even propoſed to throw themſelves entirely upon the king's mercy, and to give up the names of the Engliſh, who had not only encouraged, but invited them to invade their country. They were, however, diverted from this reſolution, by intelligence received from their friends in the Engliſh camp; but it was not without difficulty they were perſuaded to continue in their preſent ſituation, and to endeavour to conciliate the friendſhip of the Londoners by ſome ſignal act of kindneſs. They wrote a very affectionate letter from Newcaſtle to the mayor and aldermen of London, inviting them to continue the Newcaſtle trade, and aſſuring them of all imaginable ſecurity. This was a very prudent and ſucceſsful meaſure, and induced the citizens to ſend a petition to his majeſty for calling a parliament; and ſoon after, twelve noblemen preſented a petition to the ſame purpoſe. As theſe petitions ſeemed to expreſs the ſenſe of the whole nation, Charles iſſued writs for the meeting of the parliament on the third of November.

In the mean time Charles ſummoned a great council of the peers at York. They met on the 24th of September, when the king opened the aſſembly with a ſpeech, in which he demanded their advice with regard to two particulars of the utmoſt importance, What anſwer was proper to be given to the rebels, and in what manner they were to be treated? And what methods muſt be uſed for raiſing money till a parliamentary ſupply could be obtained? After various debates, it was reſolved to name commiſſioners for treating with the Scots; and fourteen noblemen, all of them profeſſed friends to moderate meaſures, were named as commiſſioners. It was firſt propoſed, as moſt conſiſtent with the king's dignity, that the conferences ſhould be held at York; but the Scots, not ſo much from any real apprehenſion they entertained of danger, as to increaſe the popular odium againſt Strafford, refuſed to meet in a place where he had any power, and Rippon was accordingly appointed for that purpoſe. With regard to the king's ſecond queſtion, it was propoſed to borrow two hundred thouſand pounds of the city of London: but this loan could not be obtained till the peers aſſembled at York joined in the requeſt.

When the conferences were opened at Rippon, the Scots commiſſioners, after propoſing ſome inſolent preliminaries, demanded 40,000l. per month for the ſubſiſtence of their army during the treaty. Charles would very gladly have conſented to the diſbanding of both armies, but could not prevail, and ſoon perceived that nothing advantageous to him could reſult from the conference at Rippon. He therefore made an another attempt to remove the meeting to York, where the great council of peers were ſtill ſitting; but was again diſappointed through the obſtinacy of the Scots. Some of the Engliſh noblemen, exaſperated at their inſolent behaviour, adviſed Charles to break up the conferences, and fortify himſelf in York, where he might be able to ſet his enemies at defiance, and, in all probability, render their expedition abortive. This was, indeed, the only expedient Charles could have taken to ſupport his own authority; but the majority of the council were of a different opinion, and it was therefore rejected.

Though the conferences ſtill continued at Rippon, yet they were carried on in ſo languid a manner, that the commiſſioners ſeemed to meet rather to conſult meaſures then to ſettle differences. The Scots, who were very aſſiduous in careſſing the Engliſh, ſolemnly proteſted, that they intended nothing more than to concur with the parliament in limiting the prerogative, in circumſcribing the high claims of the clergy, in chaſtiſing the inſolence of the papiſts, and in ſettling the conſtitution of the two kingdoms upon free and equitable principles. Nothing but the facility of the Engliſh commiſſioners could have given the Scots ſuch conſiderable advantages on this occaſion, though it muſt be admitted they behaved with great addreſs. They had treated Wilmot, and other Engliſh officers taken priſoners at Newborne, with the utmoſt politeneſs; and after giving them the higheſt ideas of their courage, reſolution, diſcipline, and good intentions, ſent them back to the Engliſh camp. This behaviour was of the utmoſt conſequence to their affairs, which were far from being in ſo promiſing a condition as the public imagined. The earl of Montroſe had kept up a ſecret correſpondence with the king; and one of his letters, either through accident or treachery, fell into the hands of Leſley, the Scottiſh general. This affair was at once both alarming and delicate. The Scots were particularly deſirous of carrying on their deſigns with an air of candour, in conjunction with their Engliſh friends; but the reputation of Montroſe, the moſt able officer they had, together with the ſenſe of his ſervices, which were far ſuperior to thoſe of any other nobleman, rendered him dear to the whole army. His correſpondence with the king, after the many profeſſions of loyalty the Scots had made for his majeſty's perſon, could not, with any appearance of juſtice, be deemed treaſonable; but, at the ſame time, the heads of the covenanters were convinced that he had abandoned their cauſe. Montroſe ſoon perceived that his correſpondence was diſcovered, by his being no longer admitted to the private conſultations and councils of war held by the other general officers; but he took no pains either to conceal or excuſe the fact: he openly avowed and juſtified it. Leſley was for bringing him to a court-martial, and putting him to death; but the other noblemen were more cautious: they knew that the ſoldiers loved Montroſe, and the loſs of their leader might make ſuch a diviſion in their army as might prove their ruin.

Charles was reduced to ſo unfortunate a ſituation, that he could take no advantage even of this favourable incident. His own commiſſioners preſſed him to remove the conferences from Rippon to London, and he was obliged to comply, though he was very ſenſible of the great advantages the Scots would receive from it. A ceſſation of arms was alſo agreed to, by which the Scots were aſſured of maintenance for their army, and the river Tees was made the boundary between both parties.

The above ceſſation was ſigned on the 26th of October, and the next day Charles repaired to London, in order to attend the new parliament, which, according to appointment, aſſembled on the 3d of November. The king opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne; but this was little regarded by the commons, who were determined to liſten only to meaſures for redreſſing national grievances, and reſtraining the royal prerogative. They forgot the reſpect and ſubmiſſion due to the ſovereign, and determined to eſtabliſh a new ſyſtem of government, under the ſpecious pretence of reſtoring the antient conſtitution. Intereſt, ambition, cabals, and, above all, fanaticiſm, united their formidable influence with that patriotic zeal, which, while it was contending for liberty, threw the whole nation into a flame.

The earl of Strafford was too much devoted to the intereſts of his maſter, too vigilant, and too firm in his adminiſtration, not to be univerſally hated by the popular leader. Pym began the attack againſt him in a long ſtudied ſpeech, divided into many heads, wherein he enumerated all the grievances under which the nation laboured; and inferred, from a complication of ſuch oppreſſions, that a deliberate plan had been laid for changing entirely the form of government, and ſubverting the ancient laws and liberties of the kingdom. "Could any thing (ſaid he) increaſe our indignation againſt ſo enormous and criminal a project, it would be to find, that, during the reign of the beſt of princes, the conſtitution has been endangered by the worſt of miniſters, and that the virtues of the king have been ſeduced by wicked and pernicious counſels. We muſt enquire (continued he) from what fountain theſe waters of bitterneſs flow: and though, doubtleſs, many evil counſellors will be found to have contributed their endeavours, yet there is one who challenges the infamous pre-eminence, and who, by his courage, enterprize, and capacity, is entitled to the firſt place among the betrayers of his country; I mean the earl of Strafford, lieutenant of Ireland, and preſident of the council of York, who, in both places, and in all other provinces where he has been intruſted with authority, has raiſed ample monuments of tyranny, and will appear, from a ſurvey of his actions, to be the chief promoter of every arbitrary counſel." He proceeded to enumerate ſome particulars of imperious actions and expreſſions; and then entered on a more perſonal attack of that miniſter, and endeavoured to expoſe his whole character and manners. At laſt the orator concluded, that it belonged to the houſe to provide a remedy proportioned to the diſeaſe, and to prevent further miſchiefs, which might otherwiſe be juſtly apprehended from the influence he had acquired over the meaſures and counſels of their ſovereign.

Pym was not the only one who ſpoke with the greateſt vehemence againſt Strafford; ſeveral others harangued to the ſame purpoſe; and it was at length moved, that the miniſter ſhould be impeached of high treaſon. This motion was received with univerſal applauſe; nor was there a ſingle perſon who ſpoke in his favour. Lord Falkland alone, though known to be his enemy, modeſtly deſired the houſe to conſider, whether it would not be more conformable to the gravity of their proceedings, firſt to digeſt, by a committee, many of thoſe particulars that had been mentioned, before they ventured to ſend an accuſation againſt him to the lords. But this was over-ruled, the accuſation was voted, and Pym choſen to carry up the impeachment, and was followed by the greater part of the commons. Strafford was in the houſe of peers when Pym brought up the impeachment. The lords ſeemed almoſt as much prejudiced againſt him as the commons, for all the favour he could obtain was to be heard in his place. He urged how unreaſonable it was, upon a general charge, unſupported by evidence, to deprive him of liberty, which was in itſelf a puniſhment, before any crime had been proved againſt him; and how dangerous a precedent to the peerage itſelf they would eſtabliſh, by admitting ſuch precipitate meaſures. But theſe conſiderations, however juſt, had very little weight with the houſe: the earl was committed to the cuſtody of the black rod, till a more particular charge ſhould be exhibited againſt him.

The commons having been thus ſucceſsful againſt a man who was conſidered as their capital enemy, they proceeded to conſider more particularly the grievances of the nation, which they reduced under the following heads: Privilege of parliament; prejudice of religion; and liberty of the ſubject.

Under the firſt head were reckoned, 1. Reſtraining the members of parliament from ſpeaking. 2. Forbidding the ſpeaker to put a queſtion. 3. Impriſoning divers members for matters done in parliament. 4. Proceeding againſt them in inferior courts. 5. Enjoining their good behaviour, and continuing them in priſon till death. 6. Abrupt diſſolutions of parliament.

Under the ſecond head were mentioned, 1. The ſuſpenſion of the laws againſt perſons profeſſing the popiſh religion. 2. Their places of truſt and honor in the common-wealth. 3. Their free reſort to London, and the court, to communicate their counſels and deſigns. 4. Their being permitted to have a nuncio here, to execute the orders of the pope.

Under innovations in religion were enumerated, 1. Maintenance of popiſh tenets in books, ſermons, and diſputes. 2. Practices of popiſh ceremonies countenanced and enjoined, as altars, crucifixes, and images. 3. Diſcouragements of proteſtants, by rigid proſecutions of the ſcrupulous, for things indifferent; no vice being conſidered ſo great as non-conformity. 4. Encroachment of eccleſiaſtical juriſdiction.

Under the third head were claſſed the grievances. 1. By tonnage and poundage unduly taken. 2. Compoſition for knighthood. 3. The unparaleled grievance of ſhip-money. 4. Enlargement of the foreſts beyond due bounds. 5. Selling of nuiſances, by compounding for them. 6. The commiſſion for building. 7. The commiſſion for depopulation. 8. Unlawful military charges, by warrant of the king, letters of the council, and orders of the lieutenants of the counties, and their deputies. 9. Extra-judicial declarations of judges, without hearing counſel or argument. 10. Monopoliſts countenanced by the council-table, and juſtices of the peace required to aſſiſt them. 11. The ſtar-chamber court. 12. The king's edicts and proclamations lately uſed for maintaining monopolies. 13. The ambitious and corrupt clergy preaching divine authority, and abſolute power in kings to act as they pleaſe. 14. The intermiſſion of parliaments.

From theſe heads it appeared ſufficiently evident, that a total alteration in government was intended, and this intention was ſupported by ſpeeches enforced by all the learning and eloquence of that age. Almoſt every county in England had its peculiar grievances, which were preſented to the houſe by members, many of whom were afterwards the firmeſt friends to the king, and ſuffered deeply in his cauſe. Thoſe who were the warmeſt aſſerters of the king's legal prerogative, inveighed with the greateſt vehemence againſt its abuſe. Among others, Mr. Capel, who afterwards fell a victim to his loyalty, expatiated in the warmeſt manner on the grievances of the county of Hertford, which he repreſented in parliament. Hyde, afterwards lord Clarendon, and Falkland, were alſo in this number: but in their ultimate views and intentions, they differed widely from the majority, though they were equally deſirous of removing the real grievances of the nation, and of placing proper bounds to the royal prerogative.

The proceedings of the commons were highly countenanced by the lords. Among others, lord Digby inveighed with great warmth againſt the oppreſſions of the court. But other matters, for ſome time, engaged the attention of parliament. Sir Thomas Rowe having made a report concerning the treaty with the Scots, it appeared, that a contribution of eight hundred and fifty pounds a day had, for a very conſiderable time, been levied on the inhabitants of the north, and they had petitioned his majeſty for relief in the moſt affecting terms. From theſe complaints, it was ſuſpected, that they were unable to ſupport this heavy contribution; and it was known that the Scots had declared, they ſhould conſider the ceſſation of payment as an infraction of the treaty; and that they ſhould be then at liberty to paſs the river Tees, and advance farther into the heart of England.

From this ſhort ſtate of the caſe, the lord-keeper, in a conference between the two houſes, endeavoured to prove, that as the lords commiſſioners were the firſt that adviſed the ceſſation of arms, the miſeries of the country, in conſequence of that meaſure, could not be attributed to the king. This being premiſed, he admitted the neceſſity of providing for the Scottiſh army, but, at the ſame time, enlarged on the abſurdity of ſuffering that of the king to ſtarve, or be diſbanded; becauſe Yorkſhire, and ſeveral of the beſt counties in England, would, by that means, be wholly expoſed to the ravages of an inveterate and rapacious enemy. The commons, however, were of a very different opinion: they had already ſhewn ſome diſguſt at an expreſſion in his majeſtys's ſpeech at the opening of the ſeſſion, in which he had termed them traitors, and had called one of their own members to the bar of the houſe for making uſe of the ſame expreſſion. They were even ſo far from cenſuring the lords commiſſioners at Rippon, that it was reſolved upon the queſtion, "That this houſe doth approve of the perſons of thoſe lords that were commiſſioners in the late treaty of Rippon, to be commiſſioners now to treat with the Scotch commiſſioners; with this declaration, that no concluſion of their's ſhall bind the commons without their conſent in parliament." The houſe could not, however, with any appearance of decency, refuſe to provide for the royal, as well as for the rebel army. But it was ſufficiently apparent, that the former was not an object of their favour. They appointed a committee to conſider the ſtate of the king's army, and what commanders, or other inferior officers, were papiſts; to conſider of the ſtate of the northern counties; and how the money, after being raiſed, might, with convenience and diſpatch, be ſent into the north.

In the mean time the Scottiſh commiſſioners were arrived in London, where they were received as the guardian angels of the rights and liberties of the people. They were attended by Henderſon, and other fanatical preachers; and the church of St. Antholin was appointed for the place of their devotions. It was amazing to ſee the propenſity of the public for this new religion: multitudes of all ranks crowded into the church. Thoſe who were ſo happy as to find acceſs early in the morning, kept their places the whole day; and others, who were excluded, clung to the doors and windows, in hopes of catching at leaſt ſome broken murmurs of the holy rhetoric. All the eloquence of parliament, now well refined from pedantry, animated with the ſpirit of liberty, and employed in the moſt important intereſts of the nation, was attended to with much leſs avidity than theſe lectures, delivered with ridiculous cant, and a provincial accent, full of barbariſm and ignorance.

The commons were now very aſſiduous in providing for the ſubſiſtance of the two armies; and becauſe ſubſidies would be levied too ſlowly for ſo urgent an occaſion, money was borowed from the city on the ſecurity of ſome particular members. Two ſubſidies, a very ſmall ſum, not more than an hundred thouſand pounds, were at firſt voted; the intention of this ſupply being only to indemnify the members, who by their private had ſupported public credit.

From the conduct of the Scotch commiſſioners it ſoon appeared that they came rather to conſult meaſures with their friends, than to finiſh the treaty. It was ſufficiently evident, that the Scots had proceeded much farther than they originally intended, which was nothing more than that of forming and ſecuring the conſtitution of their country; but this was rather owing to the arts of the mal-contents in England than their own. The great aim of the popular leaders was to protract the treaty, though that could not be effected but at the enormous expence of maintaining at leaſt forty thouſand men in a country already exhauſted. The commons, indeed, made no ſecret of retaining theſe invaders of their country till all their enemies were ſuppreſſed, and all their purpoſes effected. "We cannot ſpare the Scots (ſaid Strode plainly in the houſe) the ſons of Zeruiah are ſtill too ſtrong for us."

The commons appointed a committee to conſider of the ſtate of the nation, and the members were to be directed in their proceedings by the petitions againſt grievances, ſent up by different counties. Religion was one of the principal ingredients in the compoſition of the remonſtrance intended to be drawn up by this committee, and it was reſolved to accuſe

Windebank of high-treaſon, for the many ſervices and favours, which he, as ſecretary of ſtate, had conferred on prieſts and papiſts. Windebank ſaw their intention; but affected ſuch a firmneſs of reſolution, that the commons imagined he would make a ſtand againſt all the power of their indignation; but being interrupted by a meſſage from the lords, when they were on the point of declaring him a traitor to his country, he took the opportunity of leaving the houſe, and made his eſcape to the continent.

Several violent repreſentations were made againſt the uſurpations of the clergy; and it was reſolved to purge the army of papiſts, to preſent the names of recuſants, to examine the high commiſſion courts of Canterbury and York, and to enquire into the proceedings of the late convocation, or, as the clergy themſelves had termed it, the holy and ſacred ſynod. Theſe reſolutions were hardly finiſhed when alderman Pennington preſented to the houſe, a petition ſubſcribed by above fifteen hundred perſons in the city of London, againſt the hierarchy and government of the church of England, by archbiſhops, biſhops, deans, and arch-deacons, praying the houſe, "that the ſaid government, with all its dependencies, roots, and branches, might be aboliſhed; and all laws in their behalf made null and void." A ſchedule was annexed to this petition, conſiſting of twenty-eight articles, in which were contained all the common-place objections to the epiſcopal hierarchy, whether founded on the pretended unlawfulneſs of the order itſelf, or the abuſes and vices of thoſe who compoſed it.

Four days after the above petition was preſented, the houſe came to the following reſolutions:

1. That the clergy of England, convened in any convocation, or ſynod, or otherwiſe, have no power to make any conſtitutions, canons, or acts whatſoever, in matter of doctrine, diſcipline or otherwiſe, to bind the clergy, or laity of this land, without the common conſent of parliament.

2. That the ſeveral conſtitutions and canons eccleſiaſtical, paſſed with the conſent and approbation of his majeſty, in the laſt ſynod, do not bind either the clergy or laity of this kingdom.

3. That theſe canons and conſtitutions eccleſiaſtical eſtabliſhed with the king's conſent in the laſt ſynod, contain in them many matters contrary to the king's prerogative, to the fundamental laws and ſtatutes of this realm, to the rights of parliaments, and to the property and liberty of the ſubject; and alſo matters tending to ſedition and dangerous conſequence.

4. That the ſeveral grants of the benevolence, or contribution, granted to his majeſty by the the laſt ſynod, are contrary to the laws, and ought not to bind the clergy."

Theſe reſolutions were followed by ſeveral ſevere ſpeeches againſt Laud, archbiſhop of Canterbury, particularly one by Mr. Grimſtone. He accuſed the primate of having introduced the earl of Strafford to his majeſty, and procuring the poſt of ſecretary for Windebank, whom he termed "the very broker and pander to the whore of Babylon." He upbraided him for having advanced Montague, Manwaring, and other prelates, ſuſpected of popery; and laſtly, he accuſed him of being the main ſpring and promoter of all the deteſtable projects and monopolies that had proved ſo oppreſſive to the ſubject. Several others ſpoke nearly to the ſame purpoſe, and it was at laſt voted, that Mr. Hollis ſhould go up to the lords with a meſſage, "To accuſe William Laud, archbiſhop of Canterbury of high-treaſon, in the name of the commons of England, and to deſire he might be immediately ſequeſtered from parliament, and committed; and that the houſe, in a convenient time would offer particular accuſations againſt him."

The requeſt of the commons was immediately complied with, and the primate was ordered to withdraw, but he requeſted to be heard a word in his place. This being complied with, he began with proteſting his innocency, and added, that he was perſuaded, there was not a member in the houſe of commons, who believed, in his heart, that he was a traitor. He was called to order for that expreſſion by the earl of Eſſex, who obſerved, that the primate had ſeverely reflected on the houſe of commons, by affirming they had brought him in guilty of a charge, which they themſelves did not believe. Laud was deſirous of retracting this indiſcretion, which had eſcaped him without mature deliberation; but the peers were ſo little favourable to his cauſe, that they refuſed to grant him even this ſmall indulgence. He was immediately ſequeſtered from parliament, and committed to the Tower.

The next grievance the commons took into conſideration was that of ſhip-money, when ſeveral animated ſpeeches were made on the occaſion, and it was reſolved, "that the charge impoſed upon the ſubjects of this kingdom, for the providing and furniſhing of ſhips, and the aſſeſſments for raiſing of money for that purpoſe, commonly called ſhip-money, are againſt the laws of the realm, the ſubjects right of property, and contrary to former reſolutions in parliament, and to the petition of right." This reſolution was followed by others, which condemned the extra-judicial determination of the judges upon ſhip-money, publiſhed in the ſtar-chamber, and al writs iſſued for paying that obnoxious and arbitrary tax.

From the minute inſpection of the commons into national grievances, it was apprehended by ſome of the members that the king might be prevailed on to diſſolve the parliament, cruſh their proceedings, and attempt to reduce England into a deſpotic government. To prevent this, no meaſure was thought ſ proper as ſome poſitive, conſtitutional act, which might render the calling of parliaments leſs precarious, and more frequent. Many ſpecious arguments, beſides thoſe drawn from the circumſtances of thi important criſis, were urged with great force and eloquence. Parliaments, in former times, regularl met once a year, and it could not be any unreaſonable conceſſion in the crown to bring the conſtitutio ſo far back to its firſt principles, as to paſs an act fo triennial parliaments. This bill was ſtrongly ſuppor ed by lord Digby, ſon to the earl of Briſtol. H appealed for the truth of what he urged to the violations of the petition of right, which had happene through the diſcontinuance of parliaments. "L majeſty (ſaid he) hear our complaints ever ſo co paſſionately; let him purge away our grievances ev ſo efficaciouſly; let him puniſh and expel ill miniſte ever ſo exemplarily; let him make choice of go ones ever ſo exactly: if there be not a way ſettled preſerve and keep them good, the miſchiefs will grow again like Sampſon's locks, and pull down t houſe upon our heads.

"The people of England (continued he) cann open their ears, their hearts, their mouths, or th purſes, to his majeſty, but in parliament. We c neither hear him, acknowledge, nor give, but the This bill, Mr. Speaker, is the ſole key that c open the way to thoſe reciprocal endearments, wh muſt make and perpetuate the happineſs of the ki and kingdom. Let no man object any derogati from the king's prerogative by it: we only preſent bill; it muſt be made a law by our ſovereign; honour and his power will be as conſpicuous in co manding at once, that a parliament ſhall aſſem every third year, as in commanding a parliament aſſemble this or that year: there is more majeſty in ordaining primary and univerſal cauſes, than in the actuating of ſubordinate effects.

"I do not doubt but that the glorious king Edward III. when he made thoſe laws for the yearly calling of parliaments, did it with a right ſenſe of his dignity and honour: the truth is, the kings of England are never in their glory, their ſplendor, their majeſtic ſovereignty but in parliament. Where is the power of impoſing taxes? Where is the legiſlative authority? In the king, Mr. Speaker, but how? In the king, encircled and environed by his parliament. Out of the parliament the king has only a limited power, a circumſcribed juriſdiction; but, waited on by his parliament, no monarch of the eaſt is ſo abſolute in diſpelling grievances. In chaſing away bad miniſters, we do nothing more than diſſipate clouds that may gather again; but in voting this bill, we ſhall contribute, as far as is in our power, to the perpetuating our ſun, our ſovereign, in his vertical, in his noon-day luſtre."

Theſe were the ſentiments of that great man, lord Digby, who thought the preſervation of liberty far from being incompatible with that of loyalty; that a king of England could be great only by ruling over a free people; and that the people could be no longer free than the king was great. But he believed, and believed with reaſon, that Charles had imbibed falſe notions of royal greatneſs, and that he ſought to make that perſonal which was only political. That a king of England can do no ill was an allowed maxim in the conſtitution; but that his miniſters may, and that they may be puniſhed for it, was equally allowed. Charles, while he was able to keep the ſeat of power, ſupported the firſt of theſe maxims, but was willing to evade the latter. He endeavoured to ſcreen his miniſters, and by this prepoſterous conduct, at laſt, received in his own breaſt that popular reſentment which was originally aimed at thoſe whom he had ſo injudiciouſly protected, and which at laſt brought him to an unhappy exit.

The more the commons proceeded in their inquiry into grievances, the more they multiplied. The truth is, there was a party in the houſe of commons, who laboured aſſiduouſly to diſcover grievances, and ſought rather to propagate than extinguiſh them. Every unthinking court divine, every buſy officer, and every imprudent perſon who was honoured with a commiſſion in the army or navy, who ſpoke with warmth for ceremonies in religion, or deſpotiſm in the ſtate, were called before the commons, and their follies or offences obliquely charged upon the court. The ſervants of the high commiſſion court, the ſtar chamber, and other officers, where illegal or other arbitrary meaſures had been purſued, were condemned to make ſatisfaction to the injured parties, and ſometimes corporally puniſhed. By theſe, and other artful meaſures, the anger of the houſe againſt the late grievances was kept up perpetually, without admitting a calm hour for reflection, or making the leaſt allowance for natural infirmity, miſtakes, or miſrepreſentations.

During theſe violent proceedings the king remained entirely paſſive. The few ſervants who continued faithful to him were ſeized with aſtoniſhment at the rapid progreſs made by the commons in power and popularity, and were glad, by their inactive and inoffenſive behaviour, to compound for impunity. Charles ordered both houſes of parliament to attend him at Whitehall, where he complained ſtrongly of their ſlow proceedings, and recommended to them the better ſupport of the two armies, the forts and the navy. He profeſſed, in very earneſt terms, his deſire of their perfecting the reformation they had begun; but, at the ſame time, wiſhed them not to make any alteration in the eſtabliſhed government. "You have (ſaid he) taken the whole machine of government to pieces; a practice frequent with ſkilful artiſts, when they deſire to clear the wheels from any ruſt which may have grown upon them. The engine may again be reſtored to its former uſe and motions, provided it be put up entire, ſo that not a pin be wanting." But this was far from the intention of the commons; they were perſuaded that the machine was incumbered with many wheels and ſprings which retarded and croſſed it's operations, and prevented it's utility. Happy would it have been for themſelves, and happy for the kingdom had they proceeded with moderation, and been contented with their preſent plenitude of power, to remove ſuch parts only as might juſtly be deemed ſuperfluous and incongruous.

The petition preſented by alderman Pennington againſt the government of the church had hitherto lain dormant; the attempt was thought too dangerous, and the leaders of the oppoſition determined to proceed with caution. They accordingly introduced a bill for prohibiting all clergymen from exerciſing any civil office. One of the conſequences of this bill would have been a deprivation of the biſhops of their ſeats in the houſe of peers; but it was ſoon diſcovered, that though this meaſure was very acceptable to the zealous commons, who obſerved, with regret, the firm attachment of that order to the crown, it was not generally approved; for when the bill was preſented to the peers, it was rejected by a great majority. This was the firſt check the commons had met with in their popular career; and ſufficiently informed them of the oppoſition they muſt expect to meet with from the upper houſe, whoſe inclinations and intereſt could never be totally ſeparated from their ſovereign.

The commons now brought in a bill for granting his majeſty the duties of tonnage and poundage for a limited time; but they took the utmoſt care, in the preamble, to aſſert their own right of beſtowing this gift, and to diveſt the crown of all independent title of aſſuming it. And that they might increaſe, or rather finally fix, the entire dependence and ſubjection of the king, they voted theſe duties only for two months; and afterwards renewed their grant, from time to time, by very ſhort periods.

Charles readily paſſed the bill for tonnage and poundage, but it was not without manifeſt reluctance he gave the royal aſſent to that for triennial parliaments. By this bill it was enacted, that if the chancellor, who was bound under ſevere penalties, failed to iſſue writs by the third of September, every third year, any twelve or more of the peers ſhould be empowered to exert this authority: in default of the peers, the ſheriffs, mayors, bailiffs, &c. ſhould ſummon the voters: and, in their default, the voters themſelves ſhould meet, and proceed to the election of members, in the ſame manner as if writs had been regularly iſſued from the crown: nor could the parliament, after it was aſſembled, be diſſolved in leſs than fifty days. As this act, however neceſſary to prevent the diſuſe of parliaments, retrenched ſome of the nobleſt and moſt valuable prerogatives of the crown, it is no wonder that the king was unwilling to paſs it into a law; eſpecially as theſe aſſemblies had lately eſtabliſhed it as a maxim, to carry their ſcrutiny into every part of government. But finding nothing leſs would ſatisfy the houſe of commons, he came to the houſe of lords, and gave it the royal aſſent. Solemn thanks were returned to his majeſty by both houſes for this mark of condeſcenſion; and the greateſt rejoicings were made in every part of the kingdom.

A. D. 1641. The earl of Strafford was ſtill in cuſtody, and Charles, ever ſince his impriſonment, had laboured inceſſantly to ſave his life. He attempted to mollify, by every indulgence, the rage of his moſt inveterate proſecutors, and was willing to make almoſt any ſacrifice to obtain his wiſhes. But he laboured in vain: The reputation of that nobleman for experience and capacity was ſo well eſtabliſhed, that the members of the oppoſition were perſuaded, if he eſcaped their vengeance, he muſt regain his aſcendancy in the adminiſtration; and conſequently, that his death was the only ſecurity for the eſtabliſhment of their preſent power, and for ſucceſs in their future enterpriſes. They therefore puſhed on his impeachment with the utmoſt vigour; and after long and ſolemn preparations, it was brought to a final iſſue.

Weſtminſter-hall was formed into a ſpacious court of judicature for this important trial; the earl of Arundel preſided as high ſteward, the peers ſat in their robes as judges, the commons appeared as accuſers, and therefore it was determined that the impeachment ſhould be managed by commoners. Accordingly, George lord Digby, an Iriſh peer, John Hambden, John Pym, Oliver St. John, Sir Walter Earle, Geoffrey Palmer, John Maynard, and John Glynn, were appointed a committee for this important office, and Whitlock was choſen their chairman. The biſhops, agreeable to the precepts of the canon law, which forbid their aſſiſting at any trial for life, withdrew; being unwilling, by any oppoſition, to irritate the commons, who were already too much prejudiced againſt them. At the upper end of the hall was a chair and cloth of ſtate for the king; and on each ſide a cloſe gallery, in which the king and queen, who attended during the whole trial, ſat in private.

The trial began on the twenty-ſecond of March; and the articles of impeachment, which conſiſted of twenty-eight in number, were exhibited againſt him with all the virulence of the moſt inveterate malice, ſupported by the united efforts of the three kingdoms. But though the earl ſtood alone againſt this formidable combination, unaſſiſted by counſel, and diſcountenanced by authority, yet ſuch was the capacity, genius, and preſence of mind, which this magnanimous ſtateſman diſplayed on the occaſion, that while argument, reaſon, and law, had any place, he obtained an undiſputed victory. And he periſhed at laſt by the open violence of his unrelenting enemies.

The accuſation and defence laſted eighteen days, and Strafford, in his replies, was obliged to preſerve a reſpect for his moſt implacable enemies, the Scottiſh nation and the Iriſh parliament. The managers divided the ſeveral articles among them, and attacked the priſoner with all the weight of authority, with all the vehemence of rhetoric, with all the accuracy of long preparation. Strafford, on the contrary, took only a very ſhort time to recollect himſelf on each article, yet he alone, without the leaſt aſſiſtance, mixing modeſty and humility with firmneſs and vigour, foiled all their attempts, and baffled all their proceedings.

Nothing had hitherto appeared againſt him to juſtify the charge of treaſon. Indeed, the charge itſelf was founded on a kind of accumulative or conſtructive evidence, by which many actions, either totally innocent in themſelves, or criminal in a very trifling degree, might, when put together, ſubject the perſon to the higheſt penalties inflicted by the law.

But notwithſtanding the commons endeavoured to ſupport their accuſation on this new method of proceeding, they well knew that the famous ſtatute of Edward III. had enumerated every kind of treaſon, and that every other crime, except ſuch as are there expreſsly mentioned, is carefully excluded from that denomination. They, therefore, under pretence of defending liberty, were endeavouring to reverſe a ſtatute the beſt calculated for the ſecurity of that invaluable bleſſing.

The ſpeech which Strafford made on this occaſion, does honour to human abilities; nor perhaps can hiſtory produce any performance equal to it, in the perſpicuity of language and ſtrength of reaſoning, in ſtating, clearing or evading controverted evidences and facts, in extenuating ſome charges, in confuting others, and in following a ſubtle adverſary through all the mazes of a long and complicated impeachment. In all the argumentative part of this noble ſpeech, the earl confined his language only to the facts themſelves; but when he came to repel the arguments of the commons to make the bill amount to treaſon, he gave himſelf a much greater latitude, and diſplayed ſuch an amazing ſtrength both of ſtyle and reaſoning, as at once aſtoniſhed and affected the audience.

You will be pleaſed to " pardon my infirmities. Something I ſhould have " ſaid, but I ſee I ſhall not be able, and, therefore, " I ſhall leave it.

" And now, my lords, I thank God I have been, " by his bleſſing, ſufficiently inſtructed in the ex" treme vanity of all temporary enjoyments, com" pared to the importance of our eternal duration. " And ſo, my lords, even ſo, with all tranquillity of " mind, I ſubmit clearly and freely to your judg" ment; and whether that righteous doom ſhall be " to life or death, I ſhall repoſe myſelf, full of grati" tude and confidence, in the arms of the great au" thor of my exiſtence."

The commons were now ſufficiently convinced that t would be impoſſible ever to attain their purpoſes gainſt Strafford by any legal proſecution. But his eath was conſidered of too great importance to be ſt unaccompliſhed. A bill of attainder was therere introduced into the lower houſe, immediately fter the concluſion of theſe pleadings, which paſſed at houſe on the twenty-firſt of April, after very arm debates, fifty-nine votes only diſſenting, and as immediately ſent up to the lords. On the firſt of lay the king went to the houſe of peers, and, in a peech, earneſtly requeſted both houſes that they ould not carry their proſecutions againſt the earl of trafford to the utmoſt extremity; declaring upon his nſcience, that he could not condemn him of high eaſon; but aſſured them, that for his miſdemeanors ſhould never ſerve him, or the kingdom, in any ace of truſt, " no not ſo much as a conſta- e."

This ſpeech was highly offenſive to thoſe who irſted for the blood of Strafford; and they were ſo gilant in the purſuits of their deſigns, that the com- ns voted it a breach of privilege for the king to ke notice of any bill depending before the houſe. the ſame time they employed their emiſſaries with- t doors to diſperſe, in different parts of London, pers, containing the names of the fifty-nine mem- rs who voted againſt the bill of attainder. Thoſe mes were alſo fixed up at public places under the nomination of Straffordians and betrayers of their untry, and thus expoſed to the fury of the multitude, o were arrived to ſuch a pitch of madneſs, that, the third of May, great numbers from the city ap- ared at Weſtminſter, armed with ſwords and dgels, crying out for juſtice againſt the earl of Straf- d; and ſuch as were ſuppoſed to be the friends of t unfortunate nobleman were afraid to appear in blic.

About eighty peers had conſtantly attended the l of Strafford; but ſo much were they intimidated by the popular tumult, that only forty-nine were in the houſe of lords when the bill of attainder was introduced, yet even nineteen of theſe had the courage to vote againſt it; a ſtrong proof that, had liberty of debate been allowed, the bill would have been rejected by a great majority.

A diſcovery, which was made about this time, greatly heightened the fury of the people, and haſtened the fate of the devoted Strafford. Some principal officers of the king's army, partly from their attachment to the crown, and partly from an averſion to the parliament, had formed a plan for engaging in the king's ſervice the troops under their command; with this view they entered into an aſſociation, bound themſelves by an oath of ſecrecy, and maintained a cloſe correſpondence with the king's ſervants. The form of a petition to the king and parliament was drawn up, to which they reſolved to procure the ſubſcription of the army. In this petition, after repreſenting the great danger to which the antient conſtitution of the kingdom was ſubject, by the inſolent proceedings of certain factious and turbulent ſpirits, the army offered to come up and protect his majeſty and the parliament. " So ſhall the nation," as they expreſs themſelves in the concluſion, " not only be " vindicated from precedent innovations, but be ſe" cured from the future which are threatened, and " which are likely to produce more dangerous effects " than the former." The draught of this petition being conveyed to the king, he was, unhappily, prevailed on to counterſign it, as a mark of his approbation. One of the aſſociation, named Goring, imagining the affair could not long remain a ſecret, diſcovered the whole to the lords Newport and Dungarvon, and they to Pym, who immediately imparted it to the houſe. This diſcovery could not fail of exciting the moſt violent indignation among the people. It was now reported that a ſcheme was concerted between the court and the army, to cut the throats of the parliament, and of all thoſe who ſtood up for their liberties. To convey more ſpeedily their terror and indignation at this plot, the commons voted, that a proteſtation ſhould be ſigned by all the members, to maintain the proteſtant religion againſt popery, to defend the king's perſon, the power of parliament, and the rights and liberties of the ſubject. This proteſtation was ſent up to the lords, and ſigned by all of them, except Southampton and Roberts; and then the commons, by their ſole authority, iſſued orders that it ſhould be ſigned by the whole nation. Alarms were every day given of new conſpiracies, and theſe of ſuch a nature as to keep up the rage of the miſguided multitude, and animate them in their demands of juſtice againſt the unfortunate Strafford.

A bill was now brought into the houſe for continuing the parliament, which ſhould not be prorogued, adjourned, or diſſolved, without the conſent of both houſes, until the grievances ſhould be redreſſed. This was on the fifth of May, and the ſame day the commons ſent to the king, deſiring acceſs to him, which being granted, they attended in the Banquetting-houſe, where they preſented to him the bill of attainder againſt Strafford, and that for the continuance of the parliament. Charles told them they might expect his anſwer on the Monday following, and ſo diſmiſſed them.

The king came to the houſe of lords according to his promiſe, and aſſured them of his firm reſolution, for which he offered them any ſecurity, never again to employ Strafford in any public affairs; but at the ſame time owned himſelf entirely diſſatisfied with regard to the circumſtances of treaſon, and on that account declared his diffidence in giving his aſſent to the bill of attainder, which he thought was framed with an intention of condemning a man whom he could not, in his conſcience, deem guilty of the crime laid his to charge.

The populace now flocked about Whitehall, and accompanied their demand of juſtice upon Strafford with the moſt ſhameful and open menaces; and the whole nation was thrown into ſo violent a ferment, as ſeemed to threaten ſome great and alarming convulſion. Wherever the king turned his eyes he was preſented with a gloomy and frightful proſpect: he perceived no reſource, no expedient, no ſecurity. All his ſervants preferred their own ſafety to that of their maſter, and even declined interpoſing with their advice between him and his parliament. The queen, terrified with the appearance of ſuch alarming inſurrections, preſſed him with tears to ſatisfy his people with regard to his miniſter, as it was hoped that his death would reſtore that tranquillity which had for ſome time forſaken the kingdom. Juxon alone, whoſe courage was not inferior to his other virtues, deſpiſed the menaces of the populace, and boldly told the king, that if in his conſcience he thought the bill againſt Strafford unjuſt, by no means to paſs it.

While Charles continued in this dreadful ſituation of mind, Strafford took a ſtep which demonſtrated that his ſoul was a ſtranger to fear. He wrote a letter to the king, in which he intreated his majeſty to prefer the peace and ſafety of his kingdom to the life of an unfortunate, though innocent man; and quiet the tumultuous populace, by granting the requeſt they made with ſo much vehemence. "In this, added he, "my requeſt will more acquit you to God, than all "the world can do beſides. To a willing man there "is no injury. And by God's grace, I forgive all the "world with a calmneſs and meekneſs, of infinite "contentment to my diſlodging ſoul; ſo, Sir, to "you I can reſign the liſe of this world with all imaginable chearfulneſs, in the juſt acknowledgment "of your many and exceeding favours."

This letter greatly aſtoniſhed the king: he knew the ſoul of Strafford was not eaſily terrified, but he thought him not endued with ſuch magnanimity. It tended, however, but little to remove the doubts of Charles: he could not bear the thought of putting to death a man whom he loved, eſteemed, and believed to be innocent.

At length, however, after the moſt violent anxiety and doubt, Charles granted a commiſſion to four noblemen, empowering them to give the royal aſſent to the bill. Carleton, ſecretary of ſtate, was ſent to inform Strafford that the bill of attainder was ſigned, and that his execution was appointed for the 12th of May. On receiving this fatal news, he roſe from his chair, lifted up his eyes to heaven, laid his hand upon his heart, and ſaid, "Put not your truſt in princes, nor in the ſons of men, for in them there is no ſalvation." He, however, ſoon recollected his ſpirits, and prepared himſelf to ſuffer the fatal ſentence. Three days only were allowed him; nor could the king, though he ſent a letter by the prince of Wales to the parliament, obtain any longer reſpite.

The unfortunate earl was attended, in his laſt moments, by archbiſhop Uſher; and in paſſing from his apartment to Tower-hill, where the ſcaffold was erected, he ſtopped under the window of archbiſhop Laud, with whom he had long lived in the moſt intimate friendſhip. The aged primate appeared diſſolved in tears; and on Strafford's begging the aſſiſtance of his prayers in thoſe awful moments which were ſo nearly approaching, the prelate pronounced, in a broken voice, a tender bleſſing on his departing friend, and ſunk into the arms of his attendants. This affecting ſcene of tender friendſhip drew tears from the eyes of the unfortunate Strafford, but could not ſhake the magnanimity of his ſoul. With a mind ſuperior to his fate, he marched on with an air of greater dignity than that which uſually attended him. His behaviour on the ſcaffold was noble and decent. "I fear, ſaid he, it is an ill omen for the projected reformation in the ſtate, to begin with ſhedding innocent blood." After bidding adieu to his brother and friends who attended him, and ſending a bleſſing to his wife and children who were abſent, he ſaid, "I "have now almoſt done. One ſtroke will make my "wife a widow, and my dear children fatherleſs, de"prive my poor ſervants of an indulgent maſter, "and ſeperate me from my affectionate brother and "all my friends!" As he was laying his head upon the block, he ſaid, "I thank God I am not afraid of "death, nor am I daunted with any terrors; but do "as chearfully lay down my head at this time, as "ever I did when going to repoſe." After finiſhing this ſhort declaration, the executioner, with one blow, put a final period to his life.

Thus died, in the 49th year of his age, Thomas Wentworth, earl of Strafford, one of the greateſt men that ever appeared in England. Though he was not irreproachable, yet he certainly merited a much better fate, and whatever advice he might give his majeſty when dangers rendered deſperate methods neceſſary, yet he often repeated to his maſter this memorable and noble maxim: "That if ever neceſſity obliged the ſovereign to violate the laws, it ought to be done with great reſerve; and that, as ſoon as it was poſſible, reparation ought to be made to the laws for what they had ſuffered by ſuch violation."—It is remarkable, that a few weeks after Strafford's executio the parliament, as if conſcious of the iniquity, a leaſt illegality, of his ſentence, paſſed an act for reſtoring his children in blood and honour, and inveſte them with the poſſeſſions of their father's eſtates.

The ſame commiſſioners, who ſigned the bil againſt Strafford, ſigned alſo another more fatal to th royal authority. By this act it was declared, that th parliament ſhould not be adjourned, prorogued, o diſſolved, without the conſent of both houſes. Th king conſidered not the conſequence of this ſtatute Abſorbed in grief at the loſs of his favourite, he gav his aſſent to an act that rendered him the ſlave of hi oppreſſors.

The commons having, by the death of the earl o Strafford, removed, as they pretended, the great obſtacle to the reformation of the ſtate, proceeded t proſecute their projected plan with the utmoſt induſtry and vigour, fully reſolved to annihilate all remains of arbitrary power. They attacked the cou of high-commiſſion and the ſtar-chamber, whoſe juriſdiction, almoſt without rule or bounds, put re ſhackles on civil liberty. A bill unanimouſly paſſe the houſe to aboliſh theſe courts; and, in them, t deſtroy the principal and moſt dangerous articles o the king's prerogative. The breach made in th power of the crown by this abolition was the greate as the ſtar-chamber took cognizance of all the infra tions of the royal proclamations. The right of iſſuing ordinances was, from that time, in a great meaſu abrogated, as the king no longer had it in his pow to carry them into execution.

The marſhal's court, which took cognizance of o fenſive words, and was thought not ſufficiently l mited by law, was alſo, for that reaſon, aboliſhe The ſtannary courts, which exerciſed juriſdiction ov the miners, being liable to a ſimilar objection, unde went a ſimilar fate. The abolition of the Council York, and the Council of Wales, followed from t ſame principles: and the authority of the Clerk the Market, to whom the care of a general inſpecti of the weights and meaſures throughout England w committed, was transferred to the mayors, ſheri and ordinary magiſtrates.

Thus did the commons aboliſh every remnant arbitra arbitrary power; and made the rigid maxims of law and equity the ſole rule of their conduct. No courts of judicature now exiſted but thoſe of Weſtminſter-hall; and though the means they made uſe of to procure theſe great advantages to poſterity often ſavoured of artifice, ſometimes of violence, yet it ſhould be remembered, that it is, perhaps, impoſſible to effect a revolution in government, merely by the force of reaſon and argument. Upon the whole, therefore, if we except that complication of cruel iniquity, that effected Strafford's attainder, it muſt be owned that the tranſactions, during the firſt period of this memorable parliament, were productive of very great advantages to the nation, by fixing the liberty of the ſubject on a firm and ſolid foundation.

The treaty with the Scots being now brought to a concluſion, Charles permitted the parliament of that kingdom to aſſemble, and declared his intention of aſſiſting at it in perſon. The commons ſuſpecting, that under pretence of viſiting Scotland, he deſigned to put himſelf at the head of his army in the north, demanded a conference with the lords, when a propoſition was made that both armies ſhould be diſbanded before the king's departure. This being unanimouſly agreed to by the lords, both armies were accordingly diſbanded at the ſame time, and the Scots returned home with the greateſt ſeeming ſatisfaction.

The king ſet out for Scotland on the 10th of Auguſt, attended by ſeveral of the principal nobility; among whom were, the duke of Lenox, lately honoured with the additional title of duke of Richmond, the marquis of Hamilton, and lord Willoughby. He was received at Edinburgh with the greateſt demonſtrations of affection by the people; and, in return for this reception, he not only confirmed the articles of the treaty between the two kingdoms by act of parliament, but likewiſe all his former conceſſions, together with all the particulars that had been tranſacted in their general aſſembly. At the ſame time, to gain more effectually their eſteem, he conferred titles of honour and dignity on ſome, and places of truſt and profit on others. Among the former the marquis of Hamilton was created duke; and general Leſley was made earl of Leven.

While Charles was aſſiduouſly employed in ſettling the diſturbances in Scotland, he received advice that a rebellion was broke out in Ireland. The catholics of that kingdom were perſuaded that they had now the faireſt opportunity of ſhaking off the Engliſh yoke; and religion and liberty, thoſe ſources of the greateſt paſſions, hurried them into the attempt of totally extirpating the Engliſh from every part of the kingdom. It was Roger More, a gentleman deſcended from a very antient family in Ireland, and highly celebrated among his countrymen for valour and capacity, firſt formed the project for expelling the Engliſh, and aſſerting the independency of his native country. He was indefatigable in the purſuit; going, with the utmoſt ſecrecy, from one chieftain to another, and uſing all the arts in his power to awaken every latent principle of diſcontent. He maintained a cloſe correſpondence with lord Maguire, and Sir Phelim O'Neale, the moſt powerful perſons among the antient Iriſh. He obſerved, that the rebellious factions in England and Scotland offered the moſt favourable opportunity for effecting their purpoſe; that the Engliſh planters who had expelled them from their poſſeſſions, ſuppreſſed their religion, and bereaved them of their liberties, were but a handful when compared with the natives; and though the catholics had hitherto enjoyed, in ſome conſiderable degree, the exerciſe of their religion, from the moderation of their indulgent prince, they muſt thenceforth expect the government would be conducted by other maxims and other principles; that the puritanical parliament having at laſt ſubdued their ſovereign, would, doubtleſs, when their power was conſolidated, extend their ambitious enterprizes to Ireland, and make the catholics in that kingdom feel the ſame furious perſecution, to which their brethren in England were at preſent expoſed; and that a revolt in the Iriſh, tending only to vindicate their native liberty againſt the violence of foreign invaders, could never, at any time, be deemed rebellion, much leſs, during the preſent confuſions, when their prince was, in a manner, a priſoner, and obedience muſt be paid, not to him, but to thoſe who had traitorouſly uſurped his authority.

Theſe conſiderations could not fail of awakening the native pride of the Iriſh, and induce them to form a conſpiracy againſt their hated maſters. Plunket, a ſoldier of fortune, readily engaged in the undertaking, and it was agreed that Sir Phelim O'Neale, and the other conſpirators, ſhould begin the inſurrection on the ſame day in the different provinces, while lord Maguire and Roger More made themſelves maſters of the caſtle of Dublin. The twenty-third of October was the day fixed upon for carrying their deſign into execution. The ſcheme was at firſt propoſed with a great deal of moderation; it was reſolved not to ſpill any blood but in caſes of neceſſity, and not to moleſt the Scots, who were very numerous in the northern parts of the kingdom. The Engliſh ambaſſadors at foreign courts received frequent hints of what was projecting in Ireland, and the lords juſtices were deſired, by repeated advices, to be upon their guard; but all theſe intimations produced no effect, they continued in the ſame ſupine indolence and ſecurity. The caſtle of Dublin, by which the capital itſelf was commanded, contained arms for an hundred thouſand men, thirty-five pieces of cannon, and a proportional quantity of ammunition; yet, even this important fortreſs was guarded by no greater force than fifty men. The truth is, there was at that time ſo great a ſimilarity of intereſts between the Engliſh puritans and the Iriſh catholics, that the lords juſtices, who were enemies to Strafford, did not chuſe to be very active againſt the papiſts. Leiceſter, lord-lieutenant of Ireland, remained in London, and Sir Wm. Parſons and John Borlace, the chief juſtices, were of ſlender capacities, and owed their promotion merely to their zeal for the party that was now predominant. Tranquil from their ignorance and want of experience, they ſlumbered on the very brink of deſtruction. But the evening before the deſign was to be carried into execution, they were rouſed from their lethargy by the information of O'Connolly, an Iriſh proteſtant, who betrayed the whole ſecret to Parſons. In conſequence of this, Mahone, lord Maguire, and about thirty of the conſpirators were ſeized during the night; but More, Plunket, and ſome others, made their eſcape.

Though the Engliſh in Dublin were happily preſerved by the diſcovery of this infernal plot, yet it was not ſo with thoſe in the other parts of the kingdom. The conſpirators were in arms in the reſpective provinces early on the morning of the day appointed, and actually maſſacred forty thouſand defenceleſs proteſtants. No age, no ſex, no condition was ſpared. The wife, weeping for her butchered huſband, and embracing her helpleſs children, was pierced with them, and periſhed by the ſame ſtroke. The old, the young, the vigorous, and the infirm, underwent the ſame fate, and were blended in one common ruin. In vain did flight ſave from the firſt aſſault: deſtruction was every where let looſe, and met the hunted victims at every turn. In vain was recourſe had to relations, to companions, to friends; all connections were diſſolved, and death was dealt by that hand from which protection was implored and expected. Without provocation, without oppoſition, the aſtoniſhed Engliſh, living in profound peace, and full ſecurity, were maſſacred by their neareſt neighbours, with whom they had long maintained a continued intercourſe of kindneſs and good offices. Nay, even death was the ſlighteſt puniſhment inflicted by theſe monſters in human form: all the lingering pains of body, the anguiſh of mind, the agonies of deſpair could not ſatiate revenge excited without injury, and cruelty derived from no cauſe. Humanity forbids a particular enumeration. Such enormities, though atteſted by undoubted evidence, appear almoſt incredible. Depraved nature, even perverted religion, though encouraged by the utmoſt licence, cannot reach to ſuch a pitch of ferocity. Even the weaker ſex themſelves, naturally tender to their own ſufferings, and compaſſionate to thoſe of others, here emulated their robuſt companions in the practice of every cruelty. The very children, taught by example, and encouraged by the exhortations of their parents, dealt their feeble blows on the dead carcaſes or defenceleſs children of the Engliſh. Nor was the avarice of the Iriſh a ſufficient reſtraint to their cruelty. Such was their frenzy, that the cattle they had ſeized, and by rapine had made their own, were, becauſe they bore the name of Engliſh, wantonly ſlaughtered, or, when covered with wounds, turned looſe into the woods, there to periſh by ſlow and lingering torments. The commodious habitations of the planters, as if upbraiding the ſloth and ignorance of the natives, were laid in aſhes, or levelled with the ground. And where the wretched owners had ſhut themſelves up in the houſes, and were preparing for defence, periſhed in the flames, together with their wives and children.

When Charles received advice of this inhuman inſurrection, he ſeemed greatly affected, and immediately laid the diſpatches before the Scottiſh parliament; at the ſame time earneſtly requeſting that they would ſend forces for the ſuppreſſion of the rebels, and the protection of thoſe diſtreſſed proteſtants who had happily eſcaped. The Scots were far from being averſe to the complying with his majeſty's requeſt, and appointed a committee of their parliament to treat with the commons of England; but ſo much time was ſpent in negotiations, that the opportunity of chaſtiſing the rebels, and putting a ſtop to their inhuman ravages, was irretrievably loſt; and the unfortunate proteſtants were denied that aſſiſtance from their brethren in England, which even the laws of nature, and the ſacred ties of friendſhip, gave them the higheſt reaſon to expect.

As ſoon as the heat of ſlaughter was over, and cool reflection returned, the Iriſh trembled for their ſituation, and endeavoured to conceal the blackneſs of their crimes by the moſt horrid impoſture. They pretended they had received authority from the king and queen, eſpecially from the latter, for the horrid murders they had committed; and by this ſpecious aſſertion, though deſtitute of the leaſt foundation in truth, they deceived many of their deluded countrymen. They added, that the ſole reaſon for taking up arms was to vindicate the royal prerogative, ſo unjuſtly invaded by the puritanical parliaments of England and Scotland. To give ſome colour of truth to this improbable declaration, recourſe was had to artifice and fraud. Sir Phelim O'Neale having found a royal patent in the houſe of lord Cranfield, whom he had murdered, tore off the ſeal, and affixed it to a commiſſion he had forged for himſelf.

Charles arrived in London on the twenty-fifth of November, and informed the parliament of the neceſſity there was for immediately ſending aſſiſtance to his proteſtant ſubjects in Ireland. He flattered himſelf that the terror they had always expreſſed againſt popery, a religion that now appeared in all its terrors, would ſufficiently prompt them to interpoſe in behalf of their diſtreſſed countrymen. But he was miſtaken; a real zeal for religion was not the object of the parliament; it wanted the ſtimulation of faction or intereſt to produce the deſired effect. Charles was not, however, wanting on his part, to rouze the parliament to revenge the blood of their countrymen. He laid before the commons all the intelligence he had received; and informed them, that the inſurrection was not, in his opinion, the reſult of any raſh and furious enterprize, but of a formed conſpiracy againſt the crown of England. He added, that a cauſe ſo important to national and religious intereſts required their utmoſt attention, muſt be entered upon immediately, and purſued with vigour.

But he ſoon found that the parliament were more deſirous of exalting their own authority upon the ruins of the prerogative, than of ſending aſſiſtance to their brethren, though plunged in the very abyſs o diſtreſs. As ſoon as the particulars of this infernal maſſacre arrived, all the privy-counſellors in the neighbourhood of London repaired to the houſe o commons, and laid before the aſſembly the variou informations they had received. The dreadful nar rative ſeemed to rouze in the breaſts of the member the tender feelings of humanity; it was immediatel reſolved to borrow fifty thouſand pounds from th city on parliamentary ſecurity. Several committee were appointed to take care of the Iriſh affairs; an the houſe came to the following reſolutions:

"That a convenient number of ſhips be provide for guarding the ſea-coaſts of Ireland. That ſix thou ſand foot, and two thouſand horſe, be raiſed with a convenient ſpeed, for a preſent expedition into th kingdom. That the lord-lieutenant be deſired t preſent to both houſes of parliament the names o ſuch officers as he ſhall think proper to ſend into Ire land, for commanding the forces intended to b tranſported thither. That magazines of proviſio be provided at Weſt Cheſter, in order to be ſent ove to Dublin, as the occaſions of that kingdom may r quire. That the magazine of arms, ammunition a powder, now in Carliſle, be forthwith ſent over Knockfergus, in Ireland. That it be referred to h majeſty's council to conſider of ſome method of offe ing rewards to ſuch as ſhall ſignalize themſelves in t Iriſh expedition: of pardoning thoſe rebels in th kingdom who ſhall make their ſubmiſſion in a limit time; and of offering ſums of money as rewards ſuch as ſhall bring in the heads of the principal rebe That letters be immediately ſent to the juſtices Ireland, informing them how ſenſible this houſe is the affairs of that kingdom. That the committee Iriſh affairs conſider how and in what manner t kingdom may make uſe of the friendſhip and aſſi ance of Scotland in the affair of Ireland. That rections be given for drawing a bill for impreſſ men for this particular ſervice."

Notwithſtanding the commons came to theſe re lutions, the preparations were carried on ſo ſlow that all hopes of the Iriſh proteſtants, with reg to a ſpeedy aſſiſtance from their brethren in Engla vaniſhed. In the mean time, the commons took c to alarm every part of the kingdom with the m dreadful apprehenſions of the horrid deſigns and nu bers of the papiſts. This gave many of their o friends in the houſe of lords a diſlike to their proce ings; they began to be alarmed at their conduct, to miſtruſt their deſigns. Capel (lately called u the houſe of peers) had been very warm in the op ſition, and as forward as any gentleman in the h for removing the real grievances of his coun The ſame may be ſaid of the lords Falkland

Digby, Sir John Culpepper, Mr. Hyde, and many others whoſe concurrence in the meaſures againſt the court had given great credit to the oppoſition. But they now thought the king had gone as far as in prudence, and, perhaps, farther than in duty they could require; and therefore that all oppoſition ought now to ceaſe. They made no ſecret of theſe ſentiments; but none, except lord Digby, had as yet the courage to break with the popular leaders in the houſe of commons.

It was, however, ſufficiently evident, that the two parties muſt ſoon divide; and the oppoſition took every method in their power to ſtrengthen themſelves againſt the approaching rupture, and to prevent the deſertion of ſo many powerful friends from having any effect in turning againſt them the current of popular favour. Nothing contributed more to this than the continual alarms they artfully ſpread with regard to the deſigns of the papiſts, already ſo much the object of general abhorrence. Accuſtomed, in all their invectives, to join the prelatical party with the catholics, the people immediately ſuppoſed the inſurrection in Ireland to be the reſult of their united counſels: and when they heard that the rebels in that kingdom pleaded the king's commiſſion for all their violences, bigotry, ever credulous and malignant, aſſented, without ſcruple or examination, to that groſs impoſture, and loaded the unhappy prince with the whole enormity of a contrivance ſhocking to humanity.

The commons were far from uſing any endeavours to contradict a report ſo favourable to their deſigns. They did not, indeed, pretend to charge the king with this enormous cruelty, but inſinuated that the Iriſh rebellion had been ſecretly planned, and was at that very time fomented by papiſts in great truſt about the perſons of the king and queen. Alarmed at theſe baſe imputations, Charles, to clear himſelf and his conſort from all ſuſpicions, unhappily recommended the ſuppreſſion of the Iriſh rebellion to his parliament. Probably, the popular leaders had foreſeen this, and took care to make uſe of the advantages they had acquired from an act of ſo much imprudence. Under pretence of this acquiſition of truſt, they aſſumed the power of diſpoſing of the royal magazines, and of iſſuing orders for raiſing forces, which till that time had been underſtood to be lodged in the crown. In ſhort, Charles, by thus injudiciouſly devolving his authority on the parliament, in ſome meaſure put his own ſword into the hands of his ſubjects. Care was taken to publiſh to the whole world, that his majeſty had particularly recommended the preſervation of Ireland to both houſes of parliament; but, at the ſame time, effectual meaſures were taken to defeat the king's prudent intention of ſending over a body of Scots to ſuppreſs the Iriſh rebels, and to reſtore peace to that miſerable kingdom. They had, indeed, voted, that a conſiderable army ſhould be immediately raiſed for the ſervice of Ireland; but no effectual ſtep was taken for carrying that vote into execution, though the rebellion was now arrived to ſuch a height, as to call for the whole power of England. They, however, carried on the proſecution againſt the papiſts with the utmoſt vigour: five prieſts were executed at one time: the law of nations was violated with regard to foreign ambaſſadors whom they ſuſpected of harbouring prieſts: all the recuſants of any figure or fortune in England were ſecured; and it was reſolved that all the Iriſh in the inns of court, who refuſed to take the oaths of allegiance and ſupremacy, ſhould be expelled thoſe ſocieties, and rendered incapable of being again admitted. Theſe violent proceedings alarmed the lords, who expreſſed a viſible reluctance to proceed to ſuch extremities. This occaſioned ſeveral ſtrong reſolutions of the commons, ſufficiently indicating their intention of acting without the concurrence of the houſe of peers, if they continued to oppoſe them.

The commons were now buſied in preparing a remonſtrance on the ſtate of the nation, which was ſoon attended with the moſt important conſequences. It was not addreſſed to the king, but was openly declared to be an appeal to the people. It was a recapitulation of all the wrong meaſures embraced by the king ſince the commencement of his reign: the unſucceſsful expeditions to Cadiz and the iſle of Rhé were mentioned; the ſending ſhips to France for the ſuppreſſion of the Hugonots; the forced loans; the illegal confinement of men for refuſing to obey illegal commands; the violent diſſolution of four parliaments; the arbitrary government that always ſucceeded; the queſtioning, fining, and impriſoning members, for their conduct in the houſe; the levying taxes without conſent of parliament; the introducing ſuperſtitious innovations into the church, without the authority of law: in ſhort, every thing which, either with or without reaſon, had given offence during the courſe of fifteen years, from the acceſſion of the king to the calling of the preſent parliament.

Had all the oppreſſions here complained of ſtill exiſted, this famous remonſtrance had been the braveſt and wiſeſt meaſure that any parliament ever purſued, and muſt have rendered the memories of its conductors dear to poſterity. But as the land-marks of the conſtitution had been replaced; as Charles had been as liberal in granting as his people had been importunate in aſking; as nothing that the will of heaven could warrant, or the art of man deviſe, was now wanting to the ſecurity of the people; and as no recent violations of the king's conceſſions, or the people's rights, had been ſo much as pretended; what could any unprejudiced perſon imagine the parliament meant by this remonſtrance? The anſwer is certainly obvious: they intended to inflame the people againſt the government, and throw the whole ſtate into confuſion. It is, therefore, no wonder that it met with very ſtrong oppoſition in the houſe of commons. For more than fourteen hours the debate was ſupported with remarkable warmth and acrimony; and the remonſtrance would poſſibly have miſcarried, had not the uncommon length of the debate wearied out many of the king's party, which principally conſiſted of perſons advanced in years; for it was at laſt carried only by a majority of eleven, there being 159 for the motion, and 148 againſt it.

The remonſtrance was ſoon after preſented to his majeſty, together with a petition, requeſting that the biſhops might be deprived of their votes in parliament, that ſeveral alterations might be made in the eſtabliſhed worſhip, and that the king would remove all evil counſellors from his preſence.

Charles received the remonſtrance with great civility and politeneſs; and a few days after diſperſed an anſwer to it, in which he obſerved, that during the period ſo much and ſo bitterly complained of, the people enjoyed a large ſhare of happineſs, even when compared with the moſt fortunate periods of Engliſh hiſtory. He made the warmeſt profeſſions of ſincerity in the reformed religion; promiſed indulgence to tender conſciences, with regard to the ceremonies of the church; enumerated his great conceſſions to natural liberty; and blamed the infamous libels every where diſperſed againſt his government and the national religion. "You have thrown out (ſaid he) gene"ral reproaches with regard to pernicious councils;
"but aſk your own conſciences, have I protected
"any miniſter from parliamentary juſtice? Have I "retained any unpopular ſervant, or conferred
"offices on any one who enjoyed not, in a high de"gree, the eſteem of the public? But if, notwith-

"ſtanding this, any malignant party ſhall take heart, "and be willing to ſacrifice the peace and happineſs "of their country to their own ſiniſter ends and am- "bition, under whatever pretence of religion and "conſcience; if they ſhall endeavour to leſſen my "reputation and intereſt, and to weaken my lawful "power and authority; if they ſhall attempt, by "diſcountenancing the preſent laws, to looſen the "bands of government, that all diſorder and con- "fuſion may break in upon us; I doubt not but "God, in his own good time, will diſcover them to "me; and that the wiſdom and courage of my high "court of parliament will join with me in their ſup- "preſſion and puniſhment."

This anſwer had great effect on the more wiſe and prudent part of the nation. Even the leaders of the commons themſelves were alarmed, and began to fear, that unleſs they could remove the biſhops from the houſe of lords, they ſhould never ſucceed in the plan they had projected. They had already attempted this without ſucceſs, though thirteen of the biſhops were impeached of high-treaſon. Nor could the committee, with all their art, draw up any charge againſt Laud that would affect either his life or fortune. They, however, renewed their attempts againſt the biſhops with great violence, but without ſucceſs; the peers thought it highly unreaſonable to condemn them before they were proved to be guilty. Exaſperated at this, and other inſtances of oppoſition they had lately met with from the upper houſe, particularly by their inſiſting on taking ten thouſand Scots into their pay, the commons appointed a committee "to prepare "heads for a conference with the lords, and to ac- "quaint them what bills this houſe hath paſſed, and "ſent up to their lordſhips, which much concerned "the ſafety of the kingdom, but have had no conſent "of their lordſhips to them; and that this houſe being "the repreſentative body of the whole kingdom, "and their lordſhips being but particular perſons, "and coming to the parliament in a particular capa- "city; that if they ſhall not be pleaſed to conſent "to the paſſing of thoſe acts, and others, neceſſary "for the preſervation and ſafety of the kingdom, "that then this houſe, together with ſuch of the lords "as are more ſenſible of the ſafety of the kingdom, "may join together, and repreſent the ſame to his "majeſty."

This violent proceeding of the lower houſe produced a different effect from what it was intended, as it operated ſtrongly in favour of the king. The commons ſoon perceived it; and in order to avert the conſequences, encouraged the lower claſs of people, and perſons incapable of judging for themſelves, to preſent petitions to the houſe againſt the biſhops votes in parliament. One was brought up by the London apprentices, who aſſembled in great multitudes before the houſe of lords, crying out, "No Biſhops, No Biſhops." But the principal object of the commons was that of wreſting from Charles all his power over the military. He had offered to raiſe ten thouſand volunteers for the ſervice of Ireland; but the propoſal was rejected under pretence that they were unwilling to truſt the king with ſo large a military force; though the moſt dreadful accounts and pathetic petitions were every day received from the proteſtants in Ireland. It was in vain for Charles to endeavour to quicken the motions of the commons by repeated meſſages; the time was fruitleſsly ſpent in voting money, that was never paid; in making reſolutions, that were never executed; in conferences that had no concluſion; and in debates that had no meaning.

The tumults about Weſtminſter became every day more violent and outrageous, ſo that even Charles himſelf ſeemed in danger from lawleſs attempts of the mad populace. In this ſcene of anarchy and confuſion, ſome reduced officers and gentlemen of the inns of court offered their ſervice to his majeſty; which being accepted, they appeared as guards at Whitehall, and frequent ſkirmiſhes happened between them and the rabble. By way of reproach, theſe gentlemen, who ſupported the royal cauſe, ſtigmatized their antagoniſts with the appellation of Round heads, on account of their wearing round ſhort hair; and the latter in return, gave the others the name of Cavaliers: and thus the nation, which was already ſufficiently exaſperated both by civil and religious quarrels, was now alſo provided with party names, under which the oppoſite leaders might range their adherents, and ſignalize their mutual hatred and reſentment.

Notwithſtanding the tumultuous aſſemblies of the lower claſs of people ſtill continued, yet the popularity of Charles daily increaſed among the better ſort. The common-council of London not only diſclaimed having any ſhare in thoſe diſorders, but alſo preſented ſeveral dutiful addreſſes to the king, beſeeching him to continue his reſidence at Whitehall, and aſſuring him of protection againſt any who ſhould dare to offer him the leaſt inſult. The Scots alſo, affected to ſee their king ill uſed by others, however contumaciouſly they had treated him themſelves, informed him of the correſpondence carried on between the chief covenanters and the principal leaders of the houſe of commons, both before, and during the continuance of the late invaſion.

Charles unfortunately miſtook this gleam of compaſſion for the return of luſtre to his reign. He began therefore to act with more ſpirit and vigour. He diſcharged Belfour from his government of the Tower, and appointed Lansford in his place, notwithſtanding the warm declarations made againſt it by the commons. But Charles wanted courage to ſupport his nomination; he ſoon after diſmiſſed Lansford, and gave the command to Sir John Byron. On the eleventh of December, while the houſe was engaged in warm debates with regard to biſhops voting in parliament, the king iſſued a proclamation for paying obedience to the laws for eſtabliſhing the true religion in England; and the next day he iſſued another, commanding all abſent members to attend their duty in parliament. Theſe two proclamations, publiſhed at ſuch a juncture, gave the commons room to believe, that Charles was meditating ſome dreadful blow, and their apprehenſions were increaſed when they ſaw Falkland, Culpepper, Hyde, and ſeveral others of the wiſeſt and moſt popular members in the houſe, divide againſt them.

A bill had been paſſed by the commons for impreſſing men for the ſervice of Ireland; in the preamble to which the king's power of impreſſing, though always practiſed by former princes, was declared illegal, as contrary to the liberty of the ſubject. While this bill was debating by the peers, Charles, unwilling to ſubmit to ſo conſiderable a diminution of his power, came up to the upper houſe, where he told the lords he was very willing to paſs the bill without the preamble, by which means, he obſerved, that ill-timed queſtion with regard to the prerogative would, for the preſent, be avoided, and the pretenſions of each party remain entire. Both houſes took fire at this precipitate meaſure; and declared it to be a high breach of privilege for the king to take notice of any bill before it was preſented to him for the royal aſſent.

A few days after this, Charles committed an indiſcretion that was attended with more fatal and dangerous conſequences, and which, at leaſt, greatly accelerated all the diſorders and civil wars in which the kingdom was ſoon after involved. Lord Digby, a perſon of great abilities, but of a warm and paſſionate diſpoſition, ſhocked at the growing inſolence of the oppoſition, repreſented to Charles, that if he exerted the authority, and diſplayed the majeſty of a monarch, his inſolent ſubjects would inſtantly ſhrink before him. The queen and ſeveral of the courtiers enforced this advice; and Charles, who was ever too haſty, and had lately received ſuch inſults that even no private gentleman could bear with patience, yielded to the fatal importunity of his friends and ſervants. He was encouraged to hope, that he could give the final blow to the popularity of the faction, by producing undeniable proofs of their having invited the Scots to invade England.

KING CHARLES I.
Demanding the Five Members in the House of Commons.

A. D. 1642. Accordingly, on the third of January, the attorney-general (by the king's order) preſented to the houſe of peers the following articles of high-treaſon againſt Kinbolton, and five commoners, the moſt active perſons in the oppoſition, viz. Mr. Denzil Hollis, Sir Arthur Haſelrigg, Mr. John Pym, Mr. John Hampden, and Mr. William Strode:

"1. That they have traiterouſly endeavoured to ſubvert the fundamental laws and government of England, to deprive the king of his royal authority, and to place in ſubjects an arbitrary and tyrannical power over the lives, liberties, and eſtates of his majeſty's ſubjects.

"2. That they have traiterouſly endeavoured, by many foul aſperſions upon his majeſty and his government, to alienate the affections of his people, and to make his majeſty odious to them.

"3. That they have endeavoured to draw his majeſty's late army to diſobedience to his majeſty's command, and to ſide with them in their traiterous deſigns.

"4. That they have traiterouſly invited and encouraged a foreign power to invade his majeſty's kingdom of England.

"5. That they have traiterouſly endeavoured to ſubvert the rights and very being of parliaments.

"6. That in order to compleat their traiterous deſigns, they have endeavoured, ſo far as in them lay, by force and terror, to compel the parliament to join with them in their traiterous deſigns; and to that end had actually raiſed and countenanced tumults againſt the king and parliament.

"7. And that they have traiterouſly conſpired to levy, and actually have levied war againſt the king."

As ſoon as the Attorney-General had delivered theſe articles of impeachment, he demanded, in behalf of his maſter, that the houſe ſhould appoint a committee of ſecrecy for examining the king's witneſſes: that he ſhould have liberty to add or alter as he pleaſed, and that the perſons he had impeached ſhould be taken into cuſtody.

Charles ſeconded this attack by another ſtill more raſh and inconſiderate: a ſergeant at arms repaired to the houſe of commons, and demanded, in the king's name, the five impeached members; but he was diſmiſſed without any poſitive anſwer. In conſequence of this, meſſengers were employed to ſearch for and arreſt them; and their trunks, chambers and ſtudies were ſealed up and locked. Theſe proceedings being reported to the commons, they came to the following reſolutions:

"That the ſergeant at arms be ordered to apprehend and bring hither as delinquents the perſons who have ſealed up the trunks, or doors, or ſeized the keys of Mr. Pym, Mr. Hollis, or any other member of this houſe: and that the ſergeant ſhall have power to break open the doors, and to break the ſeals off from the trunks.

"That if any perſon whatſoever ſhall come to the lodgings of any members of this houſe, and there offer to ſeal the trunks, doors, or papers of any members, or to ſeize upon their perſons, that ſuch members ſhall require the aid of the conſtable, to keep ſuch perſons in ſafe cuſtody, till this houſe give farther order; and this houſe doth declare, that if any perſon whatſoever ſhall offer to arreſt or detain the perſon of any member without firſt acquainting this houſe therewith, and receiving farther order, that it is lawful for ſuch member, or any perſon aſſiſting him, to ſtand upon his or their guard of defence, and to make reſiſtance according to the proteſtation taken to defend the privilege of parliament."

The king, irritated at theſe proceedings, reſolved to go the next day in perſon to the houſe of commons, and demand the impeached members. But this deſign was not kept ſufficiently ſecret to anſwer his majeſty's intention. The counteſs of Carliſle, ſiſter to the earl of Northumberland, diſcovered it, and ſent intelligence to the five members, ſo that they had time to withdraw a few minutes before the king entered. Charles was attended with his ordinary retinue, amounting to about 200 men, armed in their uſual manner, ſome with halberts, and ſome with walking ſwords. He left his attendants in the lobby, and the door being immediately thrown open, he entered the houſe and advanced to the ſpeaker's chair, all the members ſtanding up to receive him. Charles looked carefully round the houſe, but not ſeeing the accuſed members, he made the following ſpeech to the commons:

"Gentlemen,

"I am ſorry for this occaſion of coming to you.
"Yeſterday I ſent a ſergeant at arms to demand ſome,
"who, by my order, were accuſed of high-treaſon.
"Inſtead of obedience, I received a meſſage. I muſt
"here declare to you, that though no king that ever
"was in England could be more careful of your pri"vileges then I ſhall be, yet, in caſes of treaſon, no
"perſon has privilege. Therefore am I come to tell "you, that I muſt have theſe men whereſoever I can "find them. Well, ſince I ſee all the birds are "flown, I do expect you will ſend them to me as "ſoon as they return. But I aſſure you on the word
"of a king, I never did intend any force, but ſhall
"proceed againſt them in a fair and legal way; for
"I never want any other. And now, ſince I ſee I "cannot do what I came for, I think this no unfit oc-
"caſion to repeat what I have ſaid formerly, that "whatever I have done in favour, and to the good of
"my ſubjects, I do intend to maintain it."

This imprudent action of Charles threw the houſe into univerſal diſorder; and even before the king reached the door, ſome of the members called aloud, "Privilege! Privilege!" Immediately after his departure the houſe adjourned till the next day; and the five accuſed members retired into the city, where they were ſure of protection. The guards at the gates were immediately doubled, and the greater part of the citizens continued under arms during the whole night.

The following morning Charles diſpatched a meſſenger to the lord-mayor, ordering him to call a common-council immediately. His commands were accordingly obeyed; and about ten o'clock the king, attended only by three or four lords, repaired to Guildhall, and addreſſed the common-council as follows:

"Gentlemen,

"I am come to demand ſuch perſons as I have "already accuſed of high-treaſon, and do believe
"are concealed in the city. I hope no good man
"will keep them from me; their offences are trea-
"ſons, and miſdemeanors of a very high nature. I
"deſire your loving aſſiſtance herein, that they may "be brought to a legal trial.

"And whereas there are divers ſuſpicions raiſed,
"that I am a favourer of the popiſh religion, I do
"profeſs, in the name of a king, that I did, and "ever will, to the utmoſt of my power, be a proſe-
"cutor of all ſuch as ſhall any ways oppoſe the laws

“ and ſtatutes of this kingdom, either papiſts or ſeparatiſts; and not only ſo, but I will maintain and defend that true proteſtant religion which my father profeſſed, and will continue in it during life.”

The lord-mayor and aldermen behaved with the greateſt reſpect, and attended his majeſty as far as Temple-Bar; but he could not eſcape the contumacious language of the populace, who made the ſtreets echo with the cry of “ Privilege of Parliament.”

No ſooner had the king left the city, than a committee of the parliament met at Merchant-Taylor's Hall, doubtleſs to inſinuate, that they did not think themſelves ſafe without the walls of London. This committee was charged with the affairs of Ireland, which, notwithſtanding the dreadful ſituation of the proteſtants in that kingdom, had been hitherto neglected. A declaration was, ſoon after meeting, drawn up, with regard to the late attempt on the privilege of parliament, and afterwards confirmed by the houſe. It was conceived in the following terms:

“ Wheraes his majeſty, in his royal perſon, came yeſterday to the houſe of commons, with a great multitude of men, armed in a warlike manner, with halberts, ſwords, and piſtols, who came up to the very door of this houſe, and placed themſelves there, and in other places and paſſages near to the houſe, to the great terror and diſturbance of the members thereof then ſitting, and, according to their duty, in an agreeable and orderly manner, treating of the great affairs of both kingdoms of England and Ireland; and his majeſty having placed himſelf in the ſpeaker's chair, did demand the perſons of divers members of that houſe to be delivered to him.

“ It is this day declared by the houſe of commons, that the ſame is a high breach of the rights and liberties of parliament, and therefore the houſe doth conceive, that they cannot, with ſafety of their own perſons, or the indemnities of the rights and privileges of parliament, ſit here any longer, without a full vindication of ſo high a breach of privilege, and a ſufficient guard wherein they may confide, for which both houſes jointly, and this houſe by itſelf, have been humbly ſuitors to his majeſty, and cannot as yet obtain.”

The whole kingdom was now thrown into a flame; and nothing was talked of but declarations, votes and remonſtrances, againſt the late flagrant breach of privilege. Several addreſſes were preſented to the king, requeſting him to name the perſons who had adviſed him to purſue ſuch alarming meaſures. Petitions were alſo ſent up from different parts of the kingdom; and among others, the lord-mayor, aldermen, and, common-council of London, repreſented to his majeſty,

“ That trade is decayed, to the ruin of the proteſtant religion, and the lives and liberties of the ſubjects, by the deſigns of papiſts; more particularly, by their fomenting the Iriſh rebellion, by the changing the conſtable of the Tower, by fortifying Whitehall, and his majeſty's late invaſion of the houſe of commons. They therefore pray, that by the parliament's advice, the proteſtants of Ireland may be relieved; the Tower put into the hands of perſons of truſt; a guard appointed for the ſafety of the parliament; and that the five members may not be reſtrained, nor proceeded againſt, but by the privilege of parliament.”

Charles thought proper to ſend an anſwer to the city petition; in which he obſerved, “ that it was impoſſible for him to expreſs a greater ſenſe of Ireland than he had done; that, merely to ſatisfy the city, he had removed a very worthy perſon from his command in the Tower; and that the late tumults had rendered it abſolutely neceſſary for him to fortify Whitehall for the ſecurity of his own perſon: that his going to the houſe of Commons was to apprehend thoſe five members for high-treaſon, to which the privilege of parliament could not extend; but that he never intended to proceed againſt them any otherwiſe than by legal methods only.”

This, however, did not at all tend to quiet the minds of the people. Exaſperated by oppoſition, and influenced by the artful harangues of their leaders, the popular tumults every day increaſed; and the king thinking himſelf and family in danger, determined to remove from Whitehall, and take up his reſidence at Hampton-court. His friends, who were beſt acqnainted with the nature of popular inſurrections, particularly thoſe of the lower claſs in London, exerted all their influence to prevail upon the king to lay aſide his deſign. They obſerved, that a little firmneſs would be ſufficient to diſſipate the ſtorm raiſed by an artful faction; that if he would remain in his palace, and his friends return to their ſeats in parliament, the giddy populace muſt ſoon ſpend their rage, and the affairs of government reſume their natural order. But all their reaſonings were in vain: Charles, after diſmiſſing the guard that attended at Whitehall, removed, with his whole family, to Hampton-court.

Two days after the king left London he ſent a meſſage to the commons, wherein he propoſed, that they ſhould agree upon a legal method, by which he might carry on his proſecution againſt the members, leſt farther miſunderſtandings might happen with regard to the privileges. In their anſwer, they deſired the king to lay the grounds of his accuſation before the houſe, pretending that they muſt firſt judge whether it would be proper to abandon their members to a legal trial. In a ſubſequent meſſage, Charles informed them, that he was willing for the preſent, to wave all proſecution; and, by another, he offered pardon to the members; to concur in any law that ſhould acquit or ſecure them; and to make any reparation for the breach of privileges, of which he acknowledged they had reaſon to complain. But the commons were determined not to accept of any ſatisfaction, unleſs he would name the perſons who adviſed him to purſue that illegal method; a condition which they were ſenſible he would not comply with.

Though the commons were deaf to all the offers made them by his majeſty, the diſtreſs to which himſelf and his family were reduced, excited the compaſſion of the wiſer part of the nation. They were alarmed at the furious proceedings of the commons: no perſon ſeemed to be ſafe, as it could not be known what they would, or what they would not vote to be treaſon. It ſoon appeared that they were determined to ſtrike a terror into every perſon who ſhould venture either to ſpeak his mind, or to do his duty. They allowed the attorney-general but one night to prepare for juſtifying his conduct with regard to his accuſing the five members; and after many captious queſtions, which he could not anſwer without breaking his oath of ſecrecy, they voted him guilty of a high crime, and addreſſed the lords to ſecure his perſon till they could bring him to an open trial. It appears, however, that the true deſign of theſe proceedings againſt the attorney-general was to diſcover the names of the witneſſes whom the king could produce againſt the accuſed members; but in this they were diſappointed by the attorney's firmneſs. Had they ſucceeded in their intention, it might, perhaps, have proved ſtill more favourable to Charles, as it is more than probable, that he had both his information and proof from the Scots, who would then have been obliged to declare in his favour; and they ſeem themſelves to have been apprehenſive of this, for the Scottiſh parliament ordered their commiſſioners to mediate a peace between the king and his parliament.

The accuſed members, who had hitherto affected to remain in the city, now went in triumph to Weſtminſter. Skippon, whom the commons, by their own authority, had appointed major-general of the city militia, conducted them thither at the head of a numerous army. And when the populace paſſed by Whitehall, they aſked, in a very inſulting manner, "What was become of the king and his cavaliers? and whither they were fled?"

From the proceedings of both parties, it now appeared ſufficiently evident, that the ſword alone could decide the conteſt. Charles, however, was ſtill deſirous of averting the horrors of a civil war; and accordingly ſent a meſſage to the parliament, deſiring, "that they would digeſt into one body all the grievances of the kingdom, and to ſend them to him, promiſing his favourable aſſent to thoſe means which ſhould be thought moſt effectual for redreſs." But this requeſt was refuſed; the commons pretended they were engaged in matters of too much importance to admit of time for ſuch kind of buſineſs.

Every candid perſon muſt acknowledge that the conceſſions made by Charles were abundantly ſufficient to have quieted the apprehenſions of men who were deſirous of peace. But the leaders of the party had ſo invincible a diſtruſt of him, that they put no confidence in his promiſes; and were perſuaded that nothing leſs than wreſting all power from his hand would be ſufficient for their ſafety. He, however, ſtood at preſent fairer in the eye of the public than they. He had taken away, by his meſſages and conceſſions, all the points controverted between them. New ones were therefore ſtarted. They deſired him to put the Tower of London, all the forts, and the whole militia of the kingdom, into ſuch hands as they could truſt. Charles agreed to give the command of the Tower to Sir John Conniers, inſtead of Sir John Biron, though the latter had done nothing to merit his diſcharge; but he abſolutely refuſed their requeſt with regard to the militia.

Charles now removed from Hampton-court to Windſor, and employed his time in making diſpoſitions for providing againſt events which he now ſaw no proſpect of avoiding. He perceived that the intention of the parliament was to ſecure the magazines of the Tower of London, Hull, and Portſmouth; and even their addreſſes to him had hinted ſomething of that kind. He had given private orders to the duke of Newcaſtle to ſecure Hull; but the deſign being diſcovered by the treachery of ſome about his perſon, the houſe of commons inſiſted on his attending his duty in parliament; and ordered Sir John Hotham, a gentleman of great eſtate in that neighbourhood, to take care of the place for the parliament. At the ſame time, they paſſed a vote, that the governor of Portſmouth ſhould admit no perſon into that forteſs, nor ſuffer any part of the ordinance or military ſtores to be diſpoſed of, without an order from the king ſignified by both houſes of parliament.

Many people conſidered theſe proceedings as a diſſolution of the regal government; eſpecially as the commons had taken upon themſelves, not only to diſpoſe of the militia and trained bands of the capital, but to name lord-lieutenants of ſeveral counties, and even the captains that were appointed to command the ſhips of war. The duke of Richmond was highly exaſperated at theſe proceedings, and made a motion in the houſe of peers to adjourn for ſix months; but his motion was over-ruled, he was [illegible] cenſured for his conduct, and a proteſt was entered by thoſe lords who were friends to the commons, becauſe, as they pretended, his puniſhment was not adequate to his crime. So dangerous was it to oppoſe the current of popular fury, whatever unconſtitutional methods were made uſe of to effect it!

The duke of Richmond was a nobleman of great ſpirit, nearly related to the king, and in poſſeſſion of a very large eſtate. The leaders of the commons therefore thought it neceſſary to point him out as an object of popular reſentment. They procured an atteſted copy of the proteſt, and reſolved, "that the houſe had ſufficient cauſe to accuſe him of being one of the malignant party, and an ill counſellor to his majeſty." Sir Ralph Hopton alſo felt the weight of their reſentment. He had been one of the moſt ſtrenuous declaimers againſt the real grievances of his country; but was perſuaded the conceſſions made by the king were more than ſufficient for reforming the government, and placing the liberties of the ſubject on a baſis not to be ſhaken: He therefore oppoſed the proceedings of the houſe with great force of reaſon, and ſometimes with indecent expreſſions, ſimilar to thoſe that had been uſed by many of the leaders againſt their ſovereign. But the very words that had been applauded when uttered againſt majeſty, were cenſured when they were directed againſt the leaders of the commons. His ſpeeches were declared malignant, and he was committed priſoner to the Tower.

Theſe proceedings of the commons ſo greatly alarmed the king, that he began to be anxious for the perſonal ſafety of his wife and children, whom he loved with the moſt tender affection. It was therefore reſolved to ſend them to Holland, where they would be beyond the reach of their moſt inveterate enemies. His eldeſt daughter, the princeſs Mary, had been lately married to the prince of Orange, who now greatly intereſted himſelf in favour of his diſtreſſed father-in-law. In conſequence of this determination, Charles accompanied his family to Dover, from whence they embarked for the continent.

While the king was employed in providing for the ſafety of his family, the commons preſented to him a bill for diſpoſing of the militia, or rather putting it entirely into the hands of the parliament. Charles did not abſolutely refuſe the royal aſſent to this bill, but replied, that he was not ſufficiently at leiſure to conſider a matter of ſuch importance, and therefore they muſt wait ſome time before he could give them a poſitive anſwer.

Alarmed at this delay, the parliament inſtantly diſpatched another meſſage to the king, preſſing him for an immediate anſwer. They repreſented, that when dangers and diſtractions prevailed, a delay was of equal conſequence with a denial; that it was their duty to ſee a meaſure ſo neceſſary to the ſafety of the public carried into execution; that the people in many parts of the kingdom had applied to them for that purpoſe, in the moſt earneſt manner; and that, in ſome places, the inhabitants were ſo alarmed at their preſent dangers, that they had exerted their own authority in preparing for their defence.

Charles did not think proper to give the commons an abſolute denial; but deſired that if the military authority was in any part defective, it might be conferred on the crown; promiſing, at the ſame time, that he would immediately give commiſſions to ſuch perſons only as the parliament ſhould name. But this was far from ſatisfying the commons. They replied, that the dangers of the kingdom were ſo preſſing as to admit of no longer delay; and that if his majeſty refuſed to ſatisfy his people, they would do it by their own authority.

Notwithſtanding theſe menaces, the commons did not as yet think proper to pull off the maſk. They pretended the greateſt ſorrow at his majeſty's leaving the capital, and earneſtly preſſed him to return, and fix his reſidence at Whitehall. The king was aſtoniſhed at this meſſage, and gave the following anſwer to the committee who delivered it:

"I am ſo much amazed at this meſſage, that I "know not what to anſwer. You ſpeak of jealou"ſies and fears! Lay your hands upon your hearts, "and aſk yourſelves, whether I may not likewiſe be "diſturbed with fears and jealouſies; and if ſo, I "aſſure you, this meſſage has nothing leſſened them.

"As to the militia, I thought ſo much of it be"fore I gave that anſwer, and am ſo much aſſured, "that the anſwer is agreeable to what in juſtice or "reaſon you can aſk, or I in honour grant, that I "ſhall not alter it in any point.

This anſwer was conſidered by the commons as an abſolute denial to their requeſt: in conſequence of which they declared, that thoſe whoſe counſels the king followed were enemies to the ſtate; that if he perſiſted in his reſolution he would expoſe the ſafety of the three kingdoms to the utmoſt danger, unleſs the parliament provided ſome remedy; and that they approved of the conduct of thoſe who had already put themſelves in a poſture of defence.

Though the commons thus aſſumed an independent authority over their ſovereign, yet they were in reality greatly alarmed, eſpecially when it was known that his majeſty had ſet out to viſit the northern parts of his kingdom, and that he intended to make the city of York the place of his reſidence. As ſoon as Charles reached Huntingdon, he ſent a meſſage to the commons, upbraiding them for their conduct with regard to the affairs of Ireland, and informing them, "that he expected an equal tenderneſs in them with regard to his majeſty's known unqueſtionable privileges, among which he is ſure it is a fundamental one, that his ſubjects cannot be obliged to obey an act, order, or injunction, to which his majeſty hath not given his conſent; and therefore he thinks it neceſſary to publiſh, that he expects, and hereby requires obedience from all his loving ſubjects to the laws eſtabliſhed, and that they preſume not, on any pretence of order or ordinance, to which his majeſty is no party, concerning the militia, or any other things to do, or execute what is not warranted by thoſe laws; his majeſty being reſolved to keep the laws himſelf, and to require obedience to them from all his ſubjects. And his majeſty recommends to his parliament, what he had before required, that they ſhould compoſe and digeſt as ſoon as poſſible, ſuch acts as they ſhall think fit, for the preſent and future eſtabliſhment of their privileges, and the free and quiet enjoyment of their eſtates and fortunes, the liberties of their perſons, the ſecurity of the true religion now profeſſed in the church of England; the maintaining of his majeſty's legal and juſt authority, and the ſettling of his revenue; his majeſty being very deſirous to take all fitting and juſt ways, which may beget a happy underſtanding between him and his parliament, in which he conceives his greateſt power and riches conſiſt."

The commons were ſo irritated at this meſſage, that they determined to inſiſt upon their former reſolutions concerning the militia: they voted ſevere penalties againſt all who had adviſed the king to give the anſwer he did to that bill; and reſolved upon the queſtion, "that when the lords and commons in parliament, which is the ſupreme court of judicature in the kingdom, ſhall declare what the law of the land is; to have this not only queſtioned and controverted, but contradicted, is a high breach of the privilege of parliament."

The king had now reached York, and finding the people faithful to him, he determined firmly to oppoſe the attempts of the parliament with regard to the militia. On the contrary, the commons (reſolved to ſupport the power they had uſurped in contempt of all laws) appointed lord-lieutenants to the different counties, gave them the command of the militia, the garriſons, and all the forts in the kingdom; obliging them to obey his majeſty's orders ſignified to them by both houſes; that is, the orders of parliament, ſignified in the king's name, with an intent to dethrone him. Manifeſtos, the forerunners of civil wars, were publiſhed on both ſides. Thoſe of the king carried with them a force of evidence, which was only oppoſe by invectives. A detail of the ſacrifices and conceſſions he had made, and of the violence and inſult which had been their only reward, gave an appearanc of juſtice to his cauſe. Confiding in the ſtrength o his arguments, the king was deſirous that the declara tions of the parliament might be diſtributed with hi own; while the parliament was very induſtrious t ſuppreſs the king's papers. Lord Falkland, ſecretar of ſtate, and Mr. Hyde, afterwards lord Clarendo were the authors of the papers in behalf of the king In theſe the Engliſh conſtitution was defined wi great preciſion; the three ſpecies of government, th monarchical, the ariſtocratical, and the democratica were diſtinguiſhed; and the government of Englan ſhewn to be a compound of the whole, each tem pering the other.

The civil war was not, indeed, yet declared, b it was ſufficiently evident, that it muſt ſoon be t conſequence from theſe furious meaſures. The ar of all the forces levied againſt the Scots had been d poſited in the magazine of Hull; and Sir Jo Hotham, the governor, had accepted a commiſſi from the parliament, but was thought to be no ene either to the church or monarchy. Theſe circu ſtances induced Charles to believe, that if he pr ceeded in perſon to the gates of that town, before t commencement of hoſtilities, the governor, overaw by his preſence, would admit him with his ordina retinue, by which means he might eaſily becon maſter of ſo important a place. He was, howev miſtaken. Hotham had received ſtrict orders fr the parliament to be upon his guard; ſo that wh Charles appeared before the place, the governor ſ him a very reſpectful meſſage, deſiring his majeſty n to approach nearer to the town; but the king con nuing to advance, he ordered the bridge to be dra up, and the garriſon to appear on the walls in a poſt of reſiſtance. When Charles was near enough his voice to be heard by the garriſon, he called Hotham, and demanded entrance; which the vernor refuſed, declaring, that he had received truſt from the parliament. Charles was in no con tion to attack the place; and therefore repeated demand, offering to reduce his train to tw perſons. This was alſo denied; and the king ceiving that the governor was determined to defend the place, he retired, after proclaiming Sir John Hothan a traitor by two heralds at arms. Charles afterwards complained to the parliament of the diſobedience of the governor; but was ſo far from obtaining redreſs, that they juſtified his conduct.

The parliament, however, were greatly alarmed at finding the inhabitants of Yorkſhire attached, in the firmeſt manner, to the royal cauſe. They had raiſed a guard of ſix hundred men for the ſecurity of his majeſty's perſon, and ſeemed determined to aſſiſt him to the utmoſt of their power. The parliament, though they had already levied a guard for themſelves, had attempted to ſeize the whole military power, the navy, and all the forts of the kingdom, yet they immediately voted, "that the king, ſeduced by wicked counſels, intended to make war againſt his parliament, who, in all their conſultations and actions, had propoſed no other end but the care of his kingdoms, and the performance of all duty and loyalty to his perſon: that this attempt was a breach of the truſt repoſed in him by his people, contrary to his oath, and tending to a diſſolution of the government; and that whoever ſhould aſſiſt him in ſuch a war were traitors by the fundamental laws of the kingdom."

The proceedings of the two parties being now in- ompatible, both ſides made the neceſſary prepara- ations for deciding the diſpute by force of arms. The arliament appointed the earl of Eſſex general of eir forces; and the ardour was ſo great among the eople in the capital, that no leſs than four thouſand en inliſted in one day. At the ſame time, the par- ament voted a declaration, which they required very member to ſubſcribe, that they would live and ie with their general. Orders were iſſued for bring- g in loans of money, in order to maintain the rces levied to defend the parliament: and the zeal of e people was, in this particular, more remarkable an their enliſting under Eſſex; for during ten days, e throng was ſo great, that the perſons appointed to eceive the offerings of the populace had neither time r room ſufficient for the purpoſe; many of them ere therefore obliged to carry back their treaſures, l a more convenient opportunity offered for their ing received.

But notwithſtanding the parliament were thus ſup- orted by the voluntary offerings of the people, they ere totally eclipſed by the ſplendid appearance of e nobility, who flocked to the king at York. Above rty peers of the higheſt rank in the kingdom at- nded upon Charles, among whom was the lord- eper Littleton; while the houſe of lords at Weſt- inſter ſeldom conſiſted of more than ſixteen mem- rs, and even ſome of theſe were of the royal party, d conſtantly oppoſed the meaſures of the commons. he king iſſued commiſſions of array all over the gdom, but the execution of them was voted trea- able by the parliament. They were, however, eatly aſtoniſhed and alarmed, when they perceived large and reſpectable a part of the kingdom had de- red for the king; and, in conſequence thereof, a w ſet of propoſitions were made, on which they re willing to come to an agreement. Their de- nds were as follow:

"1. That the officers of the crown, the miniſters of ſtate, and the governors of all the ports and forts of the kingdom, ſhall be choſen and approved of by the two houſes, or by the council in the intervals of parliament. 2. That no places ſhall be given for life; but that thoſe on whom they ſhould be beſtowed, may hold them no longer than they diſcharge their duty well. 3. That the two houſes, and the council, ſhall name the perſon unto whom the government and education of the king's children ſhall be committed. 4. That no marriage ſhall be concluded, or treated, for any of the king's children, without the conſent of parliament. 5. That the laws againſt jeſuits, and other ſecular prieſts, and in general againſt all papiſts, ſhall be ſtrictly put in execution, without any toleration or diſpenſations whatſoever. 6. That the popiſh lords be expelled from the houſe of peers, and their children taken from them, in order to their being brought up in the proteſtant religion. 7. That ſuch a reformation be made of the liturgy and church government, as both houſes of parliament, with the advice of divines, ſhall adviſe. 8. That the king ſhall reſt ſatisfied with the method taken by the parliament for ſettling the militia. 9. That a ſtrict alliance be entered into with the ſtates of the United Provinces, and other neighbouring princes and ſtates of the proteſtant religion, againſt the pope and his adherents. 10. That the five impeached members be cleared by act of parliament, and reſtored to their rights, that future parliaments may be ſecured from the conſequence of that bad example. 11. That peers made hereafter be reſtrained from ſitting and voting in parliament, without the conſent of both houſes. 12. That the military forces now attending the king be diſcharged. 13. That the lords and others of the privy-council, and others in offices and employments, be removed, except ſuch only as ſhall be approved by both houſes of parliament; and that the perſons made choice of to fill their places and employments may be approved of by both houſes of parliament; and that the privy counſellors ſhall take an oath for the due execution of their places, in ſuch form as ſhall be approved of by the parliament. 14. That the great affairs of the kingdom ſhall not be concluded nor tranſacted by the advice of private men, or by any unknown or unſworn counſellors; but that ſuch matters as concern the public, and are proper for the high court of parliament, ſhall be debated, reſolved, and tranſacted only in parliament; and ſuch as ſhall preſume to do any thing to the contrary ſhall be reſerved to the cenſure and judgment of parliament; and ſuch other matters of ſtate as are proper for the privy-council ſhall be debated and concluded by ſuch of the nobility and others as ſhall, from time to time, be choſen to fill that board, by approbation of both houſes of parliament; and that no public act, concerning the affairs of the kingdom, which is proper for the privy-council, ſhall be eſteemed of any validity, as proceeding from the royal authority, unleſs it be done with the advice and conſent of the major part of the council, atteſted under their hands; that the council ſhall be limited to a certain number, not exceeding twenty-five, nor under fifteen; and if any counſellor's place happen to be vacant, it ſhall not be ſupplied without the aſſent of the major part of the council, which choice ſhall be confirmed at the next ſitting of parliament, or elſe be void. 15. That the lord high-ſteward of England, the lord high-conſtable, the lord chancellor, or keeper of the great ſeal, the lord treaſurer, the lord privy-ſeal, the earl marſhal, the lord admiral, the warden of the cinque ports, the chief governor of Ireland, the chancellor of the exchequer, the maſter of the wards, the ſeveral ſecretaries of ſtate, the two chief juſtices and chief baron, ſhall always be choſen with the approbation of both houſes of parliament; and in the intervals of parliament, by the aſſent of the major part of the council, in the ſame manner as is before expreſſed in the choice of counſellors.

" 16. That ſuch members of either houſe of parliament, as, during this preſent parliament, have been put out of any place or office, ſhall either be reſtored, or otherwiſe have ſatisfaction upon the petition of ſuch houſe of which they are members. 17. That all privy-counſellors and judges ſhall take an oath, the form whereof ſhall be agreed upon and ſettled by act of parliament, for maintaining the petition of right, and of certain ſtatutes made by this parliament, which ſhall be mentioned by both houſes; and that an inquiry of all breaches and violations of thoſe laws ſhall be given in charge by the juſtices of the king's bench every term, and by the judges of aſſize in their circuits, and juſtices of peace at the ſeſſions, to be preſented and puniſhed according to law. 18. That the juſtice of parliament ſhall paſs upon all delinquents, whether they be within the kingdom or in foreign parts; and that all perſons cited by either houſe of parliament ſhall appear, and abide by the cenſure of parliament. 19. That a general pardon ſhall be granted, with ſuch exceptions as ſhall be adviſed by both houſes of parliament."

It was not reaſonable to imagine that Charles would ever comply with theſe demands, which were manifeſtly calculated to deprive him even of the ſhadow of regal authority. No ſubjects had ever talked in ſo high a ſtrain ſince Henry III. was in the power of the Mountforts. They had, indeed, ſo changed every part of the conſtitution, that it ſcarce retained any veſtige of its former ſtate, except the name of a king at the head of a republic. "Should I grant theſe demands," ſaid the king in his reply, "I may be waited on bare-headed, I may have my hand kiſſed, the title of majeſty may be continued to me, and The king's authority, ſignified by both houſes, may be ſtill the ſtyle of your commands; I may have ſwords and maces carried before me, and pleaſe myſelf with the ſight of a crown and ſceptre, (though even theſe twigs would not long flouriſh, when the ſtock upon which they grew was dead): but as to true and real power, I ſhould remain but the outſide, but the picture, but the ſign of a king."

Nor did Charles content himſelf with refuſing theſe demands of the parliament. He retorted their accuſations with great force; and exhibited his charge againſt the commons in a very ſpirited and maſterly manner.

The ſword of civil diſcord was now drawn, and both parties made preparations for deciding by it the dreadful conteſt. Hambden, Whitlocke, Mainyard, Grimſtone, St. John, and Selden, accepted of the parliament's commiſſions, under the ordinance of militia; but the great weight of landed intereſt declared for the king. Charles was furniſhed by his queen with money, which ſhe had borrowed upon her jewels; but the parliament had a much ſurer reſource in public credit, upon which great ſums were raiſed by way of loan; and ſmall ſkirmiſhes paſſed between the royal and parliamentary parties in different parts of the kingdom.

The greater number of the lords were now with the king, and thoſe who remained in the houſe knew not how to act, being, from various cauſes, fearful of declaring their ſentiments. Some of them were reduced by the authority of Eſſex, and the leading members of the commons; ſome were intimidated by the danger to which their perſons were expoſed, by the inſolence of the populace; ſome by the threats of the commons to annihilate their order; ſome were influenced by reſentment, and ſome by principle; ſo that upon the whole there was not a party ſufficient, in their houſe, to ſtem the dreadful torrent that was now ready to ruſh upon the conſtitution. The venerable earl of Briſtol, diſdaining the ignoble motives of reſentment for the uſage he had met with from the king, in a very pathetic, but ineffectual, ſpeech, expoſed the impending calamities of England, and exhorted them to conclude a peace with the king on honourable terms. But his advice, however prudent and ſalutary, produced not the deſired effect; the parliament were determined to puſh the advantage they enjoyed over the king to the utmoſt extremity. Hollis, by order of the houſe of commons, demanded at the bar of the lords the names of thoſe peers who had refuſed to comply with the ordinance for the militia, and made an ungenerous uſe of the diſcovery. The names of thoſe that were known to be well affected to the king were publiſhed, by which means the were inſulted by the populace, and could not attend their duty in parliament without being expoſed to the utmoſt danger; while thoſe who had the courage to join his majeſty were branded with the opprobrious title of "betrayers of the liberty of their country." The commons likewiſe voted, that all horſes ſent to the north, without an order from parliament, ſhould be ſeized and ſecured. At the ſame time they voted nine of the lords incapable of ever again ſitting in parliament. In conſequence of this laſt reſolution, the nobility who were with the king ſigned a paper, "that they would obey no orders or commands whatever, but ſuch as were warranted by the known laws of the land; that they would defend the king's perſon, crown and dignity, together with his majeſty's juſt and legal prerogative, againſt all perſons and power whatſoever; that they would defend the true proteſtant religion, eſtabliſhed by the law of the land, the lawful liberties of the ſubjects of England, and the juſt privileges of his majeſty and both houſes of parliament; and that they would obey no rule, order or ordinance whatſoever, that had not the royal aſſent."

Animated by theſe aſſurances of ſupport, Charles having collected a few forces, advanced to the ſouthward, and, on his arrival at Nottingham, he erected his royal ſtandard, the open ſignal of diſcord and civil war throughout the nation.

Never perhaps was a quarrel more unequal than that between the two contending parties, when Charles erected his ſtandard. The parliament were maſters of the royal revenues, the fleet, the ſea-ports, and all the magazines of arms and ammunition. The king was deſtitute of almoſt every advantage. He had neither arms nor ammunition, except what belonged to the trained bands of the counties favourable to his intereſt, and a ſmall ſupply ſent him by his queen from Holland. It is therefore no wonder that the parliament entertained the moſt ſovereign contempt for all the efforts they ſuppoſed the king was capable of making in ſupport of his prerogative; many imagined that he would not even attempt to make a reſiſtance, but muſt at laſt yield to the pretenſions, however enormous, of the two houſes. To this perſuaſion Charles owed his ſafety. Even after his ſtandard was erected, the danger of a civil war was not, in general, apprehended; nor was it imagined would have the imprudence to engage his implacable enemies, and render his condition ſtill more deſperate, by oppoſing a force ſo greatly ſuperior to his own. Theſe hopes were confirmed by the low condition his army, if indeed his new forces deſerved that name, when he appeared at Nottingham. His train of tillery, though far from being large, he had been obliged to leave behind him at York, for want horſes to draw it. The troops of the parliament, conſiſting of above ſix thouſand men, well armed and well appointed, lay at Northampton, under command of the earl of Eſſex, within a few days march of him, and ſeemed to threaten him with inevitable deſtruction.

When Charles reflected on theſe circumſtances, he as greatly alarmed at his ſituation, and determined o make one more effort for concluding a peace with is parliament. He accordingly ſent a meſſage to he two houſes, by the hands of the earls of South-mpton and Dorſet, Sir John Culpepper, and Sir William Uvedale. He propoſed to open a negotia-ion immediately, in order to conclude a treaty of eace. He aſſured them that nothing on his part hould be wanting to advance the true proteſtant re-gion, oppoſe popery and ſuperſtition, ſecure the laws f the kingdom, confirm all the juſt power and privi-eges of parliament, and render both king and peo-le happy. " Bring with you (added he) as firm reſolutions to do your duty, and let all our people join with us in our prayers to Almighty God, for his bleſſing upon this work."

The commons, however, inſteadof joining with the ing in propoſals for reſtoring the public tranquillity, proached him with having erected his royal ſtand-d; and refuſed to open any negotiation, unleſs he ould recall all his proclamations publiſhed againſt em. Even this anſwer did not exaſperate Charles make uſe of any indecent expreſſions; he offered take down his ſtandard, and recall his proclama-ns, provided they would recall the papers they had bliſhed againſt him and his friends. This was ab-lutely refuſed; they would agree to no terms, unleſs would immediately take down his ſtandard, and call his proclamations, without their acting a reci-ocal part.

But this negotiation, unſucceſsful as it was, did arles the greateſt ſervice. The parliament had ated the king's meſſengers with the utmoſt indigni-; they did not even pay the common civility to ir perſons. At the ſame time, they ordered all ir officers to repair to their reſpective poſts imme-tely, and publiſhed the following declaration to dicate their conduct:

" Whereas his majeſty, in his meſſage, requires, that the parliament ſhould revoke their declarations againſt ſuch perſons as had aſſiſted his majeſty in this unnatural war againſt his kingdom; it is this day ordered and declared by the lords and commons, that the arms which they have been forced to take up, for the parliament, the religion, the laws, and the liberties of the kingdom, ſhall not be laid down till his majeſty ſhall withdraw his protection from ſuch perſons as have been voted by both houſes to be delinquents, and ſhall leave them to the juſtice of the parliament, to be proceeded with according to their demerits; to the end, that both this and ſucceeding generations may ake warning, how they incur the like heinous crimes; and alſo to the end that thoſe great charges and damages, wherewith all the commonwealth have been burthened ſince his majeſty's departure from the parliament, may be borne by the delinquents and other malignant and diſaffected perſons; and that all his majeſty's good and well affected ſubjects, who by loan of monies, or otherwiſe at their charge, have aſſiſted the common-wealth in ime of extreme danger, may be repaid all ſums of money lent them for thoſe purpoſes, out of the eſtates of the ſaid delinquents, and of the malignant nd diſaffected party in the kingdom."

The commons flattered themſelves with receiving t advantages from this declaration; but they were h deceived: on the contrary, it turned the tide popular affection ſtrongly in favour of the king. this was perceived by the parliament, they were e cautious in their proceedings; and, perhaps, to ſingle conſideration the king owed his ſafety, ch was now looked on as ſo precarious, that Sir ob Aſtley, whom the king had appointed major-general of his army, told him, that he could not give him aſſurance but he might be taken out of his bed, ſhould the rebels make a briſk attempt for that purpoſe.

In conſequence of this it was determined that the royal army ſhould leave Nottingham, and the king accordingly began his march for Shrewſbury, the moſt convenient town in England for the rendezvous of his army. Every hour during his march added conſiderable acceſſions to his ſtrength, the people flocking from all parts to join the royal ſtandard. On his arrival at Wellington (a day's march from Shrewſbury) Charles ordered his army to be drawn up, ranged in ſeveral diviſions under proper officers, and his military orders to be publiſhed at the head of each regiment. As ſoon as this was done, he mounted his horſe, and placing himſelf, as near as poſſible, in the center of his army, addreſſed them as follows:

" Gentlemen,

" You have heard theſe orders read: it is your " part, in your ſeveral places, to obſerve them ex-" actly. The time cannot be long before we come " to action, therefore you have the more reaſon to " be careful; and I muſt tell you I ſhall be very " ſevere in the puniſhing of thoſe, of what condition " ſoever, who ſhall tranſgreſs theſe inſtructions. I " cannot ſuſpect your courage and reſolution; your " conſcience and your loyalty have brought you hi-" ther, to fight for your religion, your king, and the " laws of your land. You ſhall meet with no enemies " but traitors, moſt of them browniſts, anabaptiſts, " and atheiſts; ſuch who deſire to deſtroy both church " and ſtate, and who have already condemned you " to ruin for being loyal to us. That you may ſee " what uſe I mean to make of your valour, if it " pleaſe God to bleſs us with ſucceſs, I have thought " fit to publiſh my reſolution to you, in a proteſta-" tion, which, when you have heard me make, you " will believe you cannot fight in a better quarrel; " in which I promiſe to live and die with you.

" I do promiſe, in the preſence of almighty God, " and as I hope for his bleſſing and protection, that " I will, to the utmoſt of my power, defend and " maintain the true reformed proteſtant religion, " eſtabliſhed in the church of England; and by the " grace of God, in the ſame will live and die.

" I deſire to govern by all the known laws of the " land; and that the liberty and property of the " ſubjects may be preſerved by them with the ſame " care as my own juſt rights. And, if it pleaſe God, " by his bleſſing upon this army, raiſed for my ne-" ceſſary defence, to preſerve me from the preſent " rebellion; I do ſolemnly and faithfully promiſe, " in the ſight of God, to maintain the juſt privileges " and freedom of parliament, and to govern to the " utmoſt of my power by the known laws of the " kingdom; and particularly to obſerve inviolably " the laws to which I have given my conſent in this " parliament. In the mean while, if this time of " war, and the great neceſſity to which I am now " driven beget any violation of law, I hope it will be " imputed, by God and man, to the authors of this " war, and not to me, who have ſo earneſtly la-" boured for the preſervation of the peace of the " kingdom.

" When I willingly fail in theſe particulars, I ſhall " expect no aid or relief from man, nor protection " from above. But in this reſolution I hope for the " chearful aſſiſtance of all good men, and am confi-" dent of the bleſſing of heaven."

The effects this ſpeech produced were of the moſt advantageous nature. The whole army were animated with freſh ſpirits; they promiſed to live and die with their ſovereign; they now conſidered him not only as the father, but the guardian of his country. His cauſe became ſo popular, that the town of Shrewſbury declared in his favour, by which he acquired a communication with all North Wales, and other places beyond the Severn.

The king had now learned, in the ſchool of adverſity, the uſeful leſſons of complaiſance, affability, and other popular arts, which he practiſed with infinite ſucceſs. He erected a mint at Shrewſbury, and the nobility and gentry of his party poured in money and plate with as much zeal, though not in ſuch large quantities, as the Londoners had done to the parliament. He had ſtooped to many other meaſures, which nothing but his neceſſities could juſtify, for raiſing money, and his troops were as regularly paid as thoſe of the parliament, and as little burthenſome to the country. The people were charmed to ſee the alteration made in the king, with regard to his addreſs and behaviour. In all his excurſions and marches, he repeated to his people his tenderneſs for their laws and liberties, and his reſolution rather to die than infringe them. This behaviour gained the hearts of the populace ; they flocked to his ſtandard, and his army amounted to ten thouſand men.

On the firſt appearance of the commotions in England, the two princes, Rupert and Maurice, ſons to the unfortunate Palatine, offered their ſervice to the king, and the former now commanded a body of horſe, which had been detached to Worceſter, in order to watch the motions of Eſſex, who was then on his march towards that city. Rupert had hardly reached Worceſter, before he ſaw a body of the enemy's cavalry approaching the gates. He immediately attacked them with the utmoſt fury. The diſpute was very obſtinate, till colonel Sandys, who commanded the parliament's detachment, being mortally wounded, they gave way, and were totally routed by the royal party.

This action, though inconſiderable in itſelf, tended greatly to raiſe the ſpirits of the king's forces, and it was determined to march immediately to meet the parliament's army, and, if poſſible, decide the quarrel by a general battle. The royal forces were commanded by the earl of Lindeſey, who had ſerved many years in the Low Countries with great applauſe: prince Rupert commanded the horſe: Sir Jacob Aſtley the foot: Sir Arthur Aſton the dragoons: Sir John Heydon the artillery: and lord Bernard Stuart a troop of guards. Lord Clarendon ſays, that the eſtate and revenues of this ſingle troop were at leaſt equal to that of all the lords and commons, who remained in the parliament at Weſtminſter. Nor will this appear improbable when it is conſidered, that both houſes were remarkably thin ; the commons often voting matters of the greateſt moment, when not more than forty-five or fifty members ſat in the houſe.

Charles left Shrewſbury on the 12th of October, and, in order to bring on a battle with the army of Eſſex, purſued his march towards the capital with great expedition. This alarmed the parliament ſo much, that they ſent repeated expreſſes to their general to ſtop the progreſs of the royal army. Eſſex obeyed with reluctance. He was very unwilling to begin a war, which threatened the deſtruction of his country ; but at laſt determined to obey the orders of his maſters.

The two armies were now within ſix miles of each other. The king's army lay in the neighbourhood of Banbury, and that of the parliament at Keinton in Warwickſhire. In the night of the 22d of October Charles received intelligence from prince Rupert, that the enemy was approaching ; in conſequence of which, early the next morning, the king repaired to the top of Edge-hill, fully reſolved to give them battle ; and ſhewed himſelf as ready to expoſe his perſon as any private officer in the whole army. As each ſeemed equally forward for an engagement, the forenoon was ſpent in drawing up both armies, in which the king was the leſs expeditious, as ſome of his foot were not yet come up, and his ſituation was ſuch, that he could not be attacked without great diſadvantage.

The right wing of the parliament's army was compoſed of a conſiderable body of troops, which lined ſome hedges, and two bodies of horſe, drawn up near the town of Keinton. The left wing was compoſed of a ſtrong body of foot and a thouſand horſe, commanded by Ramſay, a Scotch officer ; and the center, which was deſigned as a body of reſerve, by Sir William Balfour, under the earl of Bedford, general of the horſe. Eſſex himſelf reſolved to charge in perſon at the head of a regiment of foot.

The right wing of the royal army was commanded by prince Rupert, the left by general Wilmot, and the center by Sir John Biron. The king intended to have ſcattered ſome proclamations among the parliament army, offering his pardon to ſuch officers and ſoldiers as ſhould join his forces; but this pruden meaſure was neglected ; and the old earl of Lindeſey was ſo affected at the heat and animoſity of the young officers, that he declared, " he did not look upon himſelf as a general, but would die as a private colonel, with a pike in his hand, at the head of his own regiment."

Sir Faithful Forteſcue, who had levied a body o horſe to ſerve againſt the rebels in Ireland, had bee obliged to ſerve in the parliamentary army, and wa now poſted in the left wing ; but he no ſooner perceived prince Rupert advancing, than ordering hi troop to diſcharge their piſtols in the ground, h joined the royal detachment. This incident, together with the furious charge of the prince, ſtruck th whole left wing with conſternation ; they gave a ver diſorderly fire, and were broken, routed, and drive off the field by prince Rupert, who purſued the above two miles, forgetting that he carried with hi the flower of the royal army, and thereby expoſe the king and the remaining part of his forces to th moſt imminent danger. The right wing of the parliament's army had no better ſucceſs. Chaſed fro their ground by lord Wilmot and Sir Robert Aſto they alſo took to 'flight. The action had hithert been chiefly among the horſe, the foot on both ſide were pretty entire, and fought with great courag The forces of Eſſex made their chief efforts again the king's ſtandard, which was carried by Sir Edward Verney, and bravely defended by the royaliſts but their principal attack was againſt the diviſion commanded by Sir William Stapleton. It was here th error committed in drawing up the king's forces w perceived. For though the body of reſerve und Sir John Biron had now advanced and joined in th attack againſt the artillery of Eſſex, and were on th point of taking it, yet Balfour's reſerve was ſtill entire, and advanced to the relief of the artillery j at the time when Stapleton was going to abandon Had prince Rupert, or general Wilmot, returned this critical moment, the victory had been complet and perhaps a final period put to the civil war; b both theſe commanders were at a great diſtance, a the diſpute was now very unfavourable to the kin For Balfour's diviſion charged him in flank and re with ſo much fury, that the earl of Lindeſey, fig ing on foot at the head of his regiment, was morta wounded, the royal ſtandard was taken, and ſome the king's cannon nailed up.

During this furious engagement, Charles, attend by his two ſons, was in the center of his own foot, a ſmall diſtance from the hotteſt part of the ſervic but, upon Balfour's breaking in, his perſon was in moſt imminent danger, and he ſent the two princes back to the hill, which they reached with ſome difficulty. The duke of Richmond, the earl of Dorſet, and ſeveral other noblemen, kept by his perſon; and it was here that Charles had the firſt opportunity of ſhewing his perſonal courage. For drawing his ſword, and advancing to attack the enemy, his ſoldiers were ſo animated by the example of their king, that they returned to the charge with more fury than ever; the royal ſtandard was retaken, and the enemy in their turn obliged to give ground. Rupert, at the head of his horſe, now returned from the unſeaſonable purſuit, and the battle aſſumed all the appearances of beginning afreſh. The prince ſaw, with aſtoniſhment, that every thing bore the appearance of a defeat inſtead of a victory; but his troops were ſatisfied with carnage, and could not be prevailed upon to renew the attack. The two armies faced each other for ſome time, but neither of them ſhewed courage ſufficient for a new battle. All night they lay upon their arms; and the next morning perceived themſelves in ſight of each other; but neither general nor ſoldier ſhewed any diſpoſition to renew the fight. Eſſex firſt drew off his forces, and retired to Warwick. The king returned to his former quarters. The loſs was greateſt on the ſide of the parliament; and near five thouſand men were found dead on the field of battle. On the king's ſide the earl of Lindeſey, lord Aubigny, and Sir Edmund Verney, the king's ſtandard-bearer, were ſlain in the action; and the lord Willoughby, Sir Thomas Lunſford, Sir William Vavaſor, and Sir Edward Stradling taken priſoners. Among the parliamentarians, the lord St. John, and colonel Eſſex, one of their beſt officers, were killed, and Sir William Eſſex, father to the colonel of the ſame name, was aken priſoner. The coach of the earl of Eſſex, ith ſome of his papers and his waggons, fell into he hands of the royaliſts.

This was the firſt action of any conſequence that appened between Charles and his parliament: and ough neither could boaſt of any remarkable adantage, it occaſioned a general conſternation in the ingdom. A civil war was known in England only by ading or tradition; the inhabitants were not yet hatuated to conſider one another as enemies in the ld, nor to think it their duty to plunge their ſwords the breaſts of their friends, their neighbours, their lations, their brothers, and their parents; for ſuch re the horrors entailed upon civil war. Both parties erefore ſhuddered at dipping their hands in the ood of their countrymen; but when the firſt dreadl eſſay was over, all ties of nature and duty were rgotten; all relations, however tender, diſappeared; ey wantoned in floods of cruelty, and ſported upon e wrecks of their country. The diſpoſitions of both rties were ſo violent, that it was almoſt impoſſible r any man to remain neuter, without expoſing himf and his family to inevitable ruin. Many had ned the parliament merely from a received opinion, at the king was utterly incapable of making even hew of reſiſtance, and muſt be obliged, without uſion of blood, to comply with their demands. t when they ſaw him joined by thoſe, who had ely appeared at the head of the moſt forward opers of whatever was uſurped, or even doubtful in e prerogative; when they ſaw him ſurrounded by plendid court, and retain all the forms of law and ice; when they ſaw the nobleſt blood in England ered to be ſhed in his defence, and his own perſon poſed at the head of the army with as much appearce of reſolution, as that of a common ſoldier of tune, they began to imagine they had been too ly in their choice, and to repent of their precipie engagements: but they had gone too far to ret, and were obliged to ſtand or fall by the party they had embraced; thinking that the king, whatever profeſſions he might make, never could pardon the provocations he had received.

After Charles had refreſhed his troops, and placed a garriſon in Banbury, he continued his march to Oxford, the only place in his dominions at his devotion. But as the weather ſtill continued favourable, the royal army was not ſuffered to remain idle. One Martin had been appointed governor of Reading by the parliament, who had conſiderably augmented the fortifications of the town. A party of horſe was therefore detached to make an attempt upon the place, which was thought of great importance. At their approach both the governor and garriſon were ſeized with a panic, and fled with the utmoſt precipitation to London, ſo that the royal detachment entered the town without oppoſition. This remarkable ſucceſs induced Charles to march his whole army to Reading; and to form the deſign of approaching the capital itſelf.

The commons, alarmed at the king's progreſs, and the conſequences that might enſue if his army ſhould reach the city, ſent an expreſs to the earl of Eſſex, ordering him to march with the utmoſt expedition to London. He obeyed the order, and was received by both houſes as a conqueror: they alſo made him a preſent of five thouſand pounds, declaring "that they were infinitely obliged to the ſaid "earl, for the great and acceptable ſervice he had "done the common wealth, and that they ſhould be "ready on all occaſions to expreſs the due ſenſe they "have of his merit, by aſſiſting and protecting him, "and all others under his command, with their lives "and fortunes, to the utmoſt of their power; that "this ſhould remain upon record in both houſes of "parliament for a mark of honour to his perſon, "name, and family, and for a monument of his ſingular virtue to all poſterity."

But notwithſtanding this compliment paid to Eſſex, ſeveral of the moſt diſtinguiſhed perſons in the parliament were diſſatisfied with the great powers with which he was inveſted; and were very deſirous of preventing any farther effuſion of human blood, if an equitable accommodation could be obtained. They were perſuaded that the king would have no objection to enter into a treaty with the parliament, if he could procure the ſafety of his friends, who had, in a manner, been proſcribed by both houſes. But this was not likely to be effected. All the priſons, ſeveral of the halls, and other large houſes in London, were filled with thoſe the parliament termed delinquents; among whom were ſome of the aldermen both above and below the chair, and many of the richeſt citizens. Theſe commitments had been made with all the inſolence of power; and the goods, money, and houſes of the delinquents, had been ſeized, in as arbitrary a manner as any act of authority ever committed by the king. The delinquents were not only puniſhed before conviction, but upon the ſlighteſt ſuſpicions.

Theſe arbitrary proceedings could not fail of alarming every perſon of ſenſe and reflexion; and peace now appeared to be a very deſirable object. The parliament had diſcharged many ſuſpected officers and ſoldiers, who not having an opportunity of joining the royal army, continued in the neighbourhood of London, and were perpetually forming cabals againſt the parliament. As it was impoſſible to prevent their correſpondence with the king's friends, Charles conceived great hopes of their aſſiſtance, and this motive induced him to continue his march towards the capital. Previous to his leaving Reading, he ſent a proclamation of pardon to the cities of London and Weſtminſter; but this the parliament ordered the ſheriffs to repreſs; the moſt effectual method they could have taken to render it univerſally known. At the ſame time Sir Peter Killigrew was ſent with a petition to his majeſty, for fixing ſome place near London where he might reſide, while the negotiations for a peace were carrying on. Charles ſhewed great readineſs to embrace this offer, named Windſor as the place for carrying on the conferences, and deſired that the parliament's garriſon might be removed, and his own troops admitted into that caſtle.

In the mean time Eſſex ordered ſix thouſand of his troops to march to Kingſton, that they might be in readineſs to advance to Hounſlow, to ſtop the progreſs of the royal army, provided they continued their march towards London; and ſent ſeveral of his beſt regiments to Brentford, where they threw up ſome works, while another ſtrong detachment filed off towards Acton.

As ſoon as Killigrew received the king's anſwer, he immediately ſet out for London. On his reaching Brentford, and finding it full of ſoldiers, he ſtrongly repreſented to Eſſex that he feared his advancing ſo far from the city might prove an obſtacle to the peace; but Eſſex took no notice of it. Killigrew, however, on his arrival at Weſtminſter, prevailed with the parliament to write a letter to the king, intimating their deſign that a ceſſation of arms ſhould take place between the two armies.

The active prince Rupert had been perpetually ſcouring the country at the head of his cavaliers. He well knew that the ſecret intention of Charles was, if poſſible, to march to London; and foreſaw it would be very difficult, if not impoſſible, to effect it, if Eſſex had time ſufficient to compleat his diſpoſitions. It is ſufficiently evident, that the commons themſelves never meant that their petition for peace ſhould imply a ceſſation of arms; becauſe they thought it neceſſary to make the ceſſation a ſeperate act, which they had diſpatched to Charles by Sir Peter Killigrew. While that gentleman was poſting with it to the king's head quarters, then at Colebrook, prince Rupert attacked the parliament's regiments and works at Brentford with the utmoſt fury; and, notwithſtanding they made a noble reſiſtance, they were all cut off, wounded, or taken priſoners, and the prince remained maſter of the town. In the heat of this action Killigrew arrived, with the letter for a ceſſation of arms in his pocket, and immediately informed Eſſex of the purport of his meſſage. Eſſex would not ſuffer him to proceed any further, and made the neceſſary diſpoſitions for acting on the defenſive, till he could receive reinforcements from London.

The king now moved with his whole army to Brentford; while the city marched its trained bands, in excellent order, to join the earl of Eſſex, who determined, at all events, to engage the royal army. The parliamentary forces amounted to 24,000 fighting men, beſides detachments, conſiſting of 1,000 more, which might have been recalled in a few hours. Eſſex was likewiſe poſſeſſed of a complete train of artillery, which he drew up in a lane between Turnham Green and Hammerſmith. His van conſiſted of Stapleton's and Goodwyn's regiments of horſe. His main body and reſerve were compoſed of his infantry, intermixed with the city trained bands. His cavalry formed the wings, the left extending towards the Thames, and the right towards Acton. A council of war being held, it was propoſed by ſome of the officers, that the party lying at Kingſton ſhould advance towards Hounſlow; that two of the beſt regiments of horſe ſhould defile off towards Acton; and that, upon a ſignal given, Eſſex, at the head of the main body, ſhould advance in front; by which means the king's army would be attacked at one and the ſame time in front, flank and rear. But none of the principal officers were for putting the ſucceſs of the war upon the iſſue of a ſingle battle; becauſe if they gained the victory, the conſtitution muſt be deſtroyed; if they were defeated, both themſelves, their friends, the city of London, and the cauſe of liberty itſelf, muſt be left to the mercy of an incenſed ſovereign, and a furious army. Eſſex, however, thought that ſome art was neceſſary in order to ſupport his deſign of not coming to a general engagement. It was urged that the intended detachments would ſo greatly weaken the center of the army, that the king might eaſily force his paſſage, and get between them and London, before either the flank or rear of his army could be attacked, eſpecially as it was known with what irreſiſtable fury prince Rupert charged at the head of his cavaliers. It was therefore reſolved not to venture a general engagement; that the three thouſand men lying at Kingſton ſhould immediately march to London, where their appearance was highly neceſſary to allay a ſtrong ferment that now appeared in favour of his majeſty; and that the detachment at Acton ſhould rejoin the main body. Both armies continued to face each other for ſome time, and ſeveral ſmall ſkirmiſhes happened between the advanced parties, but nothing material occurred. At laſt they both retired, the king to Colebrook, and Eſſex to London.

A few days after the two armies retired, the parliament ſent the following meſſage to the king:

"May it pleaſe your majeſty,

"It is humbly deſired by both houſes of parliament that your majeſty will be pleaſed to return to your parliament, with your royal, not your martial attendants; to the end that religion, laws, and liberties, may be ſettled by their advice; finding by a late and ſad accident, that your majeſty is environed by ſome ſuch counſellors as rather perſuade a deſperate diviſion, than a joining and good agreement with your parliament and people: and we ſhall be ready to give your majeſty aſſurance of ſuch ſecurity as may be for your honour, and the ſafety of your royal perſon."

Beſides this meſſage, petitions were now drawin up by the cities of London and Weſtminſter for peace, which ſo greatly alarmed the violent party i the houſe of commons, that they were ordered to b diſcontinued. Theſe diſorders, and the difficulties t which the commons were now reduced for raiſing th neceſſary ſupplies, encouraged Charles, in anſwer t their late addreſs, to tell them, "That he hoped a
" his good ſubjects would look upon that meſſag
" with indignation, as intended, by the contrivers
" it, to treat him with contempt; and deſigned by th
" malignant party, of whom he had ſo often com
" plained, as a wall of ſeparation between his majeſ
" and his people. That he had often told them t
" reaſons that induced him to leave his capital, fro
" which, indeed, he was driven; and had often com " plained that the greateſt part of his peers, and " the members of the houſe of commons, could n
" with ſafety to their perſons, ſit and vote free
" among them; but were debarred, by violent a
" artful practices, of thoſe privileges which their bir
" rights, and the truſt repoſed in them by their co
" ſtituents, juſtly gave them. That the whole kin
" dom knew an army was raiſed, under pretence
" orders of both houſes, (an uſurpation never bef
" heard of in any age) which army had purſued
" majeſty in his own kingdom; given him battle
" Keinton; and now theſe rebels being recruit " and poſſeſſed of London, he was courteouſly in " ted to return to his parliament, that is, into " power of that army. That ſince the traiterous
" deavours of theſe deſperate men could not ſna
" the crown from his head, it being defended by
" providence of God, and the affections and loy
" of his good ſubjects, they had requeſted him to

"liver it up, and put his own life, together with the "lives, liberties, and fortunes of all his good ſub-
"jects, into their mercileſs hands: that he thought "proper to give no other anſwer to that part of "their petition; but as he imputed not that affront
"to both his houſes of parliament, nor to the major "part of thoſe who were then preſent there, but to
"that dangerous party which his majeſty and the "kingdom muſt deteſt, ſo he would not take advan"tage of it: that if they would really purſue the "courſe their petition delivered at Colebrook point-
"ed out, he would perform all he then promiſed;
"whereby the hearts of his diſtreſſed ſubjects might "be raiſed by the hopes of peace, without which "neither religion, the laws, nor the liberties of the "kingdom, could be ſettled and ſecured."

A negotiation, however, was opened at Oxford; and the earl of Nothumberland, with four members of the lower houſe, repaired thither as commiſſioners. In this treaty the king ſtrenuouſly inſiſted on the re-eſtabliſhment of the crown in its legal powers, and on the reſtoration of his conſtitutional prerogative. The parliament ſtill required new conceſſions, and a farther abridgement of legal authority, as a more effectual remedy to their fears and jealouſies. Finding the king ſupported by more forces, and a greater party than they ever had imagined, they ſeemingly abated ſomewhat of the exorbitant conditions they had formerly claimed; but their demands were ſtill too great for an equal treaty. Beſides other articles, to which a complete victory alone could entitle them, they required the king, in expreſs terms, to aboliſh epiſcopacy; a demand which they had only inſinuated before; and deſired that all other eccleſiaſtical controverſies ſhould be determined by their aſſembly of divines. They alſo deſired the king to acquieſce in their ſettlement of the militia, and to confer on their adherents the intire authority of the ſword. And in anſwer to the king's propoſal, that his magazines, towns, forts, and ſhips, ſhould be reſtored to him; the parliament required that they ſhould be put into ſuch hands as they could confide in. And having now, in the eye of the law, been guilty of treaſon in levying war againſt their ſovereign, their fears and jealouſies muſt, on that account, have multiplied extremely, and have rendered their perſonal ſafety ſtill more incompatible with the authority of the monarch. The conferences, therefore, proceeded no farther than the firſt demand, and the parliament's commiſſioners returned ſuddenly to London.

Excluſive of the military operations between the principal armies, which lay in the heart of England, each county, each town, and almoſt each family, was divided within itſelf; and the moſt violent convulſions ſhook the whole kingdom. The two noblemen in the north, on whom Charles principally relied were, the earls of Newcaſtle and Cumberland. The latter ſoon reſigned his command, but the former aſſociated with the northern counties, where the inhabitants were well diſpoſed to join the royal party; and on account of their being ſituated near the borders of Scotland, were much better provided with arms than the other parts, of the kingdom. Newcaſtle, therefore, ſoon raiſed an army of eight thouſand men, but ſo pompouſly divided and ſubdivided into regiments, ſquadrons, and companies, that it appeared to conſiſt of twice the number. The chief adherents to the parliament, among whom were the lord Fairfax, and his ſon Sir Thomas Fairfax, were proclaimed traitors. Lord Fairfax had received a commiſſion to command the parliament's forces in Yorkſhire; but perceiving the people in general were prepoſſeſſed in favour of the king, he was obliged to act only on the defenſive. He attempted to prevent the earl of Newcaſtle from paſſing the river Tees, but his detachment was over-powered, and Newcaſtle marched directly to York, where he was received in triumph by Sir Thomas Glenham, the deputy governor.

During theſe tractions, the queen and Goring landed at Burlington-bay, with a conſiderable quantity of arms, ammunition, and ſome money. The king's affairs in the north were now in a proſperous condition. He had a ſtrong garriſon in Newcaſtle. The regiments that were raiſed againſt him in Richmondſhire and Cleveland had diſbanded themſelves. The earl of Newcaſtle had garriſoned Newark in Nottinghamſhire. A detachment from his army, under the command of Mr. Cavendiſh, had made themſelves maſters of Grantham in Lincolnſhire, and taken three hundred priſoners, with all their arms and ammunition.

The families of Huntingdon and Stamford had been for ſome time at variance with each other; and colonel Haſtings, a younger brother of the former, had oppoſed, with ſucceſs, in Leiceſterſhire, the lord Grey, ſon to the earl of Stamford. The city of Litchfield itſelf was without fortifications; but the cloſe, built by one of its biſhops, was capable of making a good defence, and had been ſeized for the king by a party of Loyaliſts. Lord Broke, one of the moſt zealous parliamentarians in England, was ordered to attack this ſtrong retreat. He accordingly advanced to Litchfield, at the head of a conſiderable detachment, and entered the city without oppoſition, the king's party retiring into the cloſe. While Broke was concerting the proper diſpoſitions for beſieging the place, he was killed by a muſket-ball, and by his death the parliament loſt one of the moſt inveterate enemies Charles had in the nation. This event inſpired his ſoldiers with a deſire to revenge the death of their leader. They ſoon made themſelves maſters of the place, and took the whole party priſoners. The earl of Northampton, who commanded the garriſon of Banbury, was advancing to the relief of Litchfield; but in his march threw himſelf into Stafford, in order to prevent the town from being fortified by Sir John Gell, one of the parliament's generals. Gell abandoned the place at his approach; but being joined by Sir William Brereton he advanced againſt Stafford. Northampton, who knew nothing of the junction, marched immediately out of the town, in order to fight Gell. The conteſt was very ſharp, and though the royaliſts were far inferior in number, Gell's cavalry were totally routed, but the brave earl of Northampton loſt his life in the action. This misfortune ſo intimidated his forces, though they had greatly the advantage, that they retreated to Stafford.

But the moſt remarkable actions of valour were performed in the weſtern parts of the kingdom. Sir Ralph Hopton, at the head of a ſmall troop, being obliged to retire into Cornwall, before the earl of Bedford, who commanded a ſuperior army in Devonſhire, he was joined by the militia, and the whole country reduced to peace and obedience under the king. But the loyaliſts were not contented with the advantages they had gained in Cornwall; they were deſirous of carrying the war into Devonſhire, and reducing that county alſo to ſubjection. Purſuant to this reſolution, Sir Bevil Granville, the moſt popular man in that county, Sir Ralph Hopton, Sir Nicholas Stanning, Arundel and Trevannion, undertook, at their own expence, to raiſe an army for the king; and their great intereſt in Cornwall ſoon enabled them to effect their purpoſe. Hopton had been as forward as any man in the parliament for oppoſing the king's meaſures; but being perſuaded of his majeſty's good intentions, and ſeeing no end of oppoſition but in rebellion, he joined the royal party, and received a commiſſion from the marquis of Hertford to act for Charles in the weſtern counties. Hopton had ſerved many years abroad with great applauſe, and was therefore complimented with the principal command of the army. Their ſucceſs was ſo rapid, that the parliament was alarmed, and ſent orders to Ruthven, governor of Plymouth, to march with all the forces of Dorſet, Somerſet, and Devon, and reduce the whole county of Cornwall to obedience. He obeyed the order, and was ſoon after followed by the earl of Stamford, with a conſiderable reinforcement. Ruthven having entered Cornwall by means of ſome bridges thrown over the Tamar, he marched with the utmoſt expedition, in order to bring on an engagement with the royaliſts before he was joined by Stamford's forces, and obtain alone the honour of that victory which he looked for with aſſurance. The royaliſts were equally impatient to bring the affair to a deciſion, before Ruthven's army received ſo conſiderable a reinforcement. The battle was fought on Braddock-down, and victory declared for the royaliſts, though greatly inferior in numbers. Hopton had a made very artful diſpoſition for the engagement. He concealed two field pices behind his ranks, which opened at every diſcharge. Theſe pieces did great execution among the enemy, and ſoon put them into diſorder. The advantage was immediately perceived by Hopton, who led his forces to the charge, and obtained a complete victory. The rebels loſt above two thouſand five hundred men, together with all their artillery and baggage. Ruthven, with a few broken troops, the poor remains of his army, fled to Saltaſh; but that town being taken by Hopton, he eſcaped with ſome difficulty, and almoſt alone, into Plymouth. The earl of Stamford, informed of Ruthven's defeat, retired to Taviſtock with great precipitation. But he was ſoon after obliged to abandon that town by Sir John Berkeley, who took poſſeſſion of Taviſtock for the king.

A. D. 1643. The loyaliſts, however, notwithſtanding theſe advantages, were greatly diſtreſſed for want both of money and ammunition; and this obliged them to conclude a neutrality with the parliamentary party in Devonſhire. But as ſoon as the ſpring advanced, the commons diſapproved of the treaty, and the war re-commenced, with the appearance of every diſadvantage to the royal party. Stamford, who commanded the parliament's forces, was at the head of near ſeven thouſand men, well provided with money, proviſions, and ammunition. Deſirous of retrieving the honour he had loſt when driven from Taviſtock, he advanced againſt the royaliſts, who were not half his number, and oppreſſed with every kind of neceſſity. Deſpair, blended with their natural valour, now determined them to make one noble effort againſt the enemy. Stamford was encamped on the top of a hill near Stratton; and it was determined to attack them, in four diviſions, by five in the morning, on the ſixteenth of May. One of the diviſions was commanded by lord Mohun and Sir Ralph Hopton; another by Sir Bevil Granville and Sir John Berkeley; a third by Stanning and Trevannion; the fourth by Baſſet and Godolphin. The royaliſts preſſed, with the utmoſt valor, four ways up the hill, and were as obſtinately oppoſed by their enemies. For ſome time the battle continued doubtful, till word was brought to the royal forces that all their ammunition was ſpent, except four barrels of powder. This defect they determined to ſupply with valour, but at the ſame time to conceal it from the ſoldiers. Orders were therefore given to advance, without firing, to the top of the hill, where they would be on equal ground with the enemy. The courage of the officers was ſo well ſeconded by the ſoldiers, that the royaliſts continually gained ground. Major-general Chidley, who commanded the parliament's forces, did every thing becoming a good officer; and when he ſaw his men recoil before the royaliſts, he advanced in perſon at the head of a ſtrong detachment of pikes, and, piercing into the thickeſt of the enemy, was overpowered and taken priſoner. This incident determined the fate of the battle. His men began to give ground apace; ſo that the four parties of royaliſts approaching nearer and nearer, as they aſcended the hill, they at laſt met together on the plain at the top, where they ſignalized their victory with mutual ſhouts and congratulations.

In conſequence of this ſucceſs, Charles ordered the marquis of Hertford, who had raiſed about three thouſand forces in Wales, to join the Corniſh loyaliſts, and puſh their conqueſts ſtill farther in the weſtern counties. In his march he attempted to ſurpriſe Cirenceſter, but failed in the attempt, through ſome unavoidable accidents ariſing from the badneſs of the roads and weather. But as that town was of the utmoſt advantage to the king, prince Rupert undertook that ſervice; and marching with the utmoſt expedition, took the place by ſtorm, cutting to pieces a whole regiment of the parliament's forces, taking eleven hundred priſoners, and about four thouſand ſtands of arms.

But the ſucceſs of the royaliſts in the weſt was in ſome meaſure balanced by that of the parliamentary army commanded by the earl of Eſſex, who had now taken the field, and laid ſiege to Reading. His army conſiſted of twenty thouſand men. The town was bu indifferently fortified, and defended by a garriſon o three thouſand men. The town was but indifferently fortified, and defended by a garriſon of three thouſand foot, and three hundred horſe, commanded by Si Richard Aſton and colonel Fielding. The largenes of the place, the weakneſs of the fortifications, an particularly the great conſumption of gunpowder ne ceſſary for making a vigorous defence, and wit which Charles was very ill provided, had occaſione a motion in the royal council for abandoning th place, and removing the magazines to Oxford: bu before this could be effected, the town was inveſte by the enemy. The approaches, however, wer carried on with ſo little judgement, that it was plai the place would not have been taken, had the fortifi cations been properly conſtructed. The enemy however, enjoyed great advantages from the ſituatio of the place, their cannon playing directly into th town, by which means ſeveral of the garriſon we killed, and Sir Richard Aſton dangerouſly wounde The diſabling of this able commander was of the u moſt importance, as the king was now advancing, the head of his army, to relieve the town. F while he was on his march, the garriſon, under Fiel ing, who had now ſucceeded to the command, af killing a great number of the enemy in their ſallie thought proper to capitulate, by which the town w delivered up to the parliament's army. By the ar cles of the capitulation, the whole garriſon were march out with the honours of war, and be at f liberty to join the royal army; but all deſerters we to be given up to the enemy. The laſt conditi was thought ſo ignominious and prejudicial to king's affairs, that Fielding was tried by a court-m tial, and condemned to loſe his his head for grant it; but his ſentence was afterwards remitted.

Though Eſſex had ſucceeded in his enterprize, a his army, during the ſiege, had been fully ſuppl with every neceſſary from London, yet the hardſh which the ſoldiers ſuffered, from the inclemency the weather, had weakened them to ſuch a deg that they were not capable of undertaking any new terprize: ſo that no action happened, for ſome t between the two armies, though encamped in neighbourhood of each other. Eſſex at laſt made a motion towards Oxford, and fixed his head quarters t Thame, on the borders of Buckinghamſhire, in order to over-awe that country, which now began to arm in favour of the king. Colonel Urrey, a Scots fficer, had been preferred to the command he held nder Eſſex, on the preſſing inſtances of the commons; but not thinking the poſt he enjoyed adequate o his merit, he threw up his commiſſion; and preſenting himſelf in his regimentals before prince Ruert, offered to conduct a detachment of the royal rmy to a place where they might, with great eaſe, eat up the enemies quarters. Rupert readily emraced the propoſal, and Urrey performed the ſerice with great courage and ſucceſs, killing and taking riſoners a whole regiment of the parliament's horſe, eſides diſperſing other detached parties, and returnd to Oxford with a large booty, and a conſiderable umber of priſoners. Animated by this ſucceſs, he ropoſed a ſtill more daring attempt to prince Rupert, hat of ſurpriſing the enemy's head quarters; offerg, at the ſame time, that the prince ſhould enjoy ll the honour of the enterprize, while he himſelf erved as a volunteer. Nothing could be more agreeble to the daring ſpirit of prince Rupert than expeitions of this kind. He embraced the offer with reat avidity; and putting himſelf at the head of a mall detachment of horſe, marched with ſo much exedition, that he ſurpriſed and cut in pieces two of e enemy's regiments, one of horſe and the other of oot, quartered at Wickham, together with another ery conſiderable party lying at ſome diſtance. The rength of the prince's detachment rendered it highly mprudent to make any farther attempt, as the enemy as, by this time, ſufficiently alarmed; and he acordingly began his march back to the royal army. ut Eſſex, who was now informed of the ſucceſs that d attended Rupert, and exaſperated at ſo daring an ult, ſent a party of his horſe to intercept his retreat, a bridge which the royaliſts were obliged to paſs. he troops deſigned for this expedition were ſeen by upert, as he was marching over a plain called Chalavefield, towards a lane which led to the bridge. e immediately perceived the diſadvantage of being acked in the defile, gave immediate orders for his ces to halt, and drew up his party on the plain. ſhamed of having been diſcovered, the parliament's ces advanced againſt the prince with great intrepiy; but being unable to ſupport the furious charge Rupert, they were all cut off, or taken priſoners, fore the earl of Eſſex could bring up the infantry to ir aſſiſtance, and Rupert returned with his priſonto Oxford. The famous Hampden, who comnded a regiment of foot in the neighbourhood, d joined the party ſent to intercept Rupert, as a lunteer, and ruſhed into the thickeſt of the battle. ne of the priſoners, after the action was over, inmed Rupert, that he was confident Mr. Hampden s wounded; for he ſaw him, contrary to his uſual ſtom, ride off the field before the battle was over; head hanging down, and his hands leaning on his ſe's neck. The ſoldier was not miſtaken: news ived the next day, that he had received a brace of ol bullets in his ſhoulder, and that the bone was ttered. He languiſhed eight days, and then paid the t of nature, ſincerely lamented, even by his enes. He was, doubtleſs, one of the greateſt men age produced. His prodigious abilities, his ued virtues, his unſhaken integrity, have been ly celebrated by writers of all parties. But he had ppily imbibed the moſt violent prejudices againſt rles, and eſteemed him as a prince wholly unthy of any truſt or confidence from his people. ſurely an attempt to annihilate monarchy, to ſubthe antient conſtitution of his country, and to d the horror of a civil war over every part of the kingdom, was carrying oppoſition to a very blameable extreme; eſpecially when there was the greateſt reaſon to believe, that his antipathy to the king was not founded upon truth; and that the arbitrary proceedings of that prince proceeded rather from neceſſity, and a natural deſire of ſupporting the prerogative which had been tranſmitted to him from his anceſtors, than from any ambitious deſigns of eradicating the liberties of the people. Perhaps Hampden himſelf never intended to carry oppoſition to this dreadful height. It is more than probable, that he, as well as many others in the oppoſition, never imagined that the king could have found ſo many reſources; and that he muſt have been obliged, even before the ſword of civil diſcord had made any progreſs in depopulating the kingdom, to ſubmit to the conditions offered by the parliament. Perceiving himſelf deceived in the reſiſtance he imagined Charles could make, he endeavoured to repair the dreadful conſequences of his miſtake, by puſhing on the war with more vigour and ſpirit than ever. He well knew that a deciſive victory only could now protect his party from the indignation of an enraged ſovereign; and was therefore deſirous of purſuing, with the utmoſt intrepidity, the only meaſures that could reſtore peace to his country. When the king was informed of Hampden's misfortune, he was ſo ſenſibly affected with the fate of that great man, tho' one of his capital enemies, that he made an offer of his own ſurgeons to attend him; but it was too late: he had been ſeized with a violent fever, which haſtily put a period to his life.

While the two principal armies continued in their quarters near the city of Oxford, Sir William Waller was ſent, at the head of a large body of forces, into the weſt, with orders to incorporate among his troops the poor remains of the parliament's army that had eſcaped from the battle of Stratton. Waller was a man of great ſpirit and fortune: he had already diſplayed his great abilities as a commander, by reducing Portſmouth, and defeating Lord Herbert. His great reputation brought in vaſt numbers of volunteers, and he advanced into the weſt with the utmoſt celerity. But before he reached the place of action, prince Maurice, and the marquis of Hertford, had joined Hopton with a conſiderable reinforcement, ſo that the army of the royaliſts now amounted to near ſeven thouſand men. They were well provided with artillery, and other neceſſaries, and greatly elated with their late ſucceſs. But the diſpoſition of the weſtern forces, which had chiefly been diſciplined by Hopton, were very different from the troops under prince Maurice and the marquis of Hertford. They were very regular and tractable in their quarters; they paid punctually for every thing as far as their money would extend, and treated thoſe who did not join them with great humanity and tenderneſs. They never levied money upon the inhabitants but with apparent reluctance, and with promiſes to repay it as ſoon as the circumſtances of the times would permit. This abſtinence was blended with the utmoſt courage, and a conſciouſneſs of their being the chief ſupports of the royal cauſe in that part of the kingdom. Maurice ridiculed this behaviour; and his troops having been accuſtomed to live at free-quarters, looked upon the ſobriety and regular conduct of the others as a reproach to themſelves. It was fortunate for Charles, that notwithſtanding this difference in the diſpoſition of his ſoldiers, all of them were united in the common principle of ſupporting the crown; their reputation was very great, even with the parliamentary party.

From theſe conſiderations it is little to be wondered at, that the royaliſts ſhould make a very rapid progreſs. Taunton, Bridgewater, and Dunſtar-caſtle, gave up without the leaſt reſiſtance, and gentlemen of known fidelity to the king were appointed governors.

Sir William Waller had now reached Bath, where he continued ſome time recruiting his army; and frequent ſkirmiſhes happened between the two parties, which generally terminated in favour of the royaliſts. At laſt the armies met at Landſdown near Bath, and fought a pitched battle, with great loſs on both ſides, but without any deciſive event. The gallant Sir Bevile Granville fell in the action, and Hopton was greatly hurt by the blowing up of ſome powder.

After this engagement the royaliſts marched to the eaſtward, in order to join the king at Oxford: but Waller hung on their rear, and greatly infeſted their march till they reached the Devizes. Reinforced with additional troops which flocked to him from all quarters, he ſoon ſo greatly ſurpaſſed the royaliſts in number, that they durſt no longer continue their march, or expoſe themſelves to the hazard of an action. It was therefore reſolved, that prince Maurice, and the marquis of Hertford, ſhould proceed with the cavalry, and, after procuring a reinforcement from the king, haſten back to the relief of their friends in the Devizes. Waller was ſo confident of taking this whole body of infantry, now abandoned by their principal ſupport, that in a letter he wrote to the parliament, he told them that the work was done, and that he would inform them, by the next poſt, of the number and quality of the priſoners. But the king, even before Hertford's arrival, hearing of the great difficulties to which the weſtern army was reduced, had prepared a ſtrong body of horſe, and immediately diſpatched them under the command of lord Wilmot. Waller, inſtead of endeavouring to prevent the junction of this reinforcement with the foot in the Devizes, which he might eaſily have done by continuing the blockade of the place, drew off his troops, thinking himſelf ſure of the victory, and that a deciſive action would totally ruin the king's affairs. He was, however, miſtaken. The infantry, relieved from deſpair, advanced with the greateſt alacrity to join Wilmot, and a general action ſucceeded on Roundway-down, about two miles from the Devizes. After a ſhort but ſharp conflict, Waller's army was totally defeated, few of them eſcaping either death or captivity. Waller himſelf, with the poor remains of his numerous army, fled to Briſtol, and carried thither the firſt news of his own defeat.

This event, together with the late ſucceſs of prince Rupert, and the death of Hampden, ſo diſcouraged Eſſex, that, quitting Thame and Ayleſbury, where he had hitherto lain, he retreated to London, at the head of a broken and diſheartened army, which, but a few months before, he had led into the field in ſo flouriſhing a condition. In the mean time the forces that had defeated Waller reduced Bath, and then marched to form the ſiege of Briſtol, in conjunction with the troops under prince Rupert. Briſtol was conſidered as one of the principal places poſſeſſed by the parliament; it was very rich, and garriſoned by two thouſand five hundred foot, a regiment of horſe, and another of dragoons. Nathaniel Fiennes, ſon to lord Say, commanded the forces, and many of the citizens took up arms, and joined the garriſon. The fortifications were, however, incomplete and irregular, which induced prince Rupert to reſolve to ſtorm the city. Accordingly the aſſault was begun in four different places, and, after a deſperate engagement, the ſuburbs were taken. But ſtill the garriſon were maſters of the town, and the entrance was rendered more difficult by the ruins of the houſes that were demoliſhed in the late attempt; as well as by the loſs ſuſtained by the royaliſts. It was even propoſed not to make any farther attempt, when, to the great joy of the whole army, the beſieged beat a parley. The articles of capitulation were ſoon ſettled, by which the garriſon were allowed to march out with their arms and baggage, leaving their cannon, ammunition, an colours. The moſt wealthy inhabitants of Briſtol fearing the city would fall into the hands of the loyaliſts, embarked the greateſt part of their wealth o board their ſhips, in order to ſend it to London but prince Rupert, informed of their deſign, ſeize the ſhips, and by that means became maſter of a ver rich booty.

The taking of Briſtol was of the greateſt importance to Charles; but to ſhew that he was not intoxicated with ſucceſs, he publiſhed a manifeſto, in whic he renewed his proteſtation lately made with ſuch ſolemnity at the head of his army, and declared hi earneſt deſire of concluding a peace, upon the re-eſtabliſhment of the conſtitution; offering to grant general pardon, and bury all that was paſt in eterna oblivion. But the factious inhabitants of Londo were ſo far from thinking that the king's late ſucceſſe gave him a title to talk of peace, that they ran int greater violences than ever. Sir William Waller wa now returned to the capital, and by his ſpirited harangues kept alive that enthuſiaſm, which a turn o fortune ſeemed to have depreſſed. The leaders o the houſe of commons ſecretly promoted theſe furious diſpoſitions of the people, though they pretende they were very deſirous of peace. The lords mad no ſecret that they were determined to ſend propoſitions to the king, and his majeſty's late manifeſto, occaſioned by his ſucceſſes in the weſt, was repreſente even by ſome conſiderable members among the commons, as a mark of royal clemency, and a prope baſis for a treaty. On the fifth of Auguſt the lord ſent down to the commons the following propoſition to be tranſmitted to the king.

1. "That both armies be immediately diſbande and his majeſty be intreated to return to his parliament, upon ſuch ſecurity as ſhould be thought ſatiſfactory.

2. "That religion might be ſettled by the advic of a general ſynod of divines, in ſuch a manner a his majeſty, with the conſent of both houſes of parliament, ſhould appoint.

3. "That the militia, both by ſea and land, ſhoul be ſettled by a bill; and the militia, forts, and ſhips o the kingdom, put into ſuch hands as the king ſhoul appoint, with the approbation of both houſes of pa liament; his majeſty's revenue be abſolutely and totally reſtored to him: only deducting ſuch part as ha been expended for the maintenance of his children.

4. "That all the members of both houſes, wh had been expelled only for abſenting themſelve ſhould be reſtored to their ſeats.

5. "That all delinquents, before the year 164 ſhould be delivered up to the juſtice of parliament, an a general pardon for all others, on both ſides, grante

6. "That an act of oblivion ſhould be paſſed for a former acts of hoſtility."

Theſe propoſitions were immediately taken in conſideration by the commons, and the article relative to the king's revenue was agreed to; but being late on Saturday night when this reſolutio paſſed, the houſe was adjourned till Monday mornin when all the members in and about London attende and, there is the greateſt reaſon to believe, that ha the parliament been left to themſelves, they wou have laid a ſure foundation for the ſalutary work peace. But this was prevented by the leaders of t faction, who had hitherto rendered abortive eve attempt for putting a period to the miſeries of ci diſcord. The two houſes were ſurrounded by t populace, who in a very clamorous and threatenin manner, demanded that no terms of accommodatio ſhould be accepted. In the midſt of this confuſio Mr. Hollis produced a letter from Eſſex, informi the houſe, that the king's forces had taken Doncaſt a and Weymouth. But this was far from diſcouraging the faction; the tumults continued to increaſe, till the lords, in a conference with the commons, plainly told them, that unleſs care was taken to ſuppreſs the violent proceedings of the populace, they muſt and would adjourn their houſe, till they could meet and deliberate with freedom, and without danger to their perſons. An order was accordingly ſent to Pennington, the factious lord-mayor, ordering him to ſuppreſs theſe tumults. But many of the members, thinking their lives in danger, had retired from the houſe, and the propoſitions for a peace were rejected by a majority of ſeven. They now liſtened to no propoſal from the lords that tended to put a period to the horrors of a civil war, but inſtead thereof appointed committees to ſit in every hall in the city, to receive ſubſcriptions for raiſing men and horſes for the defence of their religion, their laws, and their liberties. The lords were highly exaſperated at theſe proceedings, eſpecially as they ſaw, that, notwithſtanding the late order, no care was taken to ſuppreſs the tumults, and that a party of the trained bands were ſuffered to attack and murder ſeveral women who had loudly clamoured for peace. The earls of Northumberland, Bedford, Clare, Holland and Portland, with the lords Conway and Lovelace, left the houſe and retired to the king, who received them with favour.

While theſe things were tranſacting in the parliament, it was propoſed in council, that the royal army ſhould march directly to London, where every thing was in confuſion, and where it was hoped, either by an inſurrection, by victory, or by treaty, a ſpeedy end might be put to the civil deſtruction. Had this motion been carried, in all probability the conſternation of the party at the approach of the royal army would have been fatal to their cauſe; but it was thought by the majority of the council, that the great number and force of the London militia would render the attempt too dangerous. Glouceſter, lying within twenty miles of the army, offered an eaſier, and, at the ſame time, a very important conqueſt. It was the only garriſon now poſſeſſed by the parliament in thoſe parts. Should the undertaking be ſucceſsful, the advantages would be very great; the whole courſe of the Severn would be under his majeſty's command; the rich mal-content counties in the weſt, being deprived of all aſſiſtance, might be obliged to pay high contributions, as an atonement for their diſaffection; an open communication would be preſerved between Wales and theſe new conqueſts; and one half of the kingdom being entirely free from the influence of the parliament, might be united into a compact body, give the king a great ſuperiority, and be employed with ſucceſs in reducing the reſt of England to obedience. Theſe reaſons induced the king to embrace a reſolution that proved fatal to him and his adherents.

The garriſon of Glouceſter, conſiſting of about 1500 regular troops, beſides the citizens who took up arms on this occaſion, was commanded by one Maſſey, an intrepid ſoldier of fortune; but his not being infected with the enthuſiaſm of the age, induced Charles to think that he would ſoon liſten to terms of accommodation. He was, however, deceived; Maſſey was reſolute to preſerve an entire fidelity to his maſters; and though no enthuſiaſt himſelf, he well knew how to employ, to great advantage, that fanatical ſpirit with which his whole garriſon, and the greater part of the inhabitants, were infected. The king ſent a ſummons to the governor to ſurrender, giving him two hours to return an anſwer; but before half the time was expired, two citizens appeared at the head quarters, dreſſed in the moſt uncouth manner, while their countenances diſplayed all the marks of that enthuſiaſtic ardour which had been ſo fatal to the peace of the three kingdoms. Without being aſked the purport of their meſſage, without exhibiting the leaſt appearance of duty or good manners, they ſaid, in a pert, ſhrill, undiſmayed accent, that they brought an anſwer from the godly city of Glouceſter; and, after making ſeveral inſolent and ſeditious replies to ſome queſtions that were aſked them, they delivered the following anſwer in writing: "We the inhabitants, "magiſtrates, officers, and ſoldiers, within the garriſon of Glouceſter, unto his majeſty's gracious "meſſage, return this humble anſwer: That we do "keep this city, according to our oaths and allegiance, to and for the uſe of his majeſty and his "royal poſterity; and do accordingly conceive ourſelves wholly bound to obey the commands of his "majeſty ſignified by both houſes of parliament; "and are reſolved, by God's help, to keep this city "accordingly."

All negotiations were now at an end, and the ſiege was puſhed with the greateſt intrepidity. Sir William Vavaſour lay, with his Welſh forces, on the weſt and north-weſt ſides of the town; Ruthven, earl of Brentford, was poſted on the ſouth; and Sir Jacob Aſhley on the eaſt, where the king himſelf had his head quarters.

As ſoon as it was known in London that Glouceſter was inveſted, the inhabitants were thrown into the greateſt conſternation. The whole city was immediately in confuſion, and the people thought they ſaw the royal army thundering at their gates. Had even a party of the king's forces appeared in this moment of diſtraction, the conſequences might have been fatal: but the ſiege of Glouceſter demanded the king's whole attention, and in a few days the citizens recovered from their conſternation.

In the mean time the arbitrary proceedings of the parliament exaſperated many who had before joined them; and a combination was formed in London that required all the abilities of the leaders to ſuppreſs. Edmund Waller, ſo well known for his poetical writings, was a perſon of a very conſiderable fortune, and equally remarkable for his talents and elegance of manners. He was a member of the lower houſe, and had heartily joined in the meaſures that had been purſued for reducing the prerogative of the crown within proper bounds; but ſeeing no end of the encroachments of the commons, he exerted all his powers to ſtop the career of faction, and uſed the utmoſt boldneſs in his ſpeeches in blaming the violent counſels by which the members were governed. But finding all his eloquence in the houſe was exerted in vain, he determined, if poſſible, to form a party in the city, that might oblige the parliament to accept of reaſonable conditions, and reſtore peace to the nation. All the eminent perſons in and about London had formed the ſame deſign, and highly approved the ſentiments of Waller, the charms of whoſe converſation, added to his character of courage and integrity, had procured him many friends. Theſe all joined in wiſhing that ſome expedient could be found for ſtopping the impetuous career of the parliament, and bringing about a peace on equal terms. Tomkins, his brother-in-law, and Chaloner, the intimate friend of Tomkins, had for ſome time entertained the ſame ſentiments; and informed Waller, that the ſame deſire of peace among all men of ſenſe and moderation prevailed in the city. It was therefore thought very eaſy to form a ſtrong combination, for refuſing, by mutual agreement, the illegal taxes impoſed upon the people by the parliament, without the royal aſſent.

Pleaſed with the idea of reſtoring peace to their country, by obliging the parliament to accept of reaſonable terms of accommodation, they applied themſelves aſſiduouſly to form liſts of perſons whom they conceived would join them in their deſign; and ſoon had the pleaſure of ſeeing them contain a conſiderable and very reſpectable number. But, unfortunately for them, a ſervant belonging to Tomkins, who had imbibed the fanatical ſpirit of the times, overheard their converſation, and informed Pym of their deſign. Waller, Tomkins, and Chaloner, were immediately ſeized, and tried by a court-martial. They were all found guilty, and Tomkins and Chaloner ſuffered death on gibbets erected before their own doors; but the ſentence of Waller was reſpited, and he afterwards obtained a pardon, on paying a fine of 10,000l.

During theſe tranſactions in parliament, the ſiege of Glouceſter was carried on with great fury; and Maſſey, ambitious of ſaving the place, and having under his command a garriſon ready to ſacrifice their lives in ſupport of their religion, had hitherto maintained his part with ſuch courage and capacity, that he had greatly retarded all the advances of the royaliſts. By ſudden and frequent ſallies he infeſted them in their trenches, and often gained conſiderable advantages. But notwithſtanding all his intrepidity, he ſaw his garriſon reduced to the laſt extremity; and failed not, from time to time, to inform the parliament, that, unleſs he was ſpeedily relieved, he muſt, from extreme want of proviſions and ammunition, be obliged to ſurrender.

The commons now found it neceſſary to exert their whole power and authority, in order to repair their loſſes, and put themſelves in a poſture of defence. They well knew, that if Glouceſter fell into the king's hands, it would be very difficult to ſupport themſelves againſt a victorious army; eſpecially as they had lately found that very great diſſentions prevailed among the people, even in the capital itſelf. They uſed the utmoſt diligence to recruit the army of Eſſex, and render it capable of facing the royaliſts. They excited their preachers to renew their declamations againſt the cauſe ſupported by his majeſty; and even had recourſe to the expedient of impreſſing men into their ſervice, though they had ſo loudly exclaimed againſt that practice when exerciſed by the king, and even very lately aboliſhed it by a bill for which they had ſo ſtrenuouſly contended. They alſo prevailed upon the city to ſend four regiments of its militia to the relief of Glouceſter; an event expected with the utmoſt anxiety.

At length, an army of 14000 men being raiſed, and properly equipped, Eſſex put himſelf at their head, and marched with the utmoſt expedition through Bedford and Leiceſter. He was greatly inferior to the royaliſts in cavalry; and prince Rupert had been detached, at the head of a flying party to haraſs him in his march; but Eſſex, by the mere force of conduct and diſcipline, eluded all the efforts of Rupert, and paſſed over thoſe open champaign counties, without any material loſs. On his approaching the city, the king was obliged to raiſe the ſiege, ſo that Eſſex entered Glouceſter without oppoſition. He found on his arrival, that the garriſon was reduced to the utmoſt extremity, and that had his march been deferred one day longer, and the royaliſts made another attack, the garriſon muſt have ſubmitted, for they had only one barrel of powder remaining, and their proviſions were wholly conſumed. The country people ſupplied both the army and garriſon with plenty of neceſſaries, which they had carefully concealed from the royaliſts, pretending that their ſtock was entirely exhauſted.

It is reaſonable to imagine that Charles intended to give Eſſex battle if he returned by the ſame rout, and for that purpoſe continued for ſome time at Sudley caſtle, and thence removed to Eviſham. But Eſſex wiſely declined an engagement in an open country where the king's cavalry, under ſo intrepid a leader, muſt have a deciſive advantage. He lay five days at Tewkeſbury, which was his firſt ſtage after leaving Glouceſter; and ſeemed, by ſome preparations, to continue his rout to Worceſter. But by a forced march during the night he reached Cirenceſter, and obtained the double advantage of paſſing unmoleſted through an open country, and of ſurprizing a convoy of proviſions, eſcorted by three hundred royaliſts. Eſſex now directed his march towards London, thro' the northern parts of Wiltſhire, where he thought the king's horſe could act only with the leaſt advantage. But by the indefatigable activity of prince Rupert, his rear was attacked at Awborn-chaſe, with ſo much ſucceſs, that great numbers of his ſoldiers fell in the action. At laſt he reached Newbury; but was ſurprized to find, that the king, by forced marches, had arrived before him, and was already in poſſeſſion of the place.

An action was now unavoidable, and the neceſſary preparations were made for the approaching conflict by the leaders of both armies. The battle was fought with deſperate valour and a ſteady bravery on both ſides. Eſſex's horſe were ſeveral times broke by the king's, but his infantry ſtood firm; and beſides keeping up a continued fire, preſented an invincible barrier of pikes againſt the furious attacks of prince Rupert, and thoſe gallant troops of gentry who chiefly compoſed the royal cavalry. The London militia on this occaſion behaved with remarkable valour; and though taken ſo lately from their ordinary occupations, equalled the moſt veteran ſoldiers. They had been trained by Skippon, and the enthuſiaſm with which they were inſpired rendered them ſtrangers to fear. The engagement continued in all its fury till night put an end to the ſlaughter, and left the event undecided. Eſſex, who had done more than he intended, renewed not the action, but purſued his march towards London, which he reached in ſafety. His rear indeed was once put into confuſion by the king's cavalry, but no material conſequences enſued; Rupert with all his intrepidity could not ſtop the army of Eſſex, ſo as to bring on a ſecond engagement. The king followed the parliamentary army, and took poſſeſſion of Reading, where he eſtabliſhed a garriſon.

The loſs ſuſtained on both ſides in the battle of Newbury was not ſo great as might have been expected from the length of the action, which began at ſix in the morning, and continued till night; not more than 2000 men being ſlain in the field of battle. Among thoſe who fell on the part of the royaliſts were the earls of Sunderland and Carnarvon, two noblemen of great worth and abilities. But what rendered the loſs irreparable, was the death of Lucius Carey, lord viſcount Falkland, ſecretary of ſtate. He was one of the moſt learned perſons of his age, and ſtood foremoſt in the liſt of patriots, while he was perſuaded that the prerogatives of the crown incroached on the liberties of the ſubject. But when the royal power was confined within bounds; when the liberty of a ſubject had nothing to fear from the hand of authority, he embraced the defence of thoſe limited powers which were ſtill left to monarchy, and without which he was perſuaded the Engliſh conſtitution could not ſubſiſt. He was, however, penetrated with the miſeries of his country, and dreaded the ſucceſs of his own party, almoſt as much as that of the parliament. Perſuaded that an advantageous peace could only be attained when the forces of both parties were nearly balanced, he was very deſirous of opening a negotiation, and ſetling the articles of a laſting peace on the ſolid baſis of the Engliſh conſtitution. On the morning of the battle in which he fell, he had taken ſome care in dreſſing himſelf, and told his acquainquaintance that his motives for doing it were, his being unwilling the enemy ſhould find his body in a ſlovenly, indecent ſituation. "I am weary of the "times," added he, "and foreſee much miſery to "my country; but believe I ſhall be out of it ere "night." He fell in the thirty-fifth year of his age.

Notwithſtanding the royal forces in the north were greatly ſuperior to thoſe of the parliament, yet they did not make that progreſs which might have been expected. The popularity of the earl, now created marquis of Newcaſtle, was very great in the north; but he was oppoſed by two men, who about this time began to render themſelves remarkable for their valour and military conduct. Theſe were Sir Thomas Fairfax, ſon to the lord of that name, and Oliver Cromwell. The former had obtained ſome advantages over the royaliſts, eſpecially at Wakefield; and the latter obtained a victory at Gainſborough, over a party commanded by the gallant Cavendiſh, who periſhed in the action. Cromwell, by a painful obſervance of the duties of the field, and a remarkable zeal for the cauſe, was daily riſing in preferment. He had never ſeen any foreign ſervice, and if we believe his cotemporaries, his courage was not natural, but acquired by experience and reaſon. As he was a conſummate judge of human nature, he began now to put in practice his favourite ſcheme, that of inſpiring thoſe whom he commanded with an enthuſiaſm, that might more than balance all the ſentiments of honor, loyalty and duty in the other party. He ſucceeded, and the regiment he commanded became famous for a ferocious courage, founded on fanaticiſm, that nothing could withſtand.

But notwithſtanding the great abilities of Sir Thomas Fairfax and Cromwell, the advantages were on the ſide of the royal party in the north. They gained a complete victory over Fairfax at Atherton Moor, and diſperſed his whole army. But the fortreſs of Hull greatly prevented the progreſs of the royaliſts, and it was determined to beſiege the town. Newcaſtle accordingly ſet down before it with an army of fifteen thouſand men. Hotham was no longer governor; both he and his ſon had entered into a correſpondence with the royaliſts, and had fallen victims to the ſeverity of the parliament, Sir Thomas Fairfax now commanded in that town, and by his military conduct and valour rendered all the attempts of Newcaſtle abortive, and he was obliged to raiſe the ſiege.

As the ſucceſs of each party was nearly equal, there appeared no proſpect of peace, unleſs the Scots could be engaged to join in the war, it being concluded that their weight muſt turn the ſcale of the party they favoured. The commons had been early in their applications to the Scottiſh leaders; they had ſent Pickering as their agent into Scotland to carry on the negotiation. He repreſented the great danger that muſt attend the form of religion eſtabliſhed in their country, if the royal party prevailed; and conjured them to ſuccour their diſtreſſed brethren in England. The marquis, now duke of Hamilton, and the earl of Montroſe, had waited upon the queen at York, and laid before her the danger that threatened the kingdom from the negotiation of Pickering. Hamilton was for temporizing, but Montroſe was of very different ſentiments, and urged the neceſſity of having recourſe to more violent methods, in order effectually to prevent the Scottiſh parliament from joining with the commons of England. But prepoſſeſſed in favour of Hamilton, Charles intruſted him and his friends with the affairs of Scotland; and at the ſame time earneſtly requeſted that they would uſe their utmoſt endeavours to prevent the Scottiſh court from engaging in any negotiation with the committees which he underſtood the Engliſh parliament intended to ſend into that kingdom. If the duke of Hamilton and his brother the earl of Lanerk were ſincere in their attachment, they undertook more than they were able to perform. A parliament or convention of the ſtates was called, tho' expreſsly againſt the king's conſent. This meaſure was indeed chiefly effected by the Scots commiſſioners, who after concluding the late treaty in England, had entered into a cloſe correſpondence with the leaders of the parliament in London. The negotiation had indeed been carried on with ſo much ſecrecy, that when it was firſt mentioned in the houſe of commons, it created a general conſternation. There is ſomething extremely ſhocking in the idea of calling in a foreign enemy; but the deſperate ſtate of their affairs rendered it neceſſary. The earl of Rutland and the lord Grey of Warke, were named as commiſſioners for the houſe of lords; but the former had intereſt ſufficient to get himſelf excuſed, and the latter, tho' conſidered as an unſhaken friend to the cauſe of the parliament, ſo reſolutely declined the ſervice, that he was ſent to the Tower for diſobedience. Sir William Armyn, and Sir Henry Vane the younger, at laſt undertook the ſervice, and were aſſiſted by the ſame fanatical divines, who promiſed to bring over to their intereſt the Scottiſh clergy, on whoſe aſſiſtance the ſucceſs of the negotiation in a great meaſure depended. Montroſe ſent timely information to the king of the intrigues of the Engliſh parliament, and offered, on receiving a commiſſion for that purpoſe, to declare the convention of the ſtates traitors to their country. Had this been done immediately, the attempts of the commons would, in all probability, have been rendered abortive; but the king liſtened ſo much to the counſels of Hamilton, that Montroſe and his friends were neglected till the affair became deſperate, and it was then too late. Hamilton indeed pretended, that he had done every thing in his power to prevent the Scots from agreeing with the Engliſh commiſſioners; but that all his endeavours were in vain. The truth is, a large arrear was ſtill owing by the Engliſh parliament to the Scottiſh covenanters, and this muſt have been loſt if the former had been ruined. The Scotch forces in Ireland had done nothing to anſwer the great expectation conceived of them; and tho' their general, the earl of Leven, had engaged they ſhould never join the king, yet as the parliament was unable to ſupply Leven with money, it was hard to ſay what courſes the ſoldiers might follow, when pinched by neceſſity. Leven and his forces were therefore recalled from Ireland in order to prevent their inliſting in that kingdom, and paſſing over into England. Add to this, that the great ſpirit of Montroſe, his virtuous popularity, his numerous dependents, and the inflexibility of his principles, rendered him now ſo formidable, not only to the covenanters, who were directed by Argyle, but alſo to the moderate party headed by the duke of Hamilton, that a coalition took place between theſe two parties againſt Montroſe and the royaliſts. It happened to the Scots, as to a people wanton with liberty, who having nothing to wiſh for, had a thouſand things to fear. Hamilton, with all his moderation, made no ſecret of his diſtinguiſhing the revival of what he called hierarchical tyranny in Scotland, and conſequently he was united with the covenanters in the main principle of oppoſition to Charles. For though the true motives of it were ambition, and an inordinate deſire of poſſeſſing the revenues of the church, yet religion was the avowed pretence. The Engliſh commiſſioners improved all the jealouſies the Scots entertained with regard to the king's intentions. They laid before the convention the ſteps they had already taken for an intire uniformity of eccleſiaſtical government between the two kingdoms; they invited him to ſend members to the aſſembly of divines, then ſitting at Weſtminſter, for introducing a farther reformation of religion, and offered to proceed as far as the low condition of their affairs would admit, in diſcharging the arrears due to the Scottiſh army. But at the ſame time, they mentioned the neceſſity of ſecuring all thoſe invaluable bleſſings by the Scots preventing the ruin of the Engliſh parliament, which could only be effected by immediately raiſing an army for their aſſiſtance.

This rebellious propoſition would certainly have been rendered abortive, had not ſome of Charles's beſt friends been intimidated by a charge ſent down againſt them by the Engliſh parliament, for holding a correſpondence with the queen. Their letters had been intercepted by Fairfax, who forwarded them to London, whence they were ſent to Scotland by the parliament. At the ſame time the king's friends were diſunited among themſelves. The duke of Hamilton and his brother the earl of Lanerk, finding they had been deceived by the covenanters, would willingly have joined Montroſe and the declared royaliſts; but that nobleman now conſidered them as the worſt of traitors. He imputed all the aſcendancy the king's enemies had obtained in Scotland to their counſels, and rejected, with indignation, all advances towards an accommodation. It is certain the Scots in general were at this time well affected to his majeſty's perſon; nor did Montroſe over-rate his own abilities, when he made an offer to the queen of taking the field againſt thoſe noblemen who had voted for calling a convention of the ſtates without the king's permiſſion. His enemies were ſo ſenſible of this, that they offered to give him the ſecond command in the armies; a propoſal which he artfully eluded; and, notwithſtanding all the provocations he had received, preſerved an unſhaken loyalty. Recourſe was had to the ſame principles which had been before ſucceſsful, that of undermining the civil authority by means of religion. They perceived inſurmountable difficulties ſhould they make their firſt attack upon the ſtate; but they knew that treaſon would find a ready admiſſion thro' the doors of the church.

At the time the Engliſh commiſſioners arrived in Scotland, the aſſembly of divines were in full convocation; and perhaps never were there ſeen together ſuch a number of men ſo groſsly ignorant, though dignified with a ſacred function, and concealed under the diſguiſe of public zeal. The epiſcopal clergy, who had a principal ſhare in the government, when the alteration in religion took place, had either been ſequeſtered, or enjoyed very little credit with the covenanters, and every vacancy that happened had been filled with the weakeſt and moſt violent men their country produced. Henderſon, their moderator, in any other company of clergymen would have made but a contemptible figure, while Rutherford, Gilleſpie, and the other leading members of the aſſembly, by their writings and deportment, rendered it juſtly a queſtion whether they were more fit for the diſcipline of a ſchool, or that of a mad-houſe. Tho' Argyle, Loudon, and other great men, who had done ſo much for public liberty, had induſtriouſly encouraged this ignorance and frenzy in their teachers, they now began to feel the inconveniencies of both. The weakeſt minds are ſuſceptible of ambition; the luſt of power is common to the wiſe and the fooliſh. The enthuſiaſtic teachers were ſoon ſenſible of their own importance; and the torrent of zeal they poured out againſt popery, prelacy, and the like unmeaning words, grew more ungovernable, and ſwept before it all conſiderations of duty, loyalty, national independence, and public ſafety.

When the Engliſh commiſſioners preſented their letters and credentials from the Weſtminſter divines, they were received as angels ſpeaking from heaven; and without conſulting any thing but their own frantic zeal, they propoſed that a new league and covenant ſhould be taken by the ſubjects of both kingdoms. Not contented with the eſtabliſhment of preſbyterian diſcipline in their own country, they indulged an ardent paſſion for propagating, by every method, that mode of religion in the neighbouring kingdoms. Perſuaded, in the fervency of their zeal, that, by ſupernatural aſſiſtance, they ſhould be enabled to carry their triumphant covenant to the gates of Rome itſelf, their joy was unbounded when a proſpect opened of rendering it prevalent in England.

This ſolemn league and covenant was framed by Vane, who, in eloquence, addreſs, and capacity, as well as in art and diſſimulation, was not ſurpaſſed by any perſon in that age. It effaced all the former proteſtations and vows taken in both kingdoms, and long maintained its credit and authority. By this inſtrument they ſolemnly engaged themſelves to purſue the univerſal extirpation of popery and prelacy in England, "as well as in Scotland, leſt they ſhould be partakers of other men's ſins"; and undertook to purſue to extremity all incendiaries and malignants; terms which they extended as far, and to whom they pleaſed: and vowed an eternal adherence to a firm peace and union between the two kingdoms. They alſo vowed to preſerve the reformed religion eſtabliſhed in the church of Scotland; but, by the artifice of Vane, no declaration more explicit was made with regard to England and Ireland, than that theſe kingdoms ſhould be reformed, according to the word of God, and the examples of the pureſt churches. The Scots zealots, indeed, deemed this expreſſion entirely free from ambiguity; they regarded their own model as the only one which correſponded, in any degree, to ſuch a deſcription. Guthrie, afterwards biſhop of Dunkeld, was the only member in the aſſembly of divines that perceived the ambiguity, or, at leaſt, that had the courage to hint at what afterwards happened, namely, the danger that an independent party might root out preſbytery, as well as prelacy, unleſs the aſſembly declared, in expreſs terms, what plan of church-government they intended both nations ſhould follow. His ſpeech, however reaſonable in itſelf, ſerved only to draw upon him an enormous load of public reproach; and the work of the zealots was hurried on ſo faſt, that the new ſolemn league and covenant was unanimouſly voted.

The natural reſult of this covenant was a treaty with the Engliſh parliament; by which the Scots engaged to raiſe an army of 16,000 foot, and 3,000 horſe. Deſirous that the ſword ſhould carry conviction to all refractory minds, they prepared themſelves, with great alacrity, for their military enterprizes. Their levies were ſoon completed. The hopes of good pay, and warm quarters, added to a favourable diſpoſition for the cauſe, induced numbers to enliſt; ſo that their army was ready, by the end of the year, to enter England, under the command of their old general the earl of Leven.

Charles no ſooner perceived the ſtorm gathering in the north, than he endeavoured to ſecure himſelf by every expedient in his power. Ireland ſeemed to promiſe aſſiſtance. He accordingly concluded a ceſſation of arms with the papiſts: and the duke of Ormond ſent over conſiderable bodies of his forces to England, by which means the royal army was greatly augmented. The ſucceſs of prince Maurice in the weſt alſo tended to raiſe the ſpirit of the king's party. He had formed the ſiege of Exeter, which was defended by the earl of Stamford, who was ſoon obliged to ſurrender the city. This was an important acquiſition; but Maurice was ſo pleaſed with his new conqueſt, and the daily additions he received of men and money from the neighbouring counties, that he ſtayed too long at Exeter, without ſending any aſſiſtance to colonel Digby, who had beſieged Plymouth, a place of great importance. The royaliſts were, indeed, for ſome time, perſuaded, that the town would be delivered up to him, by Sir Alexander Carew, the governor; but the deſign was diſcovered, and Carew ſent priſoner to London. Digby, however, made himſelf maſter of mount Stamford, and had certainly taken Plymouth, had prince Maurice come in time to his aſſiſtance. But the prince, deceived by the negotiation with Carew, inſtead of marching to Plymouth, led his forces to Dartmouth, and after a tedious ſiege, reduced the town. He then marched to Plymouth, and joined Digby; but it was now too late. The garriſon, before his arrival, had received a reinforcement of ſix hundred men from Portſmouth, under the command of an intrepid and experienced officer, who made ſo noble a defence, that prince Maurice, after ſuſtaining a conſiderable loſs, was obliged to raiſe the ſiege.

It is impoſſible, in a general hiſtory, to enumerate all the warlike operations of this buſy year. Suffice it to ſay, that a war, which was extended over the whole kingdom, left hardly room for any man to continue neuter, however agreeable to his wiſhes. Every county became a ſcene of horror and of blood. Not only forts and caſtles, but alſo the ſeats of the nobility and gentry, ſuſtained long ſieges. Each action, each ſiege, and almoſt each ſkirmiſh, did honour to ſome particular family; though, in ſuch a multitude, many particulars that well deſerve to be tranſmitted to poſterity, are forgotten, and ſwept away among the refuſe of things. But upon the whole, notwithſtanding the exploits of Eſſex, Cromwell and Fairfax, the affairs of the king were in a much better ſituation than they were at the cloſe of the preceding campaign. Lord Clarendon tells us, that he had now five armies in the field. The principality of Wales, an inconſiderable part of it excepted, was at his devotion. Plymouth, Poole, and Lyme, were the only places of ſtrength in the weſtern counties poſſeſſed by the parliament. Hull was the only conſiderable place they held in Yorkſhire; and Nantwich, in Cheſhire. But on the other hand, the parliament had received infinite encouragement. The earl of Eſſex had diſtinguiſhed himſelf, by his military talents, above either his rivals or his enemies. He was entirely poſſeſſed of the affections of his own ſoldiers, and therefore capable of executing the moſt dangerous ſervice. The earl of Mancheſter was the idol of the aſſociated counties, and even many of the royaliſts held him in great eſteem. Though almoſt a ſtranger himſelf to the military ſcience, yet Cromwell, perhaps the beſt ſoldier of the age, ſerved under him with ſo much ſucceſs, that the ſcale of war where he fought was greatly turned in favour of the parliament. The conduct, courage, and reputation of the elder and the younger Fairfax, did honor to the cauſe they had embraced. They loſt no credit when vanquiſhed, nor committed any acts of cruelty when victorious. This moderation prevented many in the north, who favoured the royal cauſe, from exerting themſelves with that vigour they would otherwiſe have done. Sir William Waller continued ſtill the idol of the London populace, though his actions, ſince the battle of Lanſdown, deſerved very little applauſe. Many other officers diſtinguiſhed themſelves in ſupporting the ſame cauſe, and the parliament prudently rewarded even their miſcarriages, when they were aſſured of their good intentions, and that they had done every thing in their power to deſerve ſucceſs.

But the eyes of all parties were now principally turned towards Scotland, it being chiefly from that kingdom they expected deliverance or feared deſtruction. It is almoſt incredible with what ſeverity the divines in that kingdom proceeded againſt all who refuſed their covenant. Thoſe preachers and profeſſors of the goſpel of peace, iſſued the moſt peremptory order for ſeizing the goods, collecting the rents, and apprehending the perſons of the royaliſts. Nor were they contented even with this unjuſt ſeverity dictated by their fanatical ſtrain of devotion, they gave a commiſſion to the ſoldiers in general, to put to death all who refuſed to take the covenant, and made any reſiſtance to their being ſent to priſon.

There yet remained in the Engliſh parliament ſome members, who, though they had been induced, either by private ambition, or their zeal for civil liberty, to concur with the majority, ſtill retained an attachment to the hierarchy, and to the antient modes of worſhip. But in the preſent danger, which threatened their cauſe, all ſcruples were laid aſide; and the covenant, by whoſe means alone they could expect to obtain ſo conſiderable a reinforcement as an acceſſion of the whole Scottiſh nation, was received without oppoſition. The parliament, therefore, having firſt ſubſcribed it themſelves, ordered it to be received by all who acknowledged their authority. This cauſed great rejoicings among the Scots. They highly applauded themſelves in being the happy inſtruments of extending their mode of worſhip, and diſſipating that profound darkneſs, in which, they fancied, all the neighbouring nations were involved.

A. D. 1644. A mediation had been propoſed by the French for putting an end to the horrors of civil diſcord in England, by concluding a laſting peace; and the ambaſſador from that court had been ſome time in London for the purpoſe. Before the parliament had acquired the aſſiſtance of the Scots, they appeared to liſten to his propoſals; but he was now given to underſtand that his offers were rejected. They were, however, ſtill diſtreſſed for money: they had ſent a large ſum to Scotland to put that army in motion, and the city ſeemed not forward to ſupply their wants. Eſſex relapſed into his former indifference, and appeared very deſirous of putting an end to the war. He was far from being pleaſed with the ſteps taken by the parliament for introducing a foreign army, which muſt farther increaſe the diſtreſſes of his country, as his own troops were in great want of neceſſaries. He therefore ſent a meſſage to both houſes, acquainting them, that if his army, which lay at St. Albans, was not ſpeedily ſupplied, he muſt throw up his commiſſion. Fairfax and lord Gray made ſimilar complaints, and diſplayed, in pathetic language, the diſtreſſes of their troops. Anſwers were immediately diſpatched, promiſing the complainants relief as ſoon as the neceſſary ſupplies could be raiſed; but they rejected every offer for putting an end to the war.

The parliament, as a farther teſtimony of their averſeneſs to an accommodation with the king, ordered formal preparations to be made for the trial of Laud, archbiſhop of Canterbury. The unfortunate primate ſtill continued in priſon, and had been for ſome time deprived of his eſtate and goods by the violence of the commons. Though it is certain that no ſubject had more largely contributed to the errors of government, yet his enemies, however keen and artful in their reſentments, found inſurmountable difficulties in forming a charge which could amount to high treaſon. His firmneſs had not forſaken him in his confinement; he ſtill continued his oppoſition to the parliament, and obſtinately refuſed to collate a perſon to a living, when recommended to him by the faction. But ſtill his caſe was very different from that of the judges; becauſe it was next to impoſſible to convict him legally of what he had ſaid and recommended at the council board, in which his chief crimes conſiſted. This did not, however, prevent the faction from treating him with the utmoſt ſeverity. His books and papers were ſeized by an order from both houſes, and his famous diary printed and publiſhed. But notwithſtanding all the violence of his proſecutors, the articles againſt Laud were very defective, and they were obliged to have recourſe to the ſame methods uſed before in the caſe of Strafford, that of accumulated treaſon; though it was confeſſed that no article, ſingly conſidered, amounted to treaſon. The charge againſt him, when properly conſidered, conſiſted of three general heads.

1. “ A traiterous endeavour to ſubvert the fundamental laws of the kingdom, and to introduce arbitrary and tyrannical government.

2. A traiterous endeavour to ſubvert God's true religion as by law eſtabliſhed, and to ſet up popiſh ſuperſtition and idolatry in its ſtead.

3. An attempt to ſubvert the rights of parliament, and the ancient courſe of parliamentary proceedings.”

The moſt trifling allegations were brought to ſupport this general charge. The moſt bitter ſpeeches were made againſt him, and ſome of them delivered in the coarſeſt expreſſions. But notwithſtanding all the ſpirit exerted againſt the primate, the lords proceeded very ſlowly in his trial; while he defended himſelf with ſo much vigour, reaſon, and eloquence, that the proſecution was for ſome time at a ſtand. His ruin was, however, determined, and every expedient was to be tried to complete it. The populace were no ſooner informed that it was doubtful whether the lords would find him guilty, than petitions were ſigned, by a great number of citizens, for bringing him and the biſhop of Ely to juſtice. This produced ſo great a ferment, that the earl of Pembroke, a violent enemy to Laud, intimated to them, that if they delayed any longer to give the ſatisfaction expected by the commons, the citizens would aſſemble and demand juſtice, as they did in the caſe of Strafford. Mr. Strode, one of the managers of the proſecution againſt the archbiſhop, threw out a menace of the ſame kind, at the bar of the houſe of lords; but upon their reſenting it, he declared he had not done it in conſequence of any commiſſion from the commons, and that he meant not any affront to the peers. The lords were ſatisfied with this apology, and he was diſmiſſed without cenſure. They, were, however, greatly intimidated, and the principal part of them attended not the ſervice of the houſe. The primate's enemies took advantage of this ceſſion, and when no more than fourteen peers were in the houſe, Laud was voted guilty of endeavouring to ſubvert the laws, overthrow the proteſtant religion, and lay aſide the uſe of parliaments. But none of theſe articles, nor even all of them conjoined, were found by the judges to amount to high treaſon by any known eſtabliſhed law of the land; and the lords declared themſelves of the ſame opinion in a conference with the commons. Diſappointed in their expectation of capitally convicting Laud, his enemies appointed a faſt to be held, in order to rouſe the ſpirit of the populace. A petition againſt delinquents was preſented to the lower houſe, and every ſymptom of a dangerous convulſion appeared. The commons were, however, obliged to have recourſe to their legiſlative authority, and paſs an ordinance for taking away the life of this aged prelate. But notwithſtanding the low condition into which the houſe of peers had fallen, there appeared ſome intention of rejecting this ordinance, and the popular leaders were again obliged to apply to the multitude, and to extinguiſh, by threats of new tumults, the ſmall remains of liberty poſſeſſed by the upper houſe. Apprehenſive of the dangerous conſequences that might attend their following their duty, and determined not to vote againſt the dictates of their conſciences, only ſeven peers were in the houſe when the important queſtion was decided.

The primate, who had long expected the fatal ſentence, ſunk not under its terrors. His fears diſſipated in proportion as the fatal hour (which was to put a period to his mortal exiſtence) approached. “ No man, ſaid he, can be more willing to ſend me out of life, than I am deſirous to go.”

On the morning of his execution he applied himſelf, with great fervency, to private prayer, and ſo continued till the lieutenant of the Tower came to conduct him to the ſcaffold, which he aſcended with a chearful and compoſed countenance. He then made a ſpeech to the people, endeavouring to clear himſelf of what had been laid to his charge; and having prayed for ſome time, he gave the executioner a purſe, ſaying, without the leaſt change of countenance, “ Here, honeſt friend, God forgive thee as I do, and do thy office upon me with mercy.” He then kneeled down, and prayed for ſome time; after which he laid his head upon the block, and praying ſilently to himſelf for a few minutes, he ſaid aloud, “ Lord receive my ſpirit ;” which was the ſignal fo the executioner, who, with one blow, ſtruck off hi head.

Thus died Laud, archbiſhop of Canterbury, in th 72d year of his age. He had many ſad hours o leiſure, during his impriſonment, to reflect, that th meaſure he had dealt to others was meted out to him ſelf. He was an eminent inſtance that a great ſchola may be a weak man, and a favourite miniſter a poo politician; that miſtaken zeal is ſometimes as fata to the cauſe it would ſupport, as premeditated trea chery; and that nothing can more irritate the peop of England, than to ſee religion affecting to hold th reins of government, and government actuated b the caprices of eccleſiaſtical authority. Howeve miſtaken, he was certainly ſincere, and actuated b religious motives in all his purſuits. It was that ſup ported him in the dreadful hour of trial, and ren dered his laſt moments remarkably tranquil and com poſed.

While preparations were making for opening th campaign, Charles ſummoned the members of bo houſes, who adhered to his intereſt, to meet at O ford. By this meaſure he hoped to avail himſelf the name of a parliament, ſo paſſionately cheriſh by the Engliſh nation. The houſe of peers was full, that though many lords were employed in d ferent parts of the kingdom, it contained more th double the number of members that voted at We minſter. But the houſe of commons did not amou to above one hundred and fifty, not more than h the other houſe of commons. The ſeſſion was op ed by a ſpeech from the king; and the aſſembly, order to enable him to recruit his army with m ſucceſs, granted him the ſum of 100,000l. to be vied by way of loan upon the ſubject. The k accordingly circulated privy-ſeals, counter-ſigned the ſpeakers of both houſes, requiring the loan of p ticular ſums from ſuch perſons as lived within places ſubject to his authority.

As Charles, in all his offers for peace, requi nothing more than the re-eſtabliſhment of the l and conſtitution, and the ſame rights which had b enjoyed by his predeceſſors, every diſcourſe peace, and every diſcuſſion of the terms on w that bleſſing could be obtained, tended greatl promote his intereſt; eſpecially as he offered, in order to facilitate ſo valuable an end, to paſs an univerſal act of oblivion, and to grant a toleration or indulgence to tender conſciences. On the other hand, the parliament ſtudiouſly avoided, as much as poſſible, all advances towards negotiation; becauſe the terms on which they were willing to conclude a peace were of too exorbitant a nature for a general diſcuſſion. They were unwilling to expoſe to the eyes of the public their pretenſions, though they well knew their partizans were blinded with the thickeſt veil of religious prejudices.

Senſible of their advantages, the parliament at Oxford wrote the following letter to the earl of Eſſex, the only channel by which it could be conveyed to the commons at Weſtminſter; Charles having declared that they were no longer a free parliament, and conſequently entitled to no authority.

"My lord,

"His majeſty having, by his proclamation, ſummoned all the members of both houſes of parliament to attend him at Oxford; we whoſe names are underwritten, are here met and aſſembled, in obedience to his majeſty's commands. His majeſty was pleaſed to invite us, in the ſame proclamation, by theſe gracious expreſſions, that his ſubjects ſhould ſee how willing he was to receive advice, for the preſervation of the religion, laws and ſafety of the kingdom, and, as far as in him lay, to reſtore it to its former peace and ſecurity (his chief and only end) from thoſe whom they had truſted, though he could not receive it in the place where he appointed. This moſt gracious invitation hath not only been made unto us, but ſeconded and heightened by ſuch unqueſtionable demonſtrations of the deep and princely ſenſe which poſſeſſes his royal heart of the miſeries and calamities of his poor ſubjects, in this unnatural war, and of his moſt entire and paſſionate affections to redeem them from that ſad and deplorable condition, by all ways poſſible, conſiſtent either with his honour, or with the future ſafety of the kingdom, that as it were impiety to queſtion the ſincerity of them, ſo were it great want of duty and faithfulneſs in us (his majeſty having declared that he called us to be witneſſes of his actions, and privy to his intentions) ſhould we not teſtify, and witneſs to all the world the aſſurance we have of the piety and ſincerity of both. We being entirely ſatisfied of this truth, cannot but confeſs, that amidſt our higheſt affections, in the deep and piercing ſenſe we have of the miſeries and deſolation of our country, and thoſe further dangers threatened from Scotland, we are at length erected into ſome hopeful and comfortable thoughts, that poſſibly we may yet (by God's mercy, if his juſtice have not determined this nation, for its ſins, to total ruin and deſolation) hope to be the happy inſtruments of our country's redemption from the miſeries of war, and reſtitution to the bleſſings of peace.

"And we being deſirous to believe your lordſhip, however engaged, a perſon likely to be ſenſibly touched with theſe conſiderations, have thought fit to invite you to that part in this bleſſed work, which is only capable to repair all our misfortunes, and to buoy up the kingdom from ruin; that is, by conjuring you, by all the obligations that have power upon your conſcience, or public piety; that laying to heart, as we do, the inward bleeding condition of our country, and the outward more menacing deſtruction by a foreign nation, upon the very point of invading it, you will co-operate with us to its preſervation, by truly repreſenting to, and faithfully and induſtriouſly promoting with thoſe by whom you are truſted, this following moſt ſincere, and moſt earneſt deſire of ours; that, they joining with us in a right ſenſe of the paſt, preſent, and more threatening calamities of this deplorable kingdom, ſome perſons be appointed on either part, and a place agreed upon, to treat of ſuch a peace, as may yet redeem it from the brink of deſolation.

"This addreſs we ſhould not have made, but that his majeſty's ſummons, by which we are met, moſt graciouſly proclaiming pardon to all without exception, is evidence enough, that his mercy and clemency can tranſcend all former provocations; and that he had not only made us witneſſes of his princely intentions, but honoured us alſo with the name of being ſecurity for them. God Almighty direct your lordſhip, and thoſe to whom you ſhall preſent theſe our moſt real deſires, in ſuch a courſe as may produce that happy peace, and ſettlement of the preſent diſtractions, which is ſo heartily deſired and prayed for by us, and which may make us, Yours, &c."

This letter, which was ſubſcribed by the prince of Wales, the duke of York, and forty-three noblemen, was ſent by a trumpeter to the earl of Eſſex. But that nobleman, however diſguſted with the furious meaſures of the parliament, and however deſirous of a reaſonable peace, was ſtill more reſolute to preſerve an honourable fidelity to the truſt repoſed in him. He therefore, in his anſwer to the earl of Forth, the king's general, obſerved, that as the paper ſent him neither contained any addreſs to the two houſes of parliament, nor any acknowledgement of their authority, he could not communicate it to them.

Charles, however, ſtill deſirous of making another attempt for bringing about a peace, determined to have recourſe to the parliament at Weſtminſter. A ſafe conduct was accordingly demanded from Eſſex for two perſons to treat upon an accommodation. Eſſex readily complied, and Charles diſpatched a meſſage to the parliament for concluding a treaty of peace.

Various debates aroſe in both houſes on this propoſition; but it was at length jointly agreed to reject it. Accordingly, a letter was ſent to the king at Oxford, refuſing to open any negotiation, unleſs he would acknowledge them to be the only parliament: and the king, who knew what ſmall hopes there appeared of any accommodation, refuſed to abandon the pretenſions he had aſſumed, or acknowledge the two houſes at Weſtminſter more openly for a free parliament.

The conſiderable ſums of money that had been ſent from England to Scotland, and the flattering aſſurances the Scots had received that they ſhould now be entitled to all the privileges of Engliſhmen, had the deſired effect; and the Scottiſh army now marched for England with great alacrity. But notwithſtanding all theſe advantages, the rebellion in that country was far from being general. Some of their greateſt men were ſo thoroughly convinced of the good intentions of Charles, that they refuſed to accept of any command raiſed againſt the royal party in England. But the clergy and populace were of a very different opinion: they made no ſcruple of ruſhing into the field without provocation, and in a quarrel in which they had no concern.

The Scottiſh army was in excellent order, and conſiſted of 18,000 foot, 3000 horſe, and 600 dragoons, all of them commanded by their own countrymen. They paſſed the Tyne on a bridge of boats, and ſummoned the town of Newcaſtle, which had been fortified by the care and vigilance of Sir Thomas Glenham, to ſurrender. They did not, however, make any attempt upon the place, becauſe the marquis of Newcaſtle lay at Durham with an army of 14,000 men. But at the ſame time they did not continue idle: they made themſelves maſters of the caſtles of Wark and Morpeth; and fortified a ſmall ſea-port town called Blyſnock, for the conveniency of receiving proviſions.

In the mean time colonel Bellaſis, who had a conſiderable body of forces, was totally routed at Selby by Sir Thomas Fairfax. This misfortune obliged the marquis of Newcaſtle to abandon Durham. Fearful of being incloſed between two armies, he retreated to York; and the Scottiſh general having joined Fairfax, they blocked up that city. But as the combined forces were not numerous enough to inveſt ſo large a place divided by a river, they contented themſelves with preventing any reinforcement of troops from joining the marquis. Some time before Newcaſtle's retreat, another party of the parliament's forces, under the command of Meldrum, had beſieged Newark, a place of the utmoſt importance to the royaliſts, as it kept open a communication between the king's ſouthern and northern quarters. Prince Rupert was, therefore, ordered to attempt the relief of that fortreſs. Rupert was at Cheſter when he received the order, but aſſembling immediately his troops, which amounted to about 7,000 men, he advanced with ſuch expedition to Newark, that he ſurprized Meldrum's army, and after killing about 500 men, he diſarmed the reſt, and ſeized all their cannon, carriages, and baggage. This defeat ſtruck terror into the garriſons of the neighbouring towns, and Gainſborough, Lincoln, Slyford, and ſeveral other places were abandoned by the parliament's forces. The prince alſo relieved Latham-houſe, which had been beſieged by a body of 2,000 men, and gallantly defended for eighteen weeks, by the counteſs of Derby. He took Bolton by ſtorm, put the garriſon to the ſword, and marched to Liverpool, which made no reſiſtance. His army was now increaſed to ten thouſand men, full of ſpirits, and fluſhed with victory.

While prince Rupert continued at Liverpool, the earl of Mancheſter made himſelf maſter of Lincoln, and joined the Scots and the army of Fairfax before York. That city, though vigorouſly defended by the marquis of Newcaſtle at the head of his army, was ſoon reduced to extremities; and the parliament's generals, after enduring the hardſhips of a winter's campaign, and ſuffering great loſſes from ſkirmiſhes with the enemy, flattered themſelves that all their labours would now be crowned with ſucceſs. But they were ſoon alarmed with the news that prince Rupert was approaching. That intrepid general, having joined Sir Charles Lucas, who commanded Newcaſtle's cavalry, haſtened to the relief of York, at the head of an army of 20,000 men. The combined army immediately raiſed the ſiege, and retreated to Marſton-moor, in order to give battle to the royaliſts. Prince Rupert, informed of their intention, approached the city by another quarter, and interpoſing the river Ouſe between him and the enemy, ſafely joined his forces with thoſe of Newcaſtle. The marquis endeavoured to perſuade him, that, having ſo ſucceſsfully effected his purpoſe, he ought to be contented with the preſent advantage, and leave the enemy, now much diminiſhed by their loſſes, and diſcouraged by their ill ſucceſs, to diſſolve by thoſe mutual diſſenſions which had taken place among them. Had Rupert liſtened to this advice, he had, in all probability, triumphed over the enemy without ſtriking a blow. The Scots had found themſelves greatly diſappointed during their march, in which they thought to have met with little or no reſiſtance. They had expected the plunder of the richeſt counties in England, and their generals of nothing leſs than making the Engliſh officers ſerve under them. In all theſe particulars they were deceived, and their rough vexatious manners rendered them exceſſively odious to the Engliſh commanders. Their avarice was inſatiable, and all their words and conduct ſhewed that good pay and the hopes of plunder, were the chief motives that excited them to undertake the expedition. When theſe failed, and when they found that the money granted by the parliament was not ſo punctually paid as it had been liberally voted, they began to talk of returning to their own country to defend it againſt the attempts of Montroſe, who was then in arms, and acting under the king's commiſſion. They would infallibly have carried this deſign into execution, had it not been for the hopes of an engagement, when they flattered themſelves of acquiring riches by plundering the baggage of the enemy. But when prince Rupert reached York, by taking a different rout, they became more ſullen than ever. Mancheſter, Fairfax and Cromwell, were, by no means, fond o their company, while this moroſe diſcontented humour prevailed; they would have thought it leſ diſhonourable to have ſubmitted to a generous enemy, than to be inſulted by their own needy mercenaries. Newcaſtle was no ſtranger to theſe diviſions among them, and urged the propriety of continuing quiet in their quarters and ſuffer thei- enemie to periſh by their own diſſentions. But theſe arguments were urged in vain; fighting was the elemen of prince Rupert. He entertained the moſt invi cible contempt of the Scots; and he had a few da before received a letter from the king, containi little leſs than a poſitive command to fight them, upo almoſt any terms, even after he had relieved Yor But the greateſt misfortune was a miſunderſtandi between the prince and the marquis of Newcaſt whoſe characters agreed only in perſonal courage, a a ſtrong attachment to the king's ſervice. The ma quis loved fighting; but hated the fatigues of wa the prince loved both. The marquis had ſerved t king with his perſon and fortune; the prince with perſon only. The marquis truſted greatly to Ki his lieutenant-general; the prince ſurveyed and rected every thing in his own perſon. The marq was fond of ſtate and ceremony; the prince deſpi both: and each was jealous of the great merit of other, with regard to the favour of the ſovereign, w equally loved and honoured them both.

As ſoon as Rupert entered York, he took u himſelf the command of the whole army, and t the marquis that he intended, the next day, to d out the garriſon, and give battle to the enemy. T officers who could take the greateſt freedom the prince uſed every argument in their power diſſuade him from this reſolution; but all their tempts were in vain; the prince continued fixe his purpoſe; and the marquis, that he might no cur the leaſt imputation of fear, ſubmitted to order.

The enemy, not ſuſpecting that Rupert would zard a battle in his ſituation, were filing off tow Tadcaſter, Cawood, and Selby, in order to cover eaſt-riding of Yorkſhire, and render it more diffi for the royaliſts to obtain ſupplies, when they agreeably ſurprized to perceive, that the prince, the diſpoſitions he was making, intended to them. They immediately recalled all their adva parties, and formed the line of battle. While diſpoſitions were making in the parliamentary a the garriſon of York were ſo diſcontented at the haviour of the prince towards their favourite ge that it was with the utmoſt difficulty the marqui general King perſuaded them to march out o city and join the royal army. This junction b compleated, the prince formed his line of battle himſelf commanded the right wing, which co of five thouſand horſe. The generals Gorin

Potter commanded the main body; and Sir Charles Lucas and colonel Henry, the left wing: the whole army conſiſted of 17,000 foot, 9,000 horſe, and a train of 25 pieces of cannon. The parliamentary army were, at leaſt, equal to that of the prince in number. Sir Thomas Fairfax and colonel Lambert commanded the right wing, in which the Scottiſh cavalry was poſted. His father, the lord Fairfax, and general Leven, commanded the main body; and the earl of Mancheſter, aſſiſted by Cromwell, the left wing. Before the battle began the marquis of Newcaſtle and his friends again deſired the prince to ſuſpend the action; aſſuring him, that they hourly expected a reinforcement of three thouſand men from the north, and that Montroſe was actually on his march, at the head of an army, to join them from Scotland. But the prince was deaf to every argument: he would liſten to nothing but that of fighting the enemy immediately.

The battle was begun by prince Rupert, who charged, with his uſual fury, the left wing of the parliament army, where Cromwell conducted the choiceſt troops, enured to danger under that determined leader, animated by zeal, and confirmed by the moſt rigid diſcipline. This body ſtood firm, and charged in their turn with ſo much impetuoſity, that the cavalry of the royaliſts gave way; and the infantry that ſtood next to them was alſo borne down, and put to flight. Newcaſtle's regiment alone, reſolute to conquer or periſh, obſtinately kept their ground, and maintained, by their dead bodies, the ſame order in which they had firſt been ranged. Sir Thomas Fairfax and colonel Lambert alſo broke through the royaliſts; and, tranſported by the fury of purſuit, ſoon reached their victorious friends, who were alſo in purſuit of the enemy. But this indiſcreet impetuoſity had nearly proved fatal to the parliamentary army. Sir Charles Lucas, who commanded in the right wing, perceiving that the tempeſt was paſt, reſtored order to his broken troops, and made ſo furious an attack on the parliamentary cavalry, that they were thrown into diſorder, puſhed upon their own infantry, and the whole wing put to flight. Animated with this ſucceſs, the royaliſts flattered themſelves that the difficulty was over, and were on the point of ſeizing the carriages and baggage of the enemy, when Cromwell appeared in his return from purſuing the broken forces of the other wing. Both parties ſeemed aſtoniſhed when they perceived that another battle muſt be fought before the victory, which each thought their own, could be obtained. The charge was again renewed with its former fury, and the balance of victory for ſome time ſuſpended: but after the utmoſt efforts of courage by both armies, the parliamentary forces prevailed. Rupert's whole army was puſhed off the field of battle, and his train of artillery taken by the enemy. About 4000 of the royaliſts were ſlain, and 1500 taken priſoners, among whom were Sir Charles Lucas, and ſeveral other perſons of note.

The marquis of Newcaſtle, enraged at the ill ſucceſs of the party he eſpouſed, and ſtill reſenting the haughty treatment of Prince Rupert, now determined to abandon the cauſe, and retire to the continent. He accordingly repaired to Scarborough with a few friends, where he found a veſſel ready to ſail, and which landed him ſafely in France. He continued abroad till the reſtoration; and, though reduced to neceſſity, he ſcorned to acknowledge the uſurped authority of thoſe who aſſumed the government of England.

Prince Rupert alſo formed a very precipitate reſolution: for though the cavalry of the royaliſts was, in a manner, ſtill entire, and though the greater part of the infantry had eſcaped into York, he determined to abandon that city, and march his army towards Oxford, which was ſtill in the king's poſſeſſion. He had no ſooner left the city of York, than it was beſieged by the parliament's army. Glenham, who commanded the garriſon, made a brave defence, but was at laſt obliged to capitulate on honourable terms. Lord Fairfax was made governor, and a thouſand horſe were ſent into Lancaſhire to join the parliamentary forces in that quarter.

Eſſex and Waller, who commanded two of the parliament's armies, received orders to join their forces and march towards Oxford; and if they found the king continue in that city to beſiege it, and by one deciſive blow put an end to the war. Charles ordered a rendezvous of his forces at Marlborough, and after proroguing his parliament at Oxford, came in perſon to the camp, and reviewed his army, which conſiſted of 6,000 foot, and 4,000 horſe. As ſoon as the armies under Eſſex and Waller began their march towards Oxford, Charles drew his garriſon out of Reading, and demoliſhed the fortifications; the place being in no condition to ſtand a ſiege, if attacked by ſo powerful a force. It is not eaſy to ſay what might have been the conſequence had the junction between the forces of Eſſex and Waller been effected, as they amounted to upwards of 20,000 men; but theſe two generals hated each other ſo heartily, that they always found means to evade the orders of the parliament. Eſſex took poſſeſſion of Abingdon, the place being unaccountably abandoned by the king's forces. Waller, at the ſame time, marched his forces to Farnham, ſo that nothing hindered the two armies from joining: for the royaliſts having abandoned Reading and Abingdon, the parliamentary army became maſters of Berkſhire, and the king was obliged to retreat to the northward of Oxford.

It was now thought that the condition of Charles was deſperate; for Eſſex having gained the paſs of Anſlow-bridge, and Waller that of Newbridge, their armies were between him and Oxford, the only place of ſtrength he was poſſeſſed of in the ſouthern quarters. Charles retreated to Worceſter, and it was expected at London, that the king muſt either deliver himſelf up to Eſſex, or throw himſelf into the hands of the parliament. Poſſibly this might have been the caſe, had a good underſtanding prevailed between the parliament's generals; but their diſſentions gave Charles an opportunity of gaining two days march of Eſſex, who now ordered Waller to purſue him, and took upon himſelf to proſecute the weſtern expedition, originally aſſigned to the other. Waller complained loudly of Eſſex for uſurping his command, and produced his orders from the parliament; but Eſſex was abſolute, and threatened to try Waller by a court-martial, if he refuſed to obey.

During this contention between the parliamentary generals, Charles had the opportunity of refreſhing his army at Worceſter; but fearing to be ſhut up in that city by Waller, who had now reached Eviſham, retired with his army to Bewdley, and directed his courſe towards Shrewſbury. Waller, who expected a large reinforcement, marched forwards, extending his quarters by degrees along the eaſt ſide of the Severn, till he placed himſelf between the king's army and Shrewſbury. This was the very thing the king deſired; for returning upon his own foot-ſteps he reached Oxford; and having reinforced his army from that garriſon, marched, in his turn, in queſt of Waller.

At length, after ſeveral marches and counter-marches, the two armies faced each other at Cropedy-bridge, near Banbury, but were ſeparated by the river Cherwell, which ran between them. On the 29 of June, Waller, who had received conſiderable reinforcements, drew up his army in order for battle, but in ſo advantageous a ſituation, that Charles made a feint of marching towards Daventry, leaving a party of cavalry to guard Cropedy-bridge. This motion drew Waller from his advantageous poſt; and perceiving that the king's van was at a conſiderable diſtance from their rear, he attacked the party at Cropedy-bridge, at the head 15,000 horſe, 1000 foot, and 11 pieces of cannon. The poſt was ſoon abandoned by the royaliſts; but his detachment had no ſooner paſſed the bridge, with an intention to fall upon the rear of the king's army, than they were attacked, repulſed, and purſued with conſiderable loſs. Stunned and diſpirited by this blow, the army of Waller melted away by deſertion; and the king thought he might ſafely leave it, and march to the weſtward againſt Eſſex, who had obliged prince Maurice to raiſe the ſiege of Lyme, and made himſelf maſter of Weymouth and Taunton.

While Charles was marching, he received ſo many reinforcements, that he now appeared in the field with an army ſuperior to that of the enemy. Prince Maurice hovered round the camp of Eſſex with a flying army of 4,000 horſe and foot, cut off his convoys, and perpetually haraſſed his rear during his march. Eſſex now found himſelf greatly diſtreſſed, and knew not what courſe to purſue: he was incapable of fighting the royal army, and had no place of ſtrength whither he might retreat till he received reinforcements. A council of war was called, when lord Roberts propoſed their marching into Cornwall. He obſerved, that the greater part of the inhabitants of that county was well affected to the parliament, and would join their army as ſoon as the troops appeared among them; that there was the greateſt reaſon to think the king would not attempt to follow them into Cornwall, becauſe he muſt by that means be expoſed to the danger of putting himſelf between two fires, as it was more than probable Sir William Waller would ſoon be in a condition to follow him, and haraſs his rear. Theſe reaſons had the deſired effect, and a reſolution was taken of marching directly into Cornwall.

Charles immediately purſued Eſſex, and it was propoſed, in a council of war, to attack him in his camp; but Sir Richard Granville being daily expected from the weſtern parts of Cornwall with a conſiderable body of forces, it was thought more expedient to cut off his proviſions, and force him to ſurrender at diſcretion. Eſſex informed the parliament of his danger, and deſired that a body of troops might be ſent to fall upon the king's rear. General Middleton received a commiſſion to execute that ſervice, but he came too late. The army of Eſſex, cooped in a narrow corner at Leſtithiel, deprived of all forage and proviſions, and ſeeing no proſpect of ſucceſs, was reduced to the laſt extremity. The king preſſed upon them on one ſide; prince Maurice on another; Sir Richard Granville on a third; and Sir Jacob Aſhley on a fourth. Eſſex, Robarts, and ſome of the principal officers, eſcaped in a boat to Plymouth: Balfour, with his horſe, paſſed the king's guards in a thick fog, and got ſafe to the garriſons of his own party. Skippon, who commanded the foot, had no method of eſcaping; he was therefore obliged to capitulate; by which it was agreed, that they ſhould deliver up their arms, artillery, baggage and ammunition. This was accordingly performed; and the ſoldiers being conducted to the parliament's quarters, were diſmiſſed.

The conduct of Charles during this campaign produced him the moſt diſtinguiſhed reputation; and indeed it muſt be owned, that it fell little ſhort of the beſt generals of that age. After his affairs were, to all appearance, deſperate, he had reduced two ſtrong armies of his enemies, commanded by their beſt officers, to the very ſituation which he himſelf had dreaded but a few weeks before. He triumphed over thoſe very perſons whom it was thought almoſt impoſſible for him to eſcape. Middleton attempted to intercept the king's proviſions, and was, in ſome attempts, ſucceſsful; but Sir Francis Doddington watched him ſo narrowly, that, after many bloody ſkirmiſhes, he was obliged to retire to Sherborne.

While Charles was in the weſt, Colonel Gage, one of the royal officers in Oxford, undertook the difficult ſervice of relieving Baſing-houſe, belonging to the marquis of Wincheſter, which colonel Norton, at the head of a large detachment of the parliament's forces, had beſieged upwards of three months. Gage had above forty miles to march from Oxford, and his route lay near the garriſons of Abingdon and Reading. He, however, performed the taſk with great applauſe; for though his party was not ſtrong enough to raiſe the ſiege, yet he found means to throw into the houſe a large convoy of ammunition and proviſions. He afterwards returned to Oxford without ſuffering any loſs. The town of Banbury, and the caſtle of Dennington, were both relieved; and the king's army, after driving Waller out of Andover, marched unmoleſted to Newbury.

The repeated ſucceſſes of the royaliſts greatly alarmed the parliament; and it was now determined to oppoſe the king with very numerous forces. They had new armed the ſubdued forces of Eſſex, and ordered Mancheſter and Cromwell to march with their recruited troops from the eaſtern aſſociation. All theſe forces, joining with thoſe of Waller and Middleton, formed an army far ſuperior to that of the king, and advanced to give him battle. Newbury was a ſecond time the ſcene of the bloody animoſities between the Engliſh. In this battle both parties were guilty of overſights. The king quitted his advantageous ſituation, and drew his army out into Speen-field, ſituated between Newbury and Dennington-caſtle, thinking that he could there be attacked only in front. But in a council of war held at Cheveley, it was reſolved, that Waller, aſſiſted by the London brigade, and the forces of Eſſex, ſhould take poſſeſſion of Speen-hill; that the earl of Mancheſter ſhould advance to Shaw; that the former ſhould begin the attack, and the latter, on a ſignal given, force the paſs at Shaw, by which the king's diſpoſitions muſt be broken. This was, however, a very dangerous ſervice, as Charles was in poſſeſſion not only of Dennington, near which Skippon, who commanded Waller's infantry, muſt paſs, but alſo of Doleman-houſe, which was fortified, and flanked Mancheſter's forces. Waller, however, with the officers under him, acted with great intrepidity and ſucceſs. They made a large circuit to avoid the fire of Dennington-caſtle, but their rear ſuffered very conſiderably by a ſally made from the garriſon. After eſcaping this danger, they attacked the king' troops about three in the afternoon on the twenty-ſeventh of October, and not only drove them from their works, but alſo took nine pieces of cannon. In this attack the ſoldiers of Eſſex, exhorting one another to repair their broken honour, and revenge th diſgrace at Leſtithiel, charged with the utmoſt fury and ſome of the cannon they recovered, being th ſame they had loſt in Cornwall, could not forbear embracing them with tears of joy. But the earl o Mancheſter had not the ſame ſucceſs in attacking th paſſage at Shaw: for though he paſſed the Kennet o the left, and ſeemed at firſt to have the advantage yet Goring, putting himſelf at the head of Cleveland' brigade, drove him back with great ſlaughter; an another perſon attempting to take Doleman-houſe, w obliged to retire with conſiderable loſs. Night, ho ever, coming on before the action on that ſide coul be renewed, put an end to the battle; and Charle fearing that a ſecond engagement might prove fa to his army, determined to avoid it. He therefo left his baggage and cannon in Dennington caſtl and retreated firſt to Wallingford and then to Oxford. Soon after his arrival, he was joined by prince Rupert, at the head of a conſiderable body of cavalry, and a good train of artillery. Strengthened by this reinforcement, he ventured to advance towards the enemy, now employed in the ſiege of Dennington-caſtle. Eſſex, detained by ſickneſs, had not joined the army ſince his miſfortune in Cornwall. Mancheſter, who commanded in his abſence, though his forces were much ſuperior to thoſe of the king, declined an engagement, notwithſtanding the preſſing ſolicitations of Cromwell, who conjured him not to neglect ſo favourable an opportunity of putting an end to the war. The king therefore carried off his artillery from Dennington-caſtle, in the face of the enemy, and by that means ſufficiently repaired the honour that had been loſt by his retreat from the battle of Newbury. But this was not all the advantage Charles gained by this action; it excited animoſities between Mancheſter and Cromwell, equal at leaſt to thoſe that before ſubſiſted between Eſſex and Waller, and which had proved ſo favourable to his majeſty.

The battle of Newbury put an end to the campaign, and both armies were ſoon after diſtributed into winter quarters. But though the military operations were over for a ſeaſon, the conteſts between the different generals increaſed when they repaired to London: the whole city and parliament were agitated by their mutual reproaches and accuſations. Theſe, indeed, owed their riſe to a party, which had been ſome time formed in the parliament, but which the dread of the royal power had hitherto ſuppreſſed. This party were called Independents, a ſect hitherto blended with the preſbyterians, and acquired diſtinction only from the deſtruction of monarchy. Enthuſiaſts by ſyſtem, infatuated with the idea of religious perfection, and believing that they were all ſupernaturally inſpired, they would admit of neither rites, nor biſhops, nor miniſters, they pretending that the holy ſpirit, by its inward communications, placed both poor and rich upon a level, and made the ignorant equal to the learned. They hated royalty no leſs than hierarchy. The object of the puritans was to reſtrain, theirs to annihilate the prerogative; and adding a profound policy to their abſurd reveries, they executed what others thought impoſſible. Cromwell, who was at the head of the independents, had a capacity adapted to the greateſt enterprize: he had the ardour of an enthuſiaſt, the daring ſpirit of the leader of a party, the diſſimulation of a hypocrite, the talents of a general, and the genius and addreſs of a ſtateſman. He declaimed, with great violence in the houſe of commons, againſt the conduct of Mancheſter, whom he accuſed of not puſhing the war with the neceſſary vigour; eſpecially of neglecting at Dennington-caſtle, the opportunity of totally defeating the royal army. And Mancheſter, in his turn, accuſed Cromwell of ſeditious ſpeeches, calculated to ruin the parliament.

The ſeverity of theſe diſputes alarmed the Independents; they perceived that they muſt now carry their ſcheme into execution, or abandon all thoughts of effecting it; and accordingly they formed the reſolution of new modelling the army. Their maxim was, that he who drew his ſword againſt the king, ſhould throw away the ſcabbard. They were for deciſive actions, and officers that would not heſitate at any enterprize. They were, indeed, far inferior in number, both in the parliament and in the kingdom, to the preſbyterian party; but they had addreſs ſufficient, in the end, to carry their deſign into execution. At their inſtigation, a ſolemn faſt was voted, in order to implore the aſſiſtance of heaven. Some of the moſt furious preachers lamented the diſſentions in parliament, and charged the members with intereſted views. They complained of the perfidious remiſſneſs of the leaders, who, inſtead of putting a ſpeedy end to the war, ſought only, by prolonging it, to enrich themſelves with the ſubſtance of the people. They intreated the Lord to raiſe up men more worthy to be the inſtruments of his providence. The day following, theſe diſcourſes were repreſented by the independent party in parliament as the manifeſt inſpiration of the Holy Spirit. The neceſſity of finding ſome remedy for theſe diſorders was inſiſted on. The members were conjured to diveſt themſelves of all perſonal intereſt and lucrative employments. Cromwell remarked, that ſince the commencement of the war, a number of able officers had been formed, who were capable of conducting the moſt dangerous expeditions; that the troops wanted a reform on a new plan, and the ſucceſs would depend on the extirpation of abuſes. Theſe repreſentations produced the deſired effect. A committee was appointed to frame what was called the "Self-denying Ordinance," by which the members of both houſes were excluded from all civil and military employments, except a few officers who were ſpecified. This ordinance gave occaſion to the moſt furious debates, and, for ſome time, rent both the parliament and city into factions. It was obſerved by the independent party, that the diſcipline of the army did not correſpond with the merit of the officers, nor were there any hopes, till the preſent vices and diſorders, which prevailed among the ſoldiers, were repreſſed by a new model, that the forces of the parliament would ever be attended with ſignal ſucceſs in any undertaking. The preſbyterians, on the contrary, repreſented, that beſides the ingratitude of diſcarding, by fraud and ſubtlety, ſo many noble perſons by whom the parliament had been hitherto chiefly ſupported, they would find it extremely difficult to ſupply the place of men, now formed by experience to command and authority: that the rank alone, poſſeſſed by ſuch as were members of either houſe, prevented envy, retained the army in obedience, and gave weight to military orders; that greater confidence might ſafely be repoſed in men of family and fortune, than in mere adventurers, who would be apt to entertain ſeparate views from thoſe embraced by the perſons who employed them. But notwithſtanding theſe reaſons, which were urged with great force and eloquence, the bill paſſed both houſes of parliament. In conſequence of this act, Eſſex, Warwick, Mancheſter, Denbigh, Waller, Brereton, and ſeveral others, reſigned their commiſſions, and received the thanks of the parliament for their good ſervices; and a penſion of 10,000l. per annum was ſettled on Eſſex.

A. D. 1645. The Self-denying Ordinance being paſſed, it was agreed to recruit the army to 22,000 men, and Sir Thomas Fairfax was appointed general. It is remarkable that his commiſſion did not run like that of Eſſex, in the name of the king and parliament, but in that of the parliament alone; and the article relating to the ſafety of the king's perſon was omitted. Cromwell, being a member of the lower houſe, ſhould have been diſcarded with the others; but this impartiality would have diſappointed the views of thoſe who had introduced the Self-denying Ordinance. He was ſaved by a ſubtelty and that political craft in which he was ſo eminent. At the time when the other officers reſigned their commiſſions, care was taken that he ſhould be ſent with a body of horſe, to relieve Taunton, beſieged by the royaliſts. His abſence being remarked, orders were immediately diſpatched for his attendance in parliament; and the new general was directed to employ ſome other officer in that ſervice. Cromwell feigned a ready compliance, and a day was fixed when he would take his place in the houſe. But Fairfax having appointed a rendezvous of the army, wrote to the parliament, deſiring leave to retain, for ſome days, lieutenant-general Cromwell, whoſe advice, he ſaid, would be uſeful in ſupplying the place of thoſe officers who had reſigned. Shortly after he begged, with great earneſtneſs, that they would allow Cromwell to ſerve during that campaign: thus the independents, tho' much inferior in number, obtained a complete victory over the preſbyterians; it being ſufficiently evident that the army could give law to the parliament. For though the command of the forces was, in appearance, conferred on Fairfax, it reſted in reality, with Cromwell.

Fairfax, having thus procured the continuance of Cromwell, new-modelled the army by his aſſiſtance, incorporating ſome regiments into others, making a total change in all the military departments, and eſtabliſhing a new diſcipline. All this, which at any other time would have occaſioned a revolt, now paſſed without the leaſt oppoſition.

During theſe tranſactions a treaty of peace was negotiating between the king and parliament, but with little hopes of ſucceſs. Upon his majeſty's return to Oxford, after putting his army into winter quarters, the two houſes required, and procured a ſafe conduct for their deputies, with propoſals for an accommodation, which they had framed during the ſummer. Charles, on their being preſented to him, required, in his turn, a ſafe conduct for the duke of Richmond, and the earl of Southampton, who ſhould carry his anſwer to the two houſes. But this favour was not to be obtained, till he had addreſſed them by the title of the two houſes of parliament aſſembled at Weſtminſter, and alſo the Scottiſh commiſſioners. On this occaſion Charles had recourſe to an artifice, which does very little honor to his ſincerity: he entered in his council-book a ſecret proteſt, importing, that though he had called them a parliament, he did not acknowledge them as ſuch.

A treaty, however, being agreed to by both parties, Uxbridge was the place appointed for holding the conferences; and Charles appointed ſixteen commiſſioners, who accordingly met thoſe authorized by the parliament, attended by the Scots commiſſioners. It was agreed that the Scots and parliamentary commiſſioners ſhould give in their demands with regard to three important articles, namely, religion, the militia, and Ireland; and that theſe ſhould be ſucceſſively examined and diſcuſſed, in conferences with the king's commiſſioners. But it was ſoon found totally impracticable to come to any agreement with regard to either of theſe articles.

In conſequence of this, the negotiation was broke off, and each party prepared to decide the important conteſt by the ſword. On the 3d of April Fairfax repaired to the rendezvous of his troops at Windſor, where, by the great care and aſſiduity of Skippon, his ſerjeant-major, he found the army in excellent condition. Cromwell, having joined him from Saliſbury, was diſpatched with a party of horſe into Oxfordſhire, to prevent the junction of a large body of cavalry, detached from prince Rupert's army in the neighbourhood of Oxford. He was fortunate enough to meet at Iſlip-bridge five of the beſt regiments in the royal army, commanded by the earl of Northampton, and gained a complete victory, took 200 men priſoners, and 400 horſes. He then ſummoned and took Blechington-houſe, commanded by colonel Windebank, who was afterwards ſhot at Oxford, for delivering up the place. His next attempt was againſt another party of the royaliſts poſted at Brampton-buſh, under the command of Sir William Vaughan, whom he defeated and took priſoner, with two hundred of his men.

The town of Taunton was ſtill beſieged by the royaliſts, and the garriſon was reduced to ſuch extremity, that they had for ſome time ſubſiſted on the moſt nauſeous food. It was defended by colonel Blake, and attacked by Goring and Sir Richard Granville: but the latter being wounded, his command was given to Sir John Berkley, whom the troops refuſed to obey; and a difference happening between general Goring and the council in the weſt, the ſiege was raiſed at the approach of the parliamentary army.

After Cromwell had been ſo ſucceſsful in his encounters with the royaliſts, he ſummoned Farringdon-houſe to ſurrender. But colonel Bruges, who commanded the garriſon, inſtead of complying with the demand, ſallied out at the head of his troops, and Cromwell was defeated, though he had been joined by a ſtrong party of foot from Abingdon, under the command of Major-general Brown. In the mean time prince Rupert defeated Maſſey, governor of Glouceſter, and joined the king at Oxford; ſoon after which Goring defeated a body of Cromwell's horſe, and brought his forces to the royal camp.

Charles now took the field at the head of his army, which conſiſted of 6,000 horſe, and 5,000 foot. He directed his march towards Warwickſhire, in order to relieve Cheſter, which had been for ſome time beſieged by Brereton; but on the approach of the royal army, he drew off his forces, and marched towards Lancaſhire. In conſequence of this the king changed his rout. and determined to attack the town o Leiceſter, which was very ſtrong and defended by a good garriſon: but by the remarkable bravery o his troops, the place was carried by ſtorm, and the governor, with all his garriſon, conſiſting of 1500 men, were made priſoners of war. Could the king have reſtrained the exceſſes of his ſoldiers, this acquiſition would have proved of the utmoſt import ance; but the diſorders they committed, after they were maſters of the town, did more prejudice to hi affairs, than all the plunder they acquired, tho' it wa very rich, did him ſervice. Beſides the priſoners, h took about 1000 horſes, fourteen pieces of can non, and a great quantity of ammunition and militar ſtores.

The loſs of Leiceſter greatly alarmed the parlia ment. They preſſed the Scots to quicken the march to the ſouthward, and Fairfax, being now join ed by Cromwell and Brown, was ordered to block u Oxford. But thoſe meaſures were greatly embarra ſed by the backwardneſs of the Scots, who had r treated into Weſtmoreland, and by the bad conditio of Fairfax's army, after its fatiguing march into t weſt. Fairfax, however, obeyed his orders, an ſat down before Oxford on the 23d of May; thoug he was apprehenſive the king would ſoon return, a ſhut him up between his army and the town, whi was ſtrong and well garriſoned. On receiving a vice that the king was marching to relieve Oxfo Fairfax was ordered to leave the command of t blockade to general Brown, and watch the motio of the royal army; it being ſtrongly ſuſpected, th inſtead of marching to Oxford, the king intended fall upon the aſſociated counties. It ſoon appea that this opinion was well founded; and orders w immediately diſpatched for raiſing the blockade Oxford, and giving the king battle, if he contin to advance. Colonel Vermuden, who had been to join the Scots, finding they were retreated i Weſtmoreland, returned to the ſouthward, and himſelf between the royal army and the aſſocia counties. Borſtal-houſe had been, for ſome ti beſieged by Skippon, but made ſo brave a defe that he was obliged to draw off his forces. He j ed Fairfax on the 6th of June, and the next the whole army reached Sherington, in order to defend the aſſociated counties; certain advices having been received that the king had directed his march towards Northampton.

The parliament at Weſtminſter were very uneaſy, not from the ſucceſs of Charles, but from the reproaches of the expelled members, who beheld the progreſs of the king with infinite pleaſure. Goring had now cooped up Welden, who had been detached by Fairfax to Taunton, between his army and the walls of that place, and advice was every hour expected that both Welden and the town had ſurrendered. Charles had, however, ſeen his error and repented his having ſent Goring into the weſt; but he ſtill had it in his power to rejoin him, or to retire either to Leiceſter or Worceſter, where he might have recruited and refreſhed his army, while that of the parliament was haraſſed with fatiguing marches.

Had Charles taken theſe prudent meaſures, they would, in all probability, have been productive of the moſt ſalutary conſequences; but, inſtead thereof, it was unhappily reſolved to fight Fairfax. This reſolution was principally owing to the ungovernable order of prince Rupert, who excited the impatient humour of the nobility and gentry, of which the army was full, by urging the many difficulties under which the royaliſts laboured, and from which they could be relieved by nothing but a victory. The king's forces lay about Daventry in Northamptonſhire, where he waited five days in expectation of engaging Fairfax, of whoſe marches he was totally ignorant. At laſt certain advice arrived, that the parliament's general, who had now been joined by all his parties, was advanced to Wooton, and that his head quarters was within ſix miles of that of the king. It was not even now too late for Charles to decline an engagement without any injury to his reputation. He might ave taken poſſeſſion of a ſtrong camp upon Burough-ill, where the forces of Fairfax could not have at-acked him, and where he might have waited till join-d by a party of 1200 horſe, detatched into Leiceſ-erſhire; or even till Goring returned from his ex-edition againſt Welden's army. But theſe advan-ges were neglected, and the royal army advanced gainſt that of the parliament.

The forces, which on both ſides were nearly equal, ere drawn up in Naſeby-field, the ſpot on which bloody conteſt between the king and his parlia-nt was decided. The right wing of the royaliſts s commanded by prince Rupert, the left by Sir armaduke Langdale, and the main body by the g in perſon. In the parliament's army, Cromwell mmanded the right wing, Ireton, his ſon-in-law, left, and Fairfax, aſſiſted by Skippon, the main dy. The parliament's army had the advantage of ground and ſituation: their front extended ſome-t farther than the king's; and a party of their goons poſſeſſed themſelves of ſome hedges, which ked prince Rupert's horſe. The charge was be-by prince Rupert, with his uſual celerity and l ſucceſs. Ireton made a ſtout reſiſtance; and after he was run through the thigh with a pike, maintained the combat till he was taken priſoner; all his courage was not ſufficient to ſupport the adful charge of the prince; his whole wing was e, and purſued with the moſt precipitate fury, by violent commander. He was even ſo inconſide-as to loſe time in ſummoning and attacking the ery of the parliament, which had been left with ong guard of infantry. The king led on his main with great intrepidity, and with all the conduct prudent general. The conteſt was here very p. Fairfax and Skippon nobly ſupported the t reputation they had acquired. The latter being dangerouſly wounded, was deſired by Fairfax to leave the field; but he declared he would continue there as long as any ſoldier would ſtand his ground. But notwithſtanding all the intrepidity of theſe two generals, the infantry in the center was broke; and Fairfax's own regiment, commanded by Sir Charles Doyley, was the only body of foot that kept their ground. Fairfax, however, with great preſence of mind, brought up the reſerve, and renewed the combat. In the mean time, Cromwell attacked the left wing of the royal army with ſuch intrepidity, that they could not ſupport the charge; they were broken, and purſued about a quarter of a mile, when Cromwell, who improved by his prudence the advantage he had gained by his valour, detached a party to prevent their rallying, while he himſelf turned back upon the king's infantry, and threw them into the utmoſt confuſion. One regiment only maintained its order unbroken, though twice deſperately aſſaulted by Fairfax. But the third attempt proved deciſive; Doyley charged them in front, while Fairfax attacked them in the rear. The gallant regiment was now broken, and partly diſperſed. Senſible, when it was too late, of his error, prince Rupert abandoned his fruitleſs attempt upon the enemy's artillery, and joined the king, whoſe infantry was now totally defeated. Charles did all in his power to animate this body of cavalry to exert that valour they had already diſplayed; he called aloud to them, "One charge more, and we recover the day." But they ſaw too evidently the diſadvantages under which they laboured, to obey even the command of their ſovereign. The king was obliged to quit the field, and leave the victory to the enemy.

The number of ſlain in the parliament's army was greater than that in the king's, the former loſing upward of 1000, and the latter not above 800. But Fairfax took 400 officers, and upwards of 5000 men priſoners. He alſo took 12 pieces of cannon, two mortars, 8000 arms, 40 barrels of powder, and 100 colours, together with the king's equipage, and cabinet, in which were copies of his letters to the queen, which the parliament afterwards ordered to be publiſhed. In a word, this victory was at once the greateſt and moſt complete of any gained by the parliament during the whole courſe of the civil war.

Charles had ſtill a fine body of 2000 horſe, and 1000 foot, in Wales, under general Gerrard. Goring was at the head of an army before Taunton, little inferior to that the king had loſt at Naſeby, and the routed horſe were every day coming in to ſome of the royal garriſons. But a flood of misfortunes were now to be poured on the head of this unfortunate prince: his enemies conquered his towns, garriſons and armies, almoſt as faſt as a traveller could paſs from one to the other. The lord Loughborough ſurrendered Leiceſter to Fairfax, without ſtipulating any other condition, than that of obtaining quarters for himſelf and his garriſon. But Fairfax being no ſtranger to the wretched condition of Taunton, ſent a meſſenger to the parliament for inſtructions concerning his march into the weſt. In the mean time, he paſſed from Leiceſter to Lutterworth, and proceeded, without any interruption, to Dorcheſter. The miſeries of civil diſcord had, for ſome time, been ſo ſeverely felt by the inhabitants of the weſtern counties, eſpecially thoſe of Devon, Dorſet, and Wilts, that they had formed a ſcheme of neutrality, under the title of Club-men. Their declared intentions was to reſiſt either party who ſhould attack them, and to mediate fair conditions between the king and his parliament. This aſſociation was now ſo ſtrong, as to be formidable to both parties, who equally complained of their ſufferings from the Club-men. Soon after Fairfax reached Dorcheſter, Mr. Hollis, a gentleman of Dorſetſhire, with ſeveral other leaders of the Club-men, waited upon him with the following articles and requeſts, "That the aſſociates provide arms, ſet watches, be quiet with thoſe that excite no diſturbance, ſeize all diſorderly ſoldiers and ſend them to the neareſt garriſons; not to deny quarters and contributions proportioned to their abilities: till their petitions be delivered, not to favour either party, nor to protect any not aſſociated. To requeſt the renewal of a treaty, with a ceſſation of arms, and alſo that the garriſons in Dorſet, Devon, and Wilts, be put into their hands, till the king and parliament agree about their diſpoſal: that they be freed from all charges, except the maintenance of thoſe garriſons: that all laws, not repealed, be in force, and executed by the ordinary officers: that all perſons who deſire it may be at liberty to lay down their arms; and that others who have abſented themſelves from their houſes may have free liberty to return." The general told them, that he greatly approved of their endeavours to bring about a peace; but not of the ceſſation of arms, or of diſbanding the ſoldiers; but promiſed to protect them from being plundered, and required them to diſcontinue their meetings. Perhaps he would not have diſmiſſed the leaders of the Club-men on ſuch eaſy terms, had he not been very deſirous of proſecuting his favourite ſcheme, the relief of Taunton, the parliament having conſented to his leading the army into thoſe parts, where the royaliſts were ſtill powerful, and capable of making a gallant reſiſtance.

But feuds and animoſities had, for ſome time, prevailed among the officers, and threatened inevitable ruin to the royal party. Goring was capable of performing all that could be required from the braveſt and vileſt of mankind. His abilities were ſufficient to clothe vice with every advantage; his eloquence to delude caution into ruin. His heart, inſenſible either to the happineſs or miſeries of others, laid not a check on his career of wickedneſs. His profligacy, his intemperance, his riots, his overſights and his negligence, rendered it problematical for what end nature had beſtowed her gifts on a perſon who diſgraced them; and why fortune courted a man ſo ungrateful to her favours. The hopes of victory could not reſtrain him from debauchery, nor the fear of infamy deter him from treachery. His ſerving the royal party was not in him the reſult of principle, but of accident; and when oppoſed by the king's council, it cauſed him more pains to diſappoint, than it would have done to have executed the excellent diſpoſitions laid down by himſelf for the ſervice of his maſter. The ravages and barbarities of his ſoldiers had rendered him ſo diſagreeable to the royal party in the weſt, that he knew they had done him ill offices with his maſter, and was reſolved the ſervice ſhould ſuffer. He was accordingly ſo negligent in guarding the paſſages to Taunton, that the beſieged received frequent relief from the adjacent country, and even his chief officers were ſuffered to have interviews with thoſe of the enemy. This at once prolonged the ſiege, and diſcouraged the infantry ſo greatly, that they mouldered away; and when Fairfax advanced to relieve the place, Goring found himſelf under a neceſſity, wantonly occaſioned by his own negligence, of raiſing the ſiege. He retired to Lamport, an open town in Somerſetſhire, where he was defeated by Fairfax, who killed 300 of his men, and took 1400 priſoners.

Fairfax now ſat down before Bridgewater, a ſtrong and important town in that country. The place was defended by colonel Windham, at the head of a garriſon of 2,600 men. For ſome time the beſieged made a ſtout reſiſtance; but the outer town being taken by ſtorm, Windham capitulated, and delivered up the place to Fairfax; by which the whole garriſon were made priſoners of war. The taking of Bridgewater was a dreadful blow to the royaliſts, becauſe it was conſidered as impregnable; and the king's friends had laid up in it, as a ſure repoſitory, their treaſure and moſt valuable effects.

The king was now retreated to Cardiff, in South-Wales, where he had leiſure to reflect on his fallen condition; and, perhaps, ſaw it more clearly, and felt it more ſenſibly, than any man of his party. But when he was the ſport of fortune, he ſeemed regardleſs of her frowns. When his beſt friends, even thoſe who had been moſt forward in advancing war, now preſſed him to accept of peace on almoſt any conditions, Charles declared himſelf of a different opinion. He admitted, indeed, that he had nothing but ruin to himſelf, his cauſe, and his family, before his eyes; but at the ſame time declared, that he would neither ſacrifice his conſcience, injure his ſucceſſor, nor forſake his friends. He told prince Rupert, who was one of the party for peace, that if his caſe was to be viewed by a politician, it would appear next to frenzy for him to decline any terms; but as a king, a chriſtian, and a gentleman, low as his fortunes were, he would grant no other terms than what were conſiſtent with the honour and dignity of a ſovereign.

The Scots, having taken Carliſle, which had fo eleven months been bravely defended by Sir Thoma Glenham, marched to the ſouthward, and ſat down before Hereford; but they were ſo diſguſted by th treatment they had received in England, that th ſiege advanced very ſlowly. They complained loudl of the want of money, proviſions and artillery, whic had been promiſed them by the parliament, but th promiſe had never been performed. Charles bein therefore in no great pain with regard to the fate o Hereford, directed his courſe to the northward; an after very fatiguing marches, reached Doncaſte where he was joined by a body of 3000 men; it bein the peculiar fate of that prince to acquire mo friends by his misfortunes than by his proſperity. required, indeed, all his fortitude to ſupport th ſhocks of ill fortune by which he was every da aſſailed. The caſtles of Scarborough, Shipton, Sa dal, and Pontefract, after making a noble oppoſitio were obliged to ſurrender to the parliament; b their garriſons joined the royal army.

Charles was now very deſirous of puſhing forwa into Scotland, to join Montroſe, who, at the head a handful of naked, half-armed highlanders, had c in pieces ſeveral armies of regular veterans, co manded by officers of experience, and ſupported the whole ſtrength of the kingdom. The Scott army before Hereford were alarmed at his ſucce and general Leſley, at the head of all the cavalry a dragoons, marched directly towards Scotland. I mediately after his departure, the earls of Leven a Callender, who commanded at the ſiege of Herefo drew up a kind of manifeſto, enumerating the di culties and diſappointments they had met with, a urging the neceſſity of ſaving their own country fr the deſtruction with which it was threatened by Mo troſe. They accordingly raiſed the ſiege of He ford, and began their march to the northward. L ley, informed of the king's intention, marched w ſo much expedition, that he reached Rotherham a ſecured the paſs at Ferry-bridge, before the king informed of the rout he had taken; while Poyn one of the parliament's generals, took poſt, wi ſtrong body of horſe, in the neighbourhood of W ceſter. It being now impoſſible for Charles to l his army into Scotland, he directed his march tow the eaſtern aſſociated counties, with ſo much ſucc that he took Huntingdon, defeated ſeveral par of the enemy, and returned, with a conſidera booty, to Oxford.

In the mean time Fairfax made himſelf maſter of Bath and Sherborne caſtle, and prepared for beſieging Briſtol; an enterprize which, from the ſtrength of the garriſon, and the great reputation of prince Rupert the governor, was deemed of the laſt importance. But a weaker defence was not made by any town during the whole war. The general expectations were here totally diſappointed. The lines were no ſooner taken by ſtorm, than the prince capitulated, and delivered up the city to Fairfax. Charles, who, on receiving advice that Fairfax determined to beſiege Briſtol, had collected all his forces to relieve the city, was aſtoniſhed at ſo unexpected an event, which was hardly leſs fatal to his party than the battle of Naſeby. Exaſperated at the behaviour of Rupert, he inſtantly recalled all his commiſſions, and ſent him a ſafe conduct to paſs over to the continent.

Every thing now portended the ruin of the royal party. The king marched to the relief of Cheſter, which was beſieged by Jones, at the head of a ſtrong detachment of the parliament's forces. Poyntz followed him cloſe, and on his arrival in the neighbourhood of Cheſter, attacked his rear, and forced him to give battle. The action was very ſharp, and victory ſeemed to incline to the royaliſts, till Jones fell upon their troops on the other ſide, and put them to flight, with the loſs of 600 ſlain, and 1000 priſoners. The king fled, with the remains of his broken army, to Newark, and thence eſcaped to Oxford, where he ſhut himſelf up during the winter.

The two generals, Fairfax and Cromwell, having now no powerful army to oppoſe them, divided their forces. Cromwell, at the head of four regiments, marched to the Devizes, and ſoon obliged the garriſon to capitulate. Berkley-caſtle was taken by colonel Rainſborough; but the garriſon, conſiſting of 00 men, were ſuffered to march out without their arms. Cromwell's detachment being now ſtrengthened by three regiments of horſe, he marched to Wincheſter, and ſat down before the caſtle, which was defended by lord Ogle, at the head of a numerous garriſon; but after a vigorous defence he was obliged to capitulate on honourable conditions. The next expedition was againſt Baſing-houſe, which, under the brave marquis of Wincheſter, had already repelled ſo many deſperate attacks of the enemy. But he could not reſiſt the impetuoſity of Cromwell; he took it ſword in hand, put the garriſon to the ſword, and ſent the marquis, with a few of the principal officers, priſoners to London.

A. D. 1646. Animated with ſucceſs, Fairfax determined to make an attack on Dartmouth, which, with the aſſiſtance of a ſquadron of the parliament's ſhips, under the command of admiral Batten, he took by ſtorm on the eighteenth of January. One hundred and twenty pieces of cannon, 1000 priſoners, 00 horſes, with proportional arms and ammunition, and two ſmall ſhips of war, belonging to the king, now fell into the hands of Fairfax. Among the priſoners were the earl of Dartmouth, colonel eymour, and a great number of inferior officers. oudram caſtle next fell into the hands of the victorious Fairfax; who now laid cloſe ſiege to Exeter. Lord Hopton, who commanded the royal army, conſiſting of 8000 men, advanced to relieve the place. The two armies met at Torrington, where Hopton was defeated, all his foot diſperſed, and he himſelf, with his horſe, obliged to retire into Cornwall. Fairfax purſued his victory with ſo much vigour, that he encloſed the royaliſts at Truro, and forced the whole army, conſiſting of 5000 men, chiefly cavalry, to ſurrender upon terms. The ſoldiers, delivering up their horſes and arms, were permitted to diſband, and received twenty ſhillings each to carry them to their own homes. Such of the officers as deſired it were granted paſſes to retire beyond the ſeas: the others, having promiſed never more to bear arms againſt the parliament, received a free pardon, on paying compoſitions proportioned to their abilities.

Fairfax now returned to the ſiege of Exeter, and after making himſelf maſter of that city, which completed the conqueſt of the Weſt, he marched his victorious army to the centre of the kingdom, and fixed his head quarters at Newbury. The prince of Wales had the good fortune to eſcape when the royal army was inveſted at Truro; and, purſuant to the repeated orders of his father, paſſed over to the Iſles of Scilly, from thence to Jerſey, and afterwards to Paris.

Charles was no leſs unfortunate in other parts of the kingdom. Hereford was taken by ſurprize; Cheſter ſurrendered: Lord Digby, who had attempted, at the head of 1200 horſe, to force his way into Scotland, and join Montroſe, was defeated at Sherborne in Yorkſhire, by colonel Copely; his whole force was diſperſed, and he himſelf obliged to fly, firſt into the Iſle of Man, and thence into Ireland. The town and caſtle of Chepſtow were delivered up to the parliament; the counties of Pembroke and Caermarthen were reduced by Langhorne: Shelford and Wyverton houſes were taken, and even the undaunted counteſs of Derby was obliged to ſurrender Latham-houſe. And to put a final period to the hopes of the royaliſts, news arrived that Montroſe himſelf, after the moſt aſtoniſhing ſucceſs, was totally defeated, and obliged to fly, with his broken forces, into the mountains.

In this ſituation was the ſtate of affairs when the inclemency of the ſeaſon put a ſtop to the rage of war. It would be endleſs to mention all the ſmaller actions and ſkirmiſhes, the ſieges of caſtles, and the taking of houſes, that happened during the whole campaign, ſo fatal to the royal party. The genius of Cromwell ſhone in its full luſtre; he was the ſupport of the independents; while his amazing ſucceſs awakened the jealouſy of the preſbyterians. He flew from poſt to poſt with aſtoniſhing expedition; the news of one conqueſt hardly arrived before another was finiſhed; the ſhouts of victory in his troops were blended with the ſinging of pſalms, and the conſultations for battle and deſtruction were always preceded by the exerciſes of prayer and preaching. That artful general always took care to keep the minds of his ſoldiers warm, either by the heat of battle, or the force of enthuſiaſm: he was at once their martial and their ſpiritual leader. Every county was a bloody ſcene of action, and on almoſt every gentleman's eſtate encounters happened, which exceeded in fury thoſe of any foreign war. The numbers that fell in the moſt diſtinguiſhed battles were inconſiderable when compared with the total that were ſlain in thoſe leſſer ſkirmiſhes. "To the work of the Lord diligently," was now become the watch-word of the independents, and implied, that no quarter ought to be given to the royaliſts, and that the war ſhould be carried on without regarding the few decencies which had hitherto been preſerved toward his majeſty and the chief nobility of the kingdom.

Charles now made another effort for negotiating a peace with the parliament, and deſired to have a perſonal treaty with the two houſes. He offered to come to London on receiving a ſafe conduct for himſelf and his attendants, and to commit the truſt of the militia to perſons againſt whom there could be no juſt exception. But they abſolutely refuſed him acceſs; and even iſſued orders for ſeizing his perſon if he attempted to viſit them.

The king's ſituation was now truly deplorable. Fairfax was approaching, at the head of a powerful and victorious army, to beſiege him in Oxford, whence it would be impoſſible for him, after the city was inveſted, to make his eſcape. He could not bear the thoughts of being made a captive, and led in triumph through the ſtreets of his capital, amidſt a prejudiced and inſolent populace, and a rude enthuſiaſtic ſoldiery, who hated his perſon and deſpiſed his dignity. The Scots army had now inveſted Newark, and ſeemed to open the only aſylum to majeſty in diſtreſs. He imagined that the Scots had not yet loſt all attachment to their ſovereign; and that, as zealous preſbyterians, they would not willingly ſubmit to the independents. Montreville, the French miniſter, deſirous of ſerving the king, had ſolicited the Scots generals and commiſſioners to give protection to their diſtreſſed ſovereign; and having received many general profeſſions and promiſes, he tranſmitted theſe, poſſibly with ſome exaggeration, to the king, who now determined to throw himſelf into the arms of his Scottiſh ſubjects.

The greateſt ſecrecy, however, was obſerved in this tranſaction; and that no interruption, ſufficient to occaſion a diſcovery, might happen, orders were given at every gate in Oxford to permit three perſons to paſs without being examined. Theſe precautions being taken, Charles, attended only by Dr. Hudſon and Mr. Aſhburnham, paſſed about midnight thro' the gate that leads to London. The king, in the dreſs of Aſhburnham's ſervant, with a portmanteau behind him, paſſed through Henley and Harrow on the Hill. He once entertained ſome thoughts of entering the capital, and throwing himſelf into the arms of the parliament; but this deſign appearing too dangerous, he purſued his firſt intention; and after paſſing through many croſs roads, reached the Scottiſh camp before Newark. The ſurpriſe of their generals and commiſſioners was prodigious: they pretended to do him homage, and paid him every external mark of reſpect, but were determined to make him a captive. They allotted him a guard, under pretence of protection and eſteem, but in reality to ſecure his perſon.

Newark ſtill made a noble defence againſt the Scots, who now applied to the king for orders to the governor to ſurrender the place. He readily obeyed, and the gates were opened to the enemy. Soon after the king's arrival, the Scots had informed the parliament of their being in poſſeſſion of his perſon; but hearing that the commons intended to demand him, and that the army of Fairfax was already in motion towards their camp, they thought proper to retire towards the frontiers of their own kingdom, and encamped at Newcaſtle, a place of great ſtrength. This motion was not diſagreeable to Charles; he imagined it was taken merely for the protection of his perſon; and flattered himſelf that by the conjunction of his friends with the Scots, he would be once more in a condition of facing the enemy, and poſſibly of reſtoring peace to his exhauſted kingdoms.

Charles, however, well knew that the Scots would never heartily concur in promoting his intereſt, unleſs he could gain the favour of their miniſters; he was therefore very attentive to their long and enthuſiaſtic ſermons, and ſeemed very deſirous of their inſtructions. But he ſoon perceived that the covenanting zealots were by no means his friends. One of their preachers, after bitterly reproaching him, in the harſheſt terms for his conduct, gave out that pſalm, which, in the Engliſh tranſlation, begins, "Why boaſteſt thou thyſelf, thou tyrant, that thou canſt do miſchief?" The king ſtood up, and called for that pſalm which begins, "Have pity upon me, O Lord, for men go about to devour me." The good-natured audience ſhewed that they were penetrated with the ſight of majeſty in diſtreſs, and ſung the pſalm called for by the king. Pity, for once, triumped over enthuſiaſm.

The Scottiſh generals now requeſted of Charles that he would iſſue orders to the governors of all his garriſons to ſurrender the places they defended to the parliament. The king readily complied with this requeſt: he perceived he could hope for no effectual aſſiſtance from the Scots, and knew that any further oppoſition would only tend to exaſperate ſtill more the party that was formed againſt him. Fairfax carried theſe orders into execution, and granted the garriſons honourable terms: he even prevented, as far as in his power, any inſults from being offered to the unfortunate royaliſts. The capital, with all the other forts garriſoned by the king's party in Ireland, were alſo delivered up to the parliament's officers; and Montroſe, after experiencing a great variety of good and bad fortune, threw down his arms, and retired to the continent.

As no farther oppoſition was now expected on the part of the royaliſts, it was thought neceſſary to project ſome method of ſettling the diſtracted ſtate o kingdom. But this was not eaſy to be performed. The ſtrength of the independent party in parliamen was greatly increaſed; and the army was at the devotion of Cromwell; but both began to entertain jealouſies of the Scots. It was therefore voted, "tha there is no farther occaſion for the Scottiſh army t continue in England. And, that 100,000l. be raiſed and one moiety thereof paid to the Scots, on thei delivering up all the towns they have garriſoned i England, except Berwick, and the other on thei return to Scotland." At the ſame time, they ordere the Scots commiſſioners to deliver to the houſe a account of the arrears due to their army, that the might be diſcharged according to the treaty betwee the two kingdoms.

Propoſals for eſtabliſhing a peace were now lai before the king; but they were of ſuch a nature a could only be expected by a captive entirely at th mercy of an inexorable conqueror. When Charle had read them, he told the meſſengers, that as the tended to introduce the moſt important innovation in the conſtitution, it was highly reaſonable he ſhoul be allowed a proper time for deliberation. They re plied, that he muſt give his anſwer in ten days. Th king complained, that the terms made uſe of wer not defined, and deſired to know their meaning The meſſengers told him they had no power to de bate, and that he muſt give a poſitive anſwer. Upo this the king delivered a paper, in which he com plained of the limited powers of the commiſſioner and demanded permiſſion to come to London, an treat with his parliament in perſon.

The parliament's commiſſioners, not thinking th paper any ways ſatisfactory, made ſome difficulty receiving it. And though it was accepted, yet produced no effect: the king was given to underſtan that if he refuſed to comply with their demand they would ſettle the kingdom by their own autho rity.

But two difficulties ſtill continued to be removed namely, to prevail on the Scots to deliver up th king, and to ſettle the payment of the arrears of the army. Both theſe particulars cauſed long debates the parliament. The Scots pretended, that Charles was king of both nations, they were equal entitled with the Engliſh to vote on the queſtion r lative to the diſpoſal of his perſon; and that whe the titles of both are equal, and the ſubject indiviſib the preſent poſſeſſor was entitled to the preferenc On the contrary, the Engliſh maintained, that as t king was in England, his perſon could not be diſpo of by any foreign nation. perſon, they agreed in impoſing on him ſuch rigorous conditions, that Charles, notwithſtanding his deplorable ſituation, refuſed to accept them. They did not, indeed, wiſh that he ſhould recover his freedom; they never intended to blend lenity and tyranny together in ſo inconſiſtent a manner. The Scots, however, determined not to deliver up the king to the Engliſh parliament, but keep him as a pledge for their arrears, which, in the preſent diſtracted ſtate of the nation, they were unlikely to obtain by any other means. According to their own account, the ſum amounted to no leſs than two millions; for, as the parliament had paid them very little money, the contributions they had levied, and the price of their living at free quarters, were all the deductions to be made out of the whole pay due to them ever ſince they firſt entered England. This ſum was, however, conſidered as very exorbitant by the parliament; and the demand occaſioned very long and ſevere debates. At length the Scottiſh commiſſioners agreed to accept of 400,000l. in lieu of all demands; one half to be paid immediately, and the other within twelve months.

A. D. 1647. As the delivering up of the king's perſon was conſidered as the principal condition of this infamous bargain, the money was raiſed with great alacrity. The Scottiſh parliament had, indeed, voted that the king ſhould be protected, and his liberty be made one of the conditions of the treaty; but they were obliged to retract their reſolution on the interpoſition of the general aſſembly, who declared, "That as Charles had refuſed to take the covenant when tendered to him, it became not the godly to concern themſelves about his fortune." This reſolution, however, was not ſufficient to diſturb the tranquillity of the king's mind, ſo greatly had he profited in the ſchool of adverſity. He was playing at cheſs when he was informed of the final reſolution of the Scots to deliver him into the hands of the Engliſh parliament; but he continued his game without interruption; nor could any perſon in company perceive that the letter he peruſed brought any advice of conſequence.

The whole power of the nation was now in the parliament. They had ſurmounted every difficulty; and as they had nothing further to fear, ſo they had every thing to hope. Fairfax, the unhappy, the unwilling inſtrument of the miſeries of his country, was at this time in London, and complimented by the parliament in the moſt flattering terms. Theſe compliments, however, he received with that contempt they merited; but he was not proof againſt the arts of Cromwell. The army was now modelled in ſuch a manner, that they no longer conſidered themſelves as the ſervants of the parliament, but rather as their maſters; and Cromwell pointed out to Fairfax, with great juſtice and candour, the diſtractions that every where prevailed, both in church and ſtate. Scarcely two divines could agree in a ſtandard of faith, or two ſtateſmen on the ſame ſcheme of meaſures neceſſary to be purſued. Hence he concluded that the army was now the ſole principle of unity, and the center to which all lines muſt point. The ſoldiers, he ſaid, were the choſen people of God, and had within them that unerring light of grace, which ſoared above all ſublunary inſtitutions, and corrected all human errors. He meant, however, only thoſe ſoldiers under the command of Fairfax and himſelf; for there were beſides, two armies, one under Maſſey, governor of Glouceſter, and the other under Mitton, in Wales. Maſſey's ſoldiers felt the infirmities of human nature; they were diſtreſſed with cold, hunger, and the want of every neceſſary comfort of life. They therefore preſented ſeveral very ſtrong petitions to parliament, enumerating their ſervices, and aſking that relief to which as ſervants, as men, and as chriſtians, they were ſo juſtly entitled. But all their petitions and remonſtrances were in vain; they were threatened with being ſent to Ireland, and in the mean time ſuffered to live at free quarters, that the diſbanding of them, which was now determined, might appear the leſs unpopular.

The treaty with the Scots had been ſtrongly oppoſed by the independents, who were for demanding the perſon of his majeſty at the head of the army, and driving them out of the kingdom by force. Every vote, therefore, in their favour, was ſtrenuouſly debated; but the preſbyterians having, as yet, the majority, carried their point; and the meaſure for ſending the Scots into their own country, by an amicable treaty, was adopted. This being ſettled, it was voted, that Holmby-houſe in Northamptonſhire, ſhould be the place for receiving his majeſty; and a committee of lords and commons, with a party of the army, were appointed to attend him thither from Newcaſtle; but at the ſame time they declared, that nothing ſhould be done towards ſettling the peace, till the Scottiſh forces had paſſed the Engliſh borders. When the Engliſh commiſſioners arrived in the Scottiſh camp, and were permitted to kiſs the king's hand, he received them with the ſame grace and chearfulneſs as if they had travelled on no other errand than that of paying their court to him. His majeſty was allowed only nine ſervants to attend him; and though he was treated by the commiſſioners with all the external marks of reſpect, he was not ſuffered to have any intercourſe with his friends. A few weeks before the king was delivered into the hands of the parliament's commiſſioners, the earl of Eſſex paid the debt of nature. This was a ſevere blow both to the king and preſbyterian party. Senſible of the deplorable ſtate of the nation, to which, from miſtake rather than deſign, he had ſo greatly contributed, he determined to exert all his power to bring about a peace, and reſtore the tranquillity of the nation; but death put a final period to his deſign, deprived the preſbyterians, or moderate party, of a popular leader, and ſo greatly leſſened the power of the houſe of peers, that it was almoſt annihilated.

A. D. 1648. The nation now laboured under a variety of grievances; but the moſt conſiderable conſiſted in the army, which, though there was not the ſhadow of an enemy in the field, was ſtill kept up, to the great terror of the preſbyterian party, who were therefore determined to take the firſt favourable opportunity of reducing that alarming inſtrument of the independents. The army had been for ſome time greatly neglected, and had preſented many petitions to the parliament for their arrears, which they not only diſregarded, but an order had been made by both houſes, that no part of the army ſhould be quartered within twenty-five miles of London.

The preſbyterians were deſirous of diſmiſſing the army, even without rewarding them for their former ſervices. But this was oppoſed by Cromwell, who obſerved, that the parliament had nothing to ſupport the authority they had acquired but the army. On the 27th of February a motion was made in the houſe with regard to the reduction of the forces, which was carried by a majority of two only. It was then reſolved to begin with reducing the cavalry, and it was determined that 4000 horſe and 1000 dragoons would be ſufficient for the ſervice of the whole kingdom. They next proceeded to conſider how the forts and garriſons of the kingdom ſhould be diſpoſed of and provided for; and the queſtion was put, "whether there ſhould be a number of foot kept up at the pay of the kingdom, more than will be ſufficient for the keeping ſuch garriſons as ſhall be continued." This queſtion paſſed in the negative, notwithſtanding the independents excited all their intereſt to procure a majority. It was ſoon after voted, that 9000 horſe, 9000 foot, and 1200 dragoons ſhould be ſent over to Ireland. But the moſt violent queſtions carried againſt the independents were, "that no officer ſhould command under Fairfax above the degree of a colonel; and that no member of parliament ſhould have the command of any garriſon or fort in England." They next voted, "that ſuch perſons as ſhall be employed as officers in the garriſons, or forces that ſhall be kept up in the kingdom, under the command of Sir Thomas Fairfax, ſhall conform to the eſtabliſhment of the church, as agreed to by both houſes of parliament."

As theſe votes were directly levelled againſt the independents in the army, and who were the moſt active perſons in it, it is no wonder that Cromwell and his party determined to attempt the independency of the army upon the ruins of the parliament. This was no difficult taſk for Cromwell to perform, by giving the officers a very unfavourable opinion of the houſe of lords, who were daily ſending meſſengers to the commons concerning the danger of the kingdom from the army. Mancheſter had, indeed, given the houſe a very unfavourable opinion of Cromwell's intentions, and the artful methods he made uſe of to gain an aſcendant over the army. The preſbyterians in the army equally hated Cromwell, and had already voted that the Scottiſh forces in Ireland ſhould be ſent back to their own country, and that the war in that kingdom ſhould be proſecuted by the Engliſh forces only. This vote greatly alarmed the army; they well knew that if they were once ſent to Ireland, their petitions and remonſtrances would have little weight: the parliament would leave them to earn a wretched ſubſiſtence with their ſwords in oppoſing the Iriſh rebels. The arrears due to the army were already very conſiderable, amounting to no leſs than 331,000l. A petition was therefore preſented to Sir Thomas Fairfax, by the officers of the army, in which they enumerated the hardſhips to which they muſt be reduced if their arrears were any longer deferred. Fairfax laid the petition before the parliament; but received only a harſh anſwer. The parliament even threatened to proceed againſt the promoters of the petition as enemies to the ſtate, and diſturbers of the public peace.

This declaration of the parliament tended rather to increaſe than leſſen the mutinous diſpoſitions of the ſoldiers. They lamented that, having ſo long expoſed themſelves to every danger in order to eſtabliſh the liberty of the ſubject, they ſhould be deprived of the rights of Engliſhmen, and even be denied the privilege of repreſenting their grievances. The commons, fearful of the conſequences of exaſperating the army, ſent commiſſioners, at the head of whom were Cromwell and Ireton, to the head-quarters at Saffron-Walden, to make propoſals for entering into the Iriſh ſervice. But inſtead of inliſting, the generality abſolutely rejected the terms, and deſired an indemnity ratified by the king, for any illegal actions of which, during the courſe of the war, they might have been guilty; together with ſatisfaction for arrears, freedom from preſſing, relief for widows and maimed ſoldiers, and pay till diſbanded. They did not expreſs any diſſatisfaction againſt Skippon, who was appointed to command the troops in Ireland, but diſcovered a much ſtronger deſire of ſerving under Fairfax or Cromwell.

The commiſſioners, who were in reality the ſole cauſe of all the diſcontents in the army, failed not to foment the diſorders they were ſent to appeaſe. A military parliament, in oppoſition to that at Weſtminſter, was now formed, conſiſting of two houſes. The principal officers compoſed a council, or houſe o peers; while two private men, or inferior officer choſen from each troop or company, under the tit of officers, formed the lower houſe. This eſtabliſh ment afforded an eaſy method for the leaders to aug ment the mutinous diſpoſition of the ſoldiers, withou the leaſt danger of being diſcovered. At the ſam time the general humour that then prevailed in th nation for forming plans for imaginary republic was, in ſome meaſure, gratified. Their firſt reſolu

As all reſiſtance was in vain, Charles, after protracting the time as much as poſſible, ſtepped into his coach, and was carried to the army, who were haſtening to their rendezvous on Triplo-heath, near Cambridge. Fairfax, who was totally a ſtranger to the whole tranſaction, knew not how to behave on this occaſion. No one could be found who gave the orders, which were merely verbal; and while they were employed in tracing them to their ſource, Cromwell arrived from London, and finiſhed the debate. He juſtified the conduct of Joice, by aſſerting that Graves intended to carry his majeſty to London the next day, where a treaty was intended to be ſigned between him and the parliament, and the poor ſoldiers left to ſhift for themſelves, or perhaps be treated with greater ſeverity. Fairfax was, however, far from being convinced of the propriety of Joice's conduct. He thought he had gone too far; but conſented that the king ſhould be carried back to Holmby-houſe, and reſide there under a guard of his own officers and ſoldiers. But Whalley, a creature of Cromwell, being appointed to command the detachment, conducted his majeſty to Newmarket inſtead of Holmby-houſe.

When the parliament were informed of this daring inſult on their authority, they were ſtruck with the greateſt aſtoniſhment. The city was thrown into the utmoſt confuſion; diſtraction ſeemed painted in every countenance. Many of the preſbyterian members, terrified at the power of the army, either abſented themſelves from the houſe, or joined with the independents in paſſing ſuch reſolutions as might tend to allay the ferment raiſed among the ſoldiers. They voted that the army ſhould have their full demands, and that both officers and ſoldiers ſhould have a reaſonable gratuity beſides their pay; but, at the ſame time, they voted, that the king ſhould be conducted back to Holmby-houſe; while the lords preſſed ſtrongly that he ſhould be carried to Oatlands. The army, however, put a negative upon both; and Joice openly avowed, in the preſence of the king, Fairfax, and Cromwell, that what he had done was the ſenſe of the whole ſoldiery, and that, though he had undertaken to act in that manner, without a written order from his commander, he had done no more than his duty. Both the council of officers, and houſe of agitators, were wholly moved by the direction of Cromwell, who thus conveyed his will to the whole army. He had conducted himſelf in parliament with ſuch profound diſſimulation, and refined hypocriſy, that he even deceived thoſe, who had long made it a practice to deceive others. Whenever any intelligence of diſorders in the army arrived, he appeared agitated in the moſt violent manner with the paſſions of grief and anger. He wept bitterly; he lamented the misfortunes of his country: he adviſed the moſt violent meaſures for ſuppreſſing the mutiny; and by giving theſe precipitate counſels, he at once ſeemed to prove his own ſincerity, and inflamed thoſe diſcontents of which he intended to make his own advantage. He appealed to heaven and earth, that his devoted attachment to the parliament had rendered him ſo odious in the army, that his life was expoſed to the utmoſt danger while he continued among them. Theſe aſſeverations produced the deſired effect, and he had now, by his profound and artful conduct, gained a ſituation, where he could cover his enterprizes from the eye of the public; and by ſeeming rather to obey the commands of his ſuperior officer, or yield to the motions of his ſoldiers, could, with eaſe and ſecrecy, pave the way to his future greatneſs.

When Fairfax drew up the whole army on Triplo-heath, the ſoldiers ſeemed more diſſatisfied than ever; there was not one among them who was ſatisfied with the laſt votes of parliament. The preſbyterian party were now ſufficiently alarmed, and immediately applied to the city for protection. Their requeſt was granted, and two regiments of militia marched to Weſtminſter for that purpoſe. This imprudent meaſure ſerved only to increaſe the ferment already too violent in the army. It was pretended that the parliament itſelf was under reſtraint; and that it was therefore neceſſary for them to march into the neighbourhood, in order to reſtore liberty to the members. Fairfax, who ſolemnly diſclaimed all intentions of breaking with the parliament, was pleaſed with what he conſidered as an inſtance of the ſoldiers duty, and gave orders for the army to march towards London. Deſtitute at once of talents for cabal, and of penetration to diſcover the cabals of others, Fairfax had given his confidence entirely to Cromwell; who, by the moſt ſpecious pretences, the appearance of an open ſincerity, and a ſcrupulous conſcience, impoſed on the eaſy nature of this brave and virtuous general.

On the 12th of June advice was received in London that the army had advanced to St. Alban's. The city had already armed their militia, drawn out their artillery, poſted their guards, and diſplayed the ſame warlike appearance as in the beginning of the war againſt the king. But the enemy they were now to encounter was of a very different kind; and they were ſo greatly terrified with the names of Fairfax and Cromwell at the head of a powerful and victorious army, that on their approach, the warlike order of the militia ſubſided; letters full of civility and profeſſions of eſteem paſſed between the magiſtrates and the general, who ſtill continued to advance, notwithſtanding repeated meſſages were ſent by the parliament, enjoining the general not to lead his army nearer than within forty miles of London. The parliament now found it neceſſary to ſubmit, and endeavour, by complaiſance, to ſtop the fury of the enraged army. Their firſt indication was their ordering the vote, which declared the military petitioners public enemies, to be erazed from their journal-book.

The parliament had exerciſed ſuch repeated acts of tyranny, that their former popularity was now totally loſt: from being once the idol of the nation, they were now become the object of general hatred and averſion. They experienced the meaſures they had ſo lately adopted in their uſurpation upon the crown. The army roſe every day in their demands. One claim was no ſooner granted than another ſtill more enormous and exorbitant was made: they ſeemed determined never to be ſatisfied. At firſt they only pretended to petition the parliament for what concerned themſelves as ſoldiers: they next inſiſted on a vindication of their character: they then thought it neceſſary that their enemies ſhould be puniſhed; and at laſt they claimed the right of modelling the government, and ſettling the nation. In theſe exorbitant demands, they preſerved, in words, the utmoſt deference and reſpect to the parliament, while in actions they inſulted them in the groſſeſt manner. They did not pretend to accuſe the whole aſſembly; their petitions were levelled againſt evil counſellors only, by whom they ſaid it was ſeduced and betrayed.

On the 16th of June they charged the following members with high treaſon, as enemies to the army, and evil counſellors to the ſtate; namely, Denzil Hollis, Sir Philip Stapleton, Sir William Lewis, Sir John Clotworthy, Sir William Waller, Sir John Maynard, major-general Maſſey, Mr. Recorder Glyn, Colonel Walter Long, Colonel Edward Harley, and Mr. Anthony Nicholls. Theſe members, who were the leaders of the preſbyterian party, they inſiſted ſhould be immediately ſequeſtered from parliament, and committed to priſon. The commons replied, that a general charge was not ſufficient for them to proceed to ſuch extremities. It was anſwered, that ſuch a charge was thought ſufficient in the caſes of Strafford and Laud. Such is, generally, the caſe of contending parties, in alternate uſurpations of authority; they indulge themſelves in the ſame exceſſes they had condemned in their adverſaries.

The general charge againſt the eleven members was ſucceeded by a declaration ſigned by Fairfax and his officers, aſſerting their right of keeping their arms, till they ſaw the purpoſes for which they firſt took them up fully anſwered. The paper was drawn up in a very maſterly manner, and contained the following demands: "That both houſes be immediately purged of ſuch miniſters who ought not to have a ſeat in that aſſembly: that thoſe perſons who have abuſed the confidence of the parliament and army, and endangered the kingdom, may be ſpeedily diſabled from doing any farther miſchief: that ſome interval of time may be appointed for the continuance of this, as well as of future parliaments, and that new elections be ſucceſſively made according to the bill for triennial parliaments: that proviſion be made to prevent future parliaments from being diſſolved at the king's pleaſure, without their conſent, but ſuffered to ſit their proper time: that the right of the people to repreſent to the parliament their grievances, by way of petition may be vindicated: that the diſcretionary powers given to country-committees during the war, may be taken away, as they are now no longer neceſſary: that the people may be ſatisfied with regard to diſburſements of the money levied on the nation: that public juſtice being ſatisfied by a few examples of the moſt exceptionable perſons, ſome courſe may be taken, by a general act of oblivion, that all apprehenſions of a future war may be entirely removed."

The city of London were ſo terrified at theſe demands of the army, that they ſent a deputation to St. Albans, diſclaiming any intention to raiſe forces for oppoſing them. This timidity of the citizens greatly intimidated the preſbyterian party, which now became contemptible in the eyes of the ſoldiers. The proſecution againſt the eleven commoners was puſhed with great violence; and the members themſelves, unwilling to give occaſion to freſh diſcords, begged leave to retire from the houſe; and the army, for the preſent, ſeemed ſatisfied with this mark of ſubmiſſion.

Having thus completely ſubdued the parliament, and no ſigns of reſiſtance appearing in the city, the army, at the deſire of the commons, retired farther from the capital, and fixed their head quarters at Reading, carrying the king with them. He had experienced much greater lenity ſince he had been with the army than before: he enjoyed not only his favourite diverſions, but his favourite mode of worſhip, and the converſation of his favourite friends. His children were once allowed to viſit him, and paſſed a few days with him at Caverſham-houſe, where he reſided. The chiefs of the army ſeemed to pay their court to him. Fairfax declared he intended to force the parliament to moderate their demands, and to reſtore him to his juſt rights. Cromwell and Ireton went ſtill farther; they profeſſed a reſpect, and even a veneration for his perſon; and actually imparted to him propoſals, to which they promiſed to procure the agreement of the army, and to which he might aſſent with little or no violence to his conſcience. All the agitators, except thoſe infected with the principles of levelling, made the ſame profeſſions; and were even friendly enough to put him upon hi guard againſt thoſe officers whoſe ſincerity they ſuſpected. The parliament, afraid of his forming ſome accommodation with the army, addreſſed him with fa more reſpect than formerly; they even invited him to reſide at Richmond, and contribute his aſſiſtance to the ſettlement of the nation.

Charles flattered himſelf, that the preſent ſcene o diſtractions, oppreſſions and terror, would induce th people to reflect on the antient form of government under which they and their anceſtors had ſo long en joyed happineſs and tranquillity. Courted by bot parties, he hoped he ſhould ſoon be reſtored to hi juſt rights, and once more hold the ſcepter of his an ceſtors. The independents, however, ſeemed to b moſt in his intereſt. He had ſufficiently experience the rigor of the parliament: they pretended wholl to annihilate his authority: they had confined his per ſon. In both theſe particulars he had received mor indulgence from the army. None of his friends we excluded from his preſence: and in the propoſals ſe him by the council or officers for the ſettlement the nation, they inſiſted neither on the abolition epiſcopacy, nor on the puniſhment of the royaliſt two points to which the king had the greateſt reluc ance. They alſo inſiſted, that a period ſhould be p to the preſent parliament; a meaſure which Charle had extremely at heart. He hoped by gratifying few particular men to draw over the whole army his intereſt. Accordingly he offered to inveſt Crom well with the order of the garter, create him earl Eſſex, and give him the command of the army Ireton was to be lord lieutenant of Ireland. But no withſtanding theſe favourable appearances, the ki was ſtill ſenſible that they were but ambiguous pro of the army's affection to his perſon and cauſe; feared they were only intended to procure the cou tenance of him and his friends to favour their deſig in effectually humbling the parliament. On the oth hand, he reflected, that the independents, being t profeſſed patrons of the liberties of the people, cou not ſurely act ſo contrary to their own principles, to deny that liberty to their king. What they d manded for their own conſciences, they could n with the leaſt appearance of reaſon, deny to his.

The militia of London had lately been put und the command of preſbyterian officers, and the arm now determined to place it in the hands of the ind pendents. This, together with the unſettled ſtate public affairs, occaſioned petitions to be ſent to t parliament from all ranks and degrees of peop The different garriſons in the kingdom, bei neglected and ill paid, began to mutiny, and ſe petitions to both houſes for redreſs. The We forces were actually in arms againſt the parliame The northern army had impriſoned Poyntz, their o brave, and ſucceſsful general. Many of the ſoldie who had engaged to go to Ireland, retracted th promiſe, and offered their ſervice to Fairfax: a thoſe who had enliſted under the parliament, amou ing to ſeveral thouſands, held nightly meetings conſult the moſt proper meaſures to be purſued at t alarming criſis.

Theſe diſorders were wholly occaſioned by t army of Fairfax, who had engroſſed to themſelves the money that had been raiſed. The people longer paid any reverence to the parliament. M titudes of young men and apprentices flocked Weſtminſter with petitions, ſome for the old co mittee of militia, and others againſt it; but all them ſpeaking in the ſtrain of ſupreme authority, if both the parliament and army had been their ſ vants. The artful Cromwell enjoyed this ſtor which he perceived would ſoon ſweep before it all the obſtacles that oppoſed his ambition. One day the mob of the independents, the next day that of the preſbyterians, prevailed. The parliament was no longer guided by thoſe able men who could direct the tumult, and turn confuſion to their own advantage: the populace were now maſters, and the parliament had no will of its own.

From theſe circumſtances it appeared abſolutely neceſſary for the army to march to London. Accordingly the troops began their march from Reading towards the capital. When they reached Hounſlow-heath, they were drawn up, and exhibited a very formidable appearance. They were 20,000 ſtrong; and determined, without any regard to laws or liberty, to purſue whatever meaſures their generals ſhould think proper. Here they were met by the ſpeakers of the two houſes, Mancheſter and Lenthall, attended by eight peers, and about ſixty commoners; who having ſecretly left the city, preſented themſelves, with their maces, and all the enſigns of their dignity; and complaining of the violence exerciſed by the citizens, applied to the army for defence and protection. They were received with the greateſt demonſtrations of joy; and the army, being provided with ſo plauſible a pretence, advanced to chaſtiſe the rebellious city, and to reinſtate the violated parliament in all their liberties and franchiſes.

The parliament met, purſuant to their prorogation, on the 30th of July; and it being now abſolutely neceſſary for them either to reſign their whole authority, or oppoſe the violent deſigns of the army, they reſolved upon the latter. Accordingly they choſe two new ſpeakers, lord Hudſon and Henry Pelham. Vigorous meaſures were immediately purſued. One of their firſt votes was to require the general not to advance nearer than thirty miles of London, or, if already advanced, to retire to that diſtance. They renewed their former orders for inliſting troops, and appointed Maſſey their commander. They ordered the artillery to be drawn out, and the trained bands to man the lines. The whole city was in a ferment; every corner reſounded with military preparations. But the terror of an univerſal pillage, and even maſſacre, had ſeized the timid inhabitants: and confuſion was painted in every countenance.

The next day the lords and commons voted, "that his majeſty be deſired to come to London, and there treat with both houſes of parliament and the commiſſioners of Scotland for a ſafe and honourable peace." But the affairs of the parliament were now in ſuch confuſion, that this vote, which was ſent to Fairfax, was diſregarded, and the army continued ſtill to advance nearer to the capital. Rainſborough having been detached over Kingſton-bridge, at the head of a ſtrong party, preſented himſelf before Southwark, and was gladly received by ſome ſoldiers quartered there for its defence, and who were reſolved not to ſeperate their intereſts from thoſe of the army. It was now abſolutely neceſſary for the city to capitulate, though nothing better than the following diſhonourable conditions could be obtained: "That they ſhould deſert the intereſt of the impeached members; recall their declaration lately publiſhed; relinquiſh their militia; deliver up all their forts and line of communication to the army, together with the Tower of London, and all the magazines of arms and military ſtores depoſited in that fortreſs; diſband all their forces, and drive all the reformadoes out of the line; withdraw all their guards from the houſes of parliament, and receive within the lines ſuch forces as the army ſhould think neceſſary; demoliſh their works, and ſuffer the whole army to march through the city."

Theſe terms being complied with, the army accordingly marched in triumph through the capital; but preſerved the greateſt order, decency, and the appearance of humility. The two ſpeakers were conducted to Weſtminſter, and took their ſeats without the leaſt oppoſition. The eleven impeached members, being accuſed of exciting the late tumult, were expelled, and moſt of them retired beyond the ſeas. Seven peers were impeached: the lord-mayor, one of the ſheriffs, and three aldermen, ſent to the Tower: ſeveral citizens and officers of the militia committed to priſon; and every act of the parliament annulled, from the day of the tumult till the return of the ſpeakers. The lines of communication were levelled; the militia reſtored to the independents; and regiments were quartered in Whitehall and the Mews.

The army now lay in the neighbourhood of Putney, greatly diſtreſſed for want of money, and threatening every moment to break into the city, and become their own pay-maſters. Fairfax, who was ſtill the tool of Cromwell, (though his intentions were ſincere with regard to the peace and happineſs of his country) found the utmoſt difficulty in reſtraining the impatience of the ſoldiers, and the ſpirit of levelling, which was now diffuſed among the troops, by means of the agitators. The general council of the army was now applied to in the ſame manner as the parliament had been formerly; nor did the commons venture to paſs any vote of importance without knowing the ſenſe of the officers. The preſbyterian party, however, ſtill gave the generals great uneaſineſs on the popular topic of ſending relief to Ireland; and ſome votes paſſed for ſending ſeven or eight regiments over to that diſtreſſed kingdom, which the officers of the army did not think proper to oppoſe. Cromwell, however, found a pretence, from the want of money, to render the whole ineffectual for the preſent. Even that daring commander himſelf found ſome difficulty in rendering the reſentment of the agitators abortive; he was obliged to chaſtiſe ſome of them with his own hand, and to order others to be tried by a court-martial.

The heads of the army, who now, in reality, governed the nation, conveyed the king to Hampton-court, where he reſided, for ſome time, with all the appearance of dignity and freedom. He poſſeſſed ſo remarkable an equanimity of temper that, during all the variety of fortune which attended him, no change was perceived either in his countenance or behaviour. Though a priſoner in the hands of his moſt inveterate enemies, he ſupported, towards all that approached him, the majeſty of a monarch.

During Charles's ſtay at Hampton-Court, the parliament preſented him with conditions for a peace; and the army alſo offered him propoſitions of a like nature. The king ſeemed to prefer the latter, and deſired the parliament to take the propoſals of the army into conſideration, and make them the foundation of the public ſettlement. But ſome event, or the ambitious deſigns of Cromwell, rendered the whole abortive. Several writers have aſſerted, that Cromwell really intended to make a private bargain with the king; a meaſure which carried the moſt plauſible appearance, both with regard to his own ſafety and advancement; but that he found inſuperable difficulties in reconciling to it the wild humours of the army. Others ſay, that a diſcovery made by Cromwell prevented his cloſing with the king, and determined him to purſue the ambitious ſcheme he had formed of becoming himſelf the deſpotic maſter of the whole kingdom*.

* In the Memoirs of lord Broghill we meet with the following ry, which deſerves ſome attention, as it agrees very well with the character of Cromwell. It is related in the following manner by Mr. Maurice, chaplain to the earl of Orrery. "Lord Orrery,

Be this as it may, however, it is certain that the behaviour of the officers of the army was now much altered towards his majeſty. Cromwell, indeed, pretended, that he was obliged to act in a very different manner from what he had hitherto done. He ſaid that the agitators had rendered him odious to the army, and had repreſented him as a traitor, who, for the ſake of private intereſt, was ready to betray the cauſe of God to the great enemy of piety and religion. At the ſame time he pretended that deſperate projects were formed, and that he feared all the authority of the officers would not be ſufficient to prevent theſe violent enthuſiaſts from executing their bloody purpoſe.

Theſe aſſertions greatly alarmed the king, who juſtly concluded, that if they were true it would be unſafe for him to continue any longer at Hampton-Court: if they were not true, they could be thrown out for no other reaſon than that of making him a cloſe priſoner. At all events therefore he determined to attempt his eſcape before he was deprived of the few remains of liberty he ſtill enjoyed. He was confirmed in this reſolution by the looks, the geſtures, and the expreſſions that dropt from the officers and ſoldiers at Hampton-court, as he walked about the gardens and village. He underſtood that this alteration was owing to his not embracing the army's propoſitions without reſerve, and his not excluding the Scots and parliament from the negotiation.

Fully reſolved to take this imprudent ſtep, and without forming any rational ſcheme for the diſpoſal of his perſon, Charles effected his eſcape from Hampton-Court in a dark ſtormy night with more eaſe than could have been expected. He had no other attendants in his flight than Sir John Berkley, Mr. Aſhburnham, and Mr. Legg, all gentlemen of his bed-chamber. The difficulties they encountered on the way, and in paſſing through the foreſt in a diſmal night, muſt have diſcouraged any perſon, but one in Charles's ſituation, who thought no danger ſo dreadful as that he had eſcaped. Early in the morning he reached Titchfield, a ſeat belonging to the earl of Southampton, where the counteſs dowager reſided, a woman of great honour, to whom the king knew he might ſafely intruſt his perſon. But he could not hope to continue long concealed at Titchfield: and it was not eaſy to determine what meaſure it was moſt prudent to embrace. Hammond, a creature of Cromwell's, and who had married a daughter of the famous Hambden, was governor of the Iſle of Wight, which lay in the neighbourhood of Titchfield. Very little ſurely could be expected from a man devoted to the chiefs of the army; yet, becauſe he was nephew to Dr. Hammond, the king's favourite chaplain, it was thought proper to have recourſe to him in this alarming exigence. Aſhburnham and Berkley were accordingly diſpatched, with orders not to inform Hammond where the king was concealed, unleſs he would promiſe not to deliver him up to any perſon whatever; or if he could not protect him, to reſtore him to his liberty. The very nature of the negotiation itſelf ſufficiently demonſtrates that the king was under the greateſt anxiety of mind when he ſent his ſervants into the Iſle of Wight: for what ſecurity could be expected from Hammond? or how could Cariſbrook-caſtle, weak and unprovided with military ſtores, be ſufficient to defend the perſon of his majeſty againſt the joint efforts of the parliament and army? Notwithſtanding this, had Aſhburnham, who alone was acquainted with Hammond, acted conformable to the inſtructions he had received, he might, at leaſt, have eſcaped the ſnare into which he fell. But without exacting any promiſe from Hammond, he treacherouſly, or at leaſt imprudently, brought the governor to Titchfield; and Charles, diſtracted and amazed at this wrong ſtep of his ſervant, paſſed over with Hammond to the Iſle of Wight, and took up his quarters in Cariſbrook-caſtle.

The king's eſcape from Hampton-Court was not diſcovered for near an hour after his departure; when ſome perſons, entering his chamber, found on the table ſeveral letters directed to the parliament, to the general, and to the officer who had attended him. The parliament were confounded at the news of the king's eſcape, and voted it high-treaſon, and death without mercy, in any one to conceal his perſon. But they were ſoon relieved from their terror, by letters from Hammond, on the receipt of which it was reſolved, that the king ſhould be confined in Cariſbrook-caſtle, and that none of his friends or adherents ſhould be either ſuffered to viſit him, or even continue on the iſland.

Charles being thus in a place of ſafety, and the parliament incapable of reſiſting the army, Cromwell applied himſelf ſeriouſly to quell the diſorders among the troops, which had been at firſt artfully fomented by himſelf, but which were now riſen to a height that ſeemed to threaten the deſtruction of all order and government. The members of the republic eſtabliſhed in the army thought themſelves fully qualified to Orrery, in the time of his greatneſs with Cromwell, juſt after he had ſo ſeaſonably relieved him in great diſtreſs at Clonwell, riding out at Youghall one day with him and Ireton, they fell into diſcourſe about the king's death. Cromwell thereupon ſaid more than once, that if the king had followed his own judgment, and had been attended by none but truſty ſervants, he had fooled them all; and that once they had a mind to have cloſed with him, but, upon ſomething that happened, fell off from that deſign. Orrery, finding them in good humour, and being alone with them, aſked, if he might preſume to deſire to know, why they would once have cloſed with his majeſty, and why they did not? Cromwell very freely told him he would ſatisfy him in both his queries. The reaſon, ſaid he, why we would have cloſed with the king was this: we found that the Scots and preſbyterians began to be more powerful than we, and were like to agree with him, and leave us in the lurch. For this reaſon we thought it beſt to prevent them, by offering firſt to come in upon reaſonable conditions: but while our thoughts were taken up with this ſubject, there came a letter to us from one of our ſpies, who was of the king's bed-chamber, acquainting us, that our final doom was decreed that very day; that he could not poſſibly learn what it was, but we might diſcover it, if we could but intercept a letter ſent from the king to the queen, wherein he informed her of his reſolution; that this letter was ſown up in the ſkirt of a ſaddle, and the bearer of it would come with the ſaddle upon his head, about ten o'clock that night, to the Blue Boar in Holborn, where he was to take horſe for Dover. The meſſenger knew nothing of the letter in the ſaddle, though ſome in Dover did. We were at Windſor, continued Cromwell, when we received this letter, and immediately upon the receipt of it, Ireton and I reſolved to take one truſty fellow with us, and go in troopers habits to that inn. We did ſo, and leaving our man at the gate of the inn (which had a wicket only open to let perſons in and out) to watch and give us notice when any man came in with a ſaddle, we went into a drinking-ſtall. We there continued drinking cans of beer till about ten o'clock, when our centinel at the gate gave us notice, that the man with the ſaddle was come. We roſe up preſently, and juſt as the man was leading out his horſe ſaddled, we came up to him with drawn ſwords, and told him, we were to ſearch all that went in or out there; but as he looked like an honeſt man, we would ſearch his ſaddle and ſo diſmiſs him. The ſaddle was ungirt; we carried it into the ſtall where we had been drinking, and ripping open one of the ſkirts, we there found the letter we wanted. Having thus got it into our hands, we delivered the man (whom we had left with our centinel) his ſaddle, told him he was an honeſt fellow, and bid him go about his buſineſs; which he did, purſuing his journey without more ado, and ignorant of the harm he had ſuffered. We found in the letter, that his majeſty acquainted the queen, that he was courted by both factions, the Scots preſbyterians and the army; and that thoſe who bade the faireſt for him ſhould have him; but he thought he ſhould cloſe with the Scots ſooner than with the other. Upon this we returned to Windſor; and finding we were not likely to obtain good terms from the king, we from that time vowed his deſtruction".

to ſettle the kingdom, and various ſchemes for that purpoſe were every day debated by theſe military legiſlators. It was on all hands determined to aboliſh royalty, and ſet nobility aſide: all ranks of men were to be levelled, and an univerſal equality of property, as well as of power, was to be introduced among mankind. They ſaid that the ſaints were the ſalt of the earth; that an entire equality had place among the elect; and that the moſt common centinel, if enlightened by the holy ſpirit, was entitled to the ſame reſpect as the greateſt commander, and equally capable of executing all the offices of government.

Cromwell found it was high time to put a period to thoſe enthuſiaſtic opinions, which would otherwiſe deſtroy his whole ambitious ſcheme of power. He accordingly iſſued orders that the meetings of the agitators ſhould be diſcontinued. But they did not, in this reſpect, chuſe to pay an implicit obedience to their general. They had taſted the ſweets of power, and were unwilling to reſign it. They ſecretly continued their meetings, and made no difficulty of aſſerting, that their own officers, as well as the church and ſtate, ſtood in need of a reformation. Several of the regiments were ſo heated with theſe enthuſiaſtic ideas, that they joined in preſenting ſeditious remonſtrances to their general: they even appointed ſeparate places of rendezvous; and every thing ſeemed to threaten an univerſal anarchy and confuſion. The reſolution of Cromwell only was able to put a ſtop to this alarming appearance of the commencement of the moſt dreadful diſorders. He choſe the time of a review for ſtriking terror into the levellers; and as ſoon as the troops were drawn up in order, Cromwell ſeized the ring-leaders in the preſence of their companions; held a council of war upon the ſpot; and cauſed one of the mutineers to be ſhot directly. Struck with terror at the boldneſs of the action, the reſt of the levellers threw down the ſymbols of ſedition, which they had carried before them, and returned immediately to their duty.

While Cromwell was employed in quelling the diſorders of the army, a committee of lords and commons, with the earl of Denbigh at their head, was ſent to the king with four bills, to which he was deſired to give the royal aſſent. The firſt was for ſettling the militia of the kingdom: the ſecond for recalling all declarations, oaths, and proclamations againſt the parliament, and their adherents; the third for diſabling thoſe lords, created ſince the great ſeal was carried to Oxford, from ſitting and voting in the houſe of peers; and the fourth for giving power to both houſes of parliament to adjourn themſelves as they may think proper. The king was required to give his anſwer in four days; but the Scottiſh commiſſioners preſented a ſtrong remonſtrance againſt the four bills, and inſiſted on a perſonal treaty with his majeſty at London. This occaſioned great uneaſineſs to the independents at Weſtminſter, and ſeveral ſpirited papers paſſed between them. The Scots reproached the Engliſh parliament with having broken all the fundamental articles of the agreement between the two kingdoms. This breach gave great pleaſure to the king, and the Scots were indeed now ſo well diſpoſed to ſerve him, that they offered, if he would make his eſcape to Berwick, to ſupport him with the whole force of their kingdom. Whether this quarrel induced Charles to flatter himſelf that the parliament would be obliged to offer him more reaſonable conditions, or whether he hoped that the army would inſiſt upon more equitable terms, is uncertain, but the king thought proper to reject the bills.

Cromwell, having reduced the agitators to obedience, now determined to carry the ambitious ſcheme he had formed into execution. He did not, however, think proper to intruſt the whole of his deſign to any but Ireton, and two or three particular favourites. From the ſuggeſtion of Ireton, Cromwell called at Windſor a ſecret council of the chief officers of the army, in order to deliberate on the moſt proper methods for ſettling the kingdom, and the future diſpoſal of the king's perſon. Before the council began, Cromwell poured out divine prayers, when the minds of the members were ſufficiently elevated by enthuſiaſtic raptures, the conferences were begun, and the black deſign of bringing the king to juſtice, and puniſhing their ſovereign, under the ſanction of a judicial ſentence, was firſt propoſed, and the execution reſolved on by the principal part of the aſſembly.

When the committee from the Iſle of Wight reported to the houſe, that the king had abſolutely refuſed to paſs their bills, inſiſting that all the terms on both ſides ſhould be adjuſted before any conceſſions ſhould be inſiſted on, the republican party took fire at the refuſal: they openly inveighed, in the moſt virulent terms, againſt the perſon and government of the king, whoſe name, hitherto, in all debates, had been mentioned with ſome degree of reverence. Sir Thomas Worth had the boldneſs to move, that the king ſhould be removed, and committed cloſe priſoner to ſome inland caſtle; that articles of impeachment ſhould be drawn up againſt him, he himſelf deprived of all ſhare in adminiſtration, and a new form of government eſtabliſhed. This motion was ſeconded by Cromwell and Ireton with great warmth, but in general terms. The former deſired them to ſettle the nation without having any farther recourſe to the king, who had rejected all their propoſitions; promiſing that the army, who had hitherto defended the parliament at the expence of their blood, would ſtill continue, with fidelity and courage, to protect them againſt all oppoſition, in this vigorous meaſure.

In conſequence of this, the queſtion was put, "that no more addreſſes ſhould be preſented to his majeſty;" which was carried by a majority of forty-nine. This vote, in reality, dethroned the king, and formally overturned the whole conſtitution. But it was not enough to reſolve on ſo violent a meaſure; it was determined to ſupport it by a declaration equally violent. The king was accuſed of the blackeſt crimes, however improbable, in order, by blaſting his fame, to prevent the populace from uniting in his favour. Not only government, but even ſociety itſelf, ſeemed to be overturned. The people looked with contempt upon the parliament, and with execration upon the army. Cromwell enjoyed theſe national clamours; as his whole ſcheme depended on preventing the people from uniting againſt the army.

Hammond now received orders to treat the king with great ſeverity. All his ſervants were removed, his correſpondence with his friends cut off, and no perſon allowed to viſit him. An old, decriped man, employed to kindle his fire, was the beſt company he enjoyed during the interval of this rigorous confinement, which laſted ſeveral months. At the ſame time, new proſecutions were carried on againſt his friends. Hollis and Maynard, together with moſt of the eleven commoners lately impeached by the army, had reſumed their ſeats in the houſe, and ſpoke with great boldneſs and freedom againſt the violent meaſures purſued by the independents. It was therefore neceſſary to ſilence theſe oppoſers, whoſe ſpeeches had the moſt alarming effect among the people. The impeachments were accordingly re-aſſumed, and a vote paſſed for rendering them incapable of ever ſitting again in that parliament.

A. D. 1649. The mutinies and ſpirit of levelling, which ſtill prevailed among the ſoldiers, notwithſtanding the attempts of Cromwell to reduce them to obedience, afforded now the only gleam of hope to the royaliſts. The Scots, indeed, who were highly exaſperated at the meaſures purſued by the independents, were proceeding vigorouſly in their endeavours for invading England; but their late conduct had been ſo deteſtable, that very few of the royaliſts joined them. But amidſt this gloomy night of deſpair, a propitious ray unexpectedly appeared, which ſeemed to revive the ſpirits of his majeſty's friends. For though Cromwell was maſter of the king's perſon, the general, the parliament, the city, and the army, the nation in general thought as freely as ever, and beheld with impatience and indignation the handful of fanatics who held them in chains. But great art was requiſite to unite into one common cauſe ſo many people differing in their principles, their characters, their actions, and their intereſts. The greater part of the preſbyterians were well diſpoſed to join the royaliſts, and were headed by the earl of Holland, Sir William Waller, the generals Poyer and Langhorne, and other officers and perſons of diſtinction. General Goring, the earl of Norwich, lord Capel, Sir Charles Lucas, Sir George Liſle, and a few others, directed the royaliſts, and undertook to raiſe the ſouthern provinces; while Sir Marmaduke Langdale engaged for the northern, together with Berwick and Carliſle. The Scots were to be commanded by the duke of Hamilton, and the Welſh by Langhorne and Poyer. But the chief dependance of the royal party reſted on an intrigue now carrying on for putting the fleet under the command of the prince of Wales. The ſeamen had been for ſome time neglected, ſo that very little art was neceſſary to prevail upon them to deſert a party that ſeemed to treat them with contempt. Seventeen ſhips, lying in the mouth of the river, declared for the king; and putting Rainſborough their admiral aſhore, ſailed over to Holland, and took on board the prince of Wales.

Langhorne and Poyer were the two firſt who declared themſelves: theſe having a conſiderable body of Welch troops under their command, diſplayed the royal ſtandard, and were joined by a great number of perſons. They were already maſters of Chepſtow, Pembroke, and ſeveral other places of ſtrength in that county, and their army exhibited a formidable appearance. Hales, a young gentleman of fortune in Kent, put himſelf at the head of the royaliſts in that county with ſurpriſing ſucceſs. Sandwich, Dover, Graveſend, Canterbury, and almoſt every place of ſtrength in the county, declared for the king. Lord Capel, Sir Charles Lucas, Sir George Liſle and other gentlemen of fortune, excited commotions in Eſſex; while the earl of Holland raiſed forces in Surry. Langdale and Muſgrave were in arms, and maſters of Berwick and Carliſle in the north; and Pomfret-caſtle in Yorkſhire was ſurprized by Maurice.

The parliament at Weſtminſter beheld theſe commotions with terror, and ſhuddered for the event. The independents in the army quartered in the neighbourhood of London made no ſecret of their deſign to plunder the capital as ſoon as the Scottiſh forces entered England, in order to prevent the citizens from joining their preſbyterian brethren. This declaration ſtruck the wealthy inhabitants with horror. The whole city was in a ferment, and the people ſo much exaſperated, that they attacked and overpowered a party of the trained bands, and advanced in a body to Whitehall, where they were met by Cromwell, at the head of two regiments of horſe, who drove them back into the city; but thinking it would be imprudent to purſue the blow, the tumult encreaſed to ſo violent a degree, that the lord-mayor was obliged to take ſhelter in the city. The next morning Cromwell perſuaded Fairfax to give him leave to enter the city with two regiments of horſe. This produced the deſired effect. Struck with terror at the appearance of that victorious general, the people diſperſed, and tranquillity was once more reſtored in the capital. This was the only attempt made by the Londoners in ſupport of the royal cauſe: the terror of the army kept the citizens in ſubjection. They were obliged to bear the humiliating yoke of being governed by the dregs of the people; and to ſee hypocrites exerciſing iniquity under the maſk of religon.

Advice was now received that the loyaliſts were in motion, and that the number of forces in Wales were daily increaſing. The eſtabliſhment of the army at this time was 26,000 men; but by enliſting ſupernumaries the regiments were greatly augmented, and in general conſiſted of more than double their ſtated compliment. Cromwell was ordered to march into Wales, at the head of two regiments of horſe, and three of foot, to relieve colonel Horton, who commanded in that principality, while Fairfax himſelf undertook the ſervice in the north. Langhorne, who had formed an engagement with the Scots, declared himſelf too ſoon; for before Cromwell reached the borders of Wales, and even before Langhorne had procured arms for his men, Horton found means to put himſelf between the horſe and foot of Langhorne's army. A battle enſued, in which the Welſh forces were completely routed; and major-general Stradling, with 26 captains, 150 ſubalterns, and near 3000 ſoldiers, were made priſoners. This defeat, however, did not ſubdue the whole party; they were ſtill maſters of ſeveral ſtrong places, and ſeemed determined to defend them to the laſt extremity. Cromwell therefore ſat down before Chepſtow-caſtle; but finding it too well fortified to be ſoon reduced, he left a ſmall party to block up the fortreſs, and marched with the main body of his forces into Pembrokeſhire. On the eleventh of June he took the town and caſtle of Pembroke, and obliged Langhorne, Powel and Poyer to ſurrender at diſcretion. Theſe three generals were tried by a court-martial, and condemned to draw lots for their lives; and the fatal chance falling on Poyer, he was accordingly ſhot at the head of the army.

Cromwell next took Chepſtow, by which the principality of Wales was ſufficiently reduced, and that intrepid general made diſpoſitions for leading his forces into the north, in order to oppoſe the Scots and royaliſts, the inſurrections in Kent, Surry, and Suffolk, having prevented Fairfax from marching into that country, as he had firſt intended.

Petitions from ſeveral of the principal countie were now preſented to the parliament in favour of the king; and the inhabitants of Surry were ſo exaſperated at not receiving an immediate anſwer, that they attacked and killed ſeveral of the ſoldiers who were guarding the houſe. The Kentiſhmen, who were on their march towards London, in order, as they pretended, to preſent a petition to the parliament, made choice of the earl of Norwich for their general. The commons were alarmed, and the earl of Pembroke was diſpatched with terms to the inſurgents. He offered indemnity to all who ſhould lay down their arms, and free liberty to preſent their petitions after they had delivered up the towns, magazines, and ſtores they had ſeized. His offers were rejected and the Kentiſhmen marched to Blackheath, where they drew up their forces, and prepared to make an attack upon the capital, fully perſuaded that the citizens would open their gates upon the firſt ſummons. By this time Fairfax had collected his army, and the Kentiſhmen were informed by the parliament that they muſt treat with their general. This greatly diſpirited the inſurgents, and perceiving no motion wa made by the citizens in their favour, they retreated with great precipitation to Maidſtone, where a part was attacked and cut to pieces by Fairfax. The earl of Norwich now thought that a fair opportunity offered of giving the parliament's general the ſlip, and of advancing again towards the capital; fully perſuaded that the citizens being delivered from the terrors of the army, would declare in his favour. He accordingly returned with the main body of his forces to Blackheath, where he hoped to be joined by the inhabitants of Suſſex and Surry. But he was deceived in all his expectations; and a ſudden panic ſeizing his ſoldiers, they deſerted their general, and returned to their reſpective habitations. Upwards of 2000, however, ſtill kept together, and it was determined, if poſſible, to paſs over into Eſſex, where, they were informed, the county were in arms for the king, under the command of lord Capel, Sir Charles Lucas, Sir George Liſle, and other officers of courage and experience. Not more than a thouſand of them paſſed the river, where they were obliged to cut their way through a regiment belonging to the Tower Hamlets, and afterwards to ſkirmiſh with the parliament's forces, during their march to Chelmsford, where they were joined by lord Capel, and the other officers already mentioned. Their army now amounted to three thouſand men; but being in no condition to fight Fairfax, they purſued their march to Colcheſter, and made themſelves maſters of that place.

In conſequence of this, Fairfax croſſed the Thames with his army at Graveſend, and marched with great expedition to Colcheſter, from a perſuaſion that the town was wholly deſtitute of fortifications, and that the royaliſts muſt ſurrender priſoners of war. But in this he was greatly miſtaken. The enemy made a noble defence: few ſieges in hiſtory are ſo remarkable as that of Colcheſter. Fairfax in perſon led his troops to the charge, which was at once both brave and deſperate; but they were beaten off with loſs by the beſieged. The charge was again and again repeated, but without ſucceſs; and Fairfax, unwilling to expoſe his troops to inevitable deſtruction, changed the ſiege into a blockade.

The whole kingdom was now in a blaze, which was likely to be quenched only by the blood of its inhabitants. Beſides Kent, Eſſex, Wales, and the northern counties, the Corniſhmen were in arms, but were ſoon defeated by Sir Hardreſs Waller, who afterwards took poſſeſſion of Exeter. The inhabitants of Rutlandſhire, Leiceſterſhire, Nottinghamſhire, and the neighbouring counties, alſo took up arms, and were defeated by colonel Waite, near Stamford. Sir John Owen renewed the war in Wales, and beſieged Carnarvon-caſtle, but his forces were routed and he himſelf taken priſoner by Colonel Carter. The moſt determinate enemies of the parliament were thoſe who, in the beginning of the war, had been the moſt active againſt Charles. They were therefore conſidered as apoſtates by the army, and puniſhed with much greater ſeverity than even the royaliſts themſelves.

During theſe troubles in different parts of the kingdom, by which the army was divided, the parliament regained its liberty, and again acted with its wonted ſpirit and courage. The members who had withdrawn through fear of the army returned, and infuſing boldneſs into their companions, reſtored to the preſbyterian party that aſcendancy it had formerly enjoyed. The eleven impeached members were recalled; and the vote by which they were expelled was reverſed. The vote alſo of "Non Addreſſes" was repealed; and five lords and ten commoners were ſent to Newport, in the Iſle of Wight, in order to treat with his majeſty, who was allowed to have ſeveral of his friends and old counſellors, that he might have their advice on this important buſineſs.

No ſight, perhaps, was ever more moving and mortifying than the ſituation and appearance of Charles, when he entered the apartment where the parliament's commiſſioners were aſſembled. The moment his ſervants had been removed, he laid aſide all care of his perſon, and had ſuffered his hair and beard to grow, and to hang diſhevelled and neglected. His hair was become almoſt entirely grey; either from the decline of years, or from that load of ſorrows under which he laboured, and which, though borne with almoſt unexampled conſtancy, had preyed greatly on his heart. But though he had paid no attention to his perſon, he had aſſiduouſly cultivated the talents of his mind. His faculties were ſtrong and active; his judgment clear and penetrating; his prudence and patience invincible. He ſuffered not the ſmalleſt ſpark of indignation he felt at his unworthy treatment to eſcape him. The parliamentary commiſſioners would not ſuffer any of his council to be preſent; they refuſed to enter into debate with any but himſelf. He alone, during the tranſactions of two months, was obliged to ſupport the argument againſt fifteen men of the greateſt parts and capacity in both houſes, and no advantage was ever obtained over him. This was indeed the ſcene in which, of all others, he was qualified to excel. His conception was quick, his underſtanding clear, his elocution chaſte, his manner commanding; theſe accompliſhments rendered him capable of triumphing in all diſcuſſions of cool and temperate reaſoning. The parliamentary commiſſioners, who were before ſtrangers to the king's abilities, were aſtoniſhed. "The king is much changed," ſaid the earl of Saliſbury to Sir Philip Warwick: "he is extremely improved of late." "No," replied Sir Philip, "he was always ſo: but you are now at laſt ſenſible of it."

The firſt propoſition the commiſſioners preſented him was that of revoking all his proclamations and declarations againſt the parliament and their adherents, and acknowledging that they had taken up arms in their own defence. This was touching Charles in the ſenſible part. He made no difficulty of granting the former, but for ſome time oppoſed the latter with all his ſtrength of reaſoning. The king, during the whole courſe of the war, had aſſerted, that the parliament and their adherents were fundamentally in the wrong, and had they not obtained from him an acknowledgement that he himſelf was ſo, what ſecurity could they expect hereafter; as no conſequence could be valid from erroneous principles? But Charles was now in their power, nor were the commiſſioners to be diverted from their purpoſe by his moſt pathetic repreſentations of the wounds ſuch a conceſſion muſt inflict, both upon his judgment and his conſcience. But finding that peace could be obtained on no other terms, he yielded to neceſſity. It was, however, agreed, that no part of the propoſitions ſhould be binding, prejudicial, or made uſe of, unleſs the treaty was finally concluded.

The next propoſition was that which regarded the abrogation of epiſcopacy, and the liturgy of the church of England, and the total alienation of all church lands. This demand brought on a ridiculous diſpute between the king and ſome ignorant preſbyterian teachers, with regard to the divinity of epiſcopal government. Charles, even by his enemies, is allowed to have obtained the victory: but the more important part of the queſtion, the policy, or rather the neceſſity of it, in the preſent ſituation of affairs, was never debated. He at laſt conſented to ſuſpend epiſcopacy for three years, and, at the expiration of that period, to name twenty divines, who ſhould conſult with others named by the parliament, with regard to the future form of church-government: that all who were willing might take the covenant, and uſe the directory of the preſbyterians, provided he himſelf was at liberty to uſe the common prayer book in his own chapel; and that money ſhould be raiſed on the ſale of the church-lands, and only old old rents reſerved to the owners and their ſucceſſors.

The next ſubject of debate was, the future diſpoſal of the militia. The parliament required not only to have an unlimited power of raiſing what men they thought proper, both for the land and ſea-ſervice, and of employing them as they pleaſed during twenty years, but alſo that of paſſing bills to pay them, which were to have the force of laws, even though the king ſhould refuſe the royal aſſent. Charles oppoſed theſe exorbitant demands with all the force of reaſon and eloquence: but all his endeavours were in vain: the commiſſioners had no power to recede one tittle from their inſtructions. Even this did not diſcourage the king from purſuing the work of peace: he granted their demands; but, at the ſame time, he laid the three following demands before the commiſſioners, that they might be communicated to the parliament. 1. That he ſhould be reſtored to his liberty. 2. That he ſhould enjoy his revenue. 3. That an act of oblivion ſhould be paſſed. Theſe demands were ſent to the parliament, where it was voted, that they ſhould be granted, on the king's conſenting to the deſire of the two houſes.

With reſpect to the other points of the treaty, they admitted of leſs debate. Charles agreed that taxes ſhould be levied for the payment of the army, and for diſcharging the debts of the public; that all the chief officers of ſtate ſhould be nominated by the parliament for ten years: that the militia of the city of London, the government of the Tower, and the appointing the chief officers in theſe departments ſhould be conſigned to the lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council of the city of London, for ten years; and that the king ſhould receive 100,000l. annually, as a compenſation for giving up the court of wards.

Theſe debates took up ſo much time, that the parliament thought it neceſſary either to break off the treaty, or allow the commiſſioners a longer time to compleat it; ſeveral of the king's conceſſions, particularly that relating to religion, having been voted unſatisfactory. The latter was choſen, and the time was enlarged to fourteen days longer. The parliament now demanded that the earl of Newcaſtle, the lord Digby, lord Biron, Sir Marmaduke Langdale, Sir Richard Granville, Judge Jenkins, Sir Francis Doddington, and Sir John Winter, ſhould be excepted from pardon, both with regard to lives and eſtates. This was a demand which Charles abſolutely refuſed; he declared he would never agree to give up his friends to puniſhment. The ſevere repentance which he had undergone for abandoning Strafford had doubtleſs confirmed him in the reſolution never again to be guilty of a ſimilar error. He, however, conſented that the royaliſts ſhould pay ſuch compoſitions as they and the parliament ſhould think reaſonable; he only begged that they might be as moderate as poſſible: he alſo offered that the perſons excepted by the parliament ſhould be baniſhed for a limited time.

Although it was ſo evidently the intereſt both of the king and parliament to finiſh this treaty, while Cromwell and Fairfax were employed againſt the royaliſts and Scots, yet the fear of the army on the one hand, and of the king's inſincerity on the other, continued to have ſo great an effect on many of the members, that they ſtrengthened the hands of the Independents till it was too late to prevent inevitable ruin. The inſurrections were every where quelled before the treaty was finiſhed; and the army had leiſure to carry into execution the violent and ſanguinary projects they had formed.

After Cromwell had reduced the Welſh inſurgents, he marched with great expedition in order to meet the Scottiſh army, who, under Hamilton, had entered England, and were advancing forward without meeting with any oppoſition. But religious diſputes rendered their expedition abortive, and deſtroyed that cauſe they entered England to ſupport. They refuſed to join the royaliſts, becauſe they had not taken the covenant; ſo that the two armies purſued the ſame route, but at ſome diſtance; nor could even the approach of the parliamentary army under Cromwell oblige the bigotted covenanters to conſult their own ſafety, by a cloſe union with the royaliſts. The two armies, commanded by Hamilton and Langdale, amounted to twenty thouſand men; yet theſe not being joined, Cromwell ventured to attack them at the head of eight thouſand only. He fell upon the royaliſts by ſurpriſe near Preſton in Lancaſhire, and though they made a brave reſiſtance, were almoſt entirely cut to pieces. Cromwell had now an opportunity of taking vengeance on the Scots, whom he had long deteſted. He attacked Hamilton, put his army to the route, and purſued the fugitives to Utoxeter, where the Scottiſh general ſurrendered himſelf priſoner. No forces now remained in the field to oppoſe the progreſs of Cromwell, who, purſuing his victory, marched into Scotland, and having joined Argyle, and ſuppreſſed the earl of Laneric and Munro, he placed the power in the hands of the violent party among the preſbyterians.

The ſiege of Colcheſter was now drawing to a criſis. The garriſon, after enduring the utmoſt extremity of famine, were at laſt obliged to capitulate. No terms, however, could be procured from Fairfax: he inſiſted on their ſurrendering at mercy; and gave ſuch an explanation of that term, as to reſerve to himſelf the power of putting them all to the ſword if he thought proper. The officers of the garriſon were very unwilling to ſurrender, unleſs they were promiſed that their lives ſhould be ſafe, and endeavoured to perſuade the ſoldiers to make one glorious attempt on the enemy, and either cut themſelves a a paſſage, or ſell their lives as dear as poſſible. But they had ſuffered too much during the ſiege; ſo that this propoſal, which would, perhaps, have been embraced with alacrity, was now refuſed: and they ſurrendered the town to Fairfax.

At the inſtigation of Ireton, to whom Cromwell had conſigned over the government during his abſence, the paſſive Fairfax was perſuaded to take an unmanly revenge on the principal officers who had made ſo noble a defence; though that circumſtance ſhould have recommended them to the regard of every lover of military greatneſs. Accordingly Sir Charles Lucas and Sir George Liſle were ſeized, and ordered to be ſhot immediately. Exaſperated at ſo ungenerous an action, lord Capel reproached Ireton with this unmanly behaviour in the boldeſt terms, and challenged him, as they were all engaged in the ſame honourable cauſe, to execute on all the ſame impartial vengeance. Lucas was firſt ſhot, and was ſo far from being intimidated, that he gave, himſelf, the order to fire, with the ſame alacrity as if he had been at the head of his own platoon of ſoldiers. Liſle ran and kiſſed the dead body, and then preſented his own breaſt with the ſame undaunted reſolution. The lords Goring, Capel and Loughborough, with the other officers of diſtinction, 8 lieutenant-colonels, 9 majors, 30 captains, 65 gentlemen, 72 lieutenants, 61 en ensigns, 183 ſerjeants, and 3067 private men, wer ſent to different priſons.

After the ſiege of Colcheſter, Fairfax led h troop troops back to St. Alban's, and renewed his complaint to the parliament of the want of pay for his ſoldiers. The army alſo renewed their cabals, and almoſt every corps petitioned the general that juſtice might be executed upon criminals. Ireton's regiment, in particular, demanded, that the ſame fault might have the ſame puniſhment, from the king to the commoner; and that all ſuch might be proceeded againſt as traitors, who ſhould ſpeak in behalf of the king, till he was acquitted of the charge of innocent blood. Theſe demands ſo plainly indicated the dreadful cataſtrophe which ſoon after followed, that all who wiſhed well to his majeſty, both in and out of parliament, adviſed him to make his eſcape, which was conceived to be very eaſy: But Charles having given his word to the parliament not to attempt the recovery of his liberty during the treaty, and three weeks after, he could not be prevailed upon to hazard the reproach of violating his promiſe.

On the 20th of November colonel Ewer, at the head of ſeven other officers, preſented a remonſtrance from the council of the army to the parliament. It began with a demand that the treaty with the king ſhould be laid aſide, and that the prince of Wales and duke of York ſhould be declared incapable of government; that the army be ſatisfied out of the eſtates of the delinquents; that juſtice be done to the capital cauſes of the war; that a period be put to the preſent parliament; that there be a more equal repreſentation of the people in the houſe of commons; that all who had borne arms for the king ſhould be diſabled either for voting or being elected to ſerve in parliament; that the ſupreme power of government ſhould be veſted in the repreſentatives of the people, among whom there ſhould be a liberty of entering diſſents; that all future kings ſhould be elected by the people, but without any negative voice; that all matters of general ſettlement ſhould be eſtabliſhed by the general contract of the people; but that none ſhould have a ſhare in it, who ſhould oppoſe the matter of this remonſtrance.

Though the parliament well knew they were in no condition to withſtand the force of the army, yet they were determined to oppoſe them to the utmoſt of their power, and rather bring on a ſubverſion of government, than give their conſent to ſuch ſanguinary meaſures. They accordingly reſolved to pay no regard to the remonſtrance of the army. But this oppoſition tended only to haſten the execution of the project formed by the counſel of officers. Hammond received an order from Fairfax to attend him, and to reſign to colonel Ewer the cuſtody of the king's perſon. In this emergency Charles conſulted his friends, who were permitted ſtill to remain about his perſon, and all of them adviſed him to make his eſcape, which was ſtill very practicable. But Charles, from a delicacy in point of honor, thought his royal word ſo far engaged, that he refuſed to conſent, and ſtill continued under the fatal deluſion, that the preſervation of his perſon was neceſſary both to the parliament and the army. But the earl of Lindſay, with great judgment, replied, "Take heed, ſir, leſt you fall into ſuch hands as will not ſteer by the rules of policy. Remember Hampton-court, where your eſcape was the beſt ſecurity." Charles, however, continued obſtinate; and the next morning the officers of the army, detached for that purpoſe, ruſhed into his apartment, and carried him over to Hurſt-caſtle, where he was again a cloſe priſoner, and none of his friends ſuffered to viſit him.

When the parliament were informed of this tranſaction, they voted that the ſeizing the king's perſon was done without their knowledge and conſent; and ſent a meſſage to the general, to know by what authority that enterprize was undertaken. They alſo iſſued orders that the army ſhould not advance any nearer to London. They next voted, "That the anſwers of the king to the propoſitions of both houſes are ſufficient ground for the houſe to proceed upon for the ſettlement of the peace of the kingdom." It was alſo propoſed by Hollis, the preſent leader of the preſbyterians, a man of the moſt unconquerable intrepidity, that the generals and principal officers of the army ſhould be deemed traitors to their country by the parliament, for their diſobedience and uſurpations."

Theſe ſpirited proceedings of the parliament ſoon brought matters to a criſis. Fairfax marched the army to London, and placing guards at Whitehall, the Mews, St. James's, Durham-houſe, Covent-garden, and Palace-yard, ſurrounded the parliament. The next day, when the commons were to meet, colonel Pride, formerly a dray-man, blocked up the paſſage to the houſe at the head of two regiments; and being directed by the lord Gray of Groby, he ſeized in the paſſage forty-one members of the preſbyterian party, and ſent them to a low room, which paſſed under the denomination of Hell, whence they were afterwards carried to ſeveral inns. Beſides theſe, above 160 members more were excluded, and none ſuffered to enter the houſe but the moſt furious and moſt determined of the independent party, which was ſo ſmall, that their number did not exceed ſixty. This egregious invaſion of the rights of parliament was generally known under the name of "Colonel Pride's Purge;" ſo ready were the people to turn into ridicule the dethroning a party who had governed the nation with a rod of iron, and overturned the conſtitution of their country.

The ſecluded members having publiſhed a paper, containing a narrative of the violent manner in which they had been prevented from entering the houſe, together with a proteſtation againſt all acts, which ſince that moment had been tranſacted by the commons, the paper was voted to be falſe, ſcandalous, and ſeditious, tending to deſtroy the viſible and fundamental government of the kingdom, and therefore ought to be ſuppreſſed. While the commons were employed in paſſing this vote ſo contrary to what every member in the houſe knew to be true, the army preſented a ſcheme of government in conſequence of their former declarations and remonſtrances. But it was ſo wild and impracticable, and was ſo ſtrongly tinctured with that fanatical ſpirit ſo prevalent throughout the kingdom, that it is probable Cromwell ſuffered them to form ſo ridiculous a ſcheme, merely to keep them in employment.

The only difficulty Cromwell now had to ſurmount, in order to bring on the cataſtrophe of his deteſtable plot, conſiſted in diſguiſing its horrid form from Fairfax. The force that had been laid upon the parliament, and the army continuing almoſt ſingle, in oppoſition to the whole nation, together with ſome tenderneſs for the king, ſtartled Fairfax. He began to fear he had gone too far; nor could all the arts of Cromwell quiet the fears with which his breaſt was agitated. The ſoldiers themſelves proved aukward executioners of Cromwell's vengeance; they had ſuffered ſeveral of the ſecluded members to eſcape; and about ſixteen of them were ſet at liberty by Fairfaix. This ſeemed to be a kind of apology for the force put upon the houſe: but Cromwell prevented him from going any farther, by procuring a multitude of addreſſes from the independents reſiding in various parts of the kingdom.

In the mean time the king was ordered to be brought under a ſtrong guard to Windſor, by colonel Harriſon, the ſon of a butcher, and the moſt furious enthuſiaſt in the whole army. Charles himſelf was now convinced, that the period of his life was approaching; proaching; but could not be perſuaded that they intended to proceed againſt him by a formal trial, and make him fall a victim to what they called the ſtroke of juſtice. He every moment expected a private aſſaſſination, a cataſtrophe ſo frequent with dethroned princes: there was not an inſtance to be found in hiſtory where a ſovereign was put to death by the laws of his country. Harriſon aſſured him that his fears were groundleſs, and that whatever was intended againſt him would be done before the ſun. On his arrival at Windſor, all ſymbols of ſovereignty were withdrawn, and his attendants had orders to treat him in no other manner than that of a private gentleman.

On the 25th of December the commons appointed a committee to bring in a charge againſt the king, and other capital offenders. This committee was impowered to take informations with regard to facts, on which the charge againſt the king was to be founded; and on the twenty-eighth an ordinance for trying the king was brought into the houſe of commons by Scot an independent member. This ordinance met with very little difficulty in the houſe. Some ſpeeches were indeed made againſt it, but they ſeemed rather calculated to ſave appearances, than prevent it from receiving the ſanction of the commons.

The ordinance, having almoſt unanimouſly paſſed the commons, was, on the 2d of January, carried up to the peers by lord Gray, of Groby. The upper houſe had long been conſidered as of little weight in the legiſlature, and ſince the king's impriſonment had become totally contemptible. It happened however to be fuller than ordinary when the ordinance was preſented: ſixteen of the peers were aſſembled, and they all expreſſed the greateſt anxiety to know the contents of the charge, which was conceived in the following terms: "That Charles Stuart had acted contrary to his truſt in departing from his parliament, ſetting up his ſtandard, making war againſt them, and thereby been the occaſion of much bloodſhed and miſery to the people, whom he was ſet over to protect; that he had given commiſſions to Iriſh rebels, and was ſince the occaſion of a ſecond war; that he had invaded the rights of the ſubject, and endeavoured to deſtroy the fundamental laws and liberties of this kingdom." The peers looked upon each other with aſtoniſhment, and ſeemed deprived of the power of ſpeech. The earl of Mancheſter firſt broke the awful ſilence, in a ſpeech at once pathetic and conſtitutional. He affirmed it to be a palpable abſurdity to ſay, "that the king could be a traitor againſt the parliament." The earl of Northumberland declared that the greater part of the people of England were far from being ſatisfied whether the king or parliament were the firſt aggreſſors; and that even if it ſhould be granted that the king firſt began the war, there was no law in being that declared ſuch an action to be treaſon; and for the parliament to declare it treaſon before the matter of fact was proved, and without any law to countenance ſuch a proceeding, would be highly unreaſonable." All the reſt of the lords were of the ſame opinion, and the vote of the lower houſe was rejected without one diſſenting voice. They alſo adjourned themſelves for ten days, hoping, by this means, to reſtrain the furious proceedings of the commons.

But ſo ſmall an obſtacle was very inſufficient to divert the independents from their purpoſe. They voted to proceed in trying the king, and eſtabliſhing all other meaſures, without the concurrence of the lords: and accordingly paſſed the following votes, which ſufficiently indicate the purpoſes they were calculated to ſerve:

"Reſolved, that the commons of England in parliament aſſembled do declare, that the people are, under God, the original of all juſt power.

"That the commons of England, in parliament aſſembled, being choſen by and repreſenting the people, have the ſupreme power in this nation.

"That whatſoever is enacted or declared for law, by the commons, in parliament aſſembled, hath the force of law; and all the people of this nation are included thereby, although the concurrence of the king and the houſe of peers be not had thereunto."

Theſe votes being paſſed, the ordinance for the trial of the king was read, and aſſented to unanimouſly. Nothing leſs could be expected; the balance of government had been long deſtroyed, and the quarrel now was only about its ſpoils. The parliament had before declared, that they had a right to impoſe laws without the conſent of the king; and the army had juſt as much right to give law to the poor remains of a parliament that now aſſumed the legiſlative power.

The fate of Charles was now to be precipitated on many accounts. The army might feel remorſe if the fervors of fanaticiſm were ſuffered to ſubſide. The people might recover from their conſternation. The Scots might interpoſe. Foreign nations might declare in the king's favour. The ſtates-general had already named an ambaſſador to negotiate a peace between his majeſty and the parliament. The court of France appeared to be deeply concerned at the fate of Charles; the king of Denmark was fitting out armaments for his relief; and all Europe beheld his fate with pity and indignation. Cromwell knew this, and ſat late every night in conſultation with his officers. He had too ſound a judgment to think of entering upon any vindication of the late proceedings: he knew they would not ſtand the teſt of reaſon; and thought it would be more eaſy to juſtify the blow after it was given than before.

On the 6th of January information was brought to the houſe, that the king might eaſily make his eſcape; and Fairfax was ordered to confine him more cloſely, and not to ſuffer any of his friends to viſit him; and on the thirteenth of January it was voted to leave the king's name out of all public papers. Nor was the government of the city of London leſs unhinged than the conſtitution. The independent faction, in the name of the common-council, preſented an addreſs to parliament, without the conſent of the lord-mayor and aldermen, who had all of them abſented themſelves. The addreſs was, however, voted to be regular, and the thanks of the houſe were accordingly returned. No member was found intrepid enough to oppoſe theſe proceedings, Cromwell having made no ſecret of his intention to expel every one who voted againſt the meaſures he propoſed. The whole kingdom beheld theſe proceedings with ſilent horror. The queen wrote to the parliament in favour of her huſband, and deſired leave to attend him, but this letter was inhumanly thrown aſide by the commons.

The only man in England that dared to face theſe flames of ſedition was Prynne, who had ſuffered ſo deeply by the tyranny of the ſtar-chamber. He had been elected a member of parliament, and was ſo honeſt as to ſpeak, vote, and write, agreeable to his own opinion; and had been, with other members, excluded from his ſeat in the houſe, and kept priſoner at a common inn. But though his perſon was confined, he wrote ſtrongly in defence of the principles he profeſſed. He appealed to the public againſt the proceedings of the independent faction, and boldly printed a pamphlet, intituled, "A brief memento to the preſent unparliamentary junto to depoſe and execute Charles Stuart, their lawful king." This pamphlet gave ſo much offence to the party, that a committee was appointed to demand of Prynne, whether he would own it. Prynne readily replied, “ I will not anſwer till I am commanded by a lawful authority.” The preſbyterian members approved this anſwer, and made another weak attempt to try their ſtrength with the army, but were defeated.

It required no great length of time to adjuſt the neceſſary preparations for the trial, and to conſtitute what was termed “ The High Court of Juſtice.” This court conſiſted of 133 perſons, as named by the commons, but never more than ſeventy met: ſo difficult was it found, notwithſtanding the blindneſs of prejudice, and the allurements of intereſt, to prevail upon perſons of any name or character to engage in ſo criminal a meaſure. It may, perhaps, be thought ſtrange, that as a great number, nearly the majority, of the commiſſioners, who were empowered to act on this occaſion, deteſted the guilty deſigns of the court, they did not attend, and endeavour to prevent the ſentence. But the truth is, they were intimidated by the fierceneſs of the army. They knew, that if any difficulty occurred in completing this ſanguinary meaſure, the independent faction among the officers would purge the court, as it had already done the parliament. The twelve judges were at firſt appointed in the number; but on their affirming, that it was contrary to all the ideas of Engliſh law to try the king for treaſon, by whoſe authority all accuſations for that crime muſt neceſſarily be conducted, their names, as well as thoſe of ſome peers, were afterwards ſtruck out. Cromwell, Ireton, Harriſon, and the chief officers of the army, moſt of them of very mean birth, were judges, together with a few of the members of the lower houſe, and ſome citizens of London. Bradſhaw, a lawyer, was choſen preſident; Coke was appointed ſolicitor for the people of England; and Doriſlaus, Steel and Aſke, were named aſſiſtants.

Fairfax now ſeemed as one awakened from a lethargy, and ſtartled at the guilt that was every day committing under the ſanction of his name. He never, knowingly to himſelf, had profeſſed independency, though he had in fact been the tool of Cromwell to eſtabliſh it. His wrong notions, with regard to the army, occaſioned all his miſcarriages. He was perſuaded that the profeſſion of a ſoldier ought to be governed by ſeverer maxims and principles of honour than thoſe that fell within any civil ſyſtem; and was always jealous of government, becauſe he feared it wanted to make a property of the army. After he was made general in chief, he conſidered himſelf as anſwerable to the ſoldiers, with regard to their treatment from the parliament. Such military notions, greatly augmented by religious ſincerity and fervour, rendered it very eaſy for Cromwell to mould Fairfax to his purpoſes; and it happened, that, in ſome particulars, he had juſtice on his ſide. The parliament had, for inſtance, violated ſeveral articles of capitulation granted by the army, which Fairfax conſidered as highly criminal. They were undoubted truths; and Cromwell perſuaded Fairfax, that the hardſhips of the ſoldiers proceeded from the notorious avarice and wicked policy of the members. The former induced them to evade all demands of money; the latter to abandon the ſoldiers, ſo that they were obliged to live upon free quarter, whereby they were become hateful, and an intolerable burden to the people.

Fairfax, being once convinced of theſe truths, was led to believe every thing that was reported of the parliament; and his ill opinion was increaſed on ſeizing, in the cuſtody of their committees, when he marched his troops into the city, more money than would have been ſufficient to quiet the clamours of his ſoldiers. But when his troops were ſatisfied, and his preſbyterian friends laid before him the conſequences that muſt reſult from the ſcheme formed by the army, he was ſtruck with horror at the proſpect, and would fain have prevented the dreadful effects of that power he had been ſo inſtrumental in promoting.

The High Court of Juſtice for trying the king ſat in Weſtminſter-hall; and, at their firſt meeting, an incident happened of the moſt remarkable nature. Lady Fairfax, the daughter of Horace lord Vere of Tilbury, having been ſeduced by the violence of the times, ſeconded all the ardour of her huſband againſt the royal cauſe; but being now convinced of her error, ſhe joined with her huſband in bewailing the miſeries which threatened her country, and, with the friends of Fairfax, diſſuaded him from being preſent at the trial. Curioſity, however, prompted her to attend; and when her huſband's name was called in reading over the liſt of commiſſioners, a voice was heard from one of the ſpectators, ſaying aloud, “ He has too much wit to be preſent.” And when the charge was read againſt the king, in the name of all the people of England, the ſame voice exclaimed, “ Not a tenth part of them.” On this orders were given to Axtel, the officer who guarded the court, to fire into the box whence the voice proceeded; but the ſoldiers being informed that it was their general's lady, they refuſed to obey. This circumſtance ſufficiently proves, that Fairfax was now convinced of his having been abuſed, and that Cromwell was then conſidered as the hypocrite, who had inſtigated the army to inſiſt on this deteſtable trial.

It is almoſt impoſſible to conceive a more affecting ſcene than was now exhibited in the High Court of Juſtice: the delegates of a free people ſitting in judgment on their ſupreme magiſtrate, and trying him for his miſ-government and breach of truſt; and the pomp, the dignity and the ceremony were equal to the conception.

The charge againſt the king was read by the ſolicitor, in the name of the commons; in which it was declared, “ That Charles Stuart, being admitted king “ of England, and intruſted with a limited power; “ yet, nevertheleſs, out of a wicked deſign to erect an “ unlawful and tyrannical government, had traiter“ ouſly and maliciouſly levied war againſt the preſent “ parliament, and the people, whom they repre-
“ ſented; and was therefore impeached as a tyrant, “ traitor, murderer, and a public and implacable ene-
“ my to the commonwealth.”

Charles, even in this hour of diſtreſs, loſt not the majeſty of a king. On the preſident's telling him, that the court expected his anſwer; he aſked by what authority he was brought thither? The queſtion had been expected by Cromwell, and the preſident, by his direction, anſwered, “ In the name of the commons of England.” The king denied the authority of the court, and refuſed to ſubmit to their juriſdiction. He obſerved, that being born their lawful hereditary king, all his ſubjects united could have no power to bring him to a trial; that having often expoſed his life in defence of the liberties and fundamental laws of the kingdom, he would not now deſert them, but was ready, in this laſt and moſt ſolemn ſcene, to ſeal with his blood thoſe precious rights for which he had ſo long, though in vain, contended: That in the court which pretended to ſit in judgment on his actions, he could not perceive the leaſt appearance of the upper houſe, ſo eſſential a member of the conſtitution; and had learned from ſufficient authority, that the commons, with whoſe power the court pretended to be inveſted, had been ſubdued by lawleſs force, and entirely deprived of their liberty: That thoſe who arrogated the power of being his judges were born his ſubjects, and ſubjects of thoſe laws, which declare, “ That the king can do no wrong;" but that without having recourſe to that general maxim, which ſcreens even the worſt of princes, he was ready to juſtify his conduct by the evidence of reaſon: and that if he were called upon in another manner, he ſhould be deſirous of demonſtrating to them, and all the world, the juſtice of that war he was unfortunately, and contrary to his inclinations, engaged in his own defence: but in his preſent circumſtances he muſt not enter on the apology he was ſo deſirous of making, leſt, by ratifying an authority, no better founded than that of robbers and pirates, he ſhould be conſidered as the betrayer of that conſtitution he was ſo deſirous of eſtabliſhing even by his blood."

This anſwer had no effect. Bradſhaw, in the moſt atrocious and inſolent language, told him, that the court over-ruled his objections, and derived their authority from the people, the only ſource of genuine power. Thrice was Charles brought before the court, and as often denied their juriſdiction. The commiſſioners therefore proceeded to examine ſome witneſſes, who depoſed, that the king had appeared in arms againſt the troops of the parliament. Upon which, after another inſolent ſpeech made by Bradſhaw, the following ſentence of death was paſſed on the unfortunate prince:

"That he, Charles Stuart, king of England, having been convicted and attainted as a tyrant, traitor, "murderer, and public enemy, ſhould be put to "death, by ſevering his head from his body." This ſentence was ſigned by the whole court, except nine members.

The king, during his laſt appearance before the court, ſeemed very deſirous of being admitted to a conference with the two houſes of parliament; but this was denied. The independents intended not to gratify any requeſt he might make; they had already determined to aboliſh the power of the houſe of peers, and it would have been dangerous on this occaſion to acknowledge them as a branch of the legiſlature. Their denial was accompanied with the moſt brutal inſolence. The ſoldiers were ſuffered to uſe every mark of diſreſpect, and ſome of them even ſpit in his face. But even this inſult could not ſhake the tranquillity of his ſoul, a ſentiment of piety was the only effect it excited. He was more nearly affected by the ardent prayers and wiſhes offered up for his ſafety by the people who thronged about him, and which even the rod of lawleſs power was not ſufficient to reſtrain.

The ambaſſadors of France, Holland and Scotland interpoſed to ſtop theſe horrid proceedings, but in vain. Every nation in Europe exclaimed againſt this example as the moſt egregious inſult on law and juſtice. But all their exclamations and interpoſitions had no effect: the fate of the king was fixed and irrevocable. Four of the chief and moſt illuſtrious friends of his majeſty, Richmond, Holland, Southampton and Lindſey, repaired to the houſe of commons, and repreſented, that, in quality of his counſellors, they alone were guilty of the meaſures imputed to him as crimes; and deſired to ſave, by their own puniſhment, that precious life, which the commons themſelves were ſo much intereſted to defend. This generous offer had no other effect than that of increaſing the animoſity of the court. For the more bad men ſee their conduct reproached by the virtue of the good, the more eager they are to conſummate their baſe deſigns.

Three days only were allowed the king between his ſentence and execution, during which ſhort interval he chiefly employed his time in meditation and prayer. All his family that remained in England were allowed to viſit him. The duke of Glouceſter was little more than an infant; but the advanced judgement of the princeſs Elizabeth, notwithſtanding her tender years, rendered her ſenſible of all the miſeries ſhe was doomed to ſuffer. The king, after giving her the moſt prudent advice, and endeavouring to fortify her mind with pious conſolations, charged her to tell the queen, that he had never, during the whole courſe of his life, failed in conjugal fidelity towards her, not even in thought; and that his tenderneſs for her ſhould only end with his life. Holding the duke of Glouceſter on his knee, he ſaid, "Now they will "cut off thy father's head." So unexpected a ſentence ſeemed greatly to affect the child, who looked ſtedfaſtly upon him. "Mark! child what I ſay; "They will cut off my head, and perhaps make thee "a king: But mark what I ſay: Thou muſt not be "a king, as long as thy brothers Charles and James "are alive. They will cut off thy brothers heads "when they can catch them! And thy head too they "will cut off at laſt! And therefore I charge thee "do not be made a king by them!" The duke replied, fetching a deep ſigh, "I will be torn in pieces firſt." The king's eyes were filled with tears of joy and admiration at hearing ſo determined an anſwer from one of ſuch tender years.

Fairfax, overwhelmed with grief, uſed all the intereſt, which he yet retained, to prevent the execution of the fatal ſentence; and even employed perſuaſion with his regiment, though none elſe ſhould follow him, to reſcue the king from his murderers. Cromwell and Ireton, being informed of his intention, endeavoured to convince him, that God had rejected the king; and exhorted him to ſeek by prayer ſome directions from heaven on this important occaſion. The fanatic Harriſon was ordered to join with him in this pious office, and he took care to prolong the farce, till a perſon came and whiſpered him, that the king was no more. Then riſing with the air of a prophet, he aſſured Fairfax, that the lord had heard their prayers, and made known his holy will in a very marvellous manner.

On the 30th of January, which was the day appointed for the tragic ſcene, the king roſe early, and calling Herbert, one of his attendants, bade him employ more than uſual care in dreſſing and preparing him for ſo great and joyful a ſolemnity. He then received the ſacrament from the hands of biſhop Juxon, and continued in his devotions till noon, when he drank a glaſs of wine and ate a bit of bread. Immediately after this he went through the Banquetting-houſe to the ſcaffold, which was erected in the ſtreet directly oppoſite to that building, it being intended, by making choice of a ſpot adjoining to his own palace, to diſplay, in a more evident manner, the triumph of popularity over the power of royalty.

As ſoon as the king came upon the ſcaffold, he beheld the apparatus of death with great compoſure, and aſked if there was not a higher block: he then addreſſed himſelf to the colonels Tomlinſon and Hacket, and ſome other perſons on the ſcaffold, to whom he proteſted his innocence, but, at the ſame time, acknowledged that his death was juſt in the eyes of the Supreme Being, and that he was puniſhed for not having oppoſed an unjuſt ſentence (meaning, undoubtedly, that of Strafford.) He forgave all his enemies, even the chief inſtruments of his death; but exhorted them and the whole nation to return to their obedience, and acknowledge his ſon and ſucceſſor as their lawful ſovereign. While he prepared himſelf for the block, biſhop Juxon ſaid to him, "There is, "Sir, but one ſtage more, which, though turbulent "and troubleſome, is yet a very ſhort one. Conſider it will ſoon carry you a great away; it will carry you from earth to heaven; and there you ſhall "find, to your great joy, the prize to which you "haſten, a crown of glory." "Yes," replied the king, king, " I go from a corruptible to an incorrruptible " crown, where no diſturbance can have place." Then delivering his George to the prelate, he ſaid, " Remember," and laying his head on the block, he ſtretched out his hands as a ſignal, when, at one blow, his head was ſevered from his body. A man in a vizor performed the office of executioner. Another, in the ſame diſguiſe, held up the head ſtreaming with blood, and exclaimed, " This is the head of a traitor." The ſpectators teſtified their ſorrows in ſighs, tears, and lamentations; and ſeveral attempted to dip their handkerchiefs in the blood of their murdered king.

The body was put into a coffin, covered with black velvet, and removed to an apartment in Whitehall, where it was embalmed, and then expoſed for ſeveral days at St. James's. But at length the duke of Richmond, the Marquis of Hertford, and the earls of Southampton and Lindſey, obtained permiſſion to bury it in the church of Windſor.

Thus fell Charles I. by the murderous decree of his own ſubjects, and the ignominious hand of a common executioner. The character of this prince is ſtrongly delineated through the whole courſe of his reign. Every impartial judge will own, that his virtues greatly out-balanced his imperfections. Aiming at more power than the conſtitution allowed, was the firſt cauſe of his misfortunes; but it may be pleaded, in his defence, that the precedents of many former reigns favoured ſtrongly of deſpotiſm, and he unhappily followed thoſe examples. Every ſtep he took to put a ſtop to, only ſerved to encreaſe the diſorders of his people, and his own misfortunes; owing to the fury of a bigotted faction, and the claſhing intereſt of parties violent and furious in their oppoſition to each other; and to theſe he fell a ſacrifice, in the 24th year of his reign, and 49th of his age.

Charles, by his queen Henrietta, had nine children, four ſons and five daughters, viz.

Charles James, who died an infant. Charles, Prince of Wales, who ſucceded him. James, duke f York, and Henry duke of Glouceſter, who died fter the reſtoration.

His daughters were, Mary, who married William f Naſſau prince of Orange. Elizabeth, confined y the regicides in Cariſbrook-caſtle, where ſhe died grief. Ann and Catherine, who died in their fancy, and Henrietta Maria, who married Philip ke of Anjou and Orleans.

A few days after the execution of Charles, a book publiſhed, intituled, " Icon Baſiliké," ſaid to e been written by that prince. This work, ſo full piety, meekneſs and humanity, publiſhed at ſo ical a juncture, excited, in a moſt remarkable nner, the compaſſion of the people for the murdered prince. The ſale of it was ſo rapid, that it d through fifty editions in leſs than a year. have not even ſcrupled to aſcribe to that work ſubſequent reſtoration of the royal family. It ted, ſays Milton, like the will of Cæſar, when by Mark Antony to the tumultuous Romans. doubtleſs, the beſt proſe compoſition in the language at the time of its publication. have denied the compoſition to have been the , but the arguments brought to prove that theſe meditations really flowed from the royal pen much ſtronger; and it is now the general opi- that they were actually written by that unfortu- prince.

only remarkable occurrences that happened king's reign were the following:

ſecond year a proclamation was iſſued, com- the inhabitants of London and Weſtminſter to preſerve their urine for one year, in order to make ſalt-petre.

In his tenth year a law was made, whereby every Britiſh ſubject, who was deſirous of travelling to foreign parts, was obliged to purchaſe a licenſe for that purpoſe, the money ariſing from which was paid to the crown.

The moſt diſtinguiſhed perſon in literature who lived during the time of James and Charles I. was Ben Johnſon, who was born at Weſtminſter in 1574. He was firſt educated at a private ſchool in the pariſh of St. Martin's in the Fields, from whence he was removed to Weſtminſter ſchool, where the famous Camden was maſter. His mother, who married a bricklayer to her ſecond huſband, took him from ſchool, and obliged him to work at his father-in-law's trade; but being extremely averſe to that employment, he went into the Low Countries, where he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his bravery. On his return to England he purſued his former ſtudies, and was admitted into St. John's College Cambridge, where he continued for ſome time. On his leaving the univerſity, he entered into an obſcure playhouſe, where he acquitted himſelf with ſome reputation as an actor. Shakeſpeare is ſaid to have firſt introduced him to the world, by recommending a play of his to the ſtage, and at the time when one of the players had rejected his performance, and told him it would be of no ſervice to their company. His firſt dramatic performance was a comedy, entitled " Every Man in his Humour," acted in the year 1598, which being ſoon followed by ſeveral others gained him ſo high a reputation, that in October 1619, upon the death of Mr. Samuel Daniel, he was made poet laureat to king James I. and on July 19, the ſame year, he was created maſter of arts at Oxford, having reſided for ſome time at Chriſt-church in that univerſity. He once incurred his majeſty's diſpleaſure for being concerned with two others in writing a play called " Eſtward-Hoe," wherein they were accuſed of having reflected on the Scotch nation. On the acceſſion of Charles I. he wrote a petition to that prince, craving, that as his royal father had allowed him an annual penſion of 100 marks, he would make them pounds. In the year 1629 Ben fell ſick, and was then poor and lodged in an obſcure alley: his majeſty was ſupplicated in his favour, who ſent him ten guineas. When the meſſenger delivered the ſum, Ben took it in his hand and ſaid, " His majeſty has ſent me ten guineas " becauſe I am poor and live in an alley; go and tell " him that his ſoul lives in an alley." He had a penſion from the city of London, from ſeveral of the nobility and gentry, and particularly from Mr. Sutton, the founder of the Charter-houſe. In his laſt ſickneſs he often repented of the profanation of ſcripture in his plays. He died the 16th of Auguſt 1637, in the 63d year of his age, and was interred three days after in Weſtminſter-abbey, where there is now a monument to his memory; in the front of which is the following conciſe inſcription:

" O RARE BEN JOHNSON!"

He wrote above fifty ſeveral pieces, which may be ranked under the ſpecies of dramatic poetry. But the moſt remarkable are, " The Alchymiſt, The Fox, and The Silent Woman:" theſe have been oftener acted than all the reſt of his plays put together, and have been always received with univerſal applauſe.

During the above period likewiſe flouriſhed thoſe diſtinguiſhed painters Reubens and Vandyke; as alſo that unparalleled architect Inigo Jones, who has left ſtanding monuments of his ingenuity in ſeveral parts of the metropolis.

This great man was born in 1572 in London, where his father was a citizen and clothworker. His natural inclination leading him to the ſtudy of the arts of drawing and deſigning, the earl of Pembroke took him into his patronage, and ſent him, at his own expence, into Italy, and other polite parts of Europe. He ſpent many years in completing his education, and reſided a conſiderable time in the city of Venice; from whence Chriſtian IV. king of Denmark ſent for him, and appointed him his architect-general. He returned home in 1606, and was made architect to prince Henry; ſoon after which the king gave him the reverſion of the place of ſurveyor-general of his works. In 1612 he made a ſecond tour to Italy, and continued ſome years there till the ſurveyor's place fell to him. A ſhort time after his arrival, the office of works being found ſeveral thouſand pounds in debt, he voluntarily gave up his own dues, and prevaile with the comptroller and paymaſter to do the lik whereby the whole arrears were entirely cleared.
1620 the king ordered him to take a ſurvey of th ſurpriſing group of ſtones on Saliſbury Plain, con nonly called Stonehenge, and to draw up an accou of it. The ſame year he was appointed one of t commiſſioners for repairing the cathedral of St. Pau London. He formed that ſtately and elegant pavilio the Banqueting-houſe at Whitehall, which was at fi deſigned for the reception of foreign ambaſſado
To him alſo we owe the church and piazza of Cove pars of the capital. He ſuffered in his fortune by loyalty to his royal maſter Charles I. He died 1652, and was interred in the chancel of St. Be

BOOK XII.

The REPUBLIC, or COMMONWEALTH, containing a period of Eleven Year from the Death of Charles I. to the Reſtoration of Charles II.

THE death of Charles was not more deſtructive to his family than to the conſtitution. For ſeveral days, even before his condemnation, the commons were employed in preparing acts for aboliſhing monarchy, and erecting a republican government on its ruins; and on the very day of his execution they publiſhed the following proclamation:

"Whereas Charles Stuart, king of England, being, for the notorious treaſons, tyrannies and murders, committed by him in the late unnatural and cruel wars, condemned to death; whereupon, after execution of the ſame, ſeveral pretences may be made, and claims ſet on foot to the kingly office, to the apparent hazard of the public peace; for prevention whereof be it enacted and ordained by this preſent parliament, and by the authority of the ſame, that no perſon or perſons whomſoever do preſume to proclaim, declare, or publiſh, or any ways promote Charles Stuart, the ſon of the ſaid Charles, commonly called the prince of Wales, or any other perſon, to be king, or chief magiſtrate of England, or of Ireland, or of any of the dominions belonging to them, or either of them, by colour of inheritance, ſucceſſion, election, or any other claim whatſoever, without the free conſent of the people in parliament firſt had, or ſignified by a particular act or ordinance for that purpoſe; any ſtatute, law, uſage, or cuſtom to the contrary hereof, in any wiſe notwithſtanding.

"And be it farther enacted and ordained, and it is hereby enacted and ordained, that whoſoever, contrary to this act ſhall proclaim, publiſh, or any way promote the ſaid Charles Stuart the ſon, or any other perſon, to be king, or chief magiſtrate of England, or of Ireland, or of any of the dominions belonging to them, or to either of them, without the ſaid conſent in parliament ſignified as aforeſaid, ſhall be deemed and adjudged a traitor to the commonwealth, and ſhall ſuffer the pains of death, and ſuch other puniſhments as belong to the crime of high-treaſon. And all officers, as well civil as military, and all other well-affected perſons, are hereby authorized and required to apprehend all ſuch offenders, and to bring them in ſafe cuſtody to the next juſtice of ſafe peace; the advancement of the true proteſtant religion, and the liberal maintaining of a godly miniſtry; the ſettling of treaties and alliances with foreign princes and eſtates; the encouragement of the manufactories, for the increaſe and flouriſhing of trade, and the maintaining of the poor in all places of the land.

To render the model of their government perfect, they aboliſhed all the antient forms of ſovereignty in the ſtyle and teſts of writs, commiſſions, and other public inſtruments; and ordered for the future all of them to be iſſued, “ in the names of the keepers of “ the liberties of England, by authority of parlia“ ment.” They then formed a new great ſeal, having on one ſide a red croſs and harp quartered, as the arms of England and Ireland, with this inſcription, The Great Seal of England; and on the other, the repreſentation of the houſe of commons aſſembled, with this legend, In the first year of freedom, by God's blessing restored, MDCXLVIII. And, as another enſign of their power, they appointed that all the money, which from that time was to be coined, ſhould, inſtead of the impreſſion, bear the croſs and harp, with this motto, God with us. The clauſes in the firſt of Elizabeth, and the third of James I. which enjoined taking the oaths of ſupremacy and allegiance to the king and his ſucceſſors, were now repealed, and a new oath called the Engagement, was enjoined to be taken by all who were put into places of public truſt “ to be “ true and faithful to the government eſtabliſhed, “ without king or houſe of peers.” The antient, judicial and legiſlative power of the king and both houſes of parliament they aſſumed to themſelves, but the executive part of government they committed to a council of ſtate conſiſting of thirty-nine perſons; to theſe all addreſſes were to be made, and by theſe orders were given to all generals and admirals; and they digeſted all buſineſs before it was introduced into parliament.

The landmarks of the conſtitution being thus removed, no man knew upon what foundation his property ſtood; and moſt of the judges, together with many of the ſheriffs and juſtices of the peace, refuſed to act under the new government. Cromwell was not diſpleaſed at their refuſal, becauſe it enforced the neceſſity of keeping up a numerous army, and of proceeding by martial inſtead of municipal law. Hewſon, one of the colonels, very properly obſerved, that the ſoldiers could hang twenty with leſs difficulty than the magiſtrates could hang one. This introduction of martial law rendered Cromwell abſolute in the government: he took poſſeſſion of the king's rooms of ſtate at Whitehall; he diſpoſed of civil property by his warrant; and he had his officers always at command, to preſent to the houſe ſuch forms and alterations, both in the civil and military departments in government, as he thought proper; and whatever he pleaſed to preſcribe was always approved of by the commons and the council of ſtate. He met, however, with a very ſtrong oppoſition from lieutenant-colonel Lilburn, a very abuſive and turbulent man, and he was ſent immediately to priſon. The women aſſembled in troops, and demanded his enlargement. They were told to take care of their families, and leave the government of the ſtate to the men. The preſbyterians, the peers, and the ſecluded members alſo joined in the oppoſition, and filled the kingdom with the moſt ſevere invectives againſt the new government; and ſome had even the boldneſs to diſperſe papers, proclaiming the prince of Wales to be king of England, under the title of Charles II. an appellation by which we muſt now diſtinguiſh

In the month of March came on before the High Court of Juſtice, (of which Bradſhaw was preſident) the trials of the duke of Hamilton, the earl of Norwich and Holland, the lord Capel, and Sir John Owen; when they were all found guilty, and received ſentence of death. Hamilton and Capel made their eſcape, but were retaken: the former might have ſaved his life, but was honeſt enough to refuſe it, as it was only offered at the expence of his honour. Great intereſt was uſed to ſave them all. Capel had joined early in oppoſition to the king; Hamilton had ſerved the parliament; and Holland had been, by turns, the friend and ſlave of the faction: the other two had no merits to plead; yet the three former ſuffered, while the two latter were ſaved. Hamilton died becauſe he refuſed to betray his friend; Holland, on account of his apoſtacy in deſerting the cauſe he had ſo long defended; and Cromwell frankly ſaid, Capel had ſo many virtues, that his life was incompatible with the ſafety of the new government.

During the diviſions of the ſtate, after the death of the king, the Scotch commiſſioners had entered a ſtrong proteſt againſt the proceedings of the commons, with regard to the trial of their late ſovereign, and they now received orders to quit England, without taking leave of the faction. In conſequence of this, they wrote a ſpirited letter to the commons, who voted, that it was a ſcandalous and reproachful libel againſt the juſt proceedings of parliament, intended to lay the foundations for a new and bloody war; and that all who ſupported them ſhould be conſidered as traitors and rebels to their country. But Cromwell, willing to avoid, if poſſible, a rupture with Scotland, at that critical juncture, procured a vote in parliament, that the commiſſioners ſhould be ſent to Scotland under a guard. The fate of that kingdom was now deplorable. Rent with factions, and diſtracted with fanatical enthuſiaſm, no meaſure founded on reaſon and the rules of policy could be taken. The body of the people abhorred the Engliſh faction, who had put their king to death, and were unanimous for proclaiming his ſon, and placing him on the throne of his anceſtors; but they differed with regard to the terms on which the ſovereignty ſhould be offered. The violent preſbyterians, headed by Argyle, were for obliging him to obſerve every article of the covenant, and even previous to their ſending any invitation, to oblige him to ſign it, to ſubmit implicitly to their church cenſures, to renounce the ſins of his father's houſe, the iniquity of his mother, and to ſubmit to ſeveral other mortifications that even a private gentleman would have refuſed. The covenanting royaliſts, as well as the epiſcopalians, were for proclaiming the king without obliging him to ſign any conditions. The earls of Lauderdale and Laneric, now duke of Hamilton, were at this time with Charles at the Hague, where he kept up the appearance of a court, though his affairs were in a deſperate condition. The prince and princeſs of Orange wiſhed well to his intereſt, but the ſelfiſh maxims of the Dutch republic rendered it impoſſible to ſerve him effectually.

The higheſt expectations were formed of Charles, who was now about nineteen years of age. He had behaved with the utmoſt tenderneſs towards his father and his family; he had, with a prudence far above his years, reconciled to his ſervice all the different members of his council; and had ſhewn great ſpirit on all occaſions, as well as a cloſe application to buſineſs. He had hitherto enjoyed very few opportunities of improving himſelf by reading, and the perſons intruſted with his education by his father were but ill qualified to improve him by their converſation, and ſtill leſs by their inſtructions.

Intimation had been ſeveral times given by the ſtates-general, that their affairs would not permit them to come to a rupture with the ruling powers of England; and Charles knew not where to retire for protection. During this diſagreeable ſuſpence, the gallant marquis of Montroſe appeared, with magnificent equipages, and a ſmall number of choſen friends, at the court of Charles. His ſentiments were very different from thoſe of the other counſellors. He thought all treaties with rebels to be diſhonourable; that the king ought to throw himſelf upon the friendſhip of his brother monarchs and the affections of his loyal ſubjects; undertaking himſelf, with very ſmall aſſiſtance, to ſeat him on the Scottiſh throne. The great actions Montroſe had already performed, his majeſtic deportment, and his unmerited ſufferings for the royal cauſe, inſpired all who approached him with impreſſions of awe, of love, and of pity. Though he was almoſt ſingle in his ſentiments, none ventured to oppoſe him; and his own countrymen regarded him as the genius of injured majeſty.

Farther intimation being given to Charles that it was the deſire of the ſtates-general he ſhould leave the Hague, it was reſolved in council that he ſhould retire to France, as he might from thence, with the greater facility, paſs over into ſome part of his own dominions. He accordingly left Holland in the month of April, and proceeded to St. Germains, where his mother then reſided. He was received with great politeneſs in all the towns of Flanders through which he paſſed, and with as much ſtate by the young king of France, as if he had been actually in poſſeſſion of the Engliſh crown. But theſe civilities flowed entirely from a commiſeration of his misfortunes, which was ſo ſtrong with the public, that cardinal Mazarine, and the queen regent of France, did not think fit to reſtrain them. No effectual aſſiſtance, however, could be obtained; an aſylum was the only protection that could be expected by the fugitive monarch.

The affairs of Ireland ſeemed to diſplay a dawn of ſucceſs to the royal cauſe. The marquis of Ormond was at the head of a conſiderable party devoted to Charles; and though the Iriſh, at the inſtigation of the pope's nuncio, had again taken up arms againſt the Engliſh, they were now ſincerely united with the royaliſts. Had Charles appeared at the head of his army, there is no doubt but the whole kingdom would have declared in his favour; but the want of his preſence and money were great obſtacles to the ſucceſs of Ormond. That ſpirited general, however, made himſelf maſter of Drogheda, with other conſiderable garriſoned towns, and laid ſiege to Dublin, where Jones, the general of the parliament's forces, had been obliged to ſhut himſelf up.

The Engliſh government was now ſufficiently alarmed, and Cromwell, at his own requeſt, was appointed to command the troops intended to be ſent againſt the royaliſts in Ireland. Prince Rupert, ever ſince the fleet deſerted to the prince of Wales, had commanded a conſiderable ſquadron, and taken ſeveral rich prizes. Dunkirk and Oſtend alſo ſwarmed with privateers that acted under commiſſions granted by Charles. The natural remedy for this evil was to fit out a ſuperior fleet; but it was not eaſy to determine who ſhould command it. At length, after various debates and conſultations, it was reſolved to give it to Blake, Popham and Deane. The navy was ſoon in ſo reſpectable a condition, that the Engliſh channel was cleared of thoſe privateers that had ſo greatly obſtructed the commerce of the kingdom; and prince Rupert himſelf was blocked up in the harbour of Kinſale, by a ſquadron under the command of Blake and Deane.

It appears rather ſtrange that Cromwell ſhould undertake to head the expedition againſt the Iriſh in perſon, before the affairs of government were ſettled on a ſolid baſis. But his conduct was directed by wiſe maxims. He knew that power could only be maintained by the ſame meaſures by which it had been acquired. The dangerous ſpirit of levelling was far from being deſtroyed in the army; and this, with all other cautions, could only be cured by finding full employment for the ſoldiers. Cromwell promiſed himſelf great advantages from the ſpirit and temper of his ſoldiers returning from foreign conqueſt, when they had loſt all tenderneſs for their mother-country, and regarded no will but that of their general. He was ſenſible that it was abſolutely neceſſary to reduce Ireland, as it lay very convenient for receiving aſſiſtance and ſupplies from the Roman catholic powers, particularly from Spain, whoſe friendſhip the parliament had as yet great reaſon to diſtruſt. Beſides theſe motives, Cromwell flattered himſelf with extending the fame of his military atchievements, and of revenging himſelf on the marquis of Ormond, and other royaliſts in Ireland, who had accuſed him of being the ſole cauſe of the king's death.

Before, however, Cromwell led his troops againſt the Iriſh, he was determined to deſtroy that ſpirit of levelling which was now ſo prevalent in the army, and which, if not cruſhed in the bud, muſt undermine the baſis of his authority. One Thompſon, a bold, intrepid trooper, headed the levellers, who appointed their rendezvous to be held at Banbury in Oxfordſhire. Some of the regiments that had been appointed to go to Ireland mutinied about the ſame time, particularly thoſe commanded by Ireton, Scroop and Reynolds. Thompſon ſoon found himſelf at the head of two hundred horſe, and expected daily to be joined by ſo large a body of mutineers, as would enable him to ſet the government at defiance.

The artful Cromwell prevailed upon Fairfax to accompany him in the diſagreeable ſervice of reducing the levellers. They reached Banbury ſoon enough to prevent the mutineers from uniting into a body, and Fairfax, directing his march to Burford, made 4000 of them priſoners. This ſucceſs rendered the whole deſign of the levellers abortive, Thompſon himſel being killed in the conflict.

The mutiny being quelled, the parliament paſſed an act, declaring it treaſon in any one "to affirm that the preſent government is tyrannical, uſurped o unlawful, or that the commons in parliament are no the ſupreme authority; or to endeavour to alter th preſent government; or to affirm the ſame of th council of ſtate; to contrive the death of the gene ral or lieutenant-general of the army; to raiſe mutiny among the ſoldiers; to join with thoſe wh invade England or Ireland; to level war againſt th parliament; to counterfeit the great ſeal; or to ki any member of parliament, judge, or miniſter justice."

About the middle of May the army under Crom well was ready to embark for Ireland. The news this expedition determined the king, who was by th time heartily tired of the court of France, to reti to Jerſey, the only ſpot he now inherited of all h large paternal dominions, and where he had alrea been proclaimed by the loyal governor Sir Georg Carteret. This was, doubtleſs, placing his fortu on a very ſlender foundation; but it was the wiſe meaſure he could purſue in this critical conjunctur when the courts of France and Spain, notwithſtan ing all their pretended deteſtation of the rebels pr ceedings, only ſought to make the beſt advanta they could of their being poſſeſſed of his perſo The king of Denmark, and a few of the Germ princes, were, indeed, ſincere in their endeavours to ſerve him; but they wanted money ſufficient to fit out a fleet to face the Engliſh.

The marquis of Ormond had carried on the ſiege of Dublin with great vigour, and the garriſon was now reduced to the moſt abject diſtreſs. Cromwell knew the importance of ſaving the capital, and ſent over immediately 3000 of his beſt troops, who landed under the favour of a ſquadron commanded by Sir George Aſkew, juſt at a time when Jones was going to capitulate. This reinforcement, together with a large quantity of proviſions and ſtores landed at the ſame time, animated with new vigour the parliamentary garriſon. They made a furious ſally upon the royaliſts, drove them from their trenches, and obliged them to retreat over the river with great precipitation.

Ormond now fortified his camp, and reſolved to wait the arrival of ſome reinforcements he every day expected. But the fortune of Cromwell bore down all oppoſition. Being inveſted with the ſole command, both civil and military, in Ireland, the very magic of his name brought thouſands of ſoldiers to his ſtandard; ſo that in a few days after his coming to his camp, he found himſelf at the head of a large army of veterans, from whoſe courage and experience he promiſed himſelf a plentiful harveſt of glory. His military cheſt was well furniſhed with money, his ſoldiers with arms, and his camp with artillery, ſtores and proviſions; while the confidence of the ſoldiers in the abilities and intrepidity of their general rendered them almoſt invincible.

Cromwell embarked his forces at Milford-haven; but, for want of a ſufficient number of tranſports, he was obliged to leave three regiments behind him. He landed at Dublin, after a ſhort paſſage, at the head of 15,000 men, and immediately diſpatched a letter to England for a reinforcement.

Ormond had made Sir Arthur Aſton, who formerly commanded at Reading, governor of Drogheda, one of the ſtrongeſt places in Ireland, and garriſoned the place with the flower of his troops, hoping it would be able to hold out for a month at leaſt; during which he propoſed to march his army from the neighbourhood of Dublin, in order to re- ruit his forces. But before Ormond could aſſemble is different diviſions, Drogheda was inveſted with n army of 12000 men. Cromwell knew that the royaliſts depended chiefly on the defence of this lace, and therefore exerted all his power to take it. The garriſon made a very obſtinate defence, but the own was at laſt taken by ſtorm, and every one that ppeared in arms put to the ſword. This ſucceſs was hiefly owing to the perſonal courage of Cromwell, ho perceiving his men diſheartened by the gallant ſiſtance of the garriſon, and the death of colonel aſtle, one of their beſt officers, repaired to the reach, and led his troops to the attack with ſo much ry, that the Iriſh were ſeized with a panic, and ed with a deſpondency that would have diſhonoured omen; they made no farther reſiſtance, but tamely ffered themſelves to be put to death by the ſwords the Engliſh, who conſidered it as impiety to ſuffer of them to live. The whole war, indeed, was rried on with a cruelty which reflects eternal diſce on the victors: the Iriſh were treated with innal barbarity; no quarter was given them, either ſea or land; and they were generally excepted out all treaties and capitulations.

The royaliſts were ſo intimidated at the loſs of ogheda, that they abandoned Trym and Dundalk. nalis was taken by ſtorm; Wicklow ſubmitted; Cromwell marched his army into Munſter, where met with very little oppoſition. The dreadful cution at Drogheda ſtruck all his oppoſers with deſpair. Lord Inchiquin's officers and ſoldiers deſerted in great numbers; and the city of Cork was baſely ſurrendered by the governor at a time when Cromwell was in no condition to have undertaken a ſiege.

But notwithſtanding Cromwell's ſucceſs, a very ſtrong ferment was excited againſt his principles in the Engliſh parliament. Fortunately for him, the marquis of Ormond, by forming a kind of coalition with the Iriſh papiſts, and taking many of them into his ſervice, rendered the royal cauſe in Ireland unpopular, even among the Engliſh preſbyterians, and tended to increaſe the importance of Cromwell's ſucceſs. They, however, took advantage of his abſence to paſs ſome votes in parliament for moderating the exceſſive ſeverities propoſed againſt the delinquents. The army remonſtrated ſtrongly againſt theſe proceedings, but in vain; even their threats were diſregarded.

The loyaliſts ſtill continued under the infatuation that they ſhould yet be able to reſtore the king to his rights, and place him on the throne of his anceſtors. They were even weak enough to imagine, that the ſpirit of levelling, which ſtill continued in the army, might be uſeful to their cauſe; and accordingly diſperſed themſelves in different parts of the nation, joined the levellers, and ſpirited them up againſt the government. The effects of this prepoſterous conduct were ſome childiſh inſurrections, in which ſeveral of them periſhed for a cauſe, they, in their hearts, deteſted.

Colonel Pride, who had been remarkably active in all the mad, fanatical actions of the times, now became the head of a party, who inſiſted that to put any man to death for theft alone was abſolute murder. This ridiculous opinion was carried to ſuch a height, that they preſented petitions to the council of ſtate againſt all executions of that kind; and ſuch regard was paid to their interceſſions, that the lord mayor and his independent brethren were impowered to change the ſentence of death into that of baniſhment, and many felons were accordingly ſent to the American colonies.

A. D. 1650. The Scots, from a retroſpective view of the diſtractions that had prevailed in England ſince the captivity of the king, were very deſirous of being again governed by a prince deſcended from their antient kings. The demerits of the firſt Charles were almoſt forgotten, and his ſon had done nothing to induce them to believe he inherited his father's inflexibility with regard to religion. Even the marquis of Argyle, and his violent covenanters, were not averſe to monarchical government, provided the king embraced their tenets of religion. Argyle well knew that the reſtoration of Charles was incompatible with the engagements he had entered into with Cromwell, on whom he chiefly depended for protection againſt the ſeveral factions formed in his country; but he hoped that if Charles was reſtored he would be nothing better than the ſhadow of a king, a mere name without authority; or that ſome incident might happen to prevent his landing in Scotland, notwithſtanding the preſſing invitations he had received from the inhabitants of that kingdom. The ſpies maintained by Cromwell at the court of Charles informed him thoroughly of the ſtate of parties formed among the king's friends; and that he wiſhed rather to be reſtored by Montroſe, and the epiſcopal royaliſts, than by either the preſbyterian or independent party.

Charles, convinced that Ireland could now afford him no aſſiſtance, turned his whole thoughts towards Scotland, as the only part of his dominions where he could hope to be protected. The terms offered by the rigid covenanters were, indeed, highly diſagreeable; but he thought proper to open a conference with Winram, who had been ſent from Scotland to Jerſey with the following propoſitions:

1. That the king ſhould ſign the covenant, and paſs an act for giving liberty to all that pleaſed to ſign it, and for ratifying all that had been done in Scotland on that ſubject.

2. That he ſhould give the royal aſſent to ſeveral acts which had been ratified in the two laſt ſeſſions of the Scottiſh parliament; and that the kings of Scotland ſhould, for the future, have no negative voice in that aſſembly.

3. That he ſhould recall his commiſſions given to Montroſe, for raiſing forces to be ſent into Scotland, and put a final ſtop to his proceedings.

4. That he ſhould put away all papiſts from about his perſon, and let known proteſtants only have ſeats in his council.

5. That ſome place, either in or near Holland, ſhould be appointed to treat with commiſſioners from the ſtates of Scotland, who would be ſent thither, where every thing be provided neceſſary for him in a legal manner.

6. That a ſpeedy anſwer ſhould be given to theſe deſires.

This is the mildeſt form of the Scottiſh conditions; for they were afterwards loaded with many odious particulars againſt the friends of the royal family in both kingdoms, and with many intolerable indignities to the perſon of Charles himſelf. In matters of religion, the young king was the very reverſe of his father. He conſidered the different forms of worſhip and church-government among chriſtians as ſo many different faſhions of the ſame cloak. He was, indeed, fondeſt of epiſcopacy, but merely becauſe he thought it better adapted to monarchy. His education had not greatly contributed to fix his principles with regard to any one ſect. During his infancy, he he had been chiefly inſtructed by the perſons about the queen, who treated the church of England with more contempt than even preſbytery itſelf. They ridiculed, in private, the moſt celebrated divines of the church of England: while the pomp of their own worſhip, and their irregularity of their lives, implanted prejudices in the mind of Charles which were never obliterated, though they ſeldom carried him farther than to prefer the form of worſhip practiſed in the Roman to that uſed in the Engliſh church. But though he was not ſtrongly prejudiced againſt any religion, yet every thing contributed to give him the greateſt averſion to the covenant. He, however, determined to receive the Scottiſh commiſſioners, and the city of Breda was appointed for that purpoſe.

During theſe tranſactions the marquis of Montroſe haſtened his preparations for landing in Scotland, and determined to exert all his power to place the king on the throne of his anceſtors, without his ſigning any conditions. He had been encouraged by great promiſes of aſſiſtance from the courts of Denmark and Sweden, where many excellent Scotch officers, well affected to the king, had ſerved with great reputation; but his impatience and loyalty would not ſuffer him to remain any longer inactive; and he landed, in the beginning of April, in the northern parts of Scotland, accompanied only by a ſmall number of German ſoldiers. He had flattered himſelf with being joined by a number of his countrymen, but he was diſappointed; no forces appeared to join his ſtandard; and he was ſoon after ſurpriſed and taken priſoner by his countrymen. The fanatical Scots looked upon this great man only in the light of an impious excommunicated perſon, who was a rebel to the covenant. He ſuffered the moſt horrid indignities, and was condemned to be hanged. The ſentence ran, that his head ſhould be nailed to the door of the priſon, his legs and arms fixed up in the four principal towns of the kingdom, and his body interred with malefactors, unleſs his repentance induced the Scotch divines to take off the excommunication. "I am more proud," ſaid he to the preſbyterian miniſters, "to have my head nailed to the place mentioned in the ſentence, than I ſhould to have my picture hung up in the king's chamber. Far from being diſturbed at having my legs and my arms ſent to the four principal towns of the kingdom, I wiſh I had limbs enough to diſperſe through all the towns in Chriſtendom, in teſtimony of the cauſe for which I am condemned." In the evening he put theſe ſentiments into verſe, and died, as he had lived, like a hero. He was in the flower of his age when the jaws of fanaticiſm ſnatched him from his king and his country.

While theſe things were tranſacting in Scotland, the conferences were opened at Breda. Charles diſputed every propoſition offered by the Scottiſh commiſſioners, till he was informed of the defeat and death of Montroſe, when he no longer made any oppoſition, but agreed at once to all their demands. The treaty being thus concluded, Charles embarked on board a ſmall ſquadron of ſhips, and purſued his voyage towards Scotland. Before they reached their intended port, the Scottiſh commiſſioners produced freſh articles, by which they inſiſted on ſtill greater ſacrifices than any Charles had hitherto made. This gave Charles ſo much uneaſineſs, that he threatened to land in Denmark, rather than make ſuch degrading ſubmiſſions. His wiſeſt counſellors were, however of a different opinion; and Charles, fearing he might be intercepted by ſome of the parliament's ſhips, purſued his courſe, and landed ſafely in an obſcure part of Scotland.

Charles was immediately given to underſtand tha he muſt expect no aſſiſtance in that kingdom, unle he ſigned the covenant, and diſmiſſed from his pre ſence all perſons who were obnoxious to their parlia ment. Charles was obliged to comply. The Scotc covenanting royaliſts retired from the ſtorm. Som of the Engliſh fled back to the continent; and othe were lodged in the houſes of the king's friends, bu at a diſtance from his perſon. Buckingham alon for whom the king entertained the ſincereſt friendſhi was ſuffered to be with him. Notwithſtanding the precautions, the people in general ſhewed a ſurpriſin alacrity for his ſervice; they flocked to his ſtandar in every part of the kingdom. Argyle was care that Charles ſhould want nothing of the reſpect attendance that had been paid to his anceſtors, a endeavoured to give him juſt notions of his ow intereſt; but, at the ſame time, ſuffered him to e ercife no perſonal acts of power, nor to have a voice in the management of public affairs.

All parts of England were now filled with proaches againſt the conduct of parliament, and ſome places inſurrections actually happened whi were not ſuppreſſed without difficulty. Charles, b fore he left Holland, had ſigned many commiſſio for officers and agents to act for him in England, a theſe were ſo active, and their endeavours ſo impr dently bold, that the council of ſtate thought no ti ſhould be loſt in recalling the general from Irela Cromwell had by this time ſo fully eſtabliſhed his putation, that he made no difficulty in accepting invitation, and, having made Ireton his deputy, returned to England. He was received by the p liament with all the honours due to his eminent vices, and as no time was to be loſt, the affairs of Sc land were immediately taken into conſideration. T preſbyterian party had made ſeveral attempts to o a correſpondence with their brethren in Scotlan but their meſſengers had always been intercepted the troops who were ſtationed on the confines of the two kingdoms.

Fairfax had ſtill great intereſt, both in the army and parliament, but Cromwell was unwilling to truſt either his principles or ambition in the Scottiſh war; and he accordingly procured a vote in parliament, that both himſelf and Fairfax ſhould command againſt the Scots; and that Fairfax ſhould receive a new commiſſion from the houſe for that purpoſe. In the mean time the council of ſtate received orders to prepare every thing neceſſary for the immediate march of the army. Fairfax, however, thought proper to refuſe the offer, and to reſign his commiſſion. This was, in reality, what Cromwell wanted; he had now no ſuperior in the army, and he feared no oppoſition in parliament. He, however, thought proper to publiſh a declaration in order to remove the ſcruples of the preſbyterians, who loudly exclaimed againſt the pretended invaſion of Scotland. This paper declared, that though it was intended to carry the Engliſh arms into Scotland, a defenſive war only was deſigned; and that this method was taken merely to prevent an invaſion of England.

On the 29th of June Cromwell left the Engliſh capital and directed his march towards Scotland: he had no doubt of beating the Scotch if he could induce them to fight, but he thought the whole difficulty conſiſted in bringing on a general engagement. But though he looked with contempt upon the forces of Scotland, he knew that it was abſolutely neceſſary to drive Charles out of that kingdom; becauſe while he reſided there in a royal capacity, his party in England continued to increaſe, and others were preparing to raiſe an inſurrection in England as ſoon as his army ſhould paſs the borders.

As the royal party were ſtrenuous for the reſtoration of the king, Argyle knew that ſuch a meaſure would be inconſiſtent with his own ſafety, unleſs the king greatly reformed his diſpoſition. He therefore endeavoured to give Charles right notions with reſpect to government, and to his own intereſt; but the heart of the young king was already debauched, and his prejudices againſt the covenanters had taught him to conſider them only as a company of mad enthuſiaſts. The king was, indeed, charmed with the politeneſs of Argyle's behaviour, his elegant manners, and inſtructive converſation; but he could not digeſt his confinement; nor did Argyle think it prudent to truſt him with the management of himſelf. But the mortifications he met with from Argyle were nothing when compared to thoſe he was obliged to ſuffer from the zealots. The general aſſembly, and afterwards the committee of eſtates, together with the army, who were entirely govrned by the aſſembly, publiſhed a declaration, in which they proteſted, "That they did not eſpouſe any malignant quarrel or party, but fought merely on their former grounds or principles; that they diſclaimed all the ſins and guilt of the king and his houſe; nor would they own him or his intereſt, otherwiſe than with a ſubordination to God, and ſo far as he owned and proſecuted the cauſe of God, and acknowledged the ſins of his houſe, and of his former ways."

No annotations were neceſſary to this declaration. The king knew he was entirely at their mercy, and muſt ſubmit to every thing they propoſed. He iſſued a declaration in the very terms they required; he gave thanks for the merciful diſpenſations of providence, by which he was recovered from the ſnare of evil councils, had attained a full perſuaſion of the righteouſneſs of the covenant, and was induced to caſt both himſelf and his intereſt wholly upon God. He deſired to be deeply humbled and afflicted in ſpirit, becauſe of his father's following evil councils, oppoſing the covenant, and the work of reformation, and ſhedding the blood of God's people in every part of his dominions. He lamented the idolatry of his mother, and the toleration of it in his father's houſe: a matter of great offence, he ſaid, to all the proteſtant churches, and a great provocation to him who is a jealous God, viſiting the ſins of the fathers upon the children. He profeſſed that he would have no enemies but the enemies of the covenant; and that he deteſted all popery, ſuperſtition, prelacy, hereſy, ſchiſm and profaneneſs; and was reſolved not to tolerate, much leſs to countenance, any of them in any part of his dominions. He declared that he would neither love nor favour any who have ſo little conſcience as to follow his intereſts, in preference to the goſpel and kingdom of Jeſus Chriſt. And he expreſſed his hope, that whatever ill ſucceſs his former guilt might have drawn upon his cauſe, yet having now obtained mercy to be on God's ſide, and to acknowledge his own cauſe ſubordinate to that of God, the Divine Providence would crown his arms with victory.

The pride of the king being thus vanquiſhed, and the crown placed in ſubordination to the altar, the Scottiſh clergy pointed their ſpiritual inſtruments againſt the invaders of their country. They repreſented Cromwell as an incarnate devil, and his ſoldiers as ſo many monſters of blood and cruelty, who were ordered to put all the Scots to the ſword without any regard to age, condition, or ſex. This had the deſired effect. The ſouthern parts of Scotland were in an inſtant depopulated, the inhabitants flying to the northward for ſhelter and protection. Cromwell was aſtoniſhed when he paſſed the borders to find he was going to enter a deſolate wilderneſs, where it would be impoſſible to procure proviſions for his army. He was, indeed, attended by a fleet, but ſupplies from them were difficult and precarious. The only method that ſeemed to offer ſucceſs was to publiſh a declaration, that he was not to come to deſolate the country, but to ſupport them in their civil and religious rights and privileges. He alſo was very careful to treat all the Scots that fell into his hands with unuſual kindneſs. But all his attempts to gain the favour of the inhabitants were in vain: they fled from him, as from a peſtilence, and he advanced towards Dunbar under infinite difficulties. For by this time a conſiderable party of Scots had put themſelves between his fleet and army, ſo that he ſaw himſelf in danger of periſhing by famine.

The Engliſh army conſiſted of about 18,000 men; and that of the Scots, which was commanded by general Leſley, of about 20,000, beſides a great multitude of irregulars. The Scots were poſſeſſed of Edinburgh, and their army poſted ſo advantageouſly near that city, that it could not be attacked. Cromwell ſaw this and was fearful for the event; he perceived only but a diſmal proſpect of famine; for the ſtormy weather prevented him from receiving any proviſions from his ſhips. He ſtill endeavoured by acts of humanity to the Scots who fell into his hands, and by doing juſtice to his own ſoldiers, who were fond of plundering the country, to make a party among the enemy, but without ſucceſs; and their preachers began already to triumph from the pulpits, that the Engliſh army was on the point of being deſtroyed.

Cromwell now advanced towards the Scottiſh camp, and endeavoured, by every expedient, to provoke Leſley to a battle; but that general well knew, that though his army was much ſuperior in numbers, his forces were far inferior to the Engliſh in diſcipline and experience; and therefore carefully kept himſelf within the intrenchments of his camp. He, however, endeavoured to confirm the ſpirits of his ſoldiers by ſmall ſkirmiſhes with the enemy, and was generally ſucceſsful. His army increaſed daily both in numbers and courage. The king came to the camp, and having exerted himſelf in one of theſe rencounters, gained extremely on the affections of the ſoldiery, who were far more deſirous of ſerving under a young prince of ſpirit, than a committee of preaching gownſmen. This produced a fatal effect, they cauſed the king to leave the camp; and at the ſame time purged the army of near 4000 malignants, whoſe zeal for the royal cauſe had led them to attend their prince, and were all of them ſoldiers of credit and experience. They ſaid they had no need of the aſſiſtance of the ungodly, their army being entirely compoſed of ſaints, who could not be conquered by the arm of fleſh.

Finding there was no likelihood of bringing the cautious Leſley to a battle, Cromwell retired to Dunbar. Leſley immediately followed him, and encamped on the heights of Lammermure, which overlook that town. The Engliſh general hoped he ſhould now be able to accompliſh his purpoſe of forcing the Scots to leave the heights; but he ſoon perceived that this was impoſſible, and that Leſley had taken poſſeſſion of all the difficult paſſes between Dunbar and Berwick. Theſe diſcoveries almoſt drove Cromwell to deſpair. His army was in the utmoſt diſtreſs for want of proviſions, and he was on the point of forming a reſolution of embarking all his foot and artillery, and of breaking through with his horſe the different poſts poſſeſſed by the enemy in his route to Berwick. But the madneſs of the Scottiſh miniſters prevented him from putting this reſolution into practice; and of loſing at once all the honours he had acquired in ſo many campaigns.

The Scottiſh miniſters now fancied they had obtained the victory. They ſaid, Revelations had been made them from heaven, that the ſectarian and heretical army, together with Agag, their leader, would be delivered into their hands. The ſoldiers catched the flame of enthuſiaſm, and forced their general, notwithſtanding all his remonſtrances, to deſcend into the plain, and gather the laurels of victory promiſed their miniſters by the voice of heaven. Cromwell could hardly believe his eyes when he firſt perceived the Scottiſh camp in motion, and ventured to foretel, without any revelation from above, that the Lord had delivered his enemies into his hand.

The battle began in the morning of the 3d of September, and ſoon became general; but the diſpute was unequal. The Scots, though much more numerous than the Engliſh, were ſo far from ſtanding the ſhock of Cromwell's veterans, that they ſuffered themſelves to be cut to pieces, almoſt without reſiſtance. One regiment of Highlanders only behaved with reſolution: they were very little affected with the enthuſiaſm of their brethren, and did not rely on the miraculous interpoſition of heaven for aſſiſtance. They exerted their whole power, and for ſome time ſtopped the career of the Engliſh. But being abandoned by their friends, they were obliged to ſubmit to ſuperior force, and leave the field of battle to the enemy. Upwards of 4000 Scots were ſlain, and 10,000 taken priſoners; together with all their arms, ammunition, tents and baggage.

Cromwell, having thus obtained a complete victory, purſued his advantage, and took poſſeſſion of Edinburgh and Leith; while the remnant of the Scottiſh army fled to Stirling. But the approach of winter, and an intermitting fever with which he was ſeized, prevented him from advancing farther into the kingdom.

A. D. 1651. While Charles continued at the head of an army in Scotland, his ſervants and ambaſſadors abroad were treated with reſpect; and all the language of foreign courts, eſpecially that of France and Spain, expreſſed their deteſtation of the Engliſh rebels and regicides. But in reality, theſe two courts neither wiſhed nor endeavoured his reſtoration. The grand duke of Muſcovy, at once more barbarous and more generous, received Colepepper as an agent from Charles, and ſupplied him with a large ſum of money. The duke of Lorrain, though he had not a foot of land he could call his own, ſupplied Charles and his family with conſiderable ſums. The prince of Orange continued to be his faithful and uſeful friend, and a few of the German princes threw their mites into his treaſury. The king of Denmark aſſiſted him to the utmoſt of his power, but his kingdom was poor, and being inſulted by the Swedes, he was obliged to live in a precarious dependence on the Dutch. Chriſtiana, queen of Sweden, who cheriſhed the moſt diſtinguiſhed paſſion for every thing that was extraordinary either in war or literature, was now ſo charmed with the exploits of Cromwell, that ſhe entertained a kind of Platonic paſſion for his perſon, and recommended it to her council, and to the prince ſhe intended for her ſucceſſor, to avail themſelves of the friendſhip of England.

The Engliſh fleet was ſtill commanded by Blake, Dean and Popham, and was increaſed to more than double its former number; but the parliament was very uneaſy that prince Rupert and his ſquadron had found a kind reception in the harbours of Portugal. The truth is, the Portugueſe had at this time ſeveral very rich ſhips coming from the Brazils, which they were afraid might be intercepted by the fleets of the Engliſh parliament. The ſhips under the command of prince Rupert therefore promiſed to be of ſignal ſervice to the Portugueſe, and he had actually been invited thither before he left Ireland. In his paſſage, he loſt two or three of his beſt ſhips in a ſtorm; but he took a great many rich prizes, which he ſold, and generouſly remitted the money to Charles. Vane, who reſided at the court of Portugal, as agent from the Engliſh parliament, made vigorous remonſtrances on this ſubject; but they were not much regarded, and, at laſt, the court of Portugal declared itſelf a friend to Charles. Upon this the parliament ordered Blake to ſail immediately, with a ſtrong ſquadron, to the coaſt of Portugal, and demand that the fleet of prince Rupert ſhould be given up, as they were nothing better than rebels and pirates, and conſequently entitled neither to protection nor neutrality. If this was denied, Blake had inſtructions to deſtroy them where he could find them. On his arrival at the mouth of the river of Liſbon, he demanded the fleet of prince Rupert; but the court of Portugal was ſo far from complying, that the king declared he would ſuffer no more Engliſh ſhips to enter his ports or harbours, and Blake found himſelf in no condition to force his entrance. He was ſoon after joined by Popham; and the Portugueſe finding themſelves unable to ſupport the prince any longer, orders were ſent to him for quitting the Tagus, and he was fortunate enough to make his eſcape. Blake revenged this diſappointment on the king of Portugal, by taking twenty ſhips of his Brazil fleet; and it was not without great difficulty, and making many ſubmiſſions, that he obtained a peace with the Engliſh republic.

Though Cromwell had obtained a complete victory over the Scots, and had publickly ridiculed th Scottiſh miniſters, yet they were far from being cure of their fanatical madneſs. They had been very open in declaring, that they had taken up arms in defence of the covenant, not for the crown, and wer therefore equally hated by the royaliſts and independents. Thoſe jarring diſpoſitions had fatal effects o the royal ſervice. It was now ſufficiently evident that the covenanters neither could nor would reſtor the king; and the beſt officers he had to depend upo were royaliſts, who diſdaining the meanneſs and ſelf ſufficiency of the Scotch preſbyterians, refuſed t ſubmit to their diſcipline. The marquis of Argyle, would he have truſted the royaliſts, might have retrieved the late defeat; but the longer he converſed with Charles, the more reaſon he ſaw to diſtruſt him, and to keep a very watchful eye over his conduct. Charles had in his converſation ſomething bewitchingly ſoft: he talked to the Scots in their own language: his addreſs was eaſy and inſinuating; his perſon beautiful; and his underſtanding far ſuperior to what Argyle expected. But the marquis was convinced that he both deſpiſed and hated the covenanters; that all he did was from convenience or neceſſity; that he was tinctured with arbitrary principles; and that the misfortunes of his family had only taught him the art of diſſimulation, in order to re-eſtabliſh his power. Argyle could not avail himſelf of the aſſiſtance of either the epiſcopal or preſbyterian royaliſts: his bloody proceedings againſt Montroſe and his friends, who acted under the king's commiſſion, had ſtruck all mankind with horror. He ſaw the conſequences of his conduct, and trembled for the event, whenever the king ſhould be intruſted with the powers of royalty. He therefore treated Charles with more condeſcenſion, and removed ſeveral particulars which had rendered him very uneaſy.

Charles was not inſenſible of the cauſes that produced this relaxation, and began to exert ſome power with regard to his own affairs. His principal reſource lay in the affections of his friends: for when the revenues of the kingdom of Scotland were ſtated, they amounted to no more than 17,600l. to defray all the charges of his court and government. This poverty was owing to the rapaciouſneſs of the Scots themſelves, who, ever ſince the acceſſion of the Stuart family to the crown of England, had been in a manner quartered on the royal revenues, and had raiſed both fortunes and families from what they had extorted from the crown. But this was no time for reſumption; and Charles, at preſent, enjoyed a decent ſtate, and had about him the proper officers of the Scottiſh court. Charles now ventured to propoſe, at the council-board, proper perſons for commiſſions in his army; and ſeveral of the counſellors, knowing the king's inclinations, reſumed courage ſufficient to ſecond him, even without applying to Argyle for leave.

This coalition rendered the conqueſt of Scotland a work of more difficulty than Cromwell before imagined, conſidering the complete victory he had obtained at Dunbar. The caſtle of Edinburgh ſtill held out. Charles was in poſſeſſion of the paſs at Stirling, and behind him lay the moſt populous and beſt affected counties in Scotland; while the country where Cromwell lay had been eaten up, and the inhabitants looked upon his men as infernal dæmons. The king's levies were going on with great ſucceſs, and there was no doubt but he would ſoon be at the head of a much ſtronger army than that which had been defeated at Dunbar. Theſe circumſtances, and the increaſing averſion of the country towards his army, gave Cromwell infinite uneaſineſs. He endeavoured to reconcile the people to his perſon, by treating them with uncommon humanity in his marches. He ſent a meſſenger to the governor of Edinburgh caſtle, inviting the preachers to take again poſſeſſion of their pulpits, provided they meddled not with the civil affairs of the kingdom in their ſermons. This invitation was rejected with diſdain; and they treated his offers with the moſt diſtinguiſhed contempt.

While theſe things were tranſacting in Scotland, the independent faction at Weſtminſter were extremely careful to make every ſucceſs, either of their arms or councils, a kind of teſt for diſcovering their enemies. They ordered a thankſgiving to be obſerved for the advantages gained over the Scots at Dunbar. Many of the preſbyterians refuſed to obſerve it, and on that account were perſecuted with great ſeverity; but they were unfortunate in their proſecutions; hardly a jury could be found that would bring in their verdict, guilty. Another High Court of Juſtice was therefore eſtabliſhed for the counties of Norfolk, Suffolk, Huntingdon, Cambridge, Lincoln, and the Iſle of Ely. Orders were alſo iſſued, by Cromwell's direction, for raiſing new bodies of horſe and foot in every part of the kingdom: The pay of the officers and ſoldiers, both by ſea and land, was augmented; and the greateſt induſtry and punctuality obſerved in procuring ſupplies both for the fleet and army.

In conſequence of theſe augmentations it became neceſſary for the parliament to increaſe the revenues of the kingdom, and contributions were accordingly levied on the public to the amount of 100,000l. per month. They encouraged the importation of bullion: they impoſed a teſt, called An Engagement, upon all the people who lived under their government; by which they were obliged to ſwear fidelity to the commonwealth, as conſtituted without a king or houſe of lords. They alſo paſſed ſeveral other acts, all of them tending to encourage their friends, and terrify their enemies.

During theſe tranſactions in the Engliſh parliament, Cromwell was but very indifferently ſituated in Scotland. He was unable to attack Charles, whoſe army lay beyond the Forth, and who ſtill continued to keep poſſeſſion of Stirling. Cromwell's men began to be ſickly, he himſelf was in a very indifferent ſtate of health, the country round him was a deſart, and he had no opportunity of performing any remarkable action, that might revive the drooping courage of his ſoldiers.

Charles and the royaliſts had now attained a great aſcendancy in Scotland, and he had been crowned at Scone, with as much magnificence as the temper of the times and the impoveriſhed ſtate of the revenues would admit. The marquis of Argyle ſtill ſhewed great reſpect to his perſon, and had aſſiſted at his coronation, where the king was obliged again to take the covenant, and to liſten to many long ſpeeches and prayers from the pulpit. The duke of Hamilton was, however, now admitted to court; and both the parliament and general aſſembly declared, that in a time of ſuch imminent danger, there ſhould be no exception of perſons. This gave encouragement to the royaliſts, who now flocked from all quarters to the Engliſh ſtandard. The duke of Hamilton commanded under Charles, Leſley was lieutenant-general, Middleton major-general of the horſe, and Maſſey general of the Engliſh.

Cromwell, finding the royal army ſtill increaſing, ordered colonel Overton to croſs the Forth, at the head of 1600 foot and 300 horſe. Theſe were followed by major-general Lambert and colonel Okey, with another body of 1500 foot and 800 horſe; while he himſelf marched towards Stirling, in order either to bring the Scots to a battle, or force them to divide their army. But when he came in ſight of the Scottiſh camp, he found it too ſtrong to be attacked, and their officers too cautious to be drawn from their ſituation.

While both the main armies thus lay in ſight of each other, an engagement happened in Fiſe between the forces that had paſſed the Forth under Lambert, and a ſtrong detachment of the royaliſts, greatly to the diſadvantage of the latter, five of their regiments of foot, and the ſame number of horſe, being cut to pieces, and 1500 taken priſoners. Cromwell had foreſeen great advantages from Lambert's paſſing the Forth: it was, indeed, one of the moſt maſterly actions he ever performed; for he had imperceptibly ſtrengthened Lambert's party to ſeven thouſand men, by which he not only ſecured all the paſſes on the Forth, but put himſelf between the king and the northern provinces, on which the royaliſts chiefly depended.

The only alternative Charles now had was that of fighting Cromwell, or marching into England. He thought proper to chuſe the latter; by which means Cromwell became, as it were, maſter of Scotland, and his conqueſts in that kingdom were rapid and important. He made himſelf maſter of Perth, with all the adjacent country, and detached Lambert to hang on the rear of the king's army. But he thought the march of the royaliſts into England of too much importance to truſt the management of the war to any but himſelf; and accordingly, leaving general Monk to command in Scotland, he began his march in purſuit of the king, at the head of the main body of his army.

The king's beſt friends now entertained very melancholy preſages of the conſequences that would probably attend this march; and, from an excellent letter wrote by the duke of Hamilton to his niece, it appears to have been conſidered as a deſperate ſtep, and that the royaliſts daily deſerted from the army. But the preſbyterian party at Weſtminſter either conſidered, or affected to conſider, this matter in a very different light. The conduct of Cromwell was blamed; he was accuſed of forcing an enemy into the bowels of England, and of having trifled away his advantages in Scotland, till it was too late to retrieve them. Cromwell paid little regard to theſe calumnies; he left his actions to ſpeak for themſelves. His abſence, however, gave ſome advantage to his enemies; and they made great intereſt to ſave Love, a preſbyterian preacher, who had for ſome time continued under ſentence of death for being engaged in the ſervice of the king. But Cromwell, who well knew that one inſtance of ſeverity would have more effect upon the preſbyterians than twenty of lenity, refuſed their requeſt, and Love was accordingly executed. This ſeverity increaſed the hatred of the preſbyterians againſt Cromwell, and ſeveral warm ſpeeches were made againſt him in parliament, for ſuffering the royal army to enter England. Ignorant of the effect theſe prepoſſeſſions might have on the parliament, Cromwell, in his letters, very freely owned, that he had ſuffered the king to march into England, from a perſuaſion, that if the parliament did their parts in defending the moſt tenable paſſes, his whole army muſt be ruined; whereas a winter campaign in Scotland might have ruined that of the parliament.

Charles had flattered himſelf with obtaining conſiderable reinforcements on his entering England; but he now found himſelf greatly diſappointed. Terrified at ſo dangerous an enterprize, the Scots loſt their uſual courage, and deſerted in great numbers; while the Engliſh preſbyterians, having received no intelligence of the king's approach, were not prepared to join him. This meaſure was full as unexpected to the royaliſts; nor were they very deſirous of joining the royal ſtandard, as the Scottiſh miniſters, even in this deſperate extremity, had iſſued orders not to admit any who refuſed to take the covenant. The earl of Derby had exerted all his intereſt to raiſe troops for the king's ſervice; but before he was in a condition to march, his recruits were diſperſed by a party of the parliamentary forces; ſo that when Charles reached Worceſter, he found his army no more numerous than when he firſt left Scotland.

In the mean time Cromwell purſued the king with the utmoſt expedition; and being joined by the militia of the different counties through which he paſſed, he inveſted Worceſter with an army of 40,000 men. On the third of September he attacked the royaliſts, and the engagement ſoon became general, and very bloody. Charles led on his men in perſon, with an intrepidity which amazed even Cromwell himſelf; while the Scottiſh infantry behaved ſo gallantly, that they obliterated the mean opinion that uſurper had always entertained of their courage. By this time Cromwell had brought up ſome field-pieces, to make good the paſſes he had gained; but theſe were attacked with ſo much impetuoſity by the duke of Hamilton's regiment, that the artillery was, for ſome time, in the power of the royaliſts. Charles endeavoured to improve this advantage, and charged, at the head of ſome of his battalions, with ſo much ſpirit, that Cromwell was obliged to bring up his veterans, whom he had hitherto ſpared. The diſpute was now no longer equal; for Leſley, the Scottiſh general, remained in the city with his horſe, as if they had been unconcerned ſpectators of the engagement. The parliamentary army now made a general attack on all the poſts of the royaliſts, and were every where ſucceſsful. The brave duke of Hamilton was mortally wounded. General Maſſey was alſo wounded, and taken priſoner. Charles, however, ſtill made a noble defence: he had two horſes killed under him, but he was always foremoſt in every poſt of danger. Had Leſley done his duty, Cromwell muſt have purchaſed his victory very dear; but he continued totally inactive, notwithſtanding the dreadful carnage of his countrymen. The king made another effort to lead his broken troops to the charge; but neither his actions, his words, nor his preſence, could prevail. The tide of victory became irreſiſtible, and Cromwell entered Worceſter ſword in hand; nor could Charles prevail on the Scottiſh cavalry, who were ſtill unbroken, to make one attempt to retrieve the fortune o the day. The king muſt now have fallen into the enemy's hands, had not the brave colonel Drummond, and a few battalions of foot, ſtopped the victors a Sudbury-gate, while Charles made his eſcape throug the gate of St. Martin's, in the duſk of the evening He was attended by the duke of Buckingham, th earls of Shrewſbury, Cleveland, and Derby, and abou ſixty horſe.

The loſs which Charles ſuſtained by this defeat wa in ſome meaſure compenſated by the pity, the eſteem and the tenderneſs that now touched the hearts of th people. The Engliſh ſeemed to be aſhamed of thei own triumphs; and ſome who had been remarkabl forward in oppoſing his progreſs, were now the fir in commiſerating his misfortunes. His unmerited ſu ferings, his courage, his conſtancy, were the gener topics of diſcourſe; while his eſcapes from the unre mitted vigilance of his inveterate enemies, were con ſidered as ſo many miraculous indications that he wa deſtined to ſway the Engliſh ſceptre.

It was not reaſonable to imagine that the king, a tended by ſo many of his friends, could long eſcap from his purſuers; and it was therefore thought pr dent that he ſhould ſeek for that protection alo which was deſpaired of with his companions. O their arrival at Kidderminſter, Charles, purſuant the advice of the earl of Derby, retired to Boſcob a lone houſe on the borders of Staffordſhire, inh bited by one Penderell, a farmer. This man was unſhaken friend to the royal party; and thou death was denounced againſt all who concealed t king, and a large reward promiſed to any who ſhou betray him, Penderell preſerved an incorruptible i tegrity. He had, indeed, a dignity of ſentiment ſuperior to his condition; and was more pleaſed w having it in his power to conceal his royal maſter, th to have enjoyed all the advantages Cromwell w able to beſtow. He had four brothers equally lo with himſelf, and theſe all joined in aſſiſting their d treſſed ſovereign. The king was cloathed in the d of a peaſant, and carried into the woods with a bill in his hand, where they pretended to be employed in making faggots. Colonel Careleſs only, of all his attendants, was now his companion, except the five faithful Penderells. He ſometimes lay on ſtraw in the houſe, and ſometimes in the fields. But even this manner of life was expoſed to the utmoſt danger. Two ſtrangers continuing ſome time at Boſcobel could not be concealed from the ſervants, and parties of the parliament's army were diſperſed all over the neighbourhood in ſearch of his majeſty. It was therefore thought prudent that the king and Careleſs ſhould continue conſtantly in the woods; and, for the better ſecurity, they mounted up a large oak, the leaves and branches of which ſheltered them from the ſight of the enemy. While they continued in this retreat, they ſaw ſeveral ſoldiers paſs by in ſearch of the king; and ſome of them expreſſed, in their hearing, their earneſt deſire of ſeizing him. This tree was, for many years after, held in great veneration; and, for having concealed his majeſty from the ſight of his enemies, was called, The "Royal Oak."

Though theſe precautions had hitherto proved ſucceſsful with regard to the preſervation of his majeſty's perſon, yet it was now found impoſſible to conceal him any longer at Boſcobel; and it was propoſed by lord Wilmot, who had now joined him, to repair to the houſe of Mr. Whitegrave, a catholic gentleman, who lived at ſome diſtance from Boſcobel, and where lord Wilmot had, before he joined his royal maſter, been concealed. They accordingly paſſed thither with the ive Penderells, and met with a very kind reception. During the whole time, the parliament's officers were ery aſſiduous in their enquiries after all ſtrangers that ere lately arrived in theſe parts; and, perhaps, all he fidelity of his friends would not have been ſufficint to have ſaved him, had not the houſes, whither he tired, generally belonged to Roman catholics, and ntained ſeveral ſecret hiding-places in the walls and ainſcot, where they concealed their perſecuted rieſts, when their houſes were ſearched by the officers juſtice.

At a place called Bentley, a few miles from Whiteave's houſe, lived colonel Lane, a zealous loyaliſt, ho was now made acquainted with the king's treſs, and the neceſſary precautions were taken for rrying him thither. But his majeſty's feet were ſo rt by walking about in heavy boots, or countryen's ſhoes, which did not fit him, that he was forced mount on horſeback; and in this manner he tralled to Bentley, ſtill attended by the five Penderells, faithful companions. After ſome conſultation, it reſolved that the king ſhould repair to Briſtol, ere it was hoped a ſhip might be found to carry him er to the continent; and, in order to prevent any covery being made during the journey, it was proed to make uſe of a paſs that had been procured Mrs. Jane Lane, the colonel's ſiſter, for herſelf ſervant to viſit Mrs. Norton, a near relation, who d within three miles of Briſtol. Charles was acrdingly dreſſed in the habit of a ſervant, and rode ore the lady, lord Wilmot, with a hawk on his d, paſſing for a ſtranger who had joined them by ident.

On their arrival at Norton's houſe, Mrs. Lane preded that her ſervant had been taken ill on the , and deſired that he might have a private room, re he might be quiet. In this chamber Charles himſelf concealed; but he was known by one the butler, at his firſt entering the houſe. He, ver, prudently concealed the diſcovery, but took firſt opportunity of throwing himſelf on his knees re the king, and praying for his life and preſer. This incident greatly alarmed Charles, who gly enjoined the butler to keep inviolably the ſecret, which he faithfully promiſed, and punctually performed.

After Charles had been a few days at Norton's houſe, his friends were informed that no ſhip was expected to ſail from Briſtol either to France or Spain in leſs than a month. This rendered their ſcheme abortive; and it was agreed that the king ſhould intruſt his perſon to colonel Windham of Dorſetſhire, a gentleman who had always been a zealous partizan of the royal family. Before he received the king, Windham aſked leave to intruſt the ſecret to his mother, his wife, and four ſervants, on whoſe fidelity he could depend; and not one of them proved wanting either in honour or diſcretion. Here the king continued nineteen days, and all his friends in every part of Europe were kept in the moſt anxious ſuſpence with regard to his ſafety. It was indeed generally imagined that he was dead, and this notion prevailing ſtrongly among his enemies, operated greatly in his favour, by relaxing their diligence. After leaving Windham's houſe he repaired to Charmouth, where he was in the utmoſt danger of being diſcovered by the ſagacity of a blackſmith, who declared that the horſe on which his majeſty rode had been ſhod in the north, and not, as he pretended, in the weſt of England. This intelligence of the ſmith rendered it neceſſary for Charles to leave the place immediately, and he was fortunate enough to reach Windham's houſe, before the neighbourhood was informed of the diſcovery.

The friends of Charles now determined that he ſhould paſs into Suſſex, where it was hoped a veſſel might be found to carry him over to the continent. He accordingly went to Hale near Saliſbury, and thence to Brighthelmſtone, where he continued till a ſhip could be provided for his paſſage. This was at laſt accompliſhed, and on the fifteenth of October he embarked in a ſmall veſſel at Shoreham, and was landed at Feſchamp, in Normandy, after having been concealed no leſs than two and forty days in England. His eſcape was truly wonderful, and ſome of the royaliſts even termed it miraculous. But the moſt extraordinary part of the whole is, the inviolable attachment which all, who either diſcovered him, or to whom he diſcovered himſelf, expreſſed for his perſon. Tho' no leſs than forty perſons of both ſexes were intruſted with the ſecret, and though every method was uſed by Cromwell for diſcovering where he was concealed, yet not one of them ever wavered in their affection, though their vanity ſometimes got ſo much the better of their loyalty, that all his party in the neighbourhood knew the houſe where he was ſheltered.

The deſtruction of the royal party was completed by the great ſucceſs of Monk in Scotland. He took the ſtrong caſtle of Stirling, where he found forty pieces of cannon, five thouſand ſtand of arms, the regalia and records of Scotland, and other rich booty. He afterwards ſurprized and made priſoners the earls of Leven and Crawford, with the principal nobility and gentry, whom he either knew or ſuppoſed to be enemies to the Engliſh parliament. He ſtormed Dundee, and put the governor and garriſon to the ſword. The plunder of this town was very conſiderable. Whitlock ſays the common ſoldiers had five hundred pounds to their ſhare; fifty ſail of ſhips were taken in the harbour, and thirty pieces of ordnance in the town.

Theſe diſtinguiſhed conqueſts, joined to the victory obtained by Cromwell at Worceſter, rendered that general abſolute maſter of the kingdom. He called the deſtruction of the royal army at Worceſter, his "crowning mercy;" and was ſo elated with his ſucceſs in that deciſive battle, that he intended to have conferred the honour of knighthood on two of his generals, Lambert and Fleetwood, in the field; and it was not without great difficulty that his friends diſſuaded him from exerciſing that act of regal authority. His power and ambition were both too great to brook ſubmiſſion to the empty name of a republic, which ſubſiſted merely by his influence, and was ſupported by his victories. According to Whitlock, he now communicated to his moſt intimate friends the views he had formed on the crown itſelf; and expreſſed a deſire of aſſuming the regal power, which he had ſo long and ſo effectually laboured to aboliſh. He well knew that the members in parliament, who at preſent governed the nation, were deſpiſed by the people, and their views too much confined to qualify them for legiſlators. Their whole attention was engroſſed by ſelfiſh aims and fanatical bigotry. Their rigid auſterity was carried to the greateſt height; and they had hardly made any progreſs in the important work of fixing a new plan of government.

Theſe circumſtances were favourable to Cromwell's ſcheme of power: the army was at his devotion, and he had no competitor in authority. The only perſon that ſeemed capable of making any oppoſition to his ambitious ſcheme was Ireton, who commanded the troops in Ireland; but he ſoon after died of the plague, and left Cromwell at full liberty to proſecute the plan he had formed.

A. D. 1652. The parliament, no longer fearing any oppoſition either in England, Scotland, or Ireland, now turned their thoughts towards the affairs of the continent; and the Dutch were the firſt who felt the vigour of their arms. The ſtates had obſerved an exact neutrality with regard to the civil wars of England, during the life of Frederic Henry, prince of Orange; but after his death, when his ſon William, who married an Engliſh princeſs, ſucceeded him in power, they were accuſed of betraying an inveterate prejudice againſt the Engliſh parliament, and of aſſiſting the royal party. After the death of William, which was attended with the depreſſion of his party, it was hoped that a kind of coalition might be effected between the two republics, and St. John, lord chief-juſtice, was ſent to the Hague for that purpoſe. But he ſoon perceived that the ſtates entertained a contemptible idea of a government whoſe meaſures were ſo obnoxious to the people. They offered indeed to renew the former alliances with England, but refuſed any nearer connection.

Diſguſted with this refuſal, and incenſed at many affronts offered him with impunity, the haughty St. John returned to England, and exerted all his intereſt to excite a war between the two republics. He had a great aſcendency over Cromwell, and by that means ſoon accompliſhed his deſigns. He repreſented to the parliament, that the Dutch ſought nothing ſo much as to diſpute with England the government of the ſeas; that in all their papers they mentioned Charles II. which was a tacit recognition of his authority; that in all their profeſſions they were inſincere, and that it was neceſſary for the Engliſh to depreſs thoſe, whoſe friendſhip they could not gain. Theſe repreſentations had the deſired effect, and under pretence of providing for the intereſt of commerce, the parliment embraced ſuch meaſures as they knew would ſufficiently diſguſt the ſtates. They formed the famous act of navigation, which prohibited all nations from importing into England in their own bottoms, any commodity not the growth and manufacture of their own country. Though the terms in which this ſtatute was conceived were general, yet the Dutch were principally injured; becauſe their country produced few commodities, and they ſubſiſted chiefly on being the general factors and carriers of the world. Several merchants complaining of injuries they pretended to have received, obtained letters of repriſa against the ſtates, and about eighty of their mercha ſhips were taken by the Engliſh.

The States were ſo alarmed at theſe proceedings that they immediately diſpatched ambaſſadors t London, in order, if poſſible, to renew the treaty o alliance that had been broken off by the abrupt departure of St. John. They repreſented that famou republican as a perſon whom it was impoſſible t pleaſe; and that they either granted, or were willin to grant, every thing that he had aſked. But th parliament giving credit to St. John in preference t the Dutch, all neceſſary preparations were made fo commencing hoſtilities, and carrying on a briſk an vigorous war.

A ſhort time after this an Engliſh man of war fa ling in with a fleet of Dutch fiſhermen, demande the uſual acknowledgement; which being refuſed t captain ſunk one of the Dutch veſſels, and the who crew periſhed. All negotiations were now ſuſpende The Dutch followed the example of the Engliſh iſſuing letters of repriſal, and in a few days appea ed before Portſmouth with a fleet of 45 ſail.

The Engliſh marine was not immediately in a co dition to reſent this inſult, but their motions we watched by commodore Brown till Blake's ſquadr was in a condition of meeting them on the open ſ This required no great length of time; ſuch diſpat was uſed in the different departments, that in leſs th ſix weeks Blake ſailed with a conſiderable fle About the middle of May, he diſcovered the Du ſquadron commanded by their celebrated admi Van Tromp, and immediately made a ſignal for paying reſpect to the Engliſh flag. The ſignal be diſregarded, Blake, though his ſquadron conſiſted o ly of twenty-ſix ſhips, formed the line of battle, a advanced towards the enemy. Before he came wi in gun ſhot he was joined by eight ſhips, and ſo after the action began with great fury, and laſted night put an end to the battle. Blake's ſhip being c ſiderably a-head of the reſt, was expoſed, for ſo time, to the whole fire of the enemy, but his o ſhips coming up, the attention of the Dutch was d ded. One of the Dutch ſhips was taken, and ano ſunk by the Engliſh, who loſt only fifteen men in engagement. The next morning the Dutch fleet peared at four leagues diſtance, ſteering towards coaſt of France; but as neither of the admirals orders to fight, except from neceſſity, they did think proper to renew the engagement.

It was pretended by the Dutch, that their adm Van Tromp had exceeded his commiſſion, and he had been forced upon the Engliſh coaſt by of weather. But the Engliſh parliament affecte diſbelieve their moſt ſolemn aſſurances, and vot letter of thanks to Blake for his behaviour. C well himſelf repaired to Dover, and encouraged B and the ſeamen, by aſſuring them that nothing ſh be wanting on his part to induce them to act aſſiduity and vigour in the defence of their count

The Dutch now found themſelves greatly miſ in the notions they had formed with regard to Engliſh commonwealth; and Paw, their amba extraordinary at London, received orders to all his power for putting a ſtop to hoſtilities; b his endeavours were in vain. The parliament in behaved with politeneſs both towards Paw an maſters; but at the ſame time redoubled their cations to encreaſe the power of their navy. George Aſcue received a commiſſion independe that of Blake, and ſoon after deſtroyed about ſail of the St. Ube's fleet; while Blake, in leſ a month ſent upwards of forty ſail of rich prize the Thames. He now ſtood to the northward, der to aſſert the right of his country to the Britiſh fiſhery. This ſervice he nobly performed; he took their whole convoy of 12 men of war, one only excepted that was fortunate enough to eſcape. He might alſo have deſtroyed all their fiſhing veſſels, but he ſuffered them to continue their occupation on their promiſing never to return to the Engliſh coaſt without leave, and on their paying him one tenth of all their fiſh.

Though Blake's expedition was attended with the greateſt ſucceſs, yet it had nearly proved fatal to the ſquadron of Sir George Aſcue, who was left in the Downs: for Van Tromp, whoſe fleet was far ſuperior to that of Aſcue, was then at ſea, and attempted to take advantage of Blake's abſence. He ſtood accordingly towards the Engliſh coaſts, but was overtaken by ſo dreadful a ſtorm, that he was obliged to return to Holland to repair the damages his ſhips had received. His fleet was now increaſed to 150 ſail, and his appearance ſo formidable, that it was thought neceſſary to erect a platform and mount it with cannon, between Deal and Sandown-caſtle, and to line the ſhore with militia. Aſcue lay as near as poſſible to the Strand, but his whole ſquadron, which conſiſted only of 15 ſhips, muſt have been deſtroyed had not the wind immediately changed, and prevented the Dutch from reaching the Engliſh ſhore; and the Dutch merchant ſhips being impatient for a convoy to the northward, Van Tromp took them under his protection, hoping he ſhould be fortunate enough to meet with Blake in the north ſea. He was, however, diſappointed, but greatly diſtreſſed the Engliſh trade to Newcaſtle, while Blake took two of the Dutch Eaſt India ſhips. The weather proving extremely tempeſtuous, Tromp found it impoſſible to keep the ſea, and accordingly returned once more to Holland with no more than 40 ſhips, ſome being loſt, and the remainder diſperſed.

In the mean time Aſcue ſent ſome of his ſhips to convoy home a rich Eaſt-India fleet, while he himſelf cruiſed between Dover and Calais, where he took ten Flemiſh ſhips, and forced twenty to run aſhore. The famous de Ruyter was now appointed to command a ſquadron of about fifty Dutch men of war, and ſent to convoy home a large fleet of merchantmen. Aſcue, whoſe ſquadron amounted only to 38 ſhips, fell in with this convoy on the 16th of Auguſt; and though his force was ſo far unequal, he attacked de Ruyter, and deſtroyed ſeveral of the Dutch ſhips: but ſome of his captains not ſeconding the attack of their leaders, he was obliged to abandon the enterprize, after the fight had continued with the utmoſt fury near four hours. Captain Peck, who acted as rear-admiral, was mortally wounded, and moſt of the ſhips that charged the enemy were greatly ſhattered. Aſcue, however, renewed the attack in the morning, but with no better ſucceſs. He made another effort on the third day, but his ſhips were ſo ſhattered in their rigging that he was again obliged to deſiſt, and he returned to Plymouth in order to repair the damage he had ſuſtained by theſe fruitleſs attempts.

Though Aſcue had done the public more eminent ſervice at ſea than even Blake himſelf had hitherto performed, yet the council of ſtate, from ſome unknown reaſons, thought proper not to employ him again in their ſervice. They, however, preſented him with 300l. in money, and ſettled on him an eſtate in Ireland of 300l. per annum.

The Engliſh parliament were not ignorant that the Dutch were ſoliciting all the princes in Europe to join them againſt the Engliſh. At the ſame time, they knew the Dutch had above 100 ſail of ſhips ready for the ſea, and had reaſon to think the French would ſoon aſſiſt them; but notwithſtanding this, they would not hearken to any reaſons for putting an end to hoſtilities. Elated with the numerous ſucceſſes they had obtained over their domeſtic enemies, they were perſuaded that nothing could ſtand before their victorious arms. Blake, who was now returned from the north, carried his fleet into different harbours to refit; and as ſoon as every thing could be got ready, he was ordered to put to ſea, and take or deſtroy all the Dutch or French veſſels he met with in his cruize.

A. D. 1653. The whole naval power of the Dutch was now at ſea, under the command of de Wit and de Ruyter; and Blake uſed his utmoſt endeavours to bring them to a deciſive engagement. But the Dutch admirals, having a rich fleet of merchantmen under their convoy, avoided a battle, which they knew muſt be fatal to ſome of their ſhips. They had, however, no ſooner ſecured their convoy, than they ſtood towards the Engliſh, drawn up in a line of battle. Blake, though his fleet was greatly inferior in number to that of the enemy, advanced to engage them. He divided his ſhips into three ſquadrons; the firſt commanded by himſelf, in the Sovereign, the largeſt ſhip in the Engliſh navy; the ſecond by Penn, and the third by Bourn. He began the battle himſelf; but there being a ſand-bank between the two fleets, the Sovereign, the Reſolution, and the St. Andrew, all firſt rates, ſtruck upon the ſhoal. Perſuaded that theſe three ſhips were now rendered unſerviceable, the Dutch admirals ſtood farther off to ſea, in order to bring on a cloſer engagement. The largeſt ſhip in the Dutch fleet, followed by two more, bore down upon the Sovereign, on board of which Blake's flag was hoiſted, and attacked her with the utmoſt fury. But they had ſoon cauſe to repent of their temerity. The firſt broadſide of the Sovereign ſent the headmoſt ſhip to the bottom; and the others, intimimidated by the dreadful incident, retreated back to their fleet. Night at laſt put an end to the engagement, but not before the Dutch rear-admiral was taken. De Wit took the advantage of the night to bear away from the Engliſh, whoſe ſhips were ſo ſhattered in their rigging, that they could not follow him.

Van Tromp now ſailed with a fleet ſufficiently numerous to recover the honour the Dutch had loſt in this engagement. It conſiſted of 110 ſail of men of war, beſides 17 which joined him, a few days after, from Zealand. The Engliſh had unwiſely conjectured, that as Van Tromp had been laid aſide ſince his engagement with Blake, he would not be any more employed during the war; and that it would be impoſſible for the Dutch to fit out a fleet of any great ſtrength that ſeaſon. In conſequence of this opinion, Blake had detached twenty ſail of his ſhips to convoy the colliers from Newcaſtle; twelve were laid up at Plymouth, and fifteen ſent up the river Medway to refit. The admiral had, therefore, only thirty-ſeven ſail of ſhips with him in the Downs when Tromp appeared in the Engliſh channel. He had under his convoy a great number of merchantmen; but he had no ſooner conducted them to a place of ſafety, than he ſtood directly for the Downs, with a fleet of 80 ſail of men of war. Blake perceived the Dutch admiral advancing towards him in the morning of the 29th of November; and though his ſquadron was ſo far inferior to that of the enemy, he determined not to refuſe the engagement. The fight accordingly began about eleven in the morning, and laſted till ſix in the evening, but with infinite diſadvantage to the Engliſh. The great force of the engagement fell upon Blake's own ſhip, the Triumph, and two others, the Victory and the Vanguard, which were attacked by twenty of the Dutch ſhips, and fought them all for a conſiderable time before any other ſhips could come to their aſſiſtance. Towards the evening, the Garland, commanded by captain Batton, and the Bonadventure, commanded by captain Hookſton, attacked Van Tromp's own ſhip, and would have taken her, had not ſeveral of the Dutch fleet come to her aſſiſtance. They, however, paid dear for their attempt; they were both killed, and their ſhips taken. Blake, deſirous of ſaving theſe two ſhips, puſhed forward, and by that means brought himſelf into ſo deſperate a ſituation, that it was with the utmoſt difficulty he was ſaved by the aſſiſtance of the Vanguard and the Sapphire. Fortunately for the Engliſh, night ſoon after put an end to the engagement: two hours longer of day-light would have proved the deſtruction of their whole fleet. Blake retired firſt to Dover, and then to the mouth of the Thames, having loſt, beſides the two ſhips already mentioned, the Hercules, and two merchantmen. Blake himſelf was dangerouſly wounded; and a great number of his men, and ſeveral of his officers, killed. Tromp was ſo elated with this victory, that he fixed a broom at his main-top-maſt-head, intimating, that he intended to ſweep the ſea entirely of all Engliſh veſſels.

But this defeat only tended to animate the Engliſh to wipe off the diſgrace. The utmoſt efforts were made to fit out a fleet ſufficient to recover the loſſes ſuſtained in the late engagement. Among other encouragements, the pay of the ſeamen was increaſed; a larger ſhare of the prizes taken from the enemy was allotted them; and Monk, at Blake's particular requeſt, was ſent for from Scotland to aſſiſt him in the command. The true reaſon for this ſeems to have been the death of Popham, who was buried with a profuſion of honours, and the neceſſity of having a land officer on board the fleet to command the ſoldiers in time of action, but without any ſeparate command at other times. So much expedition was uſed, that by the 11th of February, Blake was at ſea, with a fleet of ſixty ſail of men of war. Several of his ſhips were new, and all of them much better manned than before. That nothing might be wanting to encourage the ſeamen and ſoldiers, hoſpitals for the reception of their ſick and wounded were erected all along the coaſts; and Blake's fleet was ſo ſtationed off Portland, that Tromp, who had upwards of 150 merchantment under his convoy could not avoid an engagement.

About eight o'clock on the morning of the 18th of February, the fight was begun by Blake in the Triumph, ſeconded with about twelve other ſhips; among which was the Fairfax, commanded by captain Lawſon, and the Vanguard, by captain Mildmay. The impetuous courage of Blake had its uſual conſequence; it expoſed him to the moſt imminent danger: for this ſmall ſquadron bore the whole fire and fury of the Dutch, till the reſt of the fleet could come up to their aſſiſtance, which was not till ſome time after. This battle far exceeded all that had been hitherto fought between the two republics. Amazed and confounded with the ſtrength, the order and the diſcipline of the Engliſh, the Dutch exerted all their force to deſtroy Blake's fleet; while Blake, ſtung with his late misfortune, collected all his force to be revenged on the Dutch. The ſea was covered with wrecks, and the fire from the ſhips ſo quick and violent, that, for ſome time, there was a dead calm. In the mean time, the fury of the combatants was aſtoniſhing; they bore down cloſe to one another, and received the whole of every broadſide: it ſeemed as if the diſpute had not been for victory, but which ſhould firſt go to the bottom. The Triumph bore the whole fury of this dreadful fire; and muſt have been either ſunk or taken, had ſhe not been relieved by Lawſon. Blake was wounded in the thigh; Mildmay in the Vanguard, and Ball in the Triumph, were killed. The admiral's ſecretary was killed by his ſide. The Proſperous, a 44 gun ſhip, was boarded by the Dutch, but ſaved by the Merlin frigate. The Aſſiſtance and the Advice were both diſabled, and obliged to put into Portſmouth. The Fairfax loſt 100 men, the Triumph as many; and captain Batten, in the Sampſon, after ſinking one of the enemy's ſhips, found it impoſſible to keep his own above water, and was obliged to go, with his crew, on board other ſhips. But this was far from being equal to the loſs ſuſtained by the Dutch. Three days was the battle continued with the utmoſt rage and obſtinacy; and Blake, who was victor, obtained not more honour than Tromp, who was vanquiſhed. He made ſo ſkilful a retreat, that he ſaved the greater part of his convoy, which was very large, thirty only of his merchantmen falling into the hands of the Engliſh. He, however, loſt 11 ſhips of war, had 2000 men killed, and near 1500 taken priſoners. The Engliſh, though many of their ſhips were dreadfully ſhattered, loſt only one. Their ſlain were not much inferior to that of the enemy; but they gained the immortal honour of filling their rival republic with the terrors of their power and valour.

The ſucceſs of the Engliſh was in a great meaſure owning to the ſize of their ſhips; an advantage which all the ſkill and bravery of the Dutch admirals could not compenſate. But the misfortunes the Dutch met with in battle were ſmall in compariſon of thoſe which their trade ſuffered from the Engliſh. Their whole commerce by the channel was cut off; and even that with the Baltic ſuffered greatly by the Engliſh privateers. Their fiſheries were totally ſuſpended. Above 1600 of their ſhips had fallen into the hands of the enemy. Nor did this diſtreſs ariſe from any public intereſt or neceſſity; but from vain points of honour and national reſentments.

Though theſe triumphs of the parliament highly pleaſed the people in general, yet they operated in a very different manner on the mind of Cromwell. The remembrance of his exploits was now but faint, and one farther ſtep to glory muſt have placed the republicans ſuperior to every thing but envy. He knew not how ſoon his ſoldiers, infected with a paſſion for increaſing the glory of their country, might declare for the parliament; and ſhould that happen, one ſingle vote would be ſufficient to deſtroy at once his greatneſs and his power. No time had yet been fixed for the diſſolution of the parliament; and while he was a ſubject, and conſequently accountable, it was the ſame to him whether the preſiding power was a monarchy or a commonwealth. He indeed commanded the army, and the troops were at preſent at his devotion; but theſe triumphs at ſea ſeemed greatly to leſſen their regard for their favourite general; they deſired to ſhare in the honours of their countrymen. On the other hand, the zealous republicans ſet up the fleet in oppoſition to the army, and celebrated, with uncommon demonſtrations of joy, the ſucceſſes of their naval armaments. They even ventured to urge the neceſſity of diminiſhing the number of the land forces, which they repreſented as no longer neceſſary to ſupport the domeſtic peace of the nation.

Cromwell now plainly ſaw that the republicans entertained a jealouſy of his power and ambitious deſigns, and were reſolved to render him ſubordinate to their authority. But this he determined to prevent; and the only method of effecting it was, by diſſolving the parliament. He accordingly ſummoned a general council of officers, and ſoon found that they were ready to join him in any attempt he might think neceſſary. Moſt of them were his own creatures, owed their advancement entirely to his favor, and depended on him for their future preferment. Some of them, indeed, were men of principle, but guided by notions ſo fanatically extravagant, that they were eaſily deluded into the moſt violent and criminal meaſures.

The firſt ſtep taken by the council of officers was, to vote a remonſtrance to the parliament. It began with complaining of the arrears due to the army; and after applauding the parliament for their zeal and enterprizes, repreſented to them, that it was now time to reſign their ſeats, and leave to other members of the commonwealth the cares of government; and that they would now, by eſtabliſhing a free and equal adminiſtration, perform the promiſe they had long ſince made to the people.

The parliament was at once alarmed and exaſperated at theſe proceedings of the army; and after a violent debate, a ſharp reply was returned to their remonſtrance. This perfectly anſwered the wiſhes of Cromwell, for as the harſh anſwer of the parliament gave the higheſt offence to the council of officers, ſo he found it more eaſy to inſpire them with thoſe ſentiments that might effect the completion of his long-concerted project.

While the council of officers were engaged in conſulting what methods to purſue, colonel Ingoldſby entered the apartment, and informed Cromwell, that the parliament had juſt voted not to diſſolve themſelves, but to fill up the houſe by new elections; and that the manner of carrying this expedient into execution was the ſubject on which they then were deliberating. Exaſperated at this intelligence, Cromwell left the council of officers; and taking with him 300 ſoldiers, repaired to the houſe, leaving ſome of his men at the foot of the ſtairs, ſome at the entrance of the lobby, and ſome at the door. He advanced to his ſeat, and told his friend St. John, that he was come to do an act which grieved his very ſoul, and had beſought the Lord, with prayers and tears, not to impoſe it upon him, but that the glory of God, and the good of the nation, rendered it abſolutely neceſſary. He, however, ſat ſtill, and liſtened to the debates for ſome time; and then told colonel Harriſon, that he thought the parliament was now ſufficiently ripe for a diſſolution. Harriſon warned him of the danger that might attend a ſtep of that nature, and deſired him to conſider the conſequences before he attempted it. Cromwell accordingly ſat ſtill for ſome time longer; but when the ſpeaker was juſt going to put the queſtion, he ſtarted from his ſeat, accuſed the parliament, in the moſt opprobrious language, of tyranny, ambition, rapine, and injuſtice. Then ſtamping violently with his foot, the ſignal he had given the ſoldiers for entering the houſe, he cried out, "Get you gone for ſhame; give place to honeſter men, to thoſe who will more faithfully diſcharge their truſt. You are no longer a parliament: I tell you, you are no longer a parliament; the Lord hath caſt you off; he hath choſen other inſtruments for carrying on his work." Then taking Martin by the cloak, "Thou art a whoremaſter," ſaid he. To a ſecond, "Thou art an adulterer." To a third, "Thou art a drunkard and a glutton." And to a fourth, "Thou art an extortioner." The ſpeaker, fond of his power and dignity, ſeemed unwilling to leave the chair, and kept his ſeat till he was in a manner pulled out of it by Harriſon. Cromwell, pointing to the mace that lay on the table, ſaid to one of the ſoldiers, "Take away that fool's bauble." Then turning himſelf to the houſe, he ſaid, "It is you that have forced me upon this. I have ſought the Lord, night and day, with ſtrong prayers and tears, that he would rather ſlay me than put me upon this work; but he would not hear me." The ſoldiers ſoon cleared the houſe, and it was ſufficiently evident, from the furious manner in which Cromwell behaved, that he would, in caſe of oppoſition, have put every man of them to death. Sir Peter Wentworth and Sir Henry Vane were the only members that had the courage to upbraid him with his conduct, which they did in the ſevereſt terms, accuſing him of ingratitude and treachery. He took no notice of what was ſaid by the former, but interrupted the latter, by crying out with a terrible voice, "O! Sir Harry Vane, Sir Harry Vane! The Lord deliver me from Sir Harry Vane!" As ſoon as the ſoldiers had cleared the houſe, Cromwell ſeized all the journals and public papers, ordered the doors to be locked, and carried the keys with him to Whitehall.

Thus, by one bold effort of power, Cromwell in a few minutes effected a work, which would have coſt a common plodding politician his whole life to have brought about, and perhaps in the end might have fell a victim to his own intrigues. But Cromwell alone was capable of properly forming and executing ſo bold a deſign. At firſt he intended to have been the ſole diſpenſer of juſtice himſelf, and not to ſhare his power with another; but, upon more mature reflection, he determined to ſatisfy the expectations of the people by governing them under the appearance of a republic. He accordingly ſummoned one hundred and twenty-eight Engliſhmen, ſix Iriſh, and five Scots, to meet at London. To each of theſe he ſent a written order, requeſting them to come and take upon them the ſovereign power, and to govern the nation. The manner and form of this order, or writ, was as follows:

"Foraſmuch as, upon the diſſolution of the laſt parliament, it became neceſſary that the peace, ſafety, and good government of this commonwealth ſhould be provided for; in order whereunto divers perſons, fearing God, and of approved fidelity and honeſty, are by myſelf, with the advice of my council of officers, nominated, to whom the great charge and truſt of ſo weighty affairs is to be committed, and having good aſſurance of their love to and courage for God, and intereſt of his cauſe, and of the good people of the commonwealth:

"I Oliver Cromwell, captain-general and commander in chief of all the armies and forces raiſed, and to be raiſed, within this commonwealth, do hereby ſummon and require you (being one of the ſaid perſons nominated) perſonally to appear at the council-chamber in Whitehall, on the 4th day of July next enſuing the date hereof, to take upon you the ſaid truſt, unto which you are hereby called, and appointed to ſerve as a member for the county of——; and hereof you are not to fail.

"Given under my hand and ſeal the 6th day of June, 1653.

Oliver Cromwell."

This aſſembly met agreeable to the above ſummons, when Cromwell delegated to them, during fifteen months, the legiſlative authority; after which they were to transfer it to one hundred and thirty four others, to be choſen by themſelves.

On the diſſolution of the late parliament, the Dutch had flattered themſelves with the hopes of ſucceeding in their negociations for a peace; and it muſt be owned that Cromwell was far from being averſe to put a period to hoſtilities. But ſeveral reaſons prevented him from putting his deſign into execution. He knew that nothing could render him more popular than carrying on the Dutch war with vigour; and the Engliſh were now more capable of diſputing the empire of the ſea with the enemy than they had ever been before. This was, in a great meaſure, owing to the friendſhip of Sweden, by which, notwithſtanding all the oppoſition of the Dutch and Danes, the Engliſh had been furniſhed with materials for ſhip building.

The Dutch, finding the Engliſh determined to proſecute the war, fitted out a powerful fleet, which ſailed from Holland about the middle of June, under the command of Van Tromp, de Wit, and de Ruyter. Blake, with his diviſion of eighteen ſail of ſhips, had ſtood to the northward, and not yet joined the fleet commanded by Monk and Dean. But his abſence did not prevent the Engliſh from advancing againſt the enemy. Their fleet conſiſted of ninety-five men of war, and five fire-ſhips; and the Dutch of ninety-eight men of war, and ſeven fire-ſhips. The engagement began in the morning of the ſecond of July, ſoon after which, Dean, one of the Engliſh admirals, was killed. Monk, with great prudence and preſence of mind, concealed this misfortune from the ſeamen, by immediately dropping his cloak over the dead body of that able officer. The fury of the contending fleets ſeemed to be increaſed in proportion as the officers had learned experience. Lawſon, the Engliſh rear-admiral, charged with the blue ſquadron, conſiſting of 40 ſhips, through the whole Dutch fleet with amazing execution, and would have taken de Ruyter's ſhip, had he not been relieved by Van Tromp, who, in his turn, was charged by Monk, and the battle continued to rage with the moſt violent fury till three in the afternoon, each party ignorant of the loſs they had ſuſtained, both fleets being involved in an impracticable cloud of ſmoak. At laſt the Dutch fury gave way to the well directed courage of the Engliſh. The faintneſs of their fire gave the firſt intimation of their loſs, and the wind being favourable they withdrew from the engagement; but were cannonaded in their retreat by the lighter ſhips of the Engliſh. Van Tromp performed all that could be expected from the braveſt and moſt experienced commander. He endeavoured to keep his ſhips in a line of battle; but three or four of them being ſunk, and one of his flag-ſhips blown up, his whole fleet was thrown into confuſion, and he was obliged to retire from the Engliſh. This engagement happened off the north Foreland, and during the night Blake joined Monk with his diviſion. The next morning the attack was renewed; but the Dutch were ſo diſheartened by the preceding engagement, that it was with the utmoſt difficulty their admirals could prevail upon their men to fight. But the conteſt was now unequal. Tromp was twice boarded by vice-admiral Penn, but diſengaged by de Ruyter and de Wit. Six capital Dutch ſhips were ſunk, two blown up by fire-ſhips, and eleven taken. The whole was now a diſorderly flight; nor could the Dutch captains, either by perſuaſions or menaces, be brought to face the Engliſh; and the remainder of their fleet muſt have been inevitably deſtroyed, had they not taken ſhelter on the flats between Dunkirk and Calais, where it was dangerous for the Engliſh to follow them.

When the news of this defeat reached Holland, it not only threw the ſtates, but all ranks of people into the utmoſt conſternation. They now ſaw that fleet, which, but a few days before, they thought invincible, blocked up in their harbours by a victorious enemy, which was every moment ruining their trade, on which their very being, as a maritime power, depended. Tromp, in his letter to the ſtates, complained bitterly that his ſhips were not ſufficiently ſupplied with powder and ball, and that his whole misfortune ought to be imputed to his want of ammunition. The common people, from whom theſe complaints were not long a ſecret, were enraged to the higheſt pitch of fury. They ſaid, that a deſign had been formed to betray their fleet into the hands of the enemy, that the republic might be under the neceſſity of making peace upon their own terms. The ſtates were alarmed, and purſued the only method in their power to ſilence the clamours of the people; they uſed the utmoſt diligence and expedition in repairing and refitting their fleet; they recalled their ſhips from the different ſtations, in order if poſſible to wipe off the diſgrace of the late defeat.

The Engliſh were ſo animated at their repeated conqueſts, that they would not liſten to any terms of peace, unleſs the Dutch would agree to diſarm their ſhips, pay all the expences of the war, and make full ſatisfaction for the damages the Engliſh merchants had ſuſtained. Cromwell, however, hinted to the Dutch ambaſſadors, that peace might be concluded on much eaſier terms, but did not think it prudent to explain himſelf farther at preſent on ſo delicate a ſubject. He was, however, perſuaded, that if the Dutch were totally ruined, he ſhould never be able to obtain the ſummit of his wiſhes, the ſupreme power in England, which perhaps he would have been glad to purchaſe even by a defeat at ſea. To this perſuaſion the Dutch owed their ſafety. The late victory, however complete, was not proſecuted with all the vigour that might have been expected. The enemy were incapable of ſending five men of war to ſea, their beſt admirals refuſed to act, and a rich Eaſt-India fleet was every day expected. Yet no advantages were taken of this diſtreſſed ſtate of the enemy. Blake, indeed, continued cruiſing on the coaſt of Holland; but he made no attempt on their harbours, and the Eaſt-India fleet arrived in ſafety.

In the mean time the Dutch were exerting all their efforts to repair and increaſe their navy. Nor were their attempts in vain; their fleet was ſoon in a better condition than ever, both with regard to the largeneſs of the ſhips, and the number of ſeamen. Van Tromp, de Ruyter, and other famous admirals, had now no longer the leaſt pretence for abandoning the public ſervice. Young Tromp, who had taken an Engliſh man of war in the ſtreights, was ordered home with his ſquadron, and ſome very large Eaſt-India ſhips were converted into men of war; ſo that about the latter end of July, Van Tromp's ſquadron conſiſted of ninety ſtout ſhips, manned with able ſeamen, and well provided with ammunition and ſtores.

Van Tromp left Holland on the 30th of July, and immediately ſailed to the Texel. Here he was joined by de Ruyter and de Wit; and by this junction the whole fleet amounted to 120 ſail. The Engliſh fleet, which was commanded by Monk, Lawſon, and Penn, amounted only to 90 ſail; but they were determined to give the enemy battle. The engagement accordingly began on the 31ſt of July, in the morning, with the utmoſt fury. The Dutch had now obviated all the diſadvantages under which they laboured in their former engagements: they worked their ſhips with wonderful addreſs, and fought with the moſt ſurpriſing reſolution. Monk, on the other hand, gave his orders with that calmneſs and preciſion which characteriſes the conſummate commander. The battle continued to rage with the utmoſt violence till near noon, when the brave admiral Van Tromp was killed with a muſquet ball, as he was encouraging his men. As ſoon as his death was known, the Dutch retired towards their own coaſts with the utmoſt precipitation. They loſt in this engagement 24 of their men of war, about 4000 of their men were killed, and 1000 taken priſoners. The Engliſh loſt three men of war, ſix captains, and 500 ſeamen. Eight hundred were dangerouſly wounded, and the whole fleet ſo ſhattered, that they were obliged to return home.

The parliament choſen by Cromwell had now ſat about five months, during the greateſt part of which time they had had been expoſed to the ridicule and contempt of the public. Among the fanatics that compoſed this aſſembly was a very active member, remarkable for long prayers, ſermons and harangues. He

He was a leather-ſeller in London, and known by the name of "Praiſe-God Barebones," a ridiculous appellation formed by ſome poet to expreſs the meagre figure of ſo ſtrange a perſon. The populace were pleaſed with the thought, and gave the aſſembly itſelf the name of "The Barebones Parliament."

Though this aſſembly had received all their authority from Cromwell, they now began to pretend they had been favoured with ſupernatural power, and that they ſhould act in conformity to ſo diſtinguiſhed a commiſſion. The friends of Cromwell perceived that they meant to purſue meaſures contrary to his intereſt, and therefore determined to put a period to this ridiculous parliament. Accordingly, they met early at the houſe; and one of them moved, that the ſitting of this parliament any longer would be of no ſervice to the nation. This motion was carried almoſt unanimouſly, on which they immediately haſtened to Cromwell, with Rouſe, their ſpeaker, at their head; and, by a formal deed, reſigned back into his hands that authority which they had ſo lately received from him.

In conſequence of their reſignation the machine of government was once more ſtopped; and it was now propoſed, in a council of officers, to introduce a new ſcheme of adminiſtration, and to temper the liberty of a commonwealth by the authority of a ſingle perſon, who ſhould be diſtinguiſhed under the appellation of Protector. Lambert, one of the creatures of Cromwell, accordingly produced a paper, called, "The Inſtrument of Government," containing the plan of this new legiſlature; and as it was ſuppoſed to be approved of by the general, it was readily agreed to by the council.

This Inſtrument of Government conſiſted of forty-two articles, the chief of which were in ſubſtance as follow: A council of ſtate was appointed, which was not to conſiſt of more than twenty-one, nor leſs than thirteen perſons. Theſe were to enjoy their office during life or good behaviour; and in caſe of a vacancy, the remaining members were to name three, out of whom the protector was to chuſe one. The protector was appointed the ſupreme magiſtrate of the commonwealth: in his name all juſtice was adminiſtered; from him all magiſtracy and all honours were derived; he had the power of pardoning all crimes, except murder and treaſon; and to him the benefit of all forfeitures devolved. The right of peace, war, and alliance, was veſted in him; but with regard to theſe particulars, he was to act entirely with the advice and conſent of his council. The power of the ſword was veſted in the protector, jointly with the parliament, while it was ſitting, or with the council of ſtate in the intervals. He was obliged to ſummon a parliament every three years, and to allow them to ſit five months, without adjournment, prorogation or diſſolution. The bills they paſſed were to be preſented to the protector for his conſent; but if within twenty days it was not obtained, they were to have the force of laws by the authority of the parliament only. A ſtanding army for England and Ireland was eſtabliſhed, conſiſting of ten thouſand foot and ten thouſand horſe, and funds were eſtabliſhed for their ſupport. Theſe were not to be diminiſhed without the conſent of the protector, and in this article alone he aſſumed a negative voice. During the intervals of parliament, the protector and councils had the power of enacting laws, which were to be valid till the firſt meeting of the parliament. The chancellor, treaſurer, admiral, chief governors of Ireland and Scotland, and the chief juſtices of both benches, were to be choſen with the approbation of parliament; and in the intervals with the approbation of the council, to be afterwards ratified by parliament. The protector was to enjoy his office during life; and on his death the place was to be filled by the council.

Such was the Inſtrument of Government enacted by the council of officers, and ſworn to by Cromwell, who, on the 16th of December was inſtalled into that high office, by the title of "His Highneſs the Lord Protector of England, Scotland, and Ireland;" and the principal perſons that attended were, the judges, the council of ſtate, and the lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council of London. *

Cromwell's firſt care was to nominate a council of fifteen perſons. This council was compoſed of ſuch men as he knew were entirely devoted to his ſervice; and at the ſame time they were ſo very oppoſite in their opinions with regard to the principles of civil and religious liberty, that there was not the leaſt danger of their uniting againſt the intereſt of their maſter.

The government being thus ſettled, the new council immediately publiſhed the following proclamation:

"Whereas the late parliament diſſolving themſelves, reſigned their power and authority; the government of the commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland, in a lord protector, and ſucceſſive triennial parliaments, is now eſtabliſhed. And whereas Oliver Cromwell, captain-general of all the forces of this commonwealth, is declared lord protector of the ſaid nations, and hath accepted thereof; we have therefore thought it neceſſary (as we hereby do) to make publication of the premiſes, and ſtrictly to charge and command, all and every perſon or perſons, of what quality or condition ſoever, in any of the ſaid three nations, to take notice hereof, and to confirm and ſubmit themſelves to the government ſo eſtabliſhed. And all ſheriffs, mayors, bailiffs, &c. are required to publiſh this proclamation, to the end that none may have cauſe to pretend ignorance in this behalf."

Thus did a private gentleman, by an amazing conjunction of courage and hypocriſy, riſe to the kingly power, though under another name. Cromwell was near 55 years of age when he attained the ſovereign power, 42 of which he had paſſed without having had any employ, either civil or military. He was hardly known in 1642, when the houſe of commons, of which he was a member, gave him a commiſſion of horſe in the army they levied againſt the king. From this beginning he roſe, by the ſteps we have ſeen, to be maſter of that houſe; and, after having humbled and ſubdued Charles I. and his ſon, he now ſtepped into the royal ſeat, and, without being king, reigned more abſolute and fortunate than any king had ever done.

The Dutch, overwhelmed with the expences of the war, and mortified by their defeats, now puſhed the negotiations for a peace with the utmoſt aſſiduity. It was known that the greateſt obſtacle to a pacification conſiſted not in any animoſity conceived by the Engliſh

* A few days after the inſtallation, the corporation of London invited his Highneſs to dine with them at Grocer's-hall; which being accepted, he was received by the citizens with all regal honours: the city companies in their ſtands lined the ſtreets through which he paſſed; and he was met and attended by the lord-mayor and aldermen, the former of whom carried the ſword before him bare-headed, and the latter rode on horſeback in their formalities. Before his departure from the hall, he, in virtue of his ſovereign character, conferred the honour of knighthood on the lord-mayor, and thanked the citizens for their diſtinguiſhed marks of reſpect ſhewn to his perſon and government.

liſh againſt the Dutch, but in a deſire of a cloſe union and confederacy. Cromwell had formed the commercial ſcheme of a coalition with the United Provinces; a total conjunction of government, privileges, intereſts, and councils. It is no wonder that a ſcheme built on ſo deluſive a foundation ſhould appear abſurd to the States-general: they were aſtoniſhed that any man in his ſenſes ſhould entertain ſuch romantic notions, and abſolutely refuſed to enter into any negociations on ſo impracticable a ſcheme of accommodation. At length, however, a peace was made, and ſigned by Cromwell, the principal conditions of which were theſe: That the Dutch ſhould pay him 300,000l. ſterling: That the ſhips of the States-general ſhould pay the compliment to the Britiſh flag: and that they ſhould never reſtore the young prince of Orange to the office of Stadtholder.

A. D. 1654. The peace with the Dutch brought great credit to Cromwell's adminiſtration. Moſt of the powers in Europe ſent ambaſſadors to court his alliance; and an incident that happened about this time ſufficiently evinced his intentions of governing with ſpirit and juſtice. Don Pantaleon Sa, brother to the Portugueſe ambaſſador, and joined with him in the ſame commiſſion, thinking himſelf affronted in the ſtreets of London, repaired the next day to the Exchange, and ſeeing a merchant, whom he thought reſembled the author of the injury, he immediately killed him, and took ſhelter in the houſe of his brother, who had connived at this baſe action. Cromwell paid no regard to his aſylum; he ſent a company of ſoldiers, who took Don Pantaleon from his brother's houſe, and committed him to priſon. He was ſoon after tried, and being condemned, was executed on Tower-hill, * notwithſtanding his brother, and all the foreign ambaſſadors then in London uſed their utmoſt endeavours to obtain a pardon. The ſituation of Portugal at this time was ſuch, that they could not reſent this tranſaction; and the ambaſſador ſoon after ſigned with the protector a treaty of peace and alliance, which was very advantageous to the Engliſh commerce.

On the third of September, according to writs iſſued by Cromwell for that purpoſe, the parliament met at Weſtminſter. He went in great ſtate, and opened it with a ſpeech, in which he informed them of the ſteps he had taken for modelling the new government; aſſured them of his upright intentions; recapitulated what he had done for the nation; told them that he had convoked a free parliament, and that he did not pretend to be their maſter, but their fellow-labourer.

The parliament, having with great attention liſtened to his ſpeech, and, by Cromwell's recommendation, choſen Lenthall for their ſpeaker, immediately entered into a diſcuſſion of the Inſtrument of Government, and of that authority which Cromwell, under the title of protector, had aſſumed over the nation. They arraigned his new dignity with the greateſt freedom, and even his perſonal character and conduct did not eſcape without cenſure. The protector, enraged at this refractory ſpirit in the parliament, ſent for them to the painted chamber, and with an air of great authority inveighed againſt their proceedings, telling them, that nothing could be more abſurd than for them to diſpute his title; ſince the ſame inſtrument of government which made them a parliament, had inveſted him with the protectorſhip; that ſome points in the new government were ſuppoſed to be fundamentals, and were not, on any pretence, to be altered or diſputed; that among theſe were the government of the nation by one perſon and a parliament, their joint authority over the army and militia, the ſucceſſion of new parliaments, and liberty of conſcience; and that with regard to theſe particulars, there was reſerved to him a negative voice, to which in the other circumſtances of government, he confeſſed himſelf in no wiſe entitled. When the members returned to the houſe they found a guard at the door, which would not ſuffer any one to enter till he had firſt ſigned a recognition, by which he promiſed to be faithful to the commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland: and that he would never conſent to a change in the government eſtabliſhed under a protector and parliament. Moſt of the members, after ſome heſitation, ſubmitted to this condition; but retained the ſame refractory ſpirit, which they had diſcovered in their firſt debates. The Inſtrument o Government was examined article by article, wit the moſt ſcrupulous accuracy. The general approbation of the houſe was given thoſe who advanced th freeſt topics; and during the whole courſe of thei tranſactions, they neither took any notice of the protector, nor ſent him a ſingle bill for his approbation.

Cromwell was highly diſguſted at this behaviour o the parliament; and being informed that many o the members had joined in a conſpiracy with the diſcontented officers of the army, he determined t diſſolve an aſſembly ſo dangerous to his power. Ac cording to the Inſtrument of Government, fiv months were allowed every parliament to ſit befor it could be diſſolved; but Cromwell pretended tha a month contained only twenty-eight days; and th full time, according to this method of reckonin being elapſed, they were again ordered to attend th protector in the painted chamber, where, after a lon and angry harangue, he diſmiſſed the aſſembly.

The meeting of a diſcontented parliament is alway a ſure ſign of a diſcontented nation: the haſty an abrubt diſſolution of ſuch a parliament never fails inflame the diſcontent to a higher degree of mali nity. The members of this aſſembly returning their ſeveral counties, carried along with them th ſpirit of diſaffection which they had diſcovered in t houſe. The royaliſts ſeeing this took advantage it, and could no longer be held in ſubjection: th raſhly imagined that every one who was diſpleaſ muſt, like them, have adopted the ſame views a intereſt. This falſe notion urged them on to prac ces which, in the end, ſubjected them and th friends to the ſevereſt vengeance.

A. D. 1655. In the beginning of this year a co ſpiracy was formed in various parts of the kingdo and a day for a general riſing was appointed. Cro well was informed of the deſign. Thurloe, his cretary had ſpies in every part of the kingdom; a the protector's government was extremely vigila Many of the royaliſts were apprehended and thro into priſon. Others, as the day appointed approac ed, were ſeized with terror, and abandoned the p ject. In one place only, the conſpiracy broke into action. Penruddoc, Groves, Jones, and ot gentlemen in the weſt, entered Saliſbury at the v time when the ſheriff and judges were holding aſſizes. Theſe they made priſoners, and proclaim the king. But, contrary to their expectations, fi ing the people not diſpoſed to join them, they march farther weſtward, and being purſued by a troop horſe, they were defeated, and moſt of them ta priſon priſoners. The leaders of the conſpiracy were put to death; and the reſt were ſold for ſlaves, and tranſported to Barbadoes.

* On the ſame day (July 10, 1654.) were executed two gentlemen of the names of Gerard and Vowel, who had been condemned for high-treaſon in conſpiring the death of the protector. The former was beheaded on the ſame ſcaffold with the Po gueſe ambaſſador's brother, and the latter was hanged at Meuſe Gate.

The failure of this attempt of the royaliſts only tended to eſtabliſh the power of the protector; the people were fearſul of oppoſing a man, who was ſo conſtantly attended with ſucceſs. Cromwell even regarded the inſurrection itſelf as a fortunate event; becauſe it demonſtrated the reality of theſe conſpiracies, which his enemies always repreſented as mere fictions, invented ſolely to varniſh over his ſeverities. It ſerved another purpoſe: it enabled him to extort large ſums from the royaliſts, under pretence of making them pay the expences incurred by their mutinous diſpoſitions. He iſſued an edict for exacting the tenth penny on all their eſtates: and in order to collect an impoſition at once ſo oppreſſive and iniquitous, he inſtituted ten major-generals, and divided the kingdom into ſo many military juriſdictions. Theſe men, aſſiſted by commiſſioners, were impowered to lay any perſon they pleaſed under the tax of decimation, to levy all the impoſts ſettled by the protector and his council, and to impriſon any perſon whom they ſhould ſuſpect to be enemies to the government. Nor was there any appeal from their arbitrary judgment but to the protector himſelf in council. Deſpotiſm now appeared openly to preſide over the Engliſh; the very maſk of liberty was thrown aſide. Veſted with ſuch unlimited power, theſe major-generals became ſo many tyrants, and oppreſſed the people to ſuch a degree, that Cromwell thought proper firſt to reſtrain, and afterwards totally to aboliſh them; but not till they had fully anſwered his purpoſe on the royaliſts, not one of whom durſt publicly avow his principles.

While Cromwell was thus reigning abſolute in England, the royal family ſuffered the utmoſt diſtreſs at Paris. The queen had, indeed, a moderate penſion aſſigned her; but it was ſo ill paid, and her credit ſo low in that capital, that ſhe complained one morning to cardinal de Retz, that her daughter, the princeſs Henrietta, was obliged to be a-bed for want of a fire to warm her. Cromwell, deſirous of humbling the pride and power of France, pretended to reſent the protection which the royal family received in that kingdom, though ſurely ſuch treatment deſerved not his anger: it muſt have excited pity in an ingenuous breaſt. Cromwell, however, thought otherwiſe; and the merchants having complained that ſome of their ſhips had been ſtopped and ſearched by the French, he iſſued letters of repriſal; and Blake ſeized a whole fleet of merchant ſhips, loaded with proviſions and ſtores for Dunkirk, then beſieged by the Spaniards.

The court of France were greatly alarmed at theſe hoſtile proceedings; and in order to remove every cauſe of complaint, they treated Charles with ſuch neglect that he thought it prudent to withdraw, in order to prevent the indignity of being deſired to leave the kingdom. He firſt retired to Spaw, and afterwards to Cologne, where he reſided two years on a ſmall penſion paid him by the king of France, and a few ſubſcriptions ſent him by his friends in England. His chief friends and confidents were Sir Edward Hyde, created lord chancellor, and the marquis of Ormond. This puſillanimous behaviour in the court of France produced at laſt the deſired effect, and the protector ſigned a peace with that kingdom.

The Spaniſh court had paid every ſubmiſſion to the Engliſh government, and even endeavoured to form an alliance, offenſive and defenſive, with the protector; but failing in the attempt, endeavours were uſed to make a breach between England and France. Cromwell was no ſtranger to theſe intrigues, but made no complaints to Cardenas, the Spaniſh miniſter. A powerful fleet was, however, fitted out, and all Europe were held in ſuſpence with regard to its deſtination. The Spaniards ſeemed not the leaſt alarmed; thy never ſuſpected that it was intended to attack their ſettlements in the New World. At laſt two ſtrong ſquadrons ſailed from England, one commanded by Penn, and the other by Blake. The former was deſtined to the Weſt-Indies, the latter to act in the Mediterranean. And what is ſtill more remarkable, Blake had orders to aſſiſt the Spaniards in Europe, and Penn to diſtreſs them in America.

When Blake arrived in the Bay of Gadiz, he undertook to ſerve the Spaniards againſt the duke of Guiſe, who then threatened to make a deſcent on Naples, and was fortunate enough to eſcape the Engliſh fleet.

Blake ſoon after directed his courſe towards Africa, in order to demand ſatisfaction from the piratical ſtates of Barbary for the inſults and depredations they had committed on the Engliſh. On his arrival at Trepano, he detached ſeveral frigates to block up the Tuniſine ſhips at Porto Farino. Terrified at the appearance of Blake, the Dey of Algiers deſired to make a peace with the protector, and agreed to reſtrain his piratical ſubjects from committing any farther violences on the Engliſh. But he was treated in a very different manner by the Dey of Tunis. On preſenting himſelf before that port, and making the ſame demands, the Dey, pointing to the caſtles of Porto Farino and Goletto, dared him to do his worſt. The courage of Blake needed not this bravado to rouſe it into action: he laid the broadſides of his ſhips almoſt cloſe to the caſtles, and ſoon tore them in pieces with his artillery. While this furious attack was carrying on, he ſent a ſtrong detachment of ſeamen in their long boats up the harbour, and burnt every ſhip that lay there. Terrified and aſtoniſhed at an action hitherto conſidered as impoſſible, the Tuniſines were convinced that they had acted very imprudently; they agreed to make the required ſatisfaction, and courted the friendſhip of a man whoſe valour had filled the African ſtates with wonder and aſtoniſhment.

Penn's expedition, however, was far from being equally ſuceeſsful. His fleet conſiſted of 30 ſhips of war, and a great number of tranſports, on board of which were 5000 land forces under the command of colonel Venables. They were joined by about 5000 more at Barbadoes and St. Chriſtopher's. But the two commanders, though they both favoured monarchy, were of very different tempers. The troops were ill provided with arms, ammunition, and proviſions: they were the refuſe of the whole army, and thoſe inliſted in the Weſt-Indies the moſt profligate of mankind. Before the fleet and army ſailed from St. Chriſtopher's, a proclamation was publiſhed, by which it was declared, that neither the ſoldiers nor ſailors were to have any ſhare of the plunder; but, as an equivalent, to receive a fortnight's pay. This was certainly a very imprudent ſtep, as it deprived them of the only incentive to courage and reſolution.

On the 20th of April the fleet arrived at the iſland of Hiſpaniola; and it was determined by the admiral and general to attack St. Domingo, the capital, and indeed the only place of ſtrength in the iſland; but this was over-ruled by the commiſſioners whom the protector had ſent on board the fleet, to regulate its operations, and act as ſpies on the conduct of both commanders. This oppoſition of the commiſſioners proved the ruin of the expedition. A ſmall part of the fleet was ordered to lie before the capital, to amuſe the enemy, while the main body of the forces were landed at Baſſado-bay, where the proclamations againſt plundering was again renewed. This threw ſuch a damp upon the ſpirits of the ſoldiers, that all the courage and intrepidity of their officers could not remove. In the mean time, colonel Buller had landed about ten miles from St. Domingo, at the head of the troops that had been left on board the ſhips to amuſe the enemy. It had been agreed, that Buller ſhould wait till he was joined by Venables, in order to attack a fort ſituated between them and the capital. But the enemy abandoning the fortreſs at the appearance of the Engliſh, Buller purſued his march towards St. Domingo, and encamped at ſome diſtance from a ſtrong fort, which formed the principal defence of the place. While Buller continued in his camp, Venables was obliged, during four days, to purſue a very fatiguing and diſcouraging march of near forty miles through an unknown and deſart country; and his men were ſcarce able to ſupport themſelves from the heat of the climate and the want of water.

By this time the Spaniards had recovered from their conſternation; and having drawn together a conſiderable body of forces, lined the woods with ſtrong ambuſcades, by which great numbers of the Engliſh were cut off in their march. Notwithſtanding this, the Engliſh attacked them with ſuch intrepidity, that they were driven from their faſtneſſes into the fort; and had not the Engliſh, through thirſt and faintneſs, been obliged to defer the attack of the fort, both that and the town itſelf muſt have fallen that very night into their hands. Nor could they continue on the ſpot where Buller was encamped for want of water; but were obliged to march to the place where that commander landed, where they continued till the 25th of Auguſt, under inexpreſſible hardſhips. Captain Cox, their principal guide, was ſlain; their bread was mouldy and ſcarce; their proviſions ſalt and rotten; their arms in very bad condition; one of their regiments gave evident ſigns of mutiny; no harmony ſubſiſted between their two principal commanders; and a peſtilential diſeaſe raged both in their fleet and camp. They, however, marched on the 26th of April, to attack the fort; captain Jackſon, who commanded the van, led his men, either incautiouſly or treacherouſly, into a defile, lined on each ſide by the enemies troops. The Engliſh had advanced ſo far before they perceived their danger, that they were expoſed to the whole fire of the Spaniards, without being able to return it with any effect; and every man of them muſt have been cut off, had not colonel Haynes at the head of a detachment of his regiment, puſhed into the wood, and diſlodged the enemy by attacking them in flank. Haynes himſelf was killed after diſplaying amazing efforts of valour, together with moſt of the officers, and 500 ſoldiers. The diverſion of Haynes enabled Venables to attack the enemy with advantage, and drive them into the fort. But the next morning it was found, that the only mortar-piece in the army was unfit for ſervice, and without a bombardment there were no hopes of ſucceſs. It was therefore determined to abandon the enterprize, and re-embark the forces.

In order to make ſome amends for this miſcarriage, the fleet ſailed to Jamaica, which they conquered almoſt without oppoſition, and took poſſeſſion of it in the name of the Engliſh republic on the ſecond of June. Having left ſome troops on the iſland, they returned to England about the beginning of September; and the Protector was ſo exaſperated at their having failed in their attempt on Hiſpaniola, that he ordered Penn and Venables to be ſent to the Tower; but they were ſoon after releaſed. In the mean time care was taken to reinforce the garriſon of Jamaica, which ſoon after became what it ſtill continues, a flouriſhing and wealthy colony.

A. D. 1656. When the Spaniards were informed of the depredations made by the Engliſh in the West-Indies, they immediately declared war againſt the Protector, and ſeized all the goods and ſhipping belonging to the Engliſh merchants in the territories of Spain. The commerce with that kingdom, ſo advantageous to the nation, was now entirely at an end, and near 1500 merchantmen fell into the hands of the enemy.

In conſequence of this, Blake received orders to begin hoſtilities againſt the Spaniards, and exert al his abilities to intercept their Plate fleet. He cruized for ſome time off Cadiz, in expectation of meeting with it; but being at laſt diſtreſſed for want o water, he was obliged to ſail towards Portugal, in order to procure a ſupply. Soon after his departure captain Stayner, whom he had left off the Spaniſ coaſt with a ſquadron of ſeven ſhips, came in ſigh of the galleons, and crowded all the ſail he coul carry, in order to come up with them; but befor this could be effected, the Spaniſh admiral ran hi ſhip aſhore, and was followed by two others. Th reſt were following the example, but were taken b the Engliſh, and valued at near two million of piec of eight. The two galleons on ſhore were ſet o fire; and the marquis of Bajadox, viceroy of Per with his wife and daughter, periſhed in the flames.

This ſucceſs greatly contributed to increaſe the p pularity of Cromwell's government; and he too care to diſplay all the advantages of the acquiſition, b ordering the treaſure taken in the galleons to b brought up from Portſmouth to London by land. B fore this welcome ſupply arrived, Cromwell had bee reduced to the utmoſt diſtreſs for want of money, a ſeverely laſhed in ſeveral pamphlets by ſome of t members of the long parliament. He had, indee laid exceſſive impoſitions on the royaliſts, and pu liſhed ſeveral rigorous edicts for collecting the publ taxes; but all theſe reſources were not ſufficient to d fray the expences of government.

Blake had not been long returned from the co of Portugal, before he received adviced that Spaniſh fleet of ſixteen ſhips, much richer than former, had taken ſhelter in the bay of Santa Cr in one of the Canary iſlands. Blake immediat ſailed thither; and ſoon found that his intelligence h not deceived him; but he perceived that every p caution had been taken to render any attempt up the galleons abortive. The ſmaller ſhips were moo cloſe to the ſhore, under the numerous cannon o ſtrong caſtle, and ſeven ſmaller batteries well moun with artillery, and a line of communication runn between them all. Six large galleons lay near entrance of this harbour, a ſtrong boom being dra acroſs its mouth, fitted up like floating batteries, their broadſides towards the Engliſh. Blake ſurvey the batteries with the cloſeſt attention, but was ra animated than daunted by the danger. He calle council of war, and it was unanimouſly determine burn the Spaniſh galleons. Blake himſelf underto the attack of the large ſhips and forts, while Stay attempted to force his way into the harbour.

Accordingly, as ſoon as the morning appea Stayner, in the Speaker frigate, ſtood into the with his ſquadron, while Blake attacked the forts galleons. The dreadful ſcene that followed is e imagined than deſcribed. The Spaniards themſe believed it to be the effect of fiends rather than of m and thanked heaven they could loſe no part of t honour in the action, as they were born to fight men, and not with devils. Every circumſta tended to confirm them in that deluſion. The t dering of Blake's cannon; the fury of his ſai who ruſhed amidſt the thickeſt of the enemy's fir if they had been invulnerable, and ſeemed to their ſafety in the mouth of danger; the ſhouts of aſſailants, and the groans of the wounded, hear the ſhort intervals between the roaring of the artill and, at laſt, the flames of their own ſhips, burſting through the clouds of ſmoak, and lighting up the dreadful ſcene of death and ruin, convinced the Spaniards that all oppoſition was in vain; they thought it would be madneſs to oppoſe force and courage to a ſupernatural power. The fire from their forts abated; their troops were driven from their intrenchments; their harbour was in the poſſeſſion of the Engliſh, and their ſhips totally abandoned; ſo that not one of them eſcaped the flames, except two which had been ſunk in the action.

But the greateſt danger ſtill attended the Engliſh; the wind blew right into the bay; and their eagerneſs had carried them ſo near the ſhore, that their ſhips muſt have been deſtroyed, had not the wind, by ſuddenly ſhifting, removed all their fears, and carried them beyond the reach of danger. Though this action was remarkably ſevere, and though the Engliſh expoſed themſelves to the thickeſt of the enemy's fire, they had only 48 men killed, and 110 wounded. The loſs of the Spaniards, both in men and ſhips, was very great; and the latter, for ſome time, irrepairable.

This was at once the greateſt and laſt action of the intrepid Blake. His health had been, for ſome time, declining, and he now obtained permiſſion to return; but he unfortunately died on his paſſage. He was always conſidered as one of the greateſt men this country ever produced. Though a ſtrict republican in principles, he always enjoyed the confidence of Cromwell. "We ſhould fight for our country, ſaid he, into whatever hands the government may fall." The ſtrongeſt proof of his merit is, that, in the midſt of ſo many jarring, and even hoſtile factions, he was univerſally eſteemed. His remains were interred with great funeral pomp in Henry the VIIth's chapel, the expences of which were defrayed by the Protector.

As Cromwell had always been deſirous of giving the power he had uſurped the ſanction of a legal eſtabliſhment, he now determined to make another attempt to effect it. He accordingly aſſembled a parliament compoſed of the repreſentatives of the three kingdoms. Ireland and Scotland, reduced to a ſtate of ſlavery, nominated ſuch members as were conformable to his wiſhes. But the ſpirit of the Engliſh was not yet ſufficiently ſubdued to ſubmit to his arbitrary directions. He ſoon perceived that many of the diſſatisfied members in the laſt parliament were again returned, and began to fear they would be too powerful for his friends. In order, therefore, to ſecure a majority, he excluded an hundred ſuſpected members; and thus made himſelf maſter of the parliament.

A. D. 1657. Every thing now went on to the wiſhes of Cromwell; for though there was ſtill a ſtrong oppoſition, the majority was on the ſide of the Protector's friends. The firſt material buſineſs executed was, the abrogating all the titles of Charles Stuart and his family. This being effected, it was moved that the Protector ſhould have the title of king; and after a very warm debate it was carried that a bill ſhould be brought in for that purpoſe. It was urged that the Engliſh conſtitution neceſſarily ſuppoſed a royal authority; that the laws admitted not of a Protector except during a minority, and had not fixed the prerogatives of the functions of that office; that to remove all appearance of arbitrary power, the only method was to have recourſe to a title which the nation had always reſpected; and that this was the more practicable, as an expreſs law of Henry VII. had provided for the ſecurity of thoſe who defended the reigning prince; a ſufficient proof that the legiſlation depended more on the form of government, that on the birthright of the ſupreme magiſtrate.

This bill was violently oppoſed by Lambert, the major-generals, and all the republican party. But being unable to anſwer the above arguments, they had recourſe to a very tumultuous behaviour, which ſufficiently convinced Cromwell, that unleſs he could prevail with the officers of the army to join with the majority in parliament, he muſt renounce the honour he ſo ardently wiſhed to obtain. No arts were left untried to bring Lambert over to his purpoſe, but in vain. Fleetwood and Deſborough were alſo averſe to his accepting the title of king; and declared, if the bill paſſed, and received the aſſent of the Protector, they would immediately reſign their commiſſions.

Notwithſtanding, however, this oppoſition, the houſe proceeded in their deſign; and at laſt, after a long and violent debate, it was voted, "That his highneſs will be pleaſed to aſſume the name, ſtile, title, dignity, and office of king of England, Scotland and Ireland, and the reſpective dominions thereunto belonging, and to exerciſe the ſame according to the laws of theſe nations." A committee was now appointed to reaſon with the Protector, and, if poſſible, overcome thoſe ſcruples, which he pretended he entertained againſt accepting ſo diſtinguiſhed an honour.

Though the reaſons urged by the committee were of the moſt forcible nature, they were ſtrongly oppoſed by Cromwell. But his oppoſition proceeded not from the impropriety of his accepting the offer. He was well pleaſed with the ſolidity of their arguments; and his inclination, as well as judgment, was entirely on the ſide of the committee. But the oppoſition of his friends, and that of the army, terrified him. He knew the office of king had been painted in ſuch horrid colours, that there were no hopes of reconciling the ſoldiers to it ſuddenly, even though beſtowed upon their general, to whom they were ſo remarkably devoted. He knew that the tranſition between coldneſs and averſion was very ſmall; that they who had loved with the greateſt affection, hated with the moſt deadly rancour; and it was impoſſible to foreſee what diſappointment and deſpair might occaſion. Some already talked of dividing England into a new heptarchy, to be governed by the chief officers of the army. Even this ſtrange deſign the republicans would rather have adopted, than agree to Cromwell's accepting of the royal dignity. He was alſo fearful, that when the queſtion regarded only perſons, not forms of government, no one would any longer balance between the antient royal family and an ignoble perſon, who had waded to the throne through a torrent of blood.

Suſpended between theſe fears and his own ardent deſires, Cromwell protracted the time, and ſeemed ſtill to oppoſe the reaſons of the committee, hoping that he might be able, by artifice, to reconcile the minds of the ſoldiers to his new dignity. His elocution was always confuſed; but now, when he reaſoned in contradiction to his own judgment and inclination, it was in tenfold darkneſs. At length, however, after much perplexity, occaſioned by a long and tedious ſeries of doubts, he was obliged to refuſe that crown he ſo ardently wiſhed to receive, and which the repreſentatives of the nation had tendered him in the moſt ſolemn manner.

On this refuſal, the parliament found it neceſſary to retain the name of Commonwealth and Protector; but as the government had hitherto been a manifeſt uſurpation, it was thought neceſſary to give it a parliamentary ſanction. To effect this, it was proper to ſet aſide the Inſtrument of Government, which had been drawn up by the general officers only, and ſubſtitute another in its ſtead. This was accordingly done, and a new inſtrument of government was framed, under the title of "An Humble Petition and Advice;" by which Cromwell was confirmed in his dignity of Protector, and his authority legally aſcertained.

By this deed, which conſiſted of forty-two articles, the authority of the Protector was in ſome things augmented; but in others it was conſiderably diminiſhed. He was empowered to name his ſucceſſor: he had a perpetual revenue ſettled on him of 100,000l. a year, a million a year for the fleet and army, and 300,000l. for the civil government, beſides what ſums ſhould be occaſionally raiſed by the parliament. He was allowed to appoint another houſe, the members of which ſhould enjoy their ſeats during life, and exerciſe ſome functions of the former houſe of peers. On the other hand, his power of framing laws with the conſent of his council, during the receſs of parliament, was abrogated; and it was eſtabliſhed, that no member of either houſe ſhould be excluded but by the conſent of that houſe of which he was a member. The other articles received very little alteration, remaining the ſame in ſubſtance as in the firſt Inſtrument of Government.

Cromwell having obtained this parliamentary ſanction of his authority, reſolved to conſecrate his title by a new inaguration, which was performed with great pomp and ceremony in Weſtminſter-hall, on the 26th of June; and on the ſame day he prorogued the parliament to the 20th of January.

The ſituation of Cromwell was now very critical. He had, indeed, obtained the diſpoſal of a very large revenue; but great difficulties attended it. His acceptance of the office and title of Protector had not leſſened them, and the force he put upon the parliament, by excluding ſo many of the members, was univerſally condemned. Even thoſe who were moſt deſirous of a ſettlement, upon almoſt any terms, and would have been contented, for the ſake of a permanent government, to have ſubmitted to his authority, either as king or protector, entertained many ſcruples with regard to the legality of the proceedings of a parliament, which ſat under a viſible force. Cromwell found that theſe ſcruples were invincible, and his enemies having already felt his ſeverity, he was now determined they ſhould taſte his clemency. Lambert was allowed a penſion of 4000l. a year. Ludlow was ſuffered to reſide in his own houſe; Sir Henry Vane was releaſed from his confinement in Cariſbrook-caſtle, and he determined to ſuffer the ſecluded members to take their ſeats the next ſeſſion of parliament.

In the mean time Cromwell applied himſelf cloſely to the formation of his upper houſe of parliament, which was to conſiſt of 60 members, among whom were five or ſix antient peers, and ſeveral gentlemen of fortune and diſtinction; the reſt were officers of the army, who had riſen from the dregs of the people; all the antient peers, however, refuſed to accept a ſeat, which they muſt ſhare with ſuch companions as were aſſigned them.

The parliament met according to its prorogation, when the Protector, in order to maintain the appearance of a legal magiſtrate, removed the guards from the doors of both houſes. The firſt ſubject of deliberation among the commons was, the illegality of excluding ſo many of their members during the laſt ſeſſion of parliament. In this debate it was confidently affirmed, that there could be no free parliament under ſuch a force, and therefore, that the Humble Petition and Advice, together with all that had been done in conſequence of it, were invalid; nor were they obliged to take any notice of the other houſe. Cromwell, by taking ſo many of his friends and adherents from the lower houſe, in order to form the upper, had loſt the majority among the national repreſentatives. The enemies of the Protector were ſoon ſenſible of their power; they made and carried a motion not t acknowledge the juriſdiction of the other houſ which Cromwell had eſtabliſhed.

A. D. 1658. While the commons were thus oppoſing the arbitrary proceedings of the governmen a petition was preparing in the city for taking th power of the militia out of the Protector's hands Exaſperated at theſe meaſures, Cromwell ſent a very ſharp meſſage to the commons, acquainting them that he expected they would give the ſame appellation, and pay the ſame attention to the lords, a had been given or paid to any houſe of peers in England. But the commons, inſtigated by Lambert and Haſlerigg within doors, and by Harriſon and the fift monarchy-men without, paid no regard to his threat or his authority.

Cromwell was now ſufficiently exaſperated, and without conſulting any perſon, took a common coach and with no more than four or five of his guards and attended by his nephew and a lieutenant colone hurried to the houſe of peers, where he whiſpere Fleetwood, that he was come to diſſolve the parliament. Fleetwood, who ſeems to have acted in conſort with the malecontents, uſed every argument i his power to diſſuade Cromwell from his purpoſe He deſired him to reflect a moment on the dreadfu conſequences that had generally attended a haſty diſſolution of the parliament. But Cromwell, withou paying any attention to his arguments, laid his han upon his breaſt, and ſwore by the living God the ſhould not ſit a moment longer. He accordingly ſen a meſſage to the commons commanding their attendance in the houſe of peers, where, after a very reproachful ſpeech, he diſſolved the parliament.

This precipitate action, which in any other perſo would have been conſidered as an indication of madneſs, was, in this extraordinary man, a meaſure a once both bold and neceſſary, and prompted by tha genius which ſeldom or never forſook him But notwithſtanding all his power, his abilities, and the terror of his name, he was now ſurrounded with danger both open and ſecret. The fifth monarchy-men ha long been his avowed enemies. They pretended t aboliſh all taxes, cuſtoms, tythes, and every othe burthen laid upon the people. They held their meetings at Mile End, and though they were in genera perſons of the loweſt condition, they were bold bloody and deſperate. They depended greatly o major-general Harriſon, admiral Lawſon, and th colonels Rich, Danvers and Okey, to head them They had even their cabals and correſpondents i every part of the kingdom. But Cromwell's intrepidity, and Thurloe's excellent intelligence, rendere all their ſchemes abortive; and about ten of the mo deſperate among them being ſeized in the midſt o their conſultations, were tried, condemned, and executed.

This well-timed action, however, did not put a end to the cabals. Cromwell perceived that the po ſon had reached much farther than he expecte Several of the officers of the army, and even ſom of them who ſerved about his perſon, became ſulle and gloomy: a ſure indication that they were forming ſome dangerous deſign. The Protector therefo aſſembled all the officers near London, among who major Packer, and moſt of the captains of his ow regiment were chiefly ſuſpected. Cromwell repaire to the meeting, and in a very authoritative tone o voice demanded whether they were willing to ſerv him againſt his enemies? Over-awed by the preſenc of their general, they continued ſilent for ſome tim at laſt they ſaid, they were ready to ſerve him upo the footing of "the good old cauſe." Cromwell trea ed that expreſſion with great contempt, and after aſkin what they meant by uſing it now, he immediately di miſſed them from their poſts in the army, and gave their commiſſions to others whom he knew he could truſt. This inſtance of firmneſs and ſeverity produced the deſired effect; the reſt of the officers promiſing to obey him with great alacrity.

During theſe tranſactions the Spaniards, who were deſirous of diſtreſſing the Engliſh government, invited Charles to Bruges, where he appeared at the head of 4000 men, cheifly Engliſh, formed into four regiments. This revived the hopes of the royaliſts, and a general inſurrection was projected. Ormond was ſecretly diſpatched to England, in order to concert meaſures for the execution of this deſign. Lord Fairfax, Sir William Waller, and ſeveral more of the leaders of the preſbyterian party had ſecretly entered into the engagement. The army was ſtill infected with the general ſpirit of diſcontent; and, after the Protector's violent breach with the late parliament, no hopes remained of founding his power on the baſis of legiſlative authority.

But notwithſtanding all theſe promiſing circumſtances, the coſpiracy of the royaliſts was rendered abortive. Cromwell was informed of their deſign before it was ripe for execution. The marquis of Ormond was obliged to fly to the continent; and great numbers of the royaliſts were thrown into priſon. Sir Henry Slingſby, and Dr. Huet, were condemned and beheaded; and Mordant, brother to the earl of Peterborough, eſcaped the ſame fate merely by the accident of colonel Pride's being abſent, till the ſentence was pronounced in his favour. For the numbers were equal, and Pride, who was his declared enemy, entered the court juſt as the preſident had finiſhed his determination.

Nor was Cromwell free from the fears of aſſaſſination. Sindercombe, one of the fifth monarchy-men had undertaken to murder him, and it was only by the intervention of the moſt unaccountable accidents that he was prevented from executing his bloody purpoſe. His deſign was at laſt diſcovered; but though the cleareſt proof of his guilt was apparent to the jury, and though every man held the crime of which he was accuſed in the utmoſt deteſtation, it was not without the greateſt difficulty they could be prevailed upon to find him guilty; ſo much were they diſſatiſfied with the Protector's right of ſupreme government of the nation.

This incident gave great uneaſineſs to Cromwell, more eſpecially as Sindercombe refuſed to diſcover any of his accomplices. He was in continual dread of being aſſaſſinated by the hands of fanatical or intereſted perſons, and felt ſuch a perturbation of ſpirit as left him not a moment's eaſe. He wore defenſive armour under his cloaths, always kept a loaded piſtol in his pocket, and never lay twice in one room.

Theſe diſtreſſes of his mind were farther increaſed by the death of his beloved daughter Mrs. Claypole, a lady endued with every humane virtue, and the moſt amiable accompliſhments. She had entertained the higheſt regard for Dr. Huet, and made the moſt preſſing ſolicitations to her father to ſave his life; but being refuſed his pardon, her temper, which was always inclined to melancholy, preyed upon her health; and after uſing the moſt preſſing remonſtrances to awaken the protector into a compunction for the henious crimes into which his ambition had betrayed him, ſhe paid the debt of nature amidſt the tears of all who were friends to virtue. Her death moſt ſenſibly affected Cromwell; and her words now obtained their full force; for they embittered, in the moſt feeling manner, the ſmall remainder of his life. This tyrannical uſurper began to perceive, when it was too late, that the purſuits of ambition are not the purſuits of peace. His compoſure and tranquillity of mind were now fled for ever. He ſaw that all his neareſt and moſt beloved friends, Fleetwood, Deſborough, Claypole, and Falconbridge, abhorred his principles; and he who had ſo lately the whole army at his call, could now hardly find five men in the whole nation to ſecond his favourite deſigns. He was become a bankrupt both in his government and his private fortune; and notwithſtanding all the mighty things he had done, he found himſelf no better than a ſplendid wretch ſurrounded with misfortunes, which the ſmalleſt grain of genuine virtue in his former career of glory might either have prevented or removed. His diſſimulation was at once ſo groſs and odious, that had he now actually returned to the paths of virtue, not a man in England would have thought him ſincere; even his profeſſing it could only have tended to heighten the general contempt of the people.

About the middle of Auguſt Cromwell was ſeized with the gout, which confined him for ſome days, and ſhifted from his foot into his body. On the 24th of the ſame month he had a ſlow fever, which ſoon after changed in a tertian ague. No dangerous ſymptoms, however, appeared for ſome time, and he was even able to walk abroad during the intervals between the fits. But the fever, as well as the force of the paroxyſm of the diſeaſe, increaſing at every return, Cromwell himſelf began to be apprehenſive that his end was approaching. His thoughts were now turned towards a future ſtate, which had formerly been the conſtant ſubject of his contemplations; but which the continual wars and affairs of government had for ſome time totally interrupted. Goodwin, one of his enthuſiaſtic preachers, conſtantly attended him, and endeavoured to remove from his mind that deſpondency in which he was now involved. One day, when he was cloſely engaged in this pious converſation, Cromwell aſked him, with great emotion, “whether it was poſſible for the elect to fall, or ſuffer a final reprobation?” “Impoſſible,” replied the preacher. “Then,” cried Cromwell, with an air of ſatisfaction, “I am ſafe; for I am ſure I was once in a ſtate of grace.”

The phyſicians, ſenſible of the dangerous condition of the Protector, were continually intimating to thoſe about him, and even often to himſelf, that they thought it highly prudent to ſettle the affairs of government. On the other hand, his chaplains by their prayers, viſions, and revelations, inſpired him with ſuch hopes, that he believed he was no longer in danger. “I ſhall not die of this diſtemper,” ſaid he one day to his phyſicians; “I am well aſſured of my recovery. My ſupplications have prevailed; I am promiſed from the Lord.” Thoſe ſtrange enthuſiaſtic notions ſeem to have prevailed among all his friends. “The lord,” ſaid Fleetwood, in a letter to Henry Cromwell, “will ſoon reſtore him, and bring him forth with more vigour, life and zeal. His highneſs has himſelf had very great diſcoveries from the Lord. He hath received aſſurances of his being reſtored, and of being farther ſerviceable in the great work he hath begun.” Goodwin was ſo thoroughly convinced of his being in no danger of death, that he uſed the following expreſſion in his prayer: “Lord we beg not for his recovery, for that thou haſt already granted and aſſured us of, but for his ſpeedy recovery.” Even when the phyſicians abſolutely deſpaired of his being able to ſupport the next fit of his diſeaſe, Thurloe has the following expreſſion in his diſpatch to Henry Cromwell, “That which is ſome ground of hope is, that the Lord has, as on ſome former occaſions, given to himſelf a particular aſſurance, that he ſhall yet live to ſerve him, and to carry on the great work he hath put into his hands.”

At length, however, the phyſicians unanimouſly declared that there were no hopes. This information ſufficiently alarmed the council; and a deputation was ſent to know his pleaſure with regard to the ſucceſſion. But before they reached his apartment, he was ſpeechleſs and almoſt inſenſible. They aſked whether he did not intend that his eldeſt ſon Richard ſhould ſucceed him; and a ſimple affirmation was, or ſeemed to be, extorted from him. He lived only a few minutes after, paying the debt of nature on the 3d of September, in the 60th year of his age, and 5th of his Protectorſhip*. He was buried with great funeral pomp in Weſtminſter-abbey.

With reſpect to the character of Cromwell, it has been in a very particular manner diſplayed both by his friends and enemies. That drawn by the former ſeems dictated by panegyric, and the latter by invective. It muſt, however, be acknowledged, that both carry the ſtrongeſt air of probability, becauſe they are ſupported by ſtriking circumſtances in his conduct and fortune. ‘What, ſay his friends, can be more extraordinary, than that a perſon, of private birth and education, no fortune, no eminent qualities of body which have ſometimes, nor ſhining talents of mind, which have often raiſed men to the higheſt dignities, ſhould have the courage to attempt, and the abilities to execute ſo extraordinary a deſign as the ſubverting one of the moſt antient and beſt eſtabliſhed monarchies in the world? That he ſhould have the power and boldneſs to put his prince and maſter to an open and infamous death? Should baniſh that numerous and ſtrongly allied family? Cover all theſe temerities under a ſeeming obedience to a parliament, in whoſe ſervice he pretended to be retained? Trample too upon that parliament in their turn, and ſcornfully expel them as ſoon as they gave him ground for diſſatisfaction? Erect in their place the dominion of the ſaints, and give reality to the moſt viſionary idea, which the heated imagination of any fanatic was ever able to entertain? Suppreſs that monſter in its infancy, and openly ſet up himſelf above all that ever attained the appellation of ſovereign in England! Overcome firſt his enemies by arms, and afterwards all his friends by artifice? Served all parties patiently for a while, and command them victoriouſly at laſt? Over run each corner of the three nations, and ſubdue with equal facility, both the riches of the ſouth and the poverty of the north? Be feared and courted by all foreign princes, and adopted a brother to gods upon earth? Call together parliaments with a word of his pen, and ſcatter them again with the breath of his mouth? Reduce to ſubjection a warlike and diſcontented nation, by means of a mutinous army? Command a mutinous army by means of ſeditious and factious officers? Be humbly and daily petitioned, that he would be pleaſed, at the rate of millions a year, to be hired as maſter of thoſe who had hired him before to be their ſervant? Have the eſtates and lives of three nations as much at his diſpoſal as was once the little inheritance of his father, and be noble and liberal in the ſpending of them? And laſtly (for there is no end of enumerating his glory) with one word bequeath all his power and ſplendor to his poſterity? Die poſſeſſed of peace at home and triumph abroad? Be buried among kings, and with more than regal ſolemnity? And leave a name behind him not to be extinguiſhed but with the whole world; which, as it was too little for his praiſe, ſo it might have ſtretched out to the extent of his immortal deſigns?’

On the other hand, his enemies have placed the actions of this extraordinary man in the moſt odious point of light. ‘What, ſay they, can be more ſuperlatively wicked than for a perſon to endeavour not only to exalt himſelf above, but to trample upon all his equals and ſuperiors? To pretend freedom for all men, and under the cloak of that pretence, to make all men his ſervants? To take up arms againſt taxes amounting to ſcarce 200,000l. a year, and to lay himſelf upon the nation the enormous load of above two millions? To quarrel for the loſs of three or four ears, and ſtrike off three or four thouſand heads? To fight againſt an imaginary ſuſpicion of two thouſand guards for the king to be fetched from no body knew were, and keep up for himſelf no leſs than forty thouſand? To pretend the defence of parliaments, and violently to diſſolve all, even thoſe of his own calling, and almoſt of his own chuſing? To undertake the reformation of religion, and on that pretence to ſtrip to the ſkin, and then to expoſe it naked to the rage of every ſect? To eſtabliſh councils of rapine and courts of murder? To fight againſt the king under a commiſſion for him? To take him out of the hands of thoſe for whom he had conquered him? To deceive him by proteſtations and vows of fidelity, and when he had effected his purpoſe, to put him to death, in the face of the world? To receive a commiſſion from the king and parliament, and murder the one and deſtroy the other? To fight againſt monarchy, when he declared for it, and to declare againſt, when he wiſhed to acquire it in his own perſon? To defame perfidiouſly, and ſupplant ungratefully his own general, and afterwards moſt of thoſe officers, who, with the loſs of their honour, had raiſed him to the ſummit of his unreaſonable ambition? To break his faith equally with his enemies and with his friends? To make as frequent uſe of the moſt ſolemn perjuries, as the common people of cuſtomary oaths? To uſurp three kingdoms without the leaſt ſhadow of pretenſions, and govern them as unjuſtly as they were acquired? To ſet himſelf up as an idol, and make the ſtreets of London reſemble the valley of Hinnom, by burning the bowels of men, as a ſacrifice to himſelf? To endeavour to entail this uſurpation upon poſterity, and with it an endleſs war upon the nation? And laſtly, by the ſevereſt judgment of the Almighty, to die hardened, mad, and without repentance, with the curſes of the preſent, and the deteſtation of all ſucceeding ages?’

Such are the different characters given of Cromwell, and both are founded on facts and circumſtances that cannot be controverted. But from the whole we may ſafely conclude, that he wanted nothing but honeſty to make him one of the greateſt men in the world†.

[*] On the day Cromwell died there was ſo dreadful a ſtorm all over Europe, that it ſeemed a great wreck of nature. This tempeſt happening at ſo critical a moment gave occaſion to many reflections both of his friends and enemies. The day on which he died was alſo ſingular for being the anniverſary of his great ſucceſſes at Dunbar and Worceſter, which he always conſidered as the moſt fortunate events of his whole life.

[†] Oliver Cromwell was born at Huntingdon, of a good family of Welſh extraction, their name being originally Williams; but one of his anceſtors marrying the ſiſter of the famous Thomas Cromwell, earl of Eſſex, in the reign of Henry VIII. a ſon by that marriage took that name, and tranſmitted it to his poſterity. Oliver married Elizabeth, daughter to Sir James Bourchier, by whom he had two ſons, Richard, who ſucceeded him, and Henry, lord-lieutenant of Ireland. He had alſo four daughters, viz. Bridget, married to lieutenant-general Ireton; Elizabeth, to John Claypole, eſq; of Northamptonſhire; Mary, to the lord viſcount Falconbridge; and Frances, to the honourable Robert Rich; all of them ladies poſſeſſed of the moſt diſtinguiſhed accompliſhments.

the ſtate; but this was far from being the caſe. The council, the army, the navy, and even the whole country at once, acknowledged Richard Cromwell, his ſon, Protector of the Commonwealth. He was a plain, indolent, good-natured young man, brought up in the country, at a diſtance from buſineſs and intrigue, and neither formed by inclination, inured by habit, nor aſſiſted by talents ſufficient to enable him to ſupply the place of his father. Henry Cromwell, who governed Ireland with great popularity and applauſe, inſured to his brother the obedience of that kingdom; and general Monk, whoſe authority was well eſtabliſhed in Scotland, proclaimed the new protector in the principal towns of that kingdom.

Addreſſes now flowed from all parts of the nation, and Richard was treated with the ſame reſpect as his father. But this external complaiſance among the fanatical leaders of the different parties was nothing better than a deceitful calm which ſuited the views of all, as a breathing-time for concerting plans to promote their own intereſts. No perſon could have been found more unexceptionable for this purpoſe than Richard. The republicans did not fear him, nor the royaliſts hate him; and his advancement was of the utmoſt conſequence to thoſe who were in the preſent poſſeſſion of the government. But a queſtion was ſoon ſtarted in the council, whether Richard, according to the tenor of the Humble Petition and Advice, was to be conſidered as general of the army. This was ſtriking at the very baſis of all his power, and the ſecret cabals againſt him were indefatigable in forming plans for his deſtruction.

A. D. 1659. As ſupplies were now wanting for the affairs of government, it was thought neceſſary to call a parliament. The Upper Houſe, or Houſe of Peers, conſiſted of the ſame perſons who had been nominated by Oliver himſelf, and thence conſidered as friends to his family. And in order to inſure a majority in the commons, it was thought neceſſary to reſtore to the old boroughs their former right of ſending members to parliament; while the counties were allowed no more than their accuſtomed members. By this means the miniſtry procured a majority in the lower as well as in the upper houſe, and all the members ſigned, without heſitation, an engagement not to alter the preſent mode of government.

In order more firmly to eſtabliſh the Protector's authority, ſecretary Thurloe preſented to the commons, "an act of recognization of his highneſs's right and title to be protector and chief magiſtrate of the commonwealth of England, Scotland and Ireland, and the dominions and territories thereunto belonging." This act was very artfully drawn, the recognitory part being expreſſed in general terms; but it contained a very particular and ample abjuration of the royal family. A ſmall debate only enſued on the firſt reading, but the republicans determined to oppoſe it with all their power when it came to be read a ſecond time. They ſaw that it virtually contained a recognition of the Petition and Advice, which they were determined, if poſſible, to ſet aſide, and conſequently deſtroy the baſis of the protector's government. Beſides the republican and miniſterial parties, there were two others in the houſe, who had views of their own, and though directly oppoſite to each other, agreed in one point, that of embarraſſing both the others. The firſt was compoſed of men of deſperate fortunes, and who wiſhed to ſee Fleetwood commander in chief of the army, hoping that the government would once more fall into the hands of the military, and both king and protector be excluded. The miniſterial party had, however, ſtill a majority in the houſe. But the proceedings of this parliament afford a memorable inſtance, that a dead majority in an Engliſh houſe of commons may carry their queſtions, and yet loſe their purpoſes. The republicans were much bolder and far better ſpeakers than their antagoniſts. In oppoſing this bill, they founded their arguments on the conſtitution ſettled immediately after the death of the late king, and Sir Henry Vane very pertinently obſerved, that if the government founded at that period was illegal, they were guilty of the blood of their late prince. The miniſterial party, on the other hand, went no farther back than the inſtrument of Petition and Advice, which they contended to be the laſt, and only legal conſtitution of government. But even admitting that poſition, they found themſelves embarraſſed with another difficulty, that of proving that the privileges and authority granted by that inſtrument to the protector were not perſonal, and terminated with his life. Even if they did not, the republicans contended, that a free parliament ought to have no regard to the whole, or any part of that inſtrument, becauſe it was voted by a power deſtructive of that conſtitution, which gave their aſſembly an exiſtence as a parliament. Their arguments had great effect upon the people, eſpecially as the anſwers given to them by the miniſterial party were far from being thought ſufficient.

Fleetwood, who had concealed his ambition under the veil of an obſequious behaviour to the new protector, could not help obſerving, that the army, by joining the republicans, might retrieve at once their power and popularity. But the greateſt art was neceſſary to form this connection, as the protector's influence among the troops was very powerful. It was therefore contrived between him and Deſborough, to introduce Lambert once more on the ſtage. That general ever ſince he had been deprived of his commiſſion, had lived retired at Wimbleton in Surry; but he no ſooner ſaw a proſpect of regaining his former authority, than he reſumed all his ambitious proſpects. Many of the principal officers in the army thought he had been ungenerouſly treated by the late protector, and his ſufferings had, in ſome meaſure, rendered him popular. Fleetwood therefore ſecretly made uſe of Lambert to ſtrengthen the diſcontented party among the officers, while Deſborough declared openly and violently for a republic. The meetings for carrying on their deſtructive ſchemes were held at Wallingford houſe, where Fleetwood reſided, and hence the aſſembly was called, "The Wallingford-houſe Cabal."

During theſe conſultations among the officers of the army, the debates in parliament were carried on with great vehemence by both parties. The republicans exerted all their power to have the militia and negative voice ſettled in the repreſentatives of the people, while the miniſterial party ſtrenuouſly inſiſted on recognizing the protector. Many expedients were propoſed for reconciling the two parties, but in vain; both continued firm to their principles. After the queſtion had been debated for ſeveral days with the utmoſt warmth and freedom, the miniſterial party carried their point, by a majority of 191 againſt 168. The republicans were not, however, diſcouraged. They procured the following reſolution to be agreed to by the houſe, viz. "That before the bill of recognization be committed, this houſe doth declare ſuch additional clauſe to be part of the bill, as may limit the power of the chief magiſtrate, and fully ſecure the right and privilege of parliament, and the liberties and rights of the people; and that neither this, nor any other previous vote, that is, or ſhall be paſſed, in order to this bill, ſhall be of force or binding to the people, till the whole bill is paſſed."

In the mean time Fleetwood had ſo far reconciled the differences that ſubſiſted between Lambert and Deſborough, that it was reſolved to preſent a remonſtrance to the protector on the preſent ſtate of affairs.

The inſtrument was accordingly preſented under the title of "The humble repreſentation of the general council of officers of the armies of England, Scotland and Ireland." In this remonſtrance the army complained, "that large arrears of pay were due to the ſoldiers, by which they were reduced to the greateſt neceſſity: that thoſe who had borne the burthen of the war, and undergone all the difficulties and dangers attending it, were now diſregarded, divided and laid aſide. That the good old cauſe was treated with contempt, and traduced by malignant and diſaffected perſons, who grew every day more inſolent, becauſe their numbers were every moment increaſing, by the return of their friends from foreign parts, and had now ſeveral meetings in the city of London: that the names of all thoſe who ſat as judges upon the late king had been printed and ſcattered in different parts of the kingdom, intimating that they were all conſigned to deſtruction: that many ſuits were commenced at common law againſt honeſt men, for what they had tranſacted in the wars as ſoldiers: that thoſe famous acts which had been performed by the long parliament, and the late Protector, were cenſured, railed at, and vilified. By theſe means, they ſaid, the good old cauſe, which they were reſolved to ſupport, was viſibly declined. And therefore they beſought his highneſs to repreſent their complaints to the parliament, and to require proper and ſpeedy remedies."

Richard immediately referred this petition to the commons, who affected to treat it with great contempt. They imagined that while they continued united with the Protector, their joint intereſt in the army would be abundantly ſufficient to ſilence the factious officers; but the puſillanimity of Richard rendered all their hopes abortive. For ſome time they took no notice of the petition; but upon receiving repeated accounts that the officers continued their meetings, and that it had been propoſed to ſeparate the military from the civil power, the commons voted "that during the ſitting of parliament, there ſhall be no general council or meeting of the officers of the army without the direction, leave and authority of his highneſs the lord protector, and both houſes of parliament. That no perſons ſhall have or continue any command or truſt in any of the armies or navies of England, Scotland or Ireland, or any of the dominions and territories thereunto belonging, who ſhall refuſe to ſubſcribe, that he will not diſturb or interrupt the free meetings of parliament, of any of the members of either houſe, or their freedom in their debates or councils."

The cabal of Wallingford-houſe were greatly incenſed at this reſolution of the commons; and they now ſeemed determined to carry things to extremity. Lord Broghill, aware of the conſequences, prevailed upon Richard to repair to one of their meetings, and command them to diſſolve. Surprized at this unexpected exertion of power in Richard, they immediately withdrew, but did not diſſolve. Fleetwood and Deſborough were now ſufficiently alarmed, and upbraided lord Broghill with his conduct in the houſe of peers, and even threatened him with an impeachment. But this did not in the leaſt intimidate Broghill; he threatened to move the houſe to know who had conſented to the calling of a council of war, without the knowledge and approbation of parliament.

Broghill's ſpeech was ſo well recived by the houſe, that the officers deſpaired of carrying any thing in parliament; and therefore renewed their ſecret conſultations with the greateſt diligence. Their deſigns, however, being known to thoſe officers who were attached to the Protector, they offered, if Richard would promiſe to ſupport them, to anſwer with their heads for the ſucceſs; and to bring before him Fleetwood, Deſborough, Vane, and other leaders of the oppoſition, dead or alive. Howard, who was one of Oliver's diſtinguiſhed favourites, was among the foremoſt to puſh Richard to take this vigorous reſolution, which might have been eaſily effected. But he declined the offer, and choſe rather to purſue peaceable than violent meaſures. Nor did he poſſeſs any of thoſe arts which were neceſſary to gain the love of an enthuſiaſtic army. Some diſguſt being taken at the promotions he had made, he anſwered, "Would you have me prefer none but the godly? Here is Dick Ingoldſby, who can neither pray nor preach, yet I will truſt him before you all." This imprudent ſpeech ſo highly offended the fanatics, that they vowed his deſtruction.

The council of officers, conſcious of their own ſtrength and the weakneſs of Richard, now reſolved to compel him to diſſolve a parliament which they found would oppoſe them in every meaſure they ſhould think proper to purſue. To effect this they brought up their forces to Whitehall; and having ſtopped up all the avenues, Deſborough, attended by a ſtrong guard, demanded an audience of the Protector, which being granted, he required him, in the name of all the officers, to diſſolve the parliament, and threatened him if he ſhould refuſe. This terrified Richard into a compliance; and the parliament at this time having adjourned for three days, he publiſhed a proclamation, declaring them diſſolved.

In conſequence of this meaſure the Protector was conſidered by every one as effectually depoſed; and he ſoon after ſigned his diſmiſſion in form. His brother Henry followed his example, and peaceably reſigned his command in Ireland; though, had he been poſſeſſed of any ambition, he might have created the cabal much uneaſineſs, for he had great influence among the troops in that kingdom, and was beloved by the people for his juſt and mild adminiſtration.

Thus fell the family of Cromwell! the principal of which, in an aſtoniſhing manner, obtained more than regal power, exerciſed a greater than papal authority, and when he paid the debt of nature, was interred with even imperial dignity. But his ſucceſſor having a leſs aſpiring, but more tranquil ſpirit, reſigned with eaſe what his father had acquired with peril; and gave up with pleaſure the blood-ſtained laurels of his predeceſſor, for the peaceful bays of retirement.* And in our opinion, by ſacrificing the ſword of ambition to the olive of contentment, the ſon was more deſerving of fame than the ſire: for Glory by few is rightly underſtood,

What's truly glorious muſt be greatly good.

The council of officers being now poſſeſſed of the ſupreme command, they applied themſelves to the eſtabliſhment of ſome form of government; and, after many deliberations, it was determined to recall the Long Parliament, which had dethroned Charles, and was afterwards diſmiſſed with diſgrace by Oliver Cromwell. That aſſembly, it was aſſerted, could only be diſſolved by their own conſent; and though violence had interrupted, it could not deſtroy their rights to government.

* Richard retired into the country, where he poſſeſſed a ſmall eſtate, and where he remained unmoleſted: his peaceable diſpoſition defended him againſt the malignancy of every party. After the reſtoration of monarchy, Richard travelled for ſome years. The prince of Conti, governor of Languedoc, ſaw him at Prezenaz, without knowing him. They were talking of Engliſh affairs, and the prince highly extolled the courage and talents of Oliver Cromwell. "But the poor, weak Richard, (added he) what is become of him? How could he be ſo great a blockhead as not to profit more by the crimes and fortunes of his father!" The poor, weak Richard, however, lived happy in a middle ſtation, to a good old age. The time of his death is not certainly known, but it was about the latter end of the reign of queen Anne.

This parliament now conſiſted of no more than 40 members, who, with their old ſpeaker Lenthall at their head, proceeded immediately to buſineſs. The officers were perſuaded that this parliament would govern wholly by their directions, and act in ſubordination to the general council of the army. But in this they were miſtaken, their firſt votes ſufficiently ſhewed that they were reſolved to exert themſelves the ſupreme authority. They were, however, held in the higheſt contempt, both by the royaliſts and preſbyterians, and ſtiled the Rump, by way of reproach. A ſecret reconciliation therefore took place between the rival parties; and it was agreed, that laying aſide former enmities, every effort ſhould be uſed for the overthrow of the rump parliament. The preſbyteterians, notwithſtanding their religious prejudices, repented of that violent zeal by which they had been hurried away. They ſaw that, by carrying the love of liberty too far, they were brought into ſlavery; and were now as deſirous as others to reſtore the crown to the royal family, which they had ſnatched from it, without increaſing their own happineſs. The nobility and gentry concurred in the ſame deſign, and a general conſpiracy was formed in the nation, the ſucceſs of which ſeemed infallible, and would in all probability, have proved ſo had not Sir Richard Willis betrayed the common intereſt before the deſign was ripe for execution.

As ſoon as the republican party were informed of the above deſign, they ordered Lambert to prevent its execution. He was remarkably active in obeying their commands, and the jails were ſoon filled with priſoners of birth and fortune. But this ſucceſs proved the ruin of the parliament. The officers, at the inſtigation of Lambert, preſented a petition concerning wounded ſoldiers, and the widows of thoſe who had periſhed in the ſervice. They alſo complained that they themſelves were greatly neglected, notwithſtanding the ſervices they had done their country, and deſired that Fleetwood ſhould be made commander in chief, Lambert major-general, Deſborough lieutenant-general of the horſe, and Monk major-general of the foot. They likewiſe preſſed for the puniſhment of thoſe who had been concerned in the late inſurrection, and that no officer ſhould be diſmiſſed from his employment but by the ſentence of a court-martial.

Theſe proceedings greatly alarmed the republicans, and they determined to make one bold attempt in ſupport of their power: they voted that Lambert, Deſborough, Berry, Clarke, Barrow, Kelſey and Corbet ſhould be caſhiered; that Fleetwood's commiſſion ſhould be vacated, and the command of the army veſted in ſeven perſons, viz. Fleetwood, Ludlow, Monk, Haſlerigg, Walton, Morley and Overton, with powers to diſpoſe of the forces in ſuch a manner, that they might preſerve the peace of the common wealth, and the ſafety of the parliament. They alſo declared it high treaſon to levy any money without the conſent of parliament.

It was now evident, that either the parliament or army muſt fall; and it required no great degree of penetration to foretel which would obtain the victory. Lambert, at the head of a party of his ſoldiers, marched into the ſtreets of Weſtminſter leading to the parliament-houſe; and when the ſpeaker came in his coach, they very civilly turned his horſes, and conducted him back to his houſe. The other members were interrupted in the ſame manner; and the Rump Parliament was diſſolved with as much eaſe by Lambert, as it had been before by Cromwell.

By this ſudden diſſolution of the parliament, all government was at an end, the conſequence of which was, that an univerſal anarchy prevailed throughout the kingdom. Both the magiſtrates and officers of the revenue refuſed to act; and the ſoldiers were under a neceſſity of either returning to their former ſituations, or procuring themſelves ſubſiſtence by their ſwords.

In this diſtreſſful ſituation, the eyes of the whole kingdom were directed to Monk, who, it was now foreſeen, muſt be the arbiter of the fate of England. That general, at firſt attached to the royal party, afterwards employed by Cromwell, and appointed governor of Scotland, had now, by his politeneſs, his integrity, and other virtues, obtained the love of the ſoldiers, and the confidence of the people. Whether he meant only to oppoſe the views of the ambitious Lambert, or ſecretly meditated the reſtoration of the king, is not known; but he declared in favour of the parliament againſt thoſe who had diſmiſſed it. His prudence, however, kept his intentions an impenetrable ſecret; but deeper deſigns, either in the king's favour or his own, were, from the beginning, ſuſpected to be the motive of his conduct.

The council of officers, in order to preſerve ſome appearance of government, elected a committee of 23 perſons, of whom 7 were officers. Theſe they pretended to inveſt with the ſupreme authority, and called them a Committee of Safety. They promiſed to ſummon a free parliament, but took no ſteps to carry it into execution. On the contrary, they made ſome progreſs towards aſſembling a military parliament, compoſed wholly of officers, elected from every regiment in the ſervice. Nothing but a dreadful proſpect of ruin and ſlavery preſented itſelf to the people. They were ſufficiently convinced that the diviſions or union of theſe ſanctified robbers tended equally to extirpate from the Britiſh dominions all private morality, as well as civil law and juſtice.

During theſe diſtractions in England, the king, diſheartened by the miſcarriage of every enterprize that had been yet undertaken in his favour, determined to try the weak reſources of foreign aid. He accordingly repaired to the Pyrenees, where the miniſters of France and Spain were at this time engaged in conference for compoſing all diſputes between the two crowns, by a final treaty. Don Lewis de Haro, the Spaniſh plenipotentiary, gave the young monarch a very kind and cordial reception, and expreſſed his inclination, had the low condition of Spain permitted him, to furniſh aſſiſtance to the unhappy king. The politic Mazarine, pretending the alliance of France with the Engliſh commonwealth, would not ſo much as deign to give him an interview. But fortune is always capricious: while every thing wore ſuch an unfavourable aſpect, blind chance, by a ſurprizing revolution, was preparing the way for Charles to mount the throne of his anceſtors.

Monk's deſigns were ſtill unknown, and Charles, being deſirous of diſcovering his real ſentiments, ſent Dr. Monk, his brother, to ſolicit his ſervices. The general aſked him, if he had truſted any perſon with the ſecret of his commiſſion. "No perſon (replied the doctor) but Brice your chaplain, in whom I know you confide." Brice was worthy of the higeſt confidence, and a zealous loyaliſt. But Monk thought proper to break off the converſation, and diſmiſſed his brother, without diſcovering his intentions; perſuaded, that in an affair of ſuch importance, a ſecret entruſted to a third perſon is no longer a ſecret.

The proceedings of Lambert in London ſo highly exaſperated Monk, that he determined to march from Scotland, in order, if poſſible, to reſtore the Rump Parliament. He wrote letters to Fleetwood and Lambert, wherein he complained "of their violation of faith to the parliament, and declared his "reſolution of endeavouring to reſtore them to their "power, againſt all oppoſition whatſoever." Fleetwood and Lambert were aſtoniſhed at this reſolution. They immediately ordered colonel Talbot and Clarges, brother-in-law to Monk, to go into Scotland, and, if poſſible, prevail on the general to enter into a treaty, which might prevent the effuſion of blood.

In the mean time Monk was indefatigable in carrying his deſigns into execution. All the officers in his army, of whom he entertained the leaſt ſuſpicion, he caſhiered. He drew together the ſeveral ſcattered regiments. He ſummoned an aſſembly ſomewhat reſembling a convention of eſtates in Scotland, and having communicated his intention of marching into England, he received from them a ſmall but ſeaſonable ſupply of money. Clarges and Talbot being arrived in Scotland, were well received by Monk; who, by their advice, and in order to gain time, conſented to a negotiation, and ſent Wilkes, Cloberry, and Knight, three of his officers, to treat with the committee. They met Lambert at York, with a body of forces to oppoſe the progreſs of Monk. He told them he was ſufficiently authorized to treat with them; but upon their demanding the reſtoration of the parliament, he acknowledged he had no inſtructions on that head, and they proceeded to London, where the ſame demand being made to the committee, they immediately aſſented to it. And the treaty, by which both ſides engaged to act vigorouſly againſt Charles, was ſigned on the fifteenth of November.

During theſe tranſactions, the nation had fallen into a ſtate of perfect anarchy; and by refuſing the payment of all taxes, reduced the army to the greateſt diſtreſs. While Lambert was collecting his forces at Newcaſtle, Haſlerigg and Morley entered Portſmouth, and declared for the Parliament. A party, ſent to quell the inſurrection, were induced, by their commander, to embrace the ſame intereſt. The city apprentices roſe in a body, and inſiſted on a free parliament: and though they were ſuppreſſed by colonel Hewſon, a man who was once a cobler, but now enjoyed a conſiderable rank in the army, the city ſtill retained its oppoſition, and diſcovered marks of the higheſt diſſatisfaction. The magiſtrates even erected a kind of ſeparate government, and exercifed the ſupreme authority within their walls. About the ſame time admiral Lawſon entered the river with his fleet, and declared for a free parliament. Alarmed at theſe events, Haſlerigg and Morley left Portſmouth, and haſtened towards London. The regiments quartered in the neighbourhood of that city, were perſuaded by their old officers, who had been diſmiſſed by the Committee of Safety, to eſpouſe, once more, the cauſe of the Rump parliament. Deſborough's regiment, which had been ſent to Lambert to aſſiſt his friends, no ſooner reached St. Alban's, than that officer declared for the ſame aſſembly.

Lenthall, the ſpeaker, at the deſire of the officers, reſumed his former authority, and on the 26th of December aſſembled the parliament, which had, with ſo much contempt and ignominy, been twice expelled. Their firſt act was, to repeal the bill againſt the payment of the exciſe and cuſtoms. They next choſe commiſſioners for aſſigning quarters to the ſoldiers; and without taking the leaſt notice of Lambert, they enjoined the forces under his command to repair directly to the reſpective garriſons allotted them.

Lambert's ſituation was now truly deſperate: his army was rendered entirely uſeleſs to him; and, what was ſtill worſe, the few troops that remained with him, thinking to make their court to thoſe in power, or, perhaps, to gratify ſome pique of their own, put their general under an arreſt, and ſent him to London, where he was committed a priſoner to the Tower.

A. D. 1660. In the mean time Monk, having received a ſupply of 30,000l. from the Scots, and taken proper precautions for maintaining the peace of that kingdom, entered England on the 2d of January. During his march he received information of the diſbanding of the army, and alſo that lord Fairfax, with ſome of the principal gentry in Yorkſhire, were in arms, demanding a free parliament. This was going a ſtep farther than Monk had yet propoſed. He was, however, received with open arms by the lord Fairfax and all his friends, who had taken poſſeſſion of the city of York. The rump parliament now became greater objects of deteſtation than the army had been before: and the general received, as he advanced to the ſouthward, continual accounts of ſome freſh declaration or aſſociation of the counties for a free parliament.

Theſe circumſtances greatly alarmed the Rump Parliament, who now thought they had made the breach between themſelves and the Wallingford officers too irreconcileable. They began to apprehend that Monk had ſomething more in view than the reſtoring them, and would have been better pleaſed had he continued in Scotland. They, however, ſent him a letter, informing him that they were re-aſſembled, and attributed the reſtitution of their authority wholly to his fidelity, care, and courage. This meſſage was ſo far from being pleaſing to the general, that he conſidered it as one of the moſt unfortunate events that could have attended him. He was under a thouſand perplexities how to act; for by the parliament's precipitate reſumption of thei power, aſſiſted by a numerous army newly returned to their obedience, he deſpaired of being able to compaſs his deſigns, and thought it prudent not to continue any longer in arms, than a favourable opportunity ſhould offer for laying them down; for he ha been perſuaded that they would not have though themſelves ſafe till his arrival in London with his army, when he intended to reſtore all the other members with them, without paying the leaſt regard t their difference of opinions. He, however, continue his march, and in all the counties which he paſſe through, the chief people flocked to him with addreſſes, wherein they expreſſed their earneſt deſire that he would do the utmoſt to reſtore the nation t peace and tranquillity, and to the enjoyment of tho liberties, of which they had been, for ſuch a number of years, ſo unhappily deprived. At Lancaſte he was met by a deputation from London, with a addreſs praying the reſtoration of the members wh had been excluded in 1648. The preſbyterians ſee to have had the principal ſhare in all theſe addreſſe for the ſecluded members were moſtly of that perſuaſion.

The parliament, finding it was not in their pow to prevent the progreſs of Monk, thought it m prudent to conſent to it. They accordingly paſſed vote to juſtify Monk's march into England; and few days after they voted 1000l. a year to be ſettl on him for life. Scot and Robinſon, two of th members, were ſent under pretence of compliment him on the road, but in reality as ſpies on his condu divided againſt itſelf; and the city of London was ſo confident of his declaring for a free parliament, that they ſent a committee of the council to congratulate him on his approach to the capital. On his arrival at St. Albans, he was informed that near 9000 ſoldiers were then in London, diſpoſed in different regiments; but the moſt of their officers were confined by the parliament. He therefore imagined there would be no great difficulty in removing theſe troops; and accordingly wrote a very preſſing letter to the houſe, that room might be made for his regiments. Had the members of parliament been united among themſelves, or dared to truſt the experienced officers that ſerved under them, they would not, probably, have ſubmitted to Monk's requeſt; but their power was ſo precarious by their diviſions, that they made no difficulty of complying, and orders were given for their own regiments to retire. Four of them, however, ſcrupled to obey: a mutiny enſued; and it was with the utmoſt difficulty they were prevented, either from joining with the royaliſts in the city, or marching out againſt the army of Monk.

On the 4th of February, Monk entered London; two days after which he was introduced to the houſe, and thanks were given him, in the name of the members, by Lenthall their ſpeaker, for the eminent ſervices he had done his country. Monk returned an anſwer in ſuch ambiguous terms, as ſtill kept every one in ſuſpence. But it was impoſſible for the nation to remain long in this doubtful ſituation; and the people, as well as the parliament, were deſirous of bringing matters to ſome determined iſſue.

During the late diſtractions the payment of taxes had been interrupted; and though the parliament, as ſoon as they were reſtored, had given orders for all collections and impoſitions, yet ſo little authority did they poſſeſs in the nation that the people obeyed their commands very ſlowly and with great reluctance. The common-council of London abſolutely refuſed to ſubmit to an aſſeſſment required of them; and declared, that till a free and lawful parliament impoſed taxes, they never ſhould think it their duty to make any payment. This peremptory denial gave the parliament a fair pretence of making a trial of their own power, and the general's fidelity. Accordingly, on the 9th of February, Monk received orders to march into the city, to ſeize twelve perſons the moſt obnoxious to the parliament, to remove the poſts and chains from all the ſtreets, and to take down and deſtroy the portcullices and gates of the city. Theſe orders Monk complied with in part only, and, after ſome ſecret conferences with the citizens, he began to throw off the maſk which he had ſo long worn. He ſent a letter to the parliament, acquainting them with what he had done, and begging they would mitigate the ſeverity of their order; which they refuſing to do, he made many public apologies to the city for his conduct in the affair, declaring it to have been entirely in compliance with the orders of the rump, whom he now found to be a ſet of mercileſs unrelenting tyrants. He then wrote a letter to the houſe, reproaching them with ſome new cabals they had formed with Vane and Lambert, and alſo with the encouragement given to a fanatical petition, preſented by Praiſe-god Barebones, wherein he deſired, that every individual of the kingdom ſhould be compelled to take the oath of abjuration. He concluded with requiring them, in the name of the citizens, ſoldiers and people, to iſſue writs immediately for filling up their houſe, and to fix the time for their own diſſolution, that a new and free parliament might be aſſembled.

Monk waited not for an anſwer to this letter: he marched immediately into the city, at the head of his army, and ordered Allen, the lord-mayor, to ſummon a common-council to meet at Guildhall. As ſoon as the citizens were aſſembled, he repaired thither, and aſſured them that he was extremely ſorry for the indignity he had ſo lately put upon the city, in complying with the orders of the parliament, and was now come to make them all the reparation in his power. He declared that he would always perſevere in the meaſures he had adopted; and wiſhed a firm union might be eſtabliſhed between the city and army for their mutual defence, and for promoting the happineſs and ſettlement of the kingdom.

This ſpeech from the general was received with univerſal applauſe. It was ſoon ſpread through the whole city, and excited the moſt extravagant demonſtrations of joy. Every individual promiſed himſelf, that the dreadful ſcenes of horror and confuſion were over, and thoſe of happineſs and tranquillity would ſoon ſucceed. Even the rage of party was forgotten; the royaliſts and the preſbyterians joined in the common joy. The populace, who in the gratification of their paſſions regard neither honour nor decency, roaſted rumps at every bonfire, and where theſe could not be procured, pieces of fleſh cut in the ſame ſhape were uſed as ſubſtitutes; in order, as the people expreſſed it, to celebrate by thoſe ſymbols of hatred and deriſion, the funeral of the rump parliament.

The diſpirited parliament, foreſeeing the approaching ſtorm, heartily wiſhed to reconcile themſelves to Monk and his officers. They diſpatched a committee to the general, to endeavour, by every precaution, to bring him over to their intereſt; and even went ſo far as to offer him the ſupreme authority. But Monk refuſed to hear them except in the preſence of ſome of the ſecluded members. He then marched into the city, where he formed a new and well-regulated militia, which he entruſted to men whoſe fidelity could be relied on. This done he returned with his army to Weſtminſter, and purſued every proper meaſure for the ſettlement of the nation, ſtill concealing his real deſigns under the appearance of republican principles.

Intimation having been given to the ſecluded members that it was Monk's deſire they ſhould reſume their ſeats, they, on the 21ſt of February attended him in a body to Whitehall; from whence, after receiving their promiſe to call a free parliament, and then diſſolve themſelves, he gave them a guard to the parliament-houſe, where they took their ſeats. The leaders of the independent and republican party, amazed at the ſudden appearance of the excluded members among them, retired from the houſe. The reſtored members immediately repealed all the votes that had been paſſed for their excluſion; releaſed the royaliſts from their confinement, and reſtored them to their eſtates. They renewed and enlarged the general's commiſſion. They fixed a neceſſary aſſeſſment for the ſupport of the fleet and army. And having paſſed theſe votes for the preſent compoſure of the kingdom they, on the 16th of March, diſſolved themſelves, having firſt ordered writs to be iſſued out for the immediate aſſembly of a new, full and free parliament.

Theſe proceedings gave the higheſt ſatisfaction. The long parliament had been for ſome time the grand object of deteſtation, and their diſſolution occaſioned a general joy throughout the kingdom. A new council of ſtate was alſo choſen, which obtained the approbation of the people, as it conſiſted of men of dignity, moderation and virtue: and their credit was ſo well eſtabliſhed, that the city of London immediately advanced them 60,000l. for the uſe of the army.

Before the new parliament met, Lambert found means to eſcape out of the Tower. This accident alarmed Monk and the council of ſtate, who knew Lambert's great popularity in the army. Colonel Ingoldſby was immediately diſpatched after him, and overtook him at Daventry, while he had yet aſſembled but four troops of horſe; two of which deſerted him; and he, endeavouring to make his eſcape, was ſeized by Ingoldſby, and again committed to the Tower.

Monk ſtill continued to purſue the plan he had formed with equal firmneſs and prudence. He did not yet openly declare that he had adopted the king's intereſt. Among the friends of that prudent general was Mr. Morrice, a gentleman of Devonſhire, remarkable for a ſedentary, ſtudious diſpoſition, and a ſound judgment. With this friend only Monk deliberated concerning the great enterprize he had formed, and hitherto conducted with ſo much ſucceſs. Sir John Granville, who was ſent with a commiſſion from the king to Monk, applied to Morrice, in order to obtain acceſs to the general. He was deſired to communicate his buſineſs to Morrice; but Granville refuſed every importunity, nor would he divulge his buſineſs to any one whatever, but the general himſelf in perſon. Monk was now convinced that Granville might be truſted, and therefore not only admitted him to his preſence, but alſo communicated to him his whole deſign. But he ſtill refuſed to commit any thing to writing: he only charged Granville with a verbal meſſage, aſſuring his majeſty of his ſervices, and exhorting him immediately to quit the Spaniſh territories, and retire into Holland. Charles fortunately took his advice: had he ſtaid a few hours longer, he had certainly been detained under pretence of honour and reſpect, by the Spaniards, who would not have releaſed him till the Engliſh had agreed to deliver up Jamaica.

The election for the approaching parliament (which had been carried on greatly in favour of the king's party) being completed, and every thing appeared ripe for the reſtoration, the new parliament aſſembled on the 25th of April. The commons choſe Sir Harbottle Grimſtone for their ſpeaker. This gentleman, with many others, had gone great lengths in contributing to the ruin of the late king, but ſtopped when his death was under conſideration. On the firſt day of their meeting, the commons received a meſſage from the lords; and on the ſecond, Grimſtone, by order of the the houſe, returned thanks to Monk for ſubduing all their, and the nation's enemies without the effuſion of blood. They then adjourned till the firſt day of May. When the houſe re-aſſembled, the great dangers incurred under the former uſurpations, and the extreme caution of the general, kept every one in awe; and no one dared for ſome days to make any mention of the king. But Monk, finding, by their bitter invectives againſt the memory of Cromwell, and execrations upon thoſe who had murdered their late ſovereign, that they were diſpoſed as he could wiſh, ordered Anneſley, preſident of the council to acquaint them, that one Sir John Granville, a ſervant of the king's, had been ſent to England by his majeſty, and was now at the door with diſpatches from the prince. The whole houſe was in an extaſy. Granville was introduced. He preſented a declaration from Charles. The declaration was well calculated to ſupport the ſatisfaction inſpired by the proſpect of a public ſettlement. It offered a general amneſty to all perſons whatever, and that without any exceptions, but ſuch as ſhould afterwards be made by parliament. It promiſed a liberty of conſcience, and a concurrence in any act of parliament, which, upon mature deliberation, ſhould be offered for ſecuring that indulgence. It ſubmitted the inquiry into all grants, purchaſes, and alienations, to the arbitration of that aſſembly; and it aſſured the ſoldiers that their arrears ſhould be paid, and that they ſhould, for the future, receive the ſame pay they had hitherto enjoyed. Every one was ſatisfied. The conceſſions of the late king had limited the prerogative too much to give the real friends of liberty any uneaſineſs.

Without one moment's delay, or a contradictory vote, a committee was appointed to prepare an anſwer to the prince's letter and declaration; and on the eighth of May both houſes attended, while the king was, with great ſolemnity, proclaimed in Palace-yard, at Whitehall, and at Temple-bar, by the title of Charles II. As a convincing proof of their affection for his majeſty, the commons voted him a preſent of fifty thouſand pounds. Ten thouſand pounds were at the ſame time given to the duke of York, and five thouſand to the duke of Glouceſter; and a committee of lords and commons was diſpatched to invite his majeſty to return and take poſſeſſion of his dominions.

Every ſtep relating to this important event was taken with ſuch zeal and unanimity, that Clarendon, ſpeaking of it, ſays, "One could not but wonder " where thoſe people dwelt who had done all the " miſchief, and kept the king ſo long from enjoying " the comfort and ſupport of ſuch excellent ſubjects." The king himſelf alſo obſerved, "That it " muſt certainly have been his own fault, that he " had not ſooner taken poſſeſſion of the throne, " ſince every body was ſo zealous for reſtoring him " to it."

This ſubmiſſion of the king's ſubjects was ſoon ſucceeded by the reſpect of foreign powers. Spain invited him to return to the Low Countries, and embark from ſome of their maritime towns, and France offere Calais for the ſame purpoſe. But Charles accepted a third invitation from the ſtates-general, and goin to Holland, where every mark of magnificent reſpec was ſhewn him, he embarked on board the Engliſh fleet, which lay ready to receive him, under the command of admiral Montague.

Monk repaired to Dover to receive the prince whom he had the glory of placing on the throne The king, on his diſembarking, embraced him in the moſt cordial manner, and, perhaps, never ſubje deſerved better of his king and country. Charle made his public entry into London on his birth-day which was the 29th of May; where he was receive with ſuch demonſtrations of joy, and ſuch diſplay o magnificence, as had been ſcarce ever exhibited on like occaſion.

Having thus brought Charles II. to the throne o his anceſtors, it may not be improper here to make ſhort digreſſion, in order to take a view of the perio we have finiſhed. No ſooner did the commonwealt commence, than fanaticiſm lighted up the flames tha involved the ſtate. That epidemical ſcourge viſite the three kingdoms. England in particular was overrun with infatuated ſectaries, determined to ſuppor their abſurdities without law or controul. The republicans were ſo much the more terrible, as thei religious principles enjoined a ſeverity of manne too refined for human nature. Perhaps nothing contributed more to their triumph over the royaliſt whom they called cavaliers, the greater part of the being men of pleaſure, either in conſequence of thei birth and fortunes, or becauſe, from a diſlike of th fanatics, they fell into the contrary extreme of immorality. A parliamentarian ſaying one day to a roya iſt, "Your friends, the cavaliers are very diſſolute " Yes, (replied the other) they have the infirmiti of men; but your friends, the round-heads, have th vices of devils, tyranny, rebellion, and ſpiritu pride."

But amidſt the variety of ſectaries that prevaile during the period we are noticing, none ſtand mor eminently diſtinguiſhed than the Quakers. The founde founder was George Fox, a ſhoemaker's apprentice: but though enthuſiaſts in the higheſt degree, they made no figure in the general commotions, becauſe their principles forbade the uſe of arms. They thought the practice of civility a worldly refinement unworthy of chriſtianity. They addreſſed themſelves to every body by the monoſyllables thee and thou; and gave no title but that of 'Friend,' even to people of rank and fortune. Their dreſs was ſimilar to their manners: they rejected all ſuperfluities, not excepting plaits to their clothes, and buttons to their ſleeves and hats, which they thought unneceſſary. Their religious ſyſtem conſiſted in following the letter of the goſpel: they thought an oath blaſphemy, even when taken in a court of juſtice. They allowed no ſacraments, no church-ceremonies, no churches, no prieſts. Every one affected inſpiration, and made ſtrange efforts to receive the holy ſpirit: and, from theſe trembling convulſions, they acquired the name of Quakers. Theſe enthuſiaſts would ſometimes ruſh into churches, diſturb the ſervice, and inſult the miniſters. They were ſentenced to be whipped and pilloried; but in this they triumphed, and their obſtinate patience appeared ſupernatural to the people. Some of them undertook to faſt forty days, in imitation of the Saviour of the world, and actually periſhed in the attempt. All made a point of offering their cheek to them that would ſmite them, and never to return an injury. The conſequence was, that by carrying their religious duties to the moſt extravagant height, they expoſed their virtues to ridicule. Strange ſurely it is, that the goſpel, calculated to inſpire every ſocial virtue, ſhould have afforded ſo many pretences to folly and frenzy, to break the ſacred bonds of ſociety! But ſuch is the weakneſs of the human mind; while men affect to quit the path marked out by the Author of reaſon, they wander through wildneſs and obſcurity, till they loſe themſelves and their way together.

The various follies of theſe fanatical ſects contributed greatly to multiply deiſts, men of raſh and ſuperficial minds, who attributing to religion the exceſſes of fanaticiſm, fell into the contrary extreme of incredulity. Cromwell called them heathens; but when in their company, laughed with them at the fanatics.

Among the learned men that flouriſhed during this æra was the celebrated Milton, whoſe poems do honour to the nation that gave him birth, and, indeed, to human nature. He was Cromwell's ſecretary for the Latin tongue; though his genius ſeems to have been very little known to his employers, for he is mentioned by Whitlock as an obſcure blind man, very unfit for his office.

About the ſame time alſo flouriſhed Sir William Davenant, Sir John Denham, Waller, and Cowley, who, though but indifferent poets, acquired a great ſhare of reputation. The republican principles of the age gave riſe to the Oceana of Harrington, containing the idea of a perfect commonwealth: and the controverſies and abſurdities that deformed religion, encouraged Hobbes to write and publiſh his Leviathan.

Among the many eminent perſons that died under Cromwell's protectorſhip were, the famous Mr. John Selden, the great antiquarian; the venerable Uſher, archbiſhop of Armagh, who came over to England a little before the breaking out of the Iriſh maſſacre; and Dr. Harvey, who acquired immortal honour for his diſcovery of the circulation of the blood.

BOOK XIII.

From the Reſtoration of CHARLES II. to the Revolution.

CHARLES II.

CLOYED with political diſputes, and tired of thoſe diſcords which had ſo long diſtracted the nation, the people were happy at the idea of things reſuming their former channel. They found the unbounded licence of a commonwealth much more intolerable than the worſt ſtate of a limited monarchy; and, bad as one tyrant might be, the deſpotiſm of many was certainly more dreadful. Hence the reſtoration ſpread a gleam of joy over the kingdom which diſſipated the clouds of faction. Relations could once more meet without hoſtile intentions; and the ſtreams of blood which had ſo long overflowed theſe realms, ſerved but to fertilize the ſeeds of felicity which began to ſpring up with the return of ancient order and diſcipline.

A round of magnificence and pleaſures ſucceeded the gloomy ferocity which had ſo long taken poſſeſſion of the minds of the Engliſh people. Charles introduced the ſpirit of gallantry into a palace yet ſtained with the blood of his father. The independents were hardly heard of, and the puritans retired from the ſeat of government. The manners of the Engliſh underwent ſo total a change, that the late civil war became a ſubject of ridicule: the auſtere and gloomy ſectariſts, who had filled the kingdom with their enthuſiaſtic notions, were now the ſubjects of raillery to the gay licentious libertines who filled the court, and had the confidence and countenance of the king.

At the time of the reſtoration, Charles II. was about thirty years of age, nurſed in the ſchool of adverſity, acquainted with men and courts, a man of genius, acute, ſenſible, good-natured, polite, never out of temper, and perfectly unaffected; but immoderately addicted to pleaſure.

As the two houſes of parliament met without the conſent of the king, they were diſtinguiſhed by the name of Convention, till Charles paſſed an act to confer on them the title of parliament.

The amneſty which the king promiſed before he landed was the firſt object that engaged their attention. The upper houſe, animated partly by reſentment and partly by zeal, were for excluding many perſons from the benefit of this act of oblivion. But Charles deſired them to remember the ſacred promiſe he had made, and to which he thought himſelf in ſome meaſure indebted for his good fortune. He therefore recommened clemency to them in the moſt preſſing manner; an inſtance of the tenderneſs of his diſpoſition, and which gained him univerſal applauſe. This interpoſition had the deſired effect, and only the regicides, and the furious republicans, Lambert and Vane, were excluded. Some others were, indeed, rendered incapable of the benefit of this act, in caſe of their accepting public employments, and ſome were rendered incapable of holding them.

Theſe affairs being ſettled, the two houſes took into conſideration the royal revenue. and it was ſettled at 1200,000l. a year; a ſum greatly ſuperior to that of any former king. But it muſt be remembered, that the expences of the crown were prodigiouſly increaſed, after the courts of Europe had adopted the example of Lewis XIV. in keeping up large ſtanding armies. The maintenance of the navy, with ſome other articles, which formerly amounted to no more than 80,000l. per annum, now required, at leaſt, 800,000l. It is not eaſy to imagine what advantages could be propoſed by ſo great an augmentation of the forces. The people were more heavily taxed, and the prince not at all the more powerful.

The trial of the regicides occaſioned a general joy, as the people were highly exaſperated againſt them. But they firmly defended the cauſe for which they ſuffered: the terrors of death loſt all their force. Harriſon told his judges, that the pretended crime of which he was accuſed, far from loading him with guilt, was an act enjoined by heaven, that in his doubts he had implored the Lord with tears, to enlighten him, and that he had received inconteſtible aſſurances of his will; that human judgments were but darkneſs in compariſon of divine illumination; that being determined not to injure the loweſt man in the world for the greateſt advantage in it, he was ſatisfied he had acted from a good conſcience; that neither ambition nor fear had ever extorted from him the ſmalleſt token of approbation in behalf of the tyranny of Cromwell; that he had always been found firm in his principles of religion and integrity; and that this was not the character of a murderer and a villain. All the reſt, who were ten in number, that were executed, ſhewed the ſame firmneſs and courage to the laſt. They conſidered themſelves as martyrs to what they ſtiled the cauſe of religion. The great lenity of the king reſpited the reſt, and they were retained in different priſons. Lambert was ſent to the iſland of Guernſey. The bodies of Cromwell, Ireton, Bradſhaw, and Pride, were taken up and ſuſpended during a whole day at Tyburn, and then cut down and buried under the gallows. Thus theſe lifeleſs bodies became the ſpectacle of a few hours to thoſe who had formerly dreaded the ſpirits which animated them.

The act of amneſty being paſſed, the king gave the royal aſſent to an act for a perpetual thankſgiving on the 29th of May, the day of his arrival in England. In the mean time the parliament applied themſelves to the neceſſary work of diſbanding the army. It would have been an act of the higheſt imprudence to keep together a body of men ſo formidable by their numbers and valour, and ſo accuſtomed to outrage and violence. An aſſeſſment of 70,000l. a month was therefore impoſed to enable the king to diſband theſe troops.

About this time the duke of Glouceſter died, in the 21ſt year of his age, univerſally regreted; and it is even ſaid, that the king's apathy was ſo much overcome by this incident, that he felt more real ſorrow than any other occurrence ever gave him.

The princeſs of Orange came over to England in October, to congratulate the king on his reſtoration, but died of the ſmall-pox two months after her arrival, leaving behind her an only ſon, viz. William, prince of Orange, who afterwards became king of England, by the name of William the Third.

Sir Edward Hyde had been lately created by the king, earl of Clarendon. He was looked upon by the whole nation as his majeſty's chief counſellor, and while the advice of this great man was attended to by Charles, his conduct, in ſome reſpects, may be ſaid to have been unexceptionable. The army was now to be paid and diſbanded; but when the king reviewed theſe veteran troops, he was ſo charmed with their beauty, diſcipline, and martial appearance, that, thinking it would be an addition to his royalty, he expreſſed a deſire of retaining them in his ſervice. But the chancellor repreſenting to him the dangerous conſequences of ſuch a meaſure, all the forces, a few guards and garriſons, amounting to 1000 foot, excepted, were immediately diſbanded. This excellent miniſter was now nearly allied to the royal family; the duke of York having married his daughter. But this alliance gave him great uneaſineſs; and he would often ſay, that by being elevated ſo much above his rank, he thence dreaded a more ſudden downfall.

It is proper here to obſerve, that of all the different ſects which ſprung up in the late civil war, there was ſcarce one which did not dread the name of monarchy. It is therefore, no wonder that thoſe who had profeſſed themſelves enemies to the king and his right of government, ſhould, after his coming to the throne, ſuffer their reſtleſs ſpirits to drive them into ſuch attempts as, had not a timely ſtop been put to them, by the prudent and vigilant care of his majeſty and his council, might have once more embroiled the nation in the horrors of a civil war. The firſt alarm of this nature was given by the fifth-monarchy-men; ſixty of whom, under the conduct of one Venner, a deſperate enthuſiaſtic, who had often conſpired againſt Cromwell, iſſued forth into the ſtreets of London compleatly armed. They ſaid, that they expected the perſonal reign of Chriſt upon earth, and that they, and the reſt of their ſect, were called by God to reform the world, and make all the earthly powers ſubſervient to the kingdom of king Jeſus; and in order thereunto, they were never to ſheath the ſword till the carnal powers of the world became a hiſſing and a curſe. In their frenzy they alſo taught that one of them was alone ſufficient to ſubdue 10,000 of their adverſaries. In this manner they marched in triumph from ſtreet to ſtreet; but at length the magiſtrates, having notice of their being abroad, aſſembled ſome trained bands, and attacked them. They defended themſelves with great valour and order; and, after killing many of the aſſailants, they made a regular retreat into Cane-wood, near Hampſtead. Next morning they were chaſed thence by a detachment of the guards; but they again came into the city, and dividing themſelves into parties, one marched to Leadenhall, and from thence to Little Eaſtcheap, where, after an obſtinate reſiſtance, they were diſperſed by the trained bands. Venner with the other party went to the lord-mayor's houſe, whom they intended to have taken priſoner, but not meeting with him, they marched into Wood-ſtreet, where they were met by colonel Corbet, and about 20 horſe. They then retreated into a houſe, which they ſhut up, and reſolved to defend to the laſt extremity. Being ſurrounded and the houſe untiled, they were fired upon from every ſide, but continued obſtinate.

Finding they ſtill refuſed to ſurrender, the people ruſhed in, and ſeized the few who remained alive. Theſe were tried, condemned, and executed; and to the laſt they perſiſted in affirming, that, if they were deceived, it was the Lord who had deceived them. The court made uſe of this inſurrection as a pretence for ſuppreſſing the preſbyterians, and all other ſects, who were begun to be confounded under the general names of Diſſenters and Nonconformiſts. The preſbyterians finding themſelves confounded with other ſectaries, whom they abominated, deſired a conference with ſome of the epiſcopal perſuaſion, in order, if poſſible, to effect a thorough accommodation with them.

In conſequence of this requeſt, on the 25th of March, a conference was held in the Savoy between 12 biſhops, and 12 leaders among the preſbyterians. Great hopes were entertained that ſome ſcheme would be fixed on to the mutual ſatisfaction of both parties; but this conference had the fate uſual with moſt conferences of the like nature: both parties being too rigidly tenacious of their own way and opinions, they ſeparated more inflamed than ever againſt each other, and more ſtrongly confirmed in their ſeveral prejudices. At the ſame time meaſures had been taken in Scotland to ſuppreſs the Kirk party, and this year epiſcopacy was reſtored in that kingdom, and the parliaments there abrogated the ſolemn league and covenant, and made ſeveral acts in favour of the king's prerogative, and againſt the preſbyterians.

In the year 1661, the loyaliſts became very powerful, ſo that when the parliament aſſembled on the 6th of May, only 56 preſbyterians were found to have been elected into the lower houſe. It was now voted, that an attempt to dethrone the king was high-treaſon. That accuſing him of hereſy or popery, or libelling him, ſhould be puniſhed by a total excluſion of all lucrative employments: and even that it was unlawful for any man to defend himſelf againſt the king. At the ſame time the covenant and other republican acts were condemned to be burnt. After the paſſing of theſe acts, the parliament adjourned to the 20th of November, when it was agreed to acknowledge that neither of the houſes, independent of the king, was poſſeſſed of the leaſt military, or legiſlative authority. An act was then paſſed for enabling the king to appoint commiſſioners for regulating all the corporations in the kingdom, and expelling from thence ſuch magiſtrates as had either obtruded themſelves by violence, or profeſſed principles dangerous to the conſtitution, civil and eccleſiaſtical. Theſe things paved the way for the celebrated act of Uniformity, which ſoon after paſſed.

A. D. 1662. By the Act of Uniformity, it was enacted, That every miniſter, who had not received epiſcopal orders, ſhould now receive them; that he ſhould declare his approbation, without reſerve, of the book of the common-prayer; that he ſhould take the oaths of canonical obedience; and that he ſhould abjure the covenant, and renounce its principles of taking arms, by any pretence whatever againſt the king. This bill was a thunder-bolt to the preſbyterians. Confounded with other nonconformiſts, and even with papiſts, they had the mortification of finding themſelves expoſed to penalties, after having ſeen their ſect predominant during the commonwealth. The church of England was put upon its antient footing; and the penal laws were revived. Liberty of conſcience, ſo expreſly promiſed by the ſovereign, was annihilated. Experience ſhewed the dangers of theſe violent meaſures. They were attributed to the catholics, who were deſirous either of ſharing the benefit of toleration with the preſbyterians, or that they ſhould ſhare with them the rigours of perſecution, or expulſion.

Nevertheleſs, however deſirous the commons might be of reſtoring the prerogative of the crown, they did not exert the ſame activity, where any demand was made by the crown for pecuniary aſſiſtance. In the mean time the king's debts were become intolerable, and the commons ſaw at laſt the neceſſity of voting him an extraordinary ſupply of one millon, two hundred thouſand pounds, to be levied by eighteen month's aſſeſſment. They alſo voted an additional impoſition of two ſhillings on each hearth, and ſettled the tax, during life, on the king.

Previous to the putting an end to the ſeſſion, the court was employed in making preparations for the reception of the new queen, Catharine of Portugal, to whom the king was betrothed, and who was juſt landed at Portſmouth. The marriage ceremony was performed with great pomp on the 21ſt of May; but the princeſs had neither the graces of perſon or humour to make herſelf agreeable to the king. She had a portion of 300,000l. together with two fortreſſes, Tangier on the coaſt of Africa, and Bombay in the Eaſt-Indies.

Vane and Lambert were ſtill in priſon: they had not been concerned in the death of Charles I. but their profeſſed hatred to the crown having occaſioned them to be excepted from the amneſty, the royaliſts demanded that they ſhould be brought to juſtice. They were accordingly tried, with great ſolemnity, before all the judges of the kingdom. The impeachment of Vane turned wholly on his conduct ſince the death of the king, in quality of counſellor of ſtate, and ſecretary of the marine department. He alledged, in his defence, the neceſſity of obeying the eſtabliſhed government, however illegal that eſtabliſhment might be. "If that obedience be criminal," ſaid he, "after the government is changed by force, every ſubject in the kingdom may be liable to puniſhment. The uſurpers will puniſh ſome for their fidelity to the depoſed prince, and the prince will puniſh others for their ſubmiſſion to the uſurpers. To prevent theſe diſaſters, and to defend the life and liberty of the ſubject, an act of Henry VII. declares, that no perſon ſhall be held criminal for obeying the reigning prince. It does not belong to individuals to diſcuſs the titles of thoſe who govern. Beſides, as the moſt reſpectable people were divided between the king and the commonwealth, ought a man to be condemned for following the party to which he was bound by the covenant, an obligation then ſacred and indiſpenſable?" Thoſe arguments were not, however, ſufficient to efface the remembrance of Vane's ſeditious conduct. The judges kept to the letter of the law; and though naturally of a timid diſpoſition, he died with all the fortitude of a fanatic. Vane had been noted, in all civil tranſactions, for temper, inſinuation, addreſs, and a profound judgment; in all religious, for folly and extravagance. He was a perfect enthuſiaſt; and fancying that he was certainly favoured with inſpiration, he deemed himſelf, to ſpeak the language of the times, a "man above ordinances;" and by reaſon of his perfection, to be unlimited and unreſtrained by any rules which govern inferior mortals. Theſe whimſies mingling with pride, had ſo corrupted his excellent underſtanding, that he ſometimes thought himſelf the perſon deputed to reign on earth for a thouſand years over the whole congregation of the faithful. Vane had been a principal leader in the trial of Strafford, and he was the laſt victim to theſe ſanguinary quarrels. Lambert was condemned at the ſame time, but reprieved at the bar. He lived about thirty years after, happier, poſſibly, in his exile, than he had ever been in the thorny paths of affluence.

A kind of eccleſiaſtical revolution ſucceeded the act of uniformity. It was called the St. Bartholomew Act, becauſe it was to take place on the 24th of Auguſt, the feaſt of that apoſtle. Though it bore no reſemblance to the St. Bartholomew's day in France, it ſhewed the invincible obſtinacy of the enthuſiaſts. In one day, and by a concerted reſolution, above 2,000 preſbyterian miniſters reſigned their livings, becauſe they would not conform to the articles of the act. The church of England now triumphed over her perſecutors. The preſbyterians, in the time of their exultation, had left her at leaſt one fifth of the livings; but they now refuſed the ſame indulgence, though it was ſolicited by the peers. They were even, ſome time after, prohibited from coming within five miles of thoſe places where they had exerciſed their miniſtry, except on journies, under pain of ſix months impriſonment, and paying a penalty of five pounds. This was cutting off their very livelihood; nor were theſe rigorous proceedings by any means agreeable to the king. Though ſtrongly ſuſpected of indifference for all religions, he was ſecretly inclined to popery, which he had, probably, embraced before his reſtoration. He was ſtrongly ſolicited by his brother James to grant a general toleration; and the misfortunes of the preſbyterians afforded a very plauſible pretence. Charles embraced the opportunity: he proclaimed an indulgence to thoſe ſcrupulous conſciences that were afraid of conforming to the eſtabliſhed worſhip; and as the parliament was now prorogued, he gave his royal word, that he would endeavour to procure a confirmation of that indulgence, at the approaching ſeſſion. The principal faults of Charles II. were an exceſſive love of pleaſure, and prodigality in the gratification of his darling paſſion. Prudence and good policy were therefore very neceſſary; but theſe were not in the catalogue of Charles's virtues. The parliamentary ſupplies, together with the portion of his new queen, were all ſquandered away; nor had he yet paid the portion of his ſiſter Henrietta to the duke of Orleans. Urged by neceſſity, he had recourſe to a meaſure which expoſed him to the ſevereſt cenſure, and is ſtill regarded as one of the greateſt blemiſhes of his reign. He offered the French miniſtry to deliver up Dunkirk, on their paying a valuable conſideration. Clarendon and Southampton, though virtuous miniſters, were concerned in this tranſaction; though there is the greateſt probability to think, that the expedient was firſt propoſed by Charles himſelf. The reſolution being taken, a negotiation was opened with d'Eſtrades, the French ambaſſador; and the French monarch purchaſed Dunkirk, with all the artillery and ammunition in the place, for 400,000l. The annual expence of the garriſon amounted to 120,000l. and the advantages ariſing from it were by no means anſwerable to ſuch a charge.

A. D. 1663. The parliament met on the 18th of February, purſuant to the prorogation, and Charles endeavoured to fulfil his promiſe with regard to the liberty of conſcience. But the parliament, who ſtrongly ſuſpected that he had another, and much deeper deſign in view, determined to defeat his intentions. The avowed deſign of gratifying the diſſenters, and the ſecret reſolution of ſupporting the catholics, were equally diſagreeable. They accordingly drew up a remonſtrance againſt the late declaration of indulgence, which they preſented to his majeſty, and both houſes joined in deſiring him to iſſue a proclamation againſt all popiſh prieſts and jeſuits. To this requeſt the king returned a very obliging anſwer; but in the proclamation afterwards iſſued, the terms were couched in ſo artful a manner as to render it of little or no effect. This ſeeming complaiſance of the king, however deceitful, was ſo pleaſing to the parliament, that upon his application, they voted him a ſupply of four ſubſidies, and this was the laſt time taxes were raiſed in that manner.

A. D. 1664. The parliament met on March the 16th when a motion was made in the lower houſe for repealing the act of triennial parliaments. No great oppoſition was made to this motion: the act was repealed; and thus all the ſecurity of the ſubject againſt the influence of the court was at once deſtroyed; and Charles failed not to take advantage of theſe conceſſions to baffle oppoſition. Nor was the parliament more ſervile in their compliance with regard to the requeſt of royalty, than rigorous and uncharitable with regard to the people. The true ſpirit of perſecution ſeemed to actuate all their proceedings on religious ſubjects. They had, poſſibly, forgotten, that the ſame rigid maxims of intolerance adopted by Laud, had been one of the principal cauſes of the dreadful calamities from which the nation had been ſo lately delivered. They were not contented with the penalties contained in the act of uniformity; they now paſſed the famous Conventicle Act, whereby it was enacted, that if any one ſhould repair to conventicles, the name they gave the meeting-houſes of all diſſenters, he ſhould be fined five pounds for the firſt offence, or ſuffer three months impriſonment; for the ſecond offence, ten pounds, or ſix months impriſonment; but for the third offence, after being convicted by a jury of his peers, he was to pay 100l. or to be tranſported abroad.

England and Holland had for ſome time maintained a commercial diſpute. The royal African company, in particular, had been oppoſed in eſtabliſhing their ſettlements on the coaſt of Guinea. Sir Rober Holmes had been ſent the preceding year with a fleet of 22 ſhips to the coaſt of Africa, to protect the Engliſh traders, and expel the Dutch from ſome places they had ſeized, contrary to the faith of treaties. Holmes executed his commiſſion with equal ſpirit and ſucceſs. After taking from the Dutch Cape Verd, the iſland of Goree, and ſeveral of their trading ſhips, he ſailed to America, where he made himſelf maſter of Nova Belgia, ſince known by the name of New York, where the Dutch had been ſettled ſeveral years. Warm remonſtrances were preſented by the Dutch againſt theſe hoſtilities; but receiving no ſatisfactory anſwer, they reſolved to do their ſubjects juſtice by force. De Ruyter was accordingly diſpatched, with a ſtrong ſquadron, to the coaſt of Guinea, where he ſoon re-eſtabliſhed the Dutch in poſſeſſion of the ſettlements from which they had been driven by the Engliſh admiral. He afterwards attempted to take Barbadoes, but without ſucceſs. Theſe hoſtile proceedings, which could only be conſidered as preludes to a rupture between the two nations, were not diſpleaſing to Charles, whoſe growing neceſſities, the natural conſequences of a blind prodigality, induced him to embrace every pretence for drawing money from his parliament. The diſpoſitions of the commons were very favourable to his deſign; for on taking the ſtate of the trade of the kingdom into conſideration, they voted, "That the wrongs, diſhonours and indignities offered to the Engliſh by the ſubjects of the United Provinces, had greatly interrupted the commerce of theſe kingdoms: that his majeſty ſhould be humbly requeſted to demand and obtain reparation for thoſe damages; and that in the proſecution of this affair, the houſe would aſſiſt him with their lives and fortunes againſt all oppoſitions whatever." This vote was conſidered as a ſufficient ſanction for thoſe vigorous meaſures which the court had adopted, and the parliament was prorogued till the month of November.

Preparations, particularly of the naval kind, were now made for acting with great vigour, and the whole nation ſeemed deſirous of humbling the pride of the Dutch. But as the parliament had granted no ſupplies, the city of London advanced 100,000l. that no ſtop might be put to the preparations. Charles viſited the ports in perſon, directed the operations himſelf, and animated the workmen by his preſence and liberality. Hence the navy was ſoon in a reſpectable condition; and in the month of September admiral Lawſon ſailed with orders to ſeize all the Dutch ſhips he met with in his cruize. He was ſo ſucceſsful, that in a very ſhort time 135 of their merchant ſhips fell into the hands of the Engliſh, and on the 24th of November the parliament aſſembled, and voted 2,500,000l. for carrying on the war.

A. D. 1665. Charles declared war againſt the Dutch in the beginning of March; and ſoon after prorogued the parliament. In this ſeſſion the clergy gave up the right of taxing themſelves in convocation, and have ever ſince been taxed by the parliament, in common with other ſubjects.

The previous preparations made in England alarmed the Dutch, who ſent an ambaſſador extraordinary to the court of England, in order, if poſſible, to prevent an open rupture, ſo deſtructive to the intereſts of a trading people: but finding all their endeavours were in vain, they exerted themſelves in making preparations for carrying on the war with vigour. John de Wit, a miniſter equally diſtinguiſhed for the extent of his capacity and the integrity of his manners, now directed all the meaſures of the Dutch republic, and infuſed ſpirit into that phlegmatic people. Though remarkably modeſt in his private behaviour, he well knew how to ſupport in his public conduct that magnanimity which becomes the miniſter of a powerful people. It was always his opinion, that no independent government ſhould ever make any mean or unreaſonable conceſſions to another; and that all ſuch compliances, inſtead of preventing the miſeries of war, ſerved only to invite farther inſults and indignities. By his management, a ſpirit of harmony was preſerved in all the provinces of the republic; large ſums were raiſed; and a powerful fleet, conſiſting of larger ſhips than the Dutch had ever built before, was fitted out with the utmoſt expedition, in order to conteſt with the Engliſh the empire of the ocean. The duke of York, as lord high admiral of England, on the 18th of March ſailed with a fleet of 114 ſail, excluſive of fireſhips and bomb-ketches. He was aſſiſted by prince Rupert, and the gallant earl of Sandwich commanded one of the diviſions. Two and twenty thouſand men ſerved on board this powerful armament. The Dutch navy conſiſted of one hundred and twenty ſail of men of war, beſides fire-ſhips. Opdam, an experienced ſea-officer of undoubted courage, commanded this numerous fleet, and received orders to ſeize the firſt opportunity of giving battle to the adverſary.

On the third of June the two fleets met, and a furious engagement enſued, in which the Dutch were defeated, with the loſs of 20 of their men of war. The ſhip on board of which the brave admiral Opdam had hoiſted his flag was blown up, and he himſelf periſhed with all his crew. The Engliſh loſt only four men of war; but ſeveral perſons of diſtinction were ſlain, and others dangerouſly wounded. A thankſgiving was appointed in England for this victory, and medals of the duke of York were ſtruck on this occaſion. He had indeed diſplayed amazing courage and conduct during the whole fight.

On the arrival of the news of this defeat, the Dutch were ſeized with terror and diſmay; it required all the abilities and conſtancy of De Wit to revive the drooping ſpirits of his countrymen. He viſited the fleet in perſon, rectified all diſorders, and repaired the damages ſuſtained in the late engagement. While he was thus employed in fitting out the navy for another battle with the enemy, a large fleet of Dutch merchant ſhips from Turkey and the Eaſt-Indies, having ſailed north about to avoid the Engliſh cruiſers, anchored in the port of Bergen, in Norway, in order to wait there till a proper convoy could be ſent to bring them into the ports of Holland. This, however, was no ſooner known in England than orders were ſent to Sir Gilbert Talbot, the Engliſh envoy at Copenhagen, to perſuade his Daniſh majeſty to ſeize this rich fleet, in revenge for the ſhameful conduct of the Dutch, who had involved him in a troubleſome war with Sweden. Tempted by the value of the prize, his Daniſh majeſty liſtened to the reaſons of the Engliſh miniſtry, but declared he was not in a condition to execute the deſign. Talbot promiſed to procure aſſiſtance from England, if his majeſty would agree to give the captors half the value of what ſhould be taken. The conditions were accepted, and the earl of Sandwich was ordered to ſail immediately to Bergen. Perſuaded that part of his ſquadron would be abundantly ſufficient to ſeize a fleet of merchantmen, Sandwich ſent Sir Thomas Tiddeman, with a few ſhips, on that ſervice. He attacked the Dutch with great impetuoſity; but the governor of Bergen having then received no orders to remain neuteral, joined the Dutch, and gave the Engliſh ſo warm a reception, that Tiddeman was obliged to abandon the enterprize, after having received conſiderable damage. Charles was greatly provoked at this diſappointment: he ordered the earl of Sandwich, to whoſe conduct he imputed the whole cauſe of the miſcarriage, to return to London, where he deprived him of his command, and ſent him ambaſſador to the Spaniſh court.

A dreadful plague raged in the city of London during theſe tranſactions at ſea. It continued eleven months, in which time it ſwept away 68,596 ſouls. The dead were carried out in carts during the night, and buried at Holy-well Mount. Charles, at its firſt appearance, removed to Hampton-court, and afterwards to Saliſbury, and the ſeſſion of parliament was held at Oxford.

The king of Denmark now acted with great duplicity, for, alarmed at the miſcarriage of Tiddeman, and aſhamed of his own conduct, he at firſt concluded an offenſive alliance with England againſt the ſtates; but reflecting on the great power of the Engliſh navy, and the fatal conſequences that might attend the deſtruction of a power, whoſe fleets only were capable of diſputing the ſovereignty of the ocean, he ſent orders to his reſident at the Hague to conclude a defenſive alliance with the ſtates againſt England. He adhered to the laſt alliance, and ſeized and confiſcated all the Britiſh ſhips in his harbours. This was a ſenſible check to the advantages Charles had obtained over the Dutch. The Engliſh commerce was not only affected, but the naval force of the king of Denmark was alſo conſiderable, and there was the greateſt reaſon to imagine that his ſhips would ſoon join the fleets of the republic. Nor indeed was Denmark the only power that was alarmed by the ſucceſs of the Engliſh; the king of France could not behold their triumphs without uneaſineſs. He was already engaged in a defenſive alliance with the ſtates; but his naval force was yet in its infancy. He was reſolved to ſupport the Hollanders in the unequal conteſt in which they were engaged, but protracted his declaration, and employed the interval in naval preparations both in his ports on the ocean, and thoſe in the Mediterranean. The king of Denmark was, however, made acquainted with his deſign, and ſtipulated to aſſiſt the Dutch with a fleet of 30 ſail; in conſequence of which he was to receive an annual ſubſidy of one million five hundred thouſand crowns, three hundred thouſand of which to be paid by the court of France.

The Dutch being encouraged by theſe favourable circumſtances, continued to exert all their power in their own defence, and to ſupport that power on the ocean, their fleets had obtained. De Ruyter, their great admiral, was arrived from the coaſt of Guinea: their India fleet was returned in ſafety; their harbours were crowded with merchantmen: domeſtic faction was appeaſed: the young prince of Orange had put himſelf under the tuition of de Wit, who executed his office with the ſtricteſt honour and fidelity; and the whole republic was ſo exaſperated againſt the Engliſh, that they thirſted for revenge, and promiſed themſelves that their next enterprize would be attended with better ſucceſs. Their merchant ſhips were not ſuffered to ſail, and even the fiſheries were ſuſpended, that no impediment might retard the manning of their fleet in the compleateſt manner.

The parliament of England aſſembled at Oxford, and declared their intention of ſupporting his majeſty in the war againſt the Dutch. Accordingly they voted him 1,250,000l. to be levied in two years, by monthly aſſeſſments. The independents, anabaptiſts, and republicans, encouraged by the emiſſaries of the Dutch, had formed a ſcheme for a general inſurrection; but their whole plan was rendered abortive. Exaſperated by theſe practices, the parliament brought in a bill, known by the name of the Five-Mile-act, which afterwards gave occaſion to many heavy and juſt complaints. Under the ſpecious pretence of ſupporting the throne againſt the attempts of its moſt inveterate enemies, the church perſevered in her project of wreaking her vengeance on the non-conformiſts. By this bill it was enacted, that no diſſenting teacher, who refuſed to take the oath of non-reſiſtance, ſhould, except upon the road, come within five miles of any corporation, or of any place, where he had diſcharged the offices of a miniſter after the act of oblivion, under the penalty of fifty pounds. Violences like theſe could only be conſidered as preludes to the moſt furious perſecution; but the ſpirit of the nation had undergone a change, the intolerant ſpirit was nipped in its bud, and the commons rejected the bill for impoſing the oath of non-reſiſtance.

A. D. 1666. France now declared war againſt England. But the conteſt was unequal. The Engliſh, however, ſtill enjoyed one advantage: their country lay between the fleets of their enemies, and might be able, by ſpeedy, and well-concerted operations, to prevent their junction. But ſuch was the want of intelligence in the miniſtry, or the want of conduct in the commanders, that this favourable circumſtance became rather prejudicial. Beaufort, the French admiral, had received orders to ſail from Toulon with his ſquadron, in order to join the Dutch, and it was ſuppoſed that he was already in the channel. The Engliſh fleet, conſiſting of 74 ſail, was commanded by Monk, earl of Albemarle, and prince Rupert. The former, from the repeated defeats of the Dutch during the government of Cromwell, had raſhly entertained too deſpicable an opinion of their courage; and it was determined in a council of war, to detach prince Rupert with a ſquadron of 20 ſhips, in order to intercept the French admiral.

At this time the Dutch fleet, commanded by the celebrated admiral de Ruyter, was riding at anchor between Newport and Dunkirk, expecting, as it was ſuppoſed, the arrival of the French ſquadron. Albemarle determined to force them to action, and accordingly ſtood immediately towards them. The Dutch, who did not expect this viſit, prepared for the engagement, and cut their cables, that they might the ſooner be in readineſs to receive the enemy. Sir George Aſcue, who was well acquainted with the bravery of the Dutch, cautioned Albemarle of his danger, but it was now too late. The battle which enſued was one of the moſt remarkable recorded in hiſtory, whether the duration, or deſperate courag with which it was fought, be conſidered. It continued four days, and each was marked with events o the moſt aſtoniſhing nature. Albemarle, conſciou of the miſtake he had made with regard to the courage and conduct of the enemy, exerted all his grea abilities on this memorable occaſion. Though no in the decline of life, he appeared the youthfu hero, and ſeemed to have forgot his years as well a his dangerous ſituation.

The van, which was led by Sir William Berkeley during the firſt day's engagement fell into the thicke of the enemy, and was obliged to yield to ſuperio force. When the victors entered the ſhip, the found the gallant commander dead in his cabbin, an covered with blood. The advantage which the Engliſh had acquired by gaining the weather-gage of th enemy was of very little conſequence, occaſione by the wind blowing ſo high, that they could not u the guns on the lower deck. A diſcovery made b de Wit was of the utmoſt conſequence to the Dutc This was chain-ſhot, which tore the rigging of th Engliſh to pieces. Sir John Harman attacked th Dutch admiral Evertz, and obtained the victory Evertz was killed in the engagement. But the conte was at length terminated by night.

The enſuing morning was conſiderably calme which occaſioned the battle to be at once more ſte dy and more dreadful, and it was now perceived th valour alone is not ſufficient to compenſate for a defect of ſuperiority, when the enemy is not wantin either in courage or conduct. De Ruyter and Va Tromp, at once enemies from faction, and rivals i glory, exerted themſelves in this memorable battl The latter being ſurrounded by the Engliſh, was relieved by the former, when reduced to the laſt extremity. During the action ſixteen freſh ſhips joine the Hollanders. This addition was deciſive. Th Engliſh, whoſe ſhips were dreadfully ſhattered, an reduced to twenty-eight, found themſelves obliged retreat towards their own coaſts, whither they we followed by the Dutch, and their whole fleet mu have been taken, had not a ſudden calm, which happened a little before night, prevented the engageme from being renewed.

The Engliſh continued their retreat as ſoon as th morning appeared. The ſhattered ſhips were orde ed to ſet all their ſails, while ſixteen of the moſt e tire, drawn up in order, followed them, and kept th enemy in play. Albemarle himſelf cloſed the re and preſented an undaunted countenance to the en my fluſhed with victory. The admiral confeſſed the young earl of Oſſory, who ſerved a voluntee that he was determined to blow up his ſhip, and peri gloriouſly in the bed of honour, rather than ſtrike the enemy. Oſſory agreed with him, and high applauded this deſperate intrepidity.

Almoſt at the inſtant that the Dutch were comi up with the Engliſh, and were preparing to beg the engagement, a new fleet appeared to the ſout ward, crouding all their ſails to reach the ſcene action, and join in the dreadful conteſt. De Ruyt was perſuaded that Beaufort was arrived to aſſiſt the total defeat of the enemy; while the Engliſh fla tered themſelves that prince Rupert was coming ſnatch the laurel wreath from the brow of the co queror. Albemarle was ſoon convinced that th were the prince's ſhips; and ſtood immediately wards them. The whole fleet followed the admira but Sir George Aſcue, whoſe ſhip carried 100 gu and was the largeſt in the fleet, unfortunately r aſhore upon a ſand called the Galloper, and w obliged to ſtrike to the Dutch.

At length it was determined in a council of war ma make another attempt againſt the Dutch, and accordingly the engagement began the next morning with greater fury than ever. The ſhips were grappled to each other, and the men fought hand to hand, as if on firm ground. In this manner the conteſt continued, till a thick miſt obliged them to ſeperate: when the Engliſh returned to the mouth of the Thames, and, conſequently, gained a place of ſecurity.

The victory, on this occaſion was claimed by the Dutch, who, however, had but very little reaſon to plume themſelves upon the occaſion. The Engliſh fleet was ſoon in a condition to face the enemy; and de Ruyter, having repaired the damages his fleet had ſuſtained, ſtood to the mouth of the Thames, in order to block up the Engliſh, and facilitate his junction with the French admiral. It could not be expected the Engliſh would tamely bear ſo vile an inſult. Albemarle and prince Rupert haſtened to attack the enemy. The two fleets, as well as the courage and conduct of their leaders, were nearly equal; each conſiſted of about eighty-eight ſail. They met on the 24th of July, and the engagement began with incredible fury. Sir Thomas Allen, who commanded the white ſquadron, attacked the van of the Dutch with ſo much fury that they were entirely routed, and the three admirals who commanded that diviſion were ſlain. Van Tromp engaged Sir Jeremy Smith; and during the heat of the action he was ſeparated from the main body, commanded by de Ruyter, who with the utmoſt conduct and valour, maintained the fight againſt the principal force of the Engliſh; and the fight continued till night put an end to the engagement. He propoſed to have renewed the battle as ſoon as the morning appeared, but inſtead of finding his ſhips in a ſituation for attacking the enemy, he ſaw them ſcattered, and unwilling to renew the battle. In this alarming ſituation, neither his courage nor his preſence of mind forſook him. He made ſo noble a retreat, that he gained as much honour by his prudence as he could have done had he gained the victory. But he could not bear the thought of flying from the enemy. He often exclaimed, " What a wretch am I, that among ſo many thouſand ſhot that fly near me, not one will put an end to my miſerable life!" He however perſevered in his duty, and by his amazing efforts the Dutch fleet were conducted into their own harbours. On his return to Holland, he complained loudly of Van Tromp's conduct, and that gallant admiral was diſmiſſed from the ſervice of the ſtates-general.

The Engliſh by this victory were rendered the indiſputed maſters of the ocean; and admiral Holmes was detached with 20 ſail of ſhips to inſult the Dutch coaſts. Accordingly, he entered the road of Ulie, where he deſtroyed 140 ſail of merchantmen, two ſhips of war, and burnt the rich village of Brandorus. Theſe inſults and loſſes exaſperated the people in general, and the merchants in particular, who exclaimed loudly againſt the Dutch adminiſtration.

The French king being alarmed at the ſucceſs of the Engliſh, haſtened Beaufort to join the Dutch, and his friend de Wit might not be able to ſupport himſelf in the adminiſtration. De Ruyter's fleet was ſoon refitted; he put to ſea, and again cruized in the ſtreights of Dover. The Engliſh fleet, now ſtronger than ever, ſailed, under the command of prince Rupert, to attack the enemy. Ruyter thought proper to decline the engagement, as he every day expected to be joined by the French ſquadron, and retired into St. John's road, near Bologne, where he was ſheltered from a terrible ſtorm that ſoon after aroſe. Prince Rupert was not ſo fortunate; his ſhips received conſiderable damage, and he was obliged to retire to St. Helen's to refit. In the mean time the duke of Beaufort, the French admiral, proceeded up the channel, and paſſed the Engliſh fleet unperceived. But before he reached the place where he expected to join de Ruyter, that commander had been ſeized with a fever, and the ſtates had thought proper to recall their fleet. Anxious for his fleet, which he had raiſed with ſo much art and induſtry, Lewis ſent orders to Beaufort to make the beſt of his way to Breſt, and to continue as near as poſſible to the French coaſt. Beaufort obeyed, and was fortunate enough to paſs the Engliſh without being perceived. One of his ſhips only, being ſeparated from the fleet, was taken.

During the time of the fleets being thus inactive, the city of London was reduced to aſhes, by a dreadful fire which broke out on the ſecond of September. It began at a broker's houſe near the bridge, and diffuſed itſelf on all ſides with ſuch rapidity, that nothing could reſiſt the progreſs of the flames. The dreadful conflagration laſted three days and nights; nor did it ſtop till the greater part of the capital was deſtroyed. Eighty churches, ſeveral of the city gates, and 400 ſtreets, containing above 13,200 dwelling houſes, were conſumed. The ruins covered a ſpace of 426 acres, extending along the banks of the Thames from the Tower to the Temple church; and from the north-eaſt gate along the city wall to Holborn-bridge. It was at laſt extinguiſhed by blowing up a number of houſes. Both the king and the duke of York attended, and exerted all their endeadeavors to put a ſtop to the progreſs of the flames.

A calamity ſo dreadful gave occaſion to various conjectures with regard to its cauſe; no perſon being inclined to think it caſual. Some imputed it to the malice of the republicans; but the greater part aſcribed it to the malice of the papiſts; and in order to comply with this popular prejudice, an inſcription engraven by authority on the monument imputed it to that hated ſect. Both theſe ſuſpicions, however, ſeemed to have owed their riſe to the violent animoſities that poſſeſſed the minds of the different parties which divided the people at this period. Their poſterity, who behold this, and other events of that time, through the cooler medium of reaſon, ſee no cauſe for aſcribing this dreadful accident either to treachery or malice. The ſtreets of London were then extremely narrow; the houſes were almoſt all built of timber, or lath and plaiſter; the ſeaſon was remarkably dry; and a violent eaſt wind happened to blow at that time. To theſe cauſes, and to theſe only, the aſtoniſhing progreſs of the flames ought to be imputed.

This misfortune, however dreadful at firſt, was attended with the moſt beneficial conſequences. The new ſtreets were much wider than the old; the houſes were built with brick and ſtone; lath and plaiſter, as well as timber, in the walls, being forbid by authority. By theſe means the city became much more healthy than before; and the plague, which ſo often ſwept the greater number of inhabitants, has not once appeared ſince this dreadful conflagration. The parliament voted a ſupply of 1,800,000l. towards defraying the expences of rebuilding the city.

A. D. 1667. Charles having received a ſupply of money, by the aſſent of parliament, now determined to bring about a peace, and accordingly propoſed the opening conferences for that purpoſe. The Dutch, who by their riches and navigation were on a better footing than the Engliſh, propoſed the alternative that things ſhould be reſtored to the ſituation they were in at the beginning of the war, or that the two nations ſhould retain all their acquiſitions. The laſt was accepted, and no difficulty remained but with regard to the poſſeſſion of the Iſle of Polerone in the Eaſt Indies, once famous for its ſpices. Holles and Coventry, the Engliſh plenipotentiares at the congreſs, propoſed that a ceſſation of hoſtilities ſhould be concluded, till the ſeveral claims could be adjuſted; but de Wit refuſed the offer. That ſagacious and enterprizing miniſter, who was no ſtranger to Charles's neceſſities, had planned an expedition, which, if ſucceſsful, he knew would be of more weight in the negociations than any arguments.

Imagining that there was not the leaſt reaſon to fear the ſucceſs of the negociation, and that no attempt would be made by the enemy while the conferences were open, the king had laid up his large ſhips, in order to convert to his own uſe the greater part of the money granted him by parliament. De Wit, who had the beſt intelligence from England, determined to take advantage of the negligence of the Britiſh monarch. He ordered Re Ruyter to ſail with a fleet of ſhips and ſurprize the Engliſh, lulled in fatal ſecurity. De Ruyter executed his commiſſion with equal conduct and ſucceſs. He entered the mouth of the Thames, and threw the Engliſh into the utmoſt conſternation. The mouth of the river Medway was defended by a chain, and ſome fortifications had been added to Sheerneſs and Upnore-caſtle. But the former was ſoon taken, though defended by the brave Sir Edward Sprague. The wind blowing freſh at eaſt, the vice-admiral, Van Ghent, broke the chain drawn acroſs the entrance of the Medway, and burnt the Matthias, the Unity, and the Charles V. all capital ſhips, and all taken from the Dutch during the war. He alſo poſſeſſed himſelf of the hull of the Royal Charles, which the Engliſh had ſet on fire, and advanced with ſix men of war and five fire ſhips as far as Upnore-caſtle, where he burnt the Royal Oak, the Loyal London, and the Great James, all ſhips of importance.

The Dutch now fell down the Medway, and it was apprehended that they would proceed up the Thames next tide, and deſtroy all the ſhips in the river. The capital was in confuſion. Nine ſhips were ſunk at Woolwich, and four at Blackwall: platforms were raiſed in ſeveral places, and furniſhed with artillery: the trained bands were called out, and every precaution taken to render the attempt of the enemy abortive. But de Ruyter did not think proper to proceed; the danger he thought was too great, and the hopes of ſucceſs too precarious. He left the mouth of the Thames, ſtood to the weſtward, and made an attempt to deſtroy the ſhipping at Portſmouth and Plymouth, but was repulſed at both places with loſs. He was not, however, intimidated: he returned again to the mouth of the Thames, and advanced as far as Tilbury-fort; but found the Engliſh ſo well prepared for his reception, that there were no hopes of ſucceſs. He next inſulted Harwich, and kept the whole ſouthern coaſt of England in perpetual alarms till the concluſion of the peace, which happened on the tenth of July, when the treaty was ſigned at Breda. Acadia was yielded to the French, who agreed to reſtore St. Chriſtopher's, and ſome other iſlands which they had taken in the Weſt-Indies. The iſland of Polerone remained with the Dutch, and the colony of New-York was the only advantage the Engliſh derived from a war that had coſt the nation ſuch immenſe ſums.

So ruinous a war, and terminated with ſo little advantage, exaſperated the Engliſh, and it was thought neceſſary to make ſome ſacrifice to appeaſe the people, before the meeting of the parliament. Clarendon the chancellor was at this time no favourite with either party. The king reſpected the merit of that great miniſter, but his virtues were troubleſome. The chancellor, incorruptible in the midſt of a diſſolute court, ſtill retained his integrity of manners. He was a reſtraint upon his pleaſures, and oppoſed his prodigalities. The people leſs grateful for the good he had done them, than exaſperated at the circumſtances that diſpleaſed them, were ſo far from thinking themſelves obliged to Clarendon for his conduct, that they conſidered him as the author of their ſufferings. The preſbyterians reproached him with perſecution on one hand, and the Roman catholics with cruelty on the other. Though the war with Holland was undertaken contrary to his advice, yet the misfortunes were wholly attributed to him, becauſe it was determined to find him guilty at all events. The earl of Southampton, high-treaſurer, and the virtuous friend of Clarendon, who had been dead about three months, had done juſtice to his character. "This man (ſaid he in full council) is a true proteſtant and an honeſt Engliſhman; while he enjoys power, we are ſecure of our laws, liberty, and religion: if he is removed, I tremble for the conſequences." But the virtues of Clarendon, inſtead o preventing, occaſioned his fall. The ſeals were taken from him, and given to Sir Orlando Bridgeman His enemies were not, however, ſatisfied with hi diſgrace; they were determined to complete his ruin As ſoon as the parliament met, a charge was opene againſt him in the houſe of commons, by Sir Edwar Seymour. It conſiſted of ſeventeen articles: bu the principal, and indeed the only one, that coul affect him, was the adviſing the ſale of Dunkirk, an even this amounted to nothing more than an error i judgment. When the charge was carried up to th peers, it was ſo ill ſupported, that they refuſed t put him under an arreſt. But Clarendon perceivin that the tide of popular clamour ran ſtrongly again him, and that he was entirely abandoned by his ma ter, whom he had ſo long and ſo faithfully ſerve withdrew to Rouen in Normandy, and put himſe under the protection of Lewis XIV. The Frenc more judicious and more humane than his countr men, received the illuſtrious fugitive with eve mark of reſpect. He lived ſix years in this reti ment, employing his leiſure time in writing a hiſto of the civil wars, a work worthy of the ſtateſm and the illuſtrious citizen. The early part of life had been ſpent in the ſtudy of the laws. father often exhorted him never to advance the p rogative at the expence of the public liberty, a died of an apoplexy juſt after he had repeated t leſſon to his ſon. This affecting incident imprin it ſtrongly on his memory. His loyalty to Charle was that of an Engliſhman firmly attached to principles of the conſtitution, and he died with character of a nobleman of unblemiſhed virtue, an corruptible judge, and an able miniſter, equ valuable for his attachment and his honeſty.

Charles's miniſtry was now entirely changed; treaſury was put into commiſſion, and Sir Rich Clifford, a declared papiſt, was made firſt comm oner. Sir Henry Bennet, created earl of Arling a concealed papiſt, was made ſecretary of ſtate. duke of Buckingham, a nobleman of ſpirit and mour, but of an abandoned character; and Wil earl of Rocheſter, the lewdeſt, and moſt licen poet of the age, were the king's chief favourites miniſters of his pleaſures.

The fire having laid the Royal Exchange, bui Sir Thomas Greſham, in aſhes, it was determin rebuild it in a moſt ſplendid manner. A mod the intended building was accordingly preſent the king; and it being approved of, Charles lai firſt ſtone in the beginning of October, with gre lemnity.

Lord Clarendon's exile not having fully tented the people, the king had recourſe to an expedient more deſerving of praiſe; and had it ſteadily purſued, would probably have rendere reign happy; at leaſt, it would have rendere memory glorious. This was the triple alliance, a meaſure which gave great ſatisfaction to the people in general.

The French monarch Lewis XIV. as proud as he was powerful, and paſſionately fond of glory, particularly that of conqueſts unworthy of a great prince, filled Europe with uneaſineſs and apprehenſions. Notwithſtanding the renunciation of his queen, Maria Thereſa, of Auſtria, he ſeized Flanders and Franche Comte, pretending he had a legal right to them both. The United Provinces were ſufficiently alarmed. England was enraged at the aſſumed ſuperiority of France; and Charles projected the triple alliance. Sir William Temple was ſent to negotiate the treaty. A philoſophical miniſter could not fail of being agreeable to de Wit. The ſame frankneſs, ſincerity, and greatneſs of mind, diſtinguiſhed them both. It was not between miniſters of ſuch a character that politics degenerate into fineſſe and chicane. They undertook to mediate between France and Spain, and to engage them in a treaty that ſhould leave to Lewis part of his conqueſt, but that he ſhould abſolutely renounce the rights of his queen. Sweden entered into this alliance. According to the laws of the States General, all the towns were to conſent to the treaty: and this it was poſſible the intrigues of Lewis might have power to prevent. His ambaſſador, d'Eſtrades, was ſo ſure of this, that, on being informed of the negotiation, he ſaid, "We will talk of it in ſix weeks." But de Wit, foreſeeing the danger of delay, and perſuaded that in a caſe of ſo much importance to his country, the good of the public ought to over-rule even the laws themſelves, boldly urged the ſtates to ratify the league the very day it was ſigned, and prevailed. Sir William Temple received the moſt flattering encomiums with a degree of modeſty that added to his merit. He anſwered, that to remove things from their element, or their centre, force and labour were neceſſary; but that they would return of themſelves. The triple alliance, ſigned at Aix-la-Chapelle, put an end to the conqueſts of Lewis XIV. He kept what he had gained in the Low Countries, but Franche Comte was reſtored to the Spaniards.

Philip IV. of Spain had been ſucceeded by his ſon, Charles II. then a minor, and his mother held the reins of government, with the title of regent. The court of Spain, though it was forced to ſubmit to the terms of the triple alliance, by no means approved of that treaty; becauſe certain conceſſions were to be made to France, which were not agreeable to the haughty ſpirit of the Spaniards. That court even declared, that they were ready to relinquiſh all the Low Countries, rather than ſubmit to the articles of the treaty. This was, however, nothing more than a paſſionate declaration; it was found in vain to reſiſt, and the treaty was accepted.

Tranquillity being thus reſtored on the continent, Charles formed a ſcheme for attaching both the preſbyterians and papiſts more ſtrongly to his intereſt. To effect this, he propoſed to incorporate the preſbyterians with the church of England, and to obtain a toleration for all the other ſects of nonconformiſts.

A. D. 1669. The lord-keeper was accordingly directed to procure a conference between ſome of the moſt eminent of the epiſcopal and preſbyterian miniſters, and to offer propoſals for a comprehenſion of ſuch diſſenters as could be brought into communion with the church of England. The epiſcopal divines, either from a ſpirit of chriſtian charity, or a deſire to pleaſe their ſovereign, were very compliable on this occaſion; they made large conceſſions; and nothing was wanting to put a final hand to the accommodation, but the re-ordaining the preſbyterian miniſters. Matters being thus adjuſted, lord chief juſtice Hales undertook to draw up a bill of comprehenſion, and the lord-keeper engaged to ſupport it in parliament. But the archbiſhop of Canterbury, who was not intruſted in the ſecret, determined to render every ſcheme of this ſort abortive. He wrote circular letters to the ſuffragan biſhops in his province, enjoining them to make an exact enquiry into the number of conventicles in each particular dioceſe. Provided with theſe neceſſary informations, he repaired to court, and obtained a proclamation to be publiſhed, for putting the laws againſt diſſenters in execution, particularly the act for reſtraining non-conformiſts from reſiding in corporate towns. But the king ſoon rendered the intentions of the biſhop abortive, by ordering the non-conformiſt miniſters to be told from him, that he was very deſirous of making them eaſy; adding, that if they thought proper to petition the crown, they ſhould be favourably heard. They embraced the offer; a petition was preſented; and the king, in his anſwer, told them, "That he would uſe all his intereſt to get them comprehended in the public eſtabliſhment." The parliament was, however, averſe to any ſuch conceſſions, and when they met in October they preſented an addreſs of thanks to his majeſty for his proclamation, and appointed a committee to make a ſtrict enquiry into the conduct of the non-conformiſts. A great number of informations were accordingly laid before them, and they reported, "That ſeveral conventicles and ſeditious aſſemblies were held, even in the neighbourhood of the houſe, tending to inſult the government, and endanger the peace of the kingdom." This report ſet the houſe in a flame; and the following declaration was immediately voted, "that they would adhere to his majeſty, for the ſupport of the government, both in church and ſtate, againſt all adverſaries whatever." They proceeded no farther at that time, and the king prorogued the parliament to the fourteenth of February.

A. D. 1670. On the 14th of February when the king opened the ſeſſion of parliament, he demanded a ſupply in the moſt preſſing terms. But the commons, before they complied with the king's deſires, paſſed the conventicle act, by which every member of a conventicle, or aſſembly of non-conformiſts, conſiſting of more than five perſons, excluſive of the family where it was held, was liable to a fine. And contrary to the principle received in criminal matters, what appeared doubtful was always to be interpreted in the leaſt favourable light. This ſeverity of the commons was the more extraordinary, as the ſame ſpirit of perſecution had, a little before, occaſioned a rebellion in Scotland. About two thouſand preſbyterians, after renewing the covenant, took up arms; and the flame which deſpair had kindled was quenched in blood. One Maccail, who had joined in the inſurrection, expired under the torture in a kind of triumph of joy. The moment when his ſoul was taking its flight, he cried out, "Farewell ſun, moon and ſtars; farewell world and time; farewell frail and weak body: welcome eternity, welcome angels and ſaints, welcome Saviour of the world, and welcome God, the judge of all!" The ſpectators were ſtruck with a fortitude like this; a man expiring under the moſt cruel torments, and rejoicing in the dreadful conflict, was truly aſtoniſhing; it increaſed their hatred againſt ſuch inhuman perſecutors.

Although prince Rupert, the duke of Ormond, ſecretary Trevor, and the lord-keeper Bridgeman, on whoſe honour and integrity the people could rely, ſtill continued in office, yet they enjoyed but little power; they were ſeldom admitted to the cabinet council, or conſulted on the moſt preſſing affairs of the nation. Equally ſuſpicious and ſuſpected, a ſlave to pleaſure and a dupe to artifice, Charles neglected the cares of government, and expoſed himſelf to the danger of a fatal revolution. Five miniſters ſhared his confidence, and directed all the affairs of government. Aſhley Cooper, earl of Saliſbury, diſtinguiſhed by his learning, but of the moſt violent paſſions; the duke of Buckingham, with all the advantages of wit, figure and fortune, but without either conduct or principles; the duke of Lauderdale, a man of parts, but opinionated, a ſycophant to the prince, and a tyrant to the ſubject; the bold and impetuous Clifford, and the earl of Arlington, well verſed in buſineſs, and worthy of the place he enjoyed, had his reſolution been ſufficient to follow his own ſentiments, rather than the influence of the court. The miniſtry was called the Cabal, from the five initial letters of their names forming that word.

When Charles had given the royal aſſent to the bill againſt diſſenters, the commons paſſed an act for granting 1,700,000l. to his majeſty; but the money had the ſame fate with other ſums he had already received from parliament: it was ſquandered away upon his miſtreſſes and favourites, and he was ſo far from making good his engagements with the ſtates-general, that he entered into meaſures for forming a cloſer union than ever with the king of France. Deſirous of rendering himſelf abſolute, by ſhaking off the yoke of dependence on the ſupplies of parliament, he determined to ſecure the friendſhip of Lewis XIV. as the only method of executing his purpoſe. To this chimerical project he ſacrificed every ſentiment of honour, juſtice, and humanity. He knew he had nothing to fear from his miniſters; their ſervile flattery, and the licentiouſneſs of their manners, were ill calculated to ſupport the intereſts of their country. They were deſirous of rendering the king independent of the parliament; and thought the only way to effect it, was to enter into a new war with Holland, and depend upon Lewis for aſſiſtance of men and money.

Purſuant to this reſolution, it was determined to renew the war with Holland on the ſlighteſt pretences. The duke of York entered heartily into this ſcheme, which he was perſuaded could not fail, if ſucceſsful, of eſtabliſhing the catholic religion in England. But the alliance with France was to be kept an impenetrable ſecret, till Charles had procured a vote of parliament for arming the nation, under pretence of being ready, at all events, to protect the commerce, and ſupport the independence of the nation againſt the attempts of any power whatever, great preparations being making in the ports of France and Holland.

The triple alliance had put an effectual ſtop to the conqueſts of Lewis, on which occaſion that ambitious monarch was deſirous of revenge. Could the Engliſh be prevailed upon to enter into a new war with the Dutch, the difficulty would be removed; and he flattered himſelf that this was not difficult to be accompliſhed, as the reduction of Holland would remove the object of emulation to the Engliſh, who were jealous of their privileges. Full of theſe ideas he took a journey to Dunkirk, accompanied by his whole court, and the ducheſs of Orleans took that opportunity of viſiting her brother. Lewis was no ſtranger to the addreſs of that amiable princeſs, and the aſcendant ſhe had acquired over the Engliſh monarch, and had prevailed upon her to exert all her intereſt to draw her brother from the triple league. This young princeſs, then only twenty-five years of age, was accordingly ſelected as the plenipotentiary for concluding this important treaty. Charles met his ſiſter at Dover, where they ſpent ten days together in the utmoſt harmony. In their conferences ſhe artfully inſinuated, that nothing was wanting to render him the greateſt monarch in the world, and to recompence him for all the misfortunes he had ſuffered, than that of making himſelf as abſolute in England as the other princes of Europe were in their dominions. This glorious end ſhe obſerved could never be obtained while his ſubjects had any proſpect of being aſſiſted by the Dutch, whoſe republican principles led them to ſupport the liberty of the ſubject. It was therefore neceſſary for him to humble the Hollanders, which would effectually remove the only difficulty of keeping his own ſubjects within the bounds of obedience. She added, that he might reſt aſſured, the king of France would aſſiſt him with men and money ſufficient to quell any commotions that might be raiſed in England, by purſuing this deſign. Blinded with the love he bore his ſiſter, and intoxicated with the deſire of governing with unlimited authority, Charles agreed to every thing propoſed by Lewis, and laid the foundation for the ruin of his allies, in the midſt of convivial entertainments.

The French king, being no ſtranger to the natura inconſtancy of Charles's temper, artfully determine to fix him firm to his engagements by the bands o pleaſure. He ſent over with the princeſs Henriett mademoiſelle de Querouaille, a young lady of extraordinary beauty and accompliſhments. Charles ha not power to reſiſt her charms. She accompanie him to London; was ſoon after created ducheſs o Portſmouth, and maintained her empire over h heart during the whole courſe of his life. She ke him firm in his engagements with France, and co tinued to be the reigning favourite, while his forme miſtreſs was honoured with the title of a ducheſs, ſome recompence for the favour ſhe had loſt.

The Engliſh monarch's joy, however, was great leſſened by the loſs of his ſiſter, who died ſoon aft her return to France. But this event made no alt ration in the reſolutions of the two monarchs. Th duke of Buckingham was diſpatched to Paris to p a finiſhing hand to the treaty, by which the ſpoils the Dutch, devoted to deſtruction, were to be ſhar between France and England. It was, howeve found impoſſible to keep this treaty a ſecret: t many perſons had been concerned in its executio But though it was generally ſuſpected, and perha known to moſt of the courts of Europe, it occaſio ed no alarm. The emperor was fully employed w ſeditions in Hungary; the Swede lulled aſleep w negotiations; and the Spaniſh monarchy, weak a irreſolute, and always ſlower in its motions, perm ted Lewis to follow the career of his ambition u moleſted.

An irruption was made into Lorrain by the m quis of Crequi. The duke, not dreaming of hoſt ties, was forced to abandon his territories. He fl tered himſelf that he ſhould find a powerful advoc in Charles, in return for the many favours he h received during his exile; but he was miſtaken. envoy was told, "That the king was extremely ſo for the misfortunes of his maſter, but that the p ſent violence, like the misfortunes of a ſudden in dation, had no remedy but patience." This ma feſt partiality in favour of the French alarmed Dutch, who began to fear for the ſafety of their country. Their misfortunes were encreaſed by factions, which divided the commonwealth: compoſed of rigid republicans, to whom the leaſt dow of abſolute authority ſeemed a monſter, c trary to the laws of human ſociety; the other republicans of a more moderate diſpoſition, were deſirous of inveſting the young prince of range, afterwards the famous William III. with poſts and dignities of his anceſtors. The grand ſionary John de Wit was at the head of the rigid republicans, but the party of the young prince began to gain ground in the ſtate. Theſe domeſtic diſſentions were more regarded than the foreign danger that threatened the deſtruction of their liberty.

The king of France had not only gained the Engliſh monarch over to his intereſt, but alſo the famous Van Galen, biſhop of Munſter, whoſe delight was war and plunder, and naturally an enemy to the Dutch. Lewis had formerly aſſiſted them againſt this warlike prelate; but he now joined him for their deſtruction. The Swedes, having united with the republic to ſtop the projects of a conqueror, who had then no deſigns againſt them, abandoned her when they ſaw ſhe was threatened with ruin, and renewed their old connections with France, on condition of receiving the former ſubſidies.

Purſuant to their prorogation on the 24th of October, the parliament met, and the ſeſſion was opened with a ſpeech from the lord-keeper, who repreſented the preſſing exigencies of the ſtate, and the abſolute neceſſity of an immediate ſupply. He told them, "That France and the ſtates-general were collecting powerful armies by ſea and land; were aſſiduouſly employed in building ſhips, and filling their magazines with all ſorts of warlike ſtores and proviſions; that ſince the beginning of the laſt war with Holland, France had encreaſed the ſtrength of her marine more than three times what it was before; and that Holland alſo, ſince the concluſion of the peace, had pplied herſelf diligently to the augmentation of her leets; that in ſo critical a conjuncture, common rudence required that his majeſty ſhould make ſome uitable preparations; that he had accordingly given rders for fitting out fifty ſail of his largeſt ſhips gainſt the ſpring, beſides thoſe which were neceſſa- y for the ſecurity of trade, foreſeeing, that if he eglected to put his navy in a reſpectable condition, might prove a temptation to thoſe who did not now em to intend it, to offer an affront at leaſt, if not o a real injury to the nation." He next expatiated on e ſeveral advantageous leagues he had entered into r the defence of his kingdom, and the benefit of mmerce. He particularly mentioned the triple lliance concluded with the Dutch and Swedes, and oſe with Portugal and Denmark. And concluded th aſſuring them, that the king would prorogue the rliament at Chriſtmas, and therefore wiſhed they uld regulate their proceedings accordingly.

This duplicity and prevarication deceived the mmons, who being either unacquainted with, or t crediting the king's engagements with France, oted him 2,500,000l. a much larger ſupply than had ver been granted by a parliament, and certainly ne- er leſs deſerved. Sir William Temple was ſtill at e Hague, where he had acquired ſo great a reputa- on for honour and integrity, that the Cabal were rſuaded no orders from his majeſty could prevail pon him to promote or countenance meaſures de- uctive of the intereſt of his country. He was erefore recalled. De Wit, who admired the great d noble qualities of the Engliſh reſident, took ve of him with the utmoſt regret. The Dutch through the flimſy veil of pretence made uſe of remove him; and were now fully convinced of inſincerity of Charles. They even ordered their baſſador at London to ſignify to the Engliſh mini- y, that they ſhould look upon their recalling Sir lliam Temple as an undoubted proof of their ing changed their meaſures.

A. D. 1672. At the latter end of January, the liament met again, when the king ſent a meſſage the commons, deſiring that the money-bills might haſtened; but inſtead of paſſing the acts they d with the lords in a ſolemn addreſs to his majeſty, upon the alarming increaſe of popery, and deſired that no papiſt or reputed papiſt might enjoy any office, civil or military. The king, unwilling to give them an abſolute denial, publiſhed a proclamation againſt the catholics, but never intended to carry it into execution. As ſoon as the firſt of the money bills was carried to the houſe of peers, Lucas ſeverely animadverted on the enormous grants made to the crown, and the ſhameful manner in which theſe ſupplies were ſquandered away. "While we are continually giving," ſaid he at the concluſion of his ſpeech, "and the king is continually aſking, it is neceſſary to make ſome eſtimate for ourſelves. Would his majeſty be pleaſed to requeſt a quarter of our eſtates, I would, for my part, chearfully reſign it. Were it half, upon good occaſions, I ſhould reſign it freely; but then let us have ſome aſſurance of quietly enjoying the reſidue, and know what we have to truſt to." The king was in the gallery when Lucas ſpoke with ſuch boldneſs, and was highly offended; but he was ſo exaſperated when he found the ſpeech was printed, and diſperſed through every part of the kingdom, that he ordered it to be burnt by the common executioner.

This, however, had ſuch an effect upon the lords, that they made ſome alterations in the money bill ſent up by the commons. This was highly reſented by the latter, who conſidered it as an infringement on their undoubted right of regulating all acts of ſubſidy. Several conferences were held between the two houſes in order to terminate the affair; but inſtead of coming to an amicable agreement, they carried the diſpute to ſo great a height, that the king was obliged to prorogue the parliament, and loſe the large ſupply that had been voted by the commons.

A tax on plays was propoſed, during this ſeſſion of parliament. But this was objected to by the court party, who ſaid the players were the king's ſervants, and adminiſtered to his pleaſures. Sir John Coventry pleaſantly aſked, "Whether the king's pleaſures lay among the male or female actors?" Charles, who, beſides his other miſtreſſes, entertained two actreſſes, Mrs. Davis and Nell Gwin, was hurt by this ſarcaſm, and took an unworthy revenge. Some of his guards attacked Coventry, and ſlit his noſe. The commons expreſſed their indignation by paſſing what is called the Coventry act, by which maiming and deforming was made a capital crime, and thoſe perſons who had aſſaulted Coventry were rendered incapable of receiving the king's pardon.

Much about the ſame time one Blood, a diſcarded officer who had ſerved under Cromwell, and the moſt daring villain recorded in hiſtory, found means to ſteal the crown, and ſeveral other parts of the regalia, from the Tower. He had ſome time before attempted to aſſaſſinate the duke of Ormond, but failed in his deſign, and eſcaped without being diſcovered. He was not ſo fortunate in his ſecond villainy. He was detected; but by a ſtrange lenity, or rather weakneſs, in Charles, he not only gave him his pardon, but ſettled on him five hundred pounds a year. When he was taken, he confeſſed his crimes, but refuſed to diſcover his accomplices. "I will never," ſaid he, "diſown a crime, nor betray a friend." The king had the curioſity to ſee ſo daring a villain. He was accordingly brought into his preſence, and had the impudence to tell his majeſty, that if he ordered him to be executed, his friends, who were both able and willing, would not fail to revenge his death. Whether this declaration intimidated the king, or whether he thought ſo intrepid a perſon might be of uſe on ſome future occaſion, is uncertain; but Charles took him into his favour, and even treated him with diſtinction, while many of his faithful ſervants, who had loſt their fortunes in his ſervice, were unrewarded and forgotten. Princes are not eaſily forgiven for neglecting thoſe who have ſerved them faithfully, eſpecially when they laviſh their favours on unworthy objects.

This imprudent action, however, was only a prelude to others of a more dangerous tendency. Charles was always in want of money, and the failure of the laſt ſupplies voted by the commons had greatly increaſed his neceſſities. In this exigency, the Cabal adviſed him to ſhut up the exchequer. Their advice was followed; the exchequer was ſhut up, and continued ſo for a year and ſome months, to the great diſtreſs and ruin of many families, who had lent their money upon government ſecurity. No Engliſh monarch had ever before dared to commit ſo flagrant an act of injuſtice; and at any other period he might perhaps have fallen the victim of his own folly. Every part of the kingdom reſounded with complaints. The moſt ſevere libels againſt the king and his miniſters were publiſhed. But Charles was deaf to the complaints of his people. Immerſed in pleaſure, he regarded not the reproaches incurred by his avarice and injuſtice. In particular the celebrated earl of Rocheſter, in one of his court lampoons, plainly, but ironically ſays,

"To ſhut th' exchequer up in thee was great,
"But in a ſubject it had been a cheat.

We have obſerved that Charles had publiſhed a proclamation againſt the papiſts; but he now determined to change his conduct. Accordingly, as head of the church, he iſſued a proclamation for ſuſpending the penal laws, which had been made againſt all nonconformiſts and recuſants whatever; and for granting to the proteſtant diſſenters the public exerciſe of their religion, and to the papiſts the liberty of celebrating maſs in private houſes. The lord-keeper Bridgeman refuſed to put the ſeals to the edict for ſuſpending the penal laws. Exaſperated at this oppoſition, the king deprived him of his office, and gave the ſeals to the earl of Shaftſbury.

Many perſons could not, however, ſtill believe the king had entered into a treaty with Lewis for the deſtruction of the Dutch. A yatch had been ſent from England to bring over the lady Temple from Holland. The captain inſiſted that the Dutch admiral Van Ghent ſhould pay the honours due to the Engliſh flag. This the Dutchman refuſed, declaring that it was never known for an admiral in his own harbour to ſtrike his flag to a ſmall veſſel, eſpecially as the commander had nothing more than a captain's commiſſion. Though this reaſon was irrefragable, the Cabal laid hold of the incident to quarrel with the ſtates. Unwilling to enter into a war with England, the Dutch offered to make any conceſſions: but the miniſtry, determined to declare war againſt the republic, purſuant to the conditions ſtipulated in their famous treaty with Lewis, refuſed every ſatiſfaction.

The nation in general now believed, that the vaſt naval preparation making in the different parts of England were intended againſt the Dutch; but before any declaration was publiſhed, a perfidious attempt was made on the Dutch Smyrna fleet, amounting to 70 ſail, and valued at a million and a half ſterling. The deſign was, however, rendered abortive, by the gallant behaviour of the Dutch, who repulſed all the attacks of the Engliſh during three days ſucceſſively. Theſe hoſtilities were followed by a declaration of war. But ſurely never reaſons more abſurd and ridiculous were employed to cover ſo flagrant a violation of the late treaty. Complaints were made of injuries offered to the Eaſt-India company; a charge which that company diſowned. The detention of ſome Engliſh ſubjects in Surinam was alſo alledged, though it was known that their continuing in tha colony was voluntary. The refuſal of a Dutch flee to pay the honours of the flag to an Engliſh yatch was alſo urged as an unpardonable offence; and t compleat the ridiculous catalogue of affronts, mention was made of ſome abuſive pictures reflecting o the Engliſh nation. It was ſome time before th ſtates could diſcover the meaning of the laſt charg againſt them. At laſt it was found, that the complaint related entirely to a portrait of Cornelius d Wit, brother to the penſionary, who had diſtinguiſhe himſelf in the expedition, when the Engliſh ſhip were burnt in the Medway. On the back ground the picture was a repreſentation of ſeveral ſhips o fire. Such were the injuries which nothing leſs tha the blood of a whole people could obliterate. Lewi with more dignity, though not with more ſolid reaſo alledged nothing but his diſpleaſure with the ſtates.

Every endeavour which ambition could dictate, o prudence deviſe, were now to be put in practice f the deſtruction of a ſtate, whoſe only crime was the oppoſition to the conqueſts of Lewis XIV. Nea 2,000,000 ſterling were expended by that ambitio monarch in making preparations againſt the Dut republic. Thirty men of war, of 50 guns each, joine the Engliſh fleet, which conſiſted of 100 ſail. Th French monarch, accompanied by his brother th duke of Orleans, marched at the head of 120,00 men, towards Maeſtricht and Charleroi, on the fron tiers of Spaniſh Flanders and Holland. The biſho of Munſter, and the elector of Cologne, had abo 20,000 men. The prince of Conde and marſh Turenne were the principal generals of the Frenc army: the duke of Luxemburg commanded und them: and the ſieges were to be conducted by Va ban, the celebrated engineer.

To encounter a force ſo formidable, commande by ſuch conſummate generals, and furniſhed wi immenſe treaſures to bribe the commanders of garr ſons, what had the republic of Holland to oppoſe A young prince of a weak conſtitution, who had nev ſeen a battle, and about 25,000 ill-trained ſoldie who formed the whole military force of the countr In a word, the total annihilation of the republic a peared inevitable.

The king of France ſoon made himſelf maſter all Guelderland, and the towns upon the Yſſel. T inhabitants of Utrecht ſent the keys of their city to conqueror, and the whole province of that name c pitulated. Lewis made a triumphal entry into Utrec on the 20th of June. The provinces of Holla and Zealand only remained to conquer, and Amſte dam itſelf ſeemed but to wait the hour of its ſlave or deſtruction. A little more alacrity on the part Lewis would have put the important fortreſs into h hands. The capital once taken, not only the r public itſelf muſt have fallen, but there would ha been no longer ſuch a ſtate as Holland. Some of t richeſt families, and thoſe who were zealous lovers liberty, were preparing to fly their devoted countr and embark for Batavia, or other foreign parts.

It was not on land only that the Dutch were ſo di treſſed; the combined forces of France and Engla threatened the deſtruction of their marine power, a the total annihilation of their navy. The ſtates had n however, been negligent in fitting out their ſhips; a De Ruyter, with a fleet of 90 ſail was ſent in queſt the Engliſh and French fleets, commanded by t duke of York and the marſhal d'Etrees. They we riding careleſs in Solebay, little expecting the appea ance of a ſhip from an enemy whoſe force was f from being ſufficient to defend their own frontie Cornelius de Wit was on board as deputy from t ſtates. The Engliſh were very near being ſurprize but recovering themſelves, they ſlipt their cables, a ſtood out to meet the enemy. A dreadful engagement enſued, in which both the commanders and ſeamen diſplayed the greateſt courage and conduct. The earl of Sandwich, who commanded under the duke of York, led the van, and was ſoon engaged in a cloſe fight with the enemy. Several Dutch ſhips attacked him at once; but he bravely defended himſelf againſt their joint attempts, killed the Dutch admiral Van Ghent, and beat off his ſhip. Aſtoniſhed at the valour diſplayed by this gallant officer, and deſirous of ſilencing the dreadful fire he kept up with ſuch amazing vigour, three fire-ſhips were ſent ſucceſſively to deſtroy him; but he ſunk them all, together with another capital ſhip of the enemy, that had ventured to lay him aboard. At laſt, when his ſhip was almoſt torn to pieces, and 600 of his men were ſlain, another fire-ſhip grappled him, and he periſhed with the remainder of his crew. In the mean time De Ruyter engaged the ſhip on board of which the duke of York had hoiſted his flag, with the utmoſt fury, and one of the fierceſt encounters recorded in hiſtory ſucceeded. At laſt the duke's ſhip was ſo ſhattered, that he was obliged to leave her, and hoiſt his flag on board another. But he was ſo overpowered by the enemy, that had not Sir Joſeph Jordan brought the Blue ſquadron to his relief, he muſt have been taken, with ſeveral ſhips that were cloſely engaged with the enemy. This reinforcement rendered the conqueſt equal, and it was continued with the ſame fury till night obliged them to ſeparate. The Dutch retired; nor did the Engliſh think it prudent to follow them. Both ſides, however, claimed the victory, and perhaps with equal reaſon. The loſs was great on the ſide of the Engliſh; but the Dutch firſt retired. De Wit, who knew that nothing leſs than a complete victory could ſave his country, thought it prudent to retire when he found that this was impoſſible to be obtained. The Engliſh complained loudly that the French were wanting in their duty; for they ſeparated from the fleet, and fought only at a diſtance. This conduct was aſcribed to ſecret orders given to the marſhal d'Etrees. Nothing could tend more to promote the ambitious projects of Lewis, than the total deſtruction of both the Engliſh and Dutch fleets, while his own ſhips were preſerved.

While the Dutch were thus reduced to deſpair, the ſtate was diſtracted by the diviſions which commonly ariſe among an unfortunate people, who impute to each other the calamities of their country. John de Wit was perſuaded that the only way of ſaving the ſmall remains of the wretched republic was, by making a peace with the conqueror. Full of a republican ſpirit, and jealous of his perſonal authority, which had always been exerted for the good of his country, he dreaded the power of the prince of Orange little leſs than the ambition of the French monarch: while the prince, who was equally attached to the welfare of the ſtate, exerted all his intereſt to induce the ſtates to elect him ſtadtholder, an honour ſo long enjoyed by his anceſtors. He ſtrenuouſly oppoſed a peace with Lewis, as he knew it could now only be obtained on terms that muſt annihilate the power and opulence of the republic. But the intereſt of the penſionary prevailed; and a reſolution was taken in an aſſembly of the ſtates to ſue for peace. Deputies were accordingly ſent to the French camp to implore mercy in the name of the republic, who, ſix months before, looked upon herſelf as the arbiter of kingdoms. Lewis received the deputies with an arrogance that was an inſult upon humanity; but at length deigned to dictate the terms on which he would permit the Dutch to exiſt as a ſtate. His demands however were little better than articles of ſlavery; and a peace on ſuch conditions was abſolutely inſupportable. Inſpired with a deſperate courage by the haughtineſs of the conqueror, it was determined, that if a peace could be obtained on no better terms, to periſh with their liberties of their country.

Purſuant to this reſolution it was reſolved to ſtop the progreſs of the conqueror; and accordingly the ſluices of the province of Holland were opened, whereby the whole country was laid under water. The eyes of the people were now fixed upon the young prince of Orange, whom they conſidered as the deliverer of their country: while the grand penſionary, by having prevailed upon the ſtates to ſend deputies to the French king, was conſidered as the betrayer of the ſtate. The fury of the party zeal now roſe to the greateſt height; and Cornelius de Wit, being accuſed of a deſign to murder the prince, was committed to priſon, where he underwent the moſt cruel torture, in the height of which he repeated thoſe verſes of Horace, which ſo elegantly expreſs the duty of a true citizen. His brother, the penſionary, failed not to viſit him in priſon, determined to ſhare his fate. The outrageous populace followed him, and glutted their brutal fury on the mangled bodies of thoſe illuſtrious citizens. The murder of the de Wits extinguiſhed for a time the party diſtinctions which had divided the ſtate. The prince of Orange was declared ſtadtholder, and ſhewed himſelf worthy of the power with which he was intruſted. He exhorted the citizens to firmneſs, aſſuring them that the other powers of Europe would not fail to ſend them aſſiſtance. He repreſented to them, that it was in vain to flatter themſelves with being able to diſarm, by ſubmiſſion, an enemy whoſe ambition would keep no meaſures: that now was the time to ſacrifice every thing to ſupport that precious liberty which their anceſtors had purchaſed with their blood; that for his own part he would tread in the ſteps of his fathers, and devote himſelf, without reſerve, to the preſervation of the ſtate. Buckingham, the Engliſh envoy, aſking him whether he did not ſee that the republic was infallibly ruined? anſwered, with great vivacity, "I have one ſure method of ſeeing the ruin of my country; I will die in the laſt intrenchment."

The conduct of this gallant prince ſhewed that he ſpoke the real ſentiments of his heart. He exerted all his power againſt the common enemy. He overflowed all the paſſes by which the French could penetrate into the reſt of the country. He ſent envoys to the different courts of Europe; and by his negotiations, rouſed the emperor, the empire, the Spaniſh council, and the government of Flanders, from their lethargy; and even induced the court of England to be leſs deſirous of ſupporting the ambitious deſigns of the French monarch. Affairs now began to wear a different aſpect. Lewis entered Holland in the month of May; and before September the greater part of the powers of Europe were forming a confederacy againſt him. Montercy, governor of Flanders, ſent privately a few regiments to the aſſiſtance of the States; the emperor Leopold diſpatched Montecuculli, at the head of 20,000 men; and the elector of Brandenburgh took the field with 40,000 troops, whom he paid himſelf. In a word, while the ſubjects of Lewis were every where erecting monuments of his conqueſts, the powers of Europe were forming confederacies for ſnatching them from his hands. They rightly conſidered the reduction of Holland as a prelude to their own ſlavery. It would be impoſſible, they thought, to defend themſelves againſt the exorbitant power of France, ſhould it be increaſed by an acceſſion of ſuch great importance.

A. D. 1673. Charles, for near two years, had been free from the uneaſineſs of parliamentary remonſtrances, but the want of money rendered it abſolutely neceſſary for him to ſummon that aſſembly. His ſpeech to both houſes, at the opening of the ſeſſion, full of confidence and cordiality, diſguiſed the real ſentiments of his heart. Shaftſbury, the chancellor, inſiſted on the neceſſity of carrying on the war againſt a republic ſo eſſentially an enemy to the Engliſh. "The parliament itſelf (ſaid he) acknowledged that Carthage was to be deſtroyed: the preſent hoſtilities therefore may more properly be called the war of the parliament, than that of the king." The commons, however, were of a different opinion, and were determined that his majeſty ſhould purchaſe the ſupplies by particular compliances.

At this time the cabal had uſurped the whole power of the government, and the chancellor, contrary to the eſtabliſhed cuſtom, had iſſued writs for electing new members in the room of thoſe who were deceaſed. The firſt vote of the parliament declared theſe elections void, and the members accordingly withdrew. It was now evident that there was a large majority againſt the court, and that without remarkable firmneſs in the king, the whole plan formed by the cabal muſt fall to the ground, and a change in the miniſtry be the conſequence. Shaftſbury, before he communicated his plan to Charles, had determined within himſelf, that if he found the king wanted reſolution to execute it, he would immediately join the country party, in order to prevent a proſecution from the commons, as the adviſer, or at leaſt the promoter of a ſtep that threatened the deſtruction of the conſtitution. The example of the earl of Clarendon was yet too recent to be forgotten, and he doubted not but his ſovereign would as readily ſacrifice him to the indignation of the parliament and people, as he had done that nobleman.

The proclamation of indulgence was now entered into by the parliament; by which the penal laws againſt non-conformiſts and catholics were ſuſpended, and it was voted, that it tended to alter the conſtitution and change the legiſlative power, which the two houſes ſhared with the king. Charles at firſt ſeemed determined to ſupport his declaration, and in caſe of reſiſtance, to apply to France for aſſiſtance. But he now ſaw the danger of his reſolution. He perceived a civil war muſt be the conſequence of his breaking with the parliament; and the remembrance of the miſeries that had attended his family nearly affected him. His natural indolence, his love of pleaſure and repoſe, added to his want of money, were motives too powerful to be withſtood, and he determined to comply with the parliament. He, however, conſulted the peers in order to give an air of deliberation to the buſineſs; after which he broke the ſeals of the obnoxious declaration with his own hand, and promiſed to aſſent to all bills that had a tendency to remove abuſes.

According to his preſages and intentions, Shaftſbury ſaw his danger, and immediately joined the country party, and his great talents ſoon placed him at the head of the oppoſition. The parliament were now determined to put the king's declaration to the proof. They paſſed a bill entitled, "an Act to prevent the dangers which may happen from popiſh recuſants," commonly called the Teſt Act, whereby all perſons, enjoying any office, or place of truſt or profit, were required to take the oath of allegiance and ſupremacy, and alſo an oath againſt tranſubſtantiation in theſe terms, "I declare that I believe that there is no ſuch thing as tranſubſtantiation in the ſacrament of the Lord's ſupper, either before or after conſecration by any perſon whatever." They were likewiſe to receive the communion according to the rites of the church of England, in ſome pariſh church. Nor were the parliament contented with paſſing theſe bills, they alſo preſented two petitions concerning grievances; and the king having promiſed to redreſs them, they paſſed the money-bill, but without mentioning any thing of the war, which they highly diſapproved; but they added a clauſe to it, importing, That no papiſt ſhould be capable of holding any public employment.

All the popiſh officers, in conſequence of the Teſt Act, reſigned their employments, and among the reſt the duke of York his poſt of lord high-admiral. The lord Clifford alſo reſigned his treaſurer's ſtaff, and died ſoon after. Shaftſbury was deprived of the ſeals, which were given to Sir Heneage Finch: and Sir Thomas Oſbourne, created earl of Danby, ſucceeded lord Clifford in the office of treaſurer.

Some time previous to theſe tranſactions the duke of York had loſt his ducheſs, daughter to the earl of Clarendon, and was now determined to marry Mary, ſiſter to the duke of Modena, a princeſs educated in all the ſuperſtition of the Romiſh religion. This alliance was warmly oppoſed by the parliament, who, on this occaſion, preſented a petition to the king, conceived in the ſtrongeſt terms, and expreſſive of their apprehenſions of the dangerous conſequences that might reſult from ſuch a marriage. The duke of York, however, paid little regard to their petition. He declared he ſhould not be contradicted in a meaſure he thought ſo eſſential to the happineſs of his life. He accordingly married that princeſs on the 21ſt of November.

Prince Rupert was appointed to be commander in chief of the fleet in lieu of the duke of York; as it was intended ſtill to carry on the war againſt the Dutch. As ſoon as the prince had joined the French admiral, they ſailed in queſt of the Dutch to force them to an engagement; and as the latter were far from declining the offer, a battle enſued, and proved very obſtinate and very bloody; but without either gaining any great advantage. The principal loſs fell upon the French, whom the Engliſh, diffident of their intentions, took care to place under their own ſquadrons, and by that means expoſed them to the thickeſt part of the fire of the enemy. This engagement was fought on the 8th of June; and was renewed on the 14th, when the fortune of the day remained as doubtful as before.

England and Holland now exerted all their force, and ſeemed determined to put the whole to the event of a general engagement. The prince of Orange had found means to reconcile de Ruyter and Van Tromp, a ſon worthy of the gallant father from whom he ſprung. Theſe two celebrated admirals now commanded the Dutch fleet, and on the 11th of Auguſt the battle began at the mouth of the Texel. De Ruyter ſingled out prince Rupert, Tromp oppoſed himſelf to Sir Edward Sprague, the Engliſh vice-admiral, and Brankert, the Dutch rear-admiral bore up to attack d'Etres. The engagement was conducted with aſtoniſhing fury and emulation by the Engliſh and Dutch officers; but the French kept at a diſtance and left the Engliſh to ſuſtain the whole fury of the battle. In vain did prince Rupert make a ſignal to d'Etrees to bear down to his aſſiſtance; he took no notice of any thing that paſſed, and kept his whole ſquadron far from the ſcene of action. Sprague, when the battle began, had hoiſted his flag on board the Royal Prince; but ſhe being ſoon diſabled he left her, and diſplayed his flag on board the St. George, while Tromp, for a ſimilar reaſon, quitted his own ſhip, and went on board the Comet; and the fight was immediately renewed with the ſame fury as before. Both the ſhips of theſe gallant commanders were ſoon ſhattered, and Sprague was leaving the St. George in order to hoiſt his flag on board a third ſhip, when a cannon ball paſſing through his ſhip, ſtruck his boat, and the gallant admiral was drowned. It is worthy of remark, that in all the engagements theſe brave admirals ſingled out each other, as the only antagoniſt worthy of them; and when the brave

Sprague periſhed, Van Tromp generouſly paid him the tribute of a tear.

Had the French done their duty, a total victory muſt have been the conſequence. But by this refuſal in the Frenchman, and his own ſhips having received ſo much damage by the enemy, prince Rupert could not purſue the advantage he had gained by his valour. He therefore ſtood away for the Engliſh coaſt, leaving the victory undecided. The Dutch, however, gained every thing they wiſhed. By the retreat of the Engliſh, a rich fleet of Eaſt-India ſhips, which had been for ſome time expected, arrived unmoleſted in their ports. An expedition which had been planned againſt the coaſt of Zealand was alſo rendered abortive. This was the laſt engagement fought betwixt thoſe rival nations. The Engliſh became very deſirous of putting an end to a war which had exhauſted them of men and money, without the leaſt proſpect of honour or advantage.

On the 20th of October the parliament met, but the king, finding he had nothing to expect from their deliberations, ſent the uſher of the black rod to the commons, commanding their attendance in the houſe of peers. But before they would ſuffer him to enter, they voted, that a ſtanding army is a grievance; that the duke of Lauderdale is a grievance, and not fit to be employed in any office of truſt. They had hardly finiſhed theſe votes before the uſher of the black rod entered, the ſpeaker leaped from the chair, and the houſe broke up in the utmoſt confuſion.

The Dutch in the mean time began to recover from their aſtoniſhment. Lewis, by not deſtroying the forts, as Conde and Turenne had propoſed, greatly weakened his own army by the number of garriſons he was obliged to detach. The prince of Orange, by a maſterly piece of military conduct, joined the army of the empire, and the French were obliged to evacuate the three Dutch provinces with as much precipitation as they had conquered them; but not before the inhabitants had paid dear for their deliverance. The intendant Robert had raiſed in the ſingle province of Utrecht no leſs than 1668 florins. All the triumphant monuments of Lewis's conqueſt erected in the Netherlands were deſtroyed, and that prince conſidered, by all the powers of Europe, as one who had enjoyed the honours of a tranſient triumph with too much precipitation and pride; which had now involved him in a bloody war with the united forces of the Empire, Spain and Holland.

A. D. 1674. The parliament met agreeable to their prorogation on the 7th of January, and it was ſoon evident that they had not changed their opinions during the receſs. Aware of the dangerous deſigns of Charles, they were determined to exert all their power to render his plans of arbitrary power abortive. They ſeriouſly debated on the grievances of the nation, and both houſes were perſuaded that there was a neceſſity for their being removed. They began with addreſſing the king for a general faſt to implore the bleſſing of the Almighty on their endeavours againſt the dangerous errors of popery; and then reſolved to grant no more ſupplies till the grievances they enumerated were redreſſed, and the proteſtant religion, as well as the liberties and properties of the people, ſecured. Both houſes joined in an addreſs to the king, for the removal of the duke of Lauderdale from his majeſty's preſence and councils for ever. The commons examined the duke of Bukingham on ſeveral particulars of government, and not being ſatiſfied with his anſwers, they paſſed the ſame vote againſt him, as they had done againſt Lauderdale. Arlington was next queſtioned; but his anſwers were ſo ſatiſfactory to the houſe, that notwithſtanding an impeachment was prepared againſt him, they thought proper to drop the proſecution.

Charles was intimidated by theſe vigorous proceedings, and, finding it would be impoſſible to carry on the war without ſupplies, he began to liſten to the terms propoſed by the ſtates general, for a ſeparate peace. The French miniſter exerted all his power to keep Charles firm to his engagement, but in vain. The king choſe rather to reconcile himſelf to his people and parliament, by agreeing to a peace they ſo much deſired, than to depend upon France for ſupport. A treaty was accordingly ſigned with the ſtates, by which they again gave up the honours of the flag, and agreed to pay 300,000l. towards defraying the expence of the king's naval armaments. Several attempts were made for concluding an offenſive and defenſive alliance with Holland. Moſt of the European princes ſolicited this meaſure as the only infallible means of putting a ſtop to the alarming progreſs of the French monarch. The two houſes of parliament ſupported theſe ſolicitations with all their power. Their hatred to the French was indeed ſo great, that they would gladly have relinquiſhed the enjoyments of the new peace for a time, to ſee their king armed againſt the common diſturber of the tranquillity of Europe; nor would they have thought any ſupplies too great in order to proſecute a war which had ſo evidently tended to increaſe the good of the public. Charles, however, paid no regard to their ſolicitations. Prompted equally by his hatred to the Dutch, and the hopes of ſtill receiving a powerful aſſiſtance from France, he refuſed to ſacrifice his ally to the reſentment of his enemies. He ſuffered 10,000 of his men to engage in the ſervice of that crown, and made a merit with Lewis of the neceſſity which had drawn him from his alliance, and offered his mediation for concluding a general peace.

Sir William Temple, ſoon after the treaty with the ſtates was ſigned, was again ſent to Holland with the title of ambaſſador, but before he embarked he nobly repreſented to the king the inconvenience which the ſyſtem of the Cabal muſt occaſion; how difficult, not to ſay impoſſible, it was, to eſtabliſh in England the government and religion of France; that the genius and principles of the people were not to be ſuddenly or eaſily changed; that force of arms alone could compel them to ſubmit to a yoke they beheld with horror; that an Engliſh army could never be prevailed upon to promote thoſe ends; that the catholics did not compoſe the one hundredth part of the nation; that foreign troops could not be levied or maintained in any conſiderable number; and that if a few were retained, they could do nothing more than excite the hatred and revolt of the people. He concluded with referring him to the obſervations of Gourville, a French writer, much eſteemed by Charles, who ſays, "A king of England that chuſes to be a man of his people, is the greateſt monarch in the world; but if he chuſes to be ſomething more, he is nothing at all." Though the king was highly diſpleaſed at this diſcourſe, he knew how to diſſemble. "'Tis very well," ſaid he, "I will be the man of my people." Events ſoon ſhewed that he ſpoke not the dictates of his heart.

England's defection was followed by that of the biſhop of Munſter, and even the elector of Cologne. Lewis was, however, ſucceſsful in ſeveral places. Franche Comte was again reduced. Turenne was able, with a much inferior force, to baffle all the attempts of the allied army in Alſace. By a ſudden and unexpected march he attacked and defeated, at Sintzheim, the duke of Lorraine, and Copara, the imperial general. Seventy thouſand Germans invaded Alſace, and took up their quarters in that province. He attacked and routed a body of the enemy at Mulhauſen. He drove from Colmar the elector of Brandenburgh. He obtained a new victory at Turkheim:

and having cleared the province entirely of the allies, he compelled them to repaſs the Rhine with great loſs and diſhonour. The French were not ſo fortunate on the ſide of Flanders where the prince of Orange commanded. That young general ſhewed himſelf nearly equal to the great Conde, in the bloody battle of Senſſe. "The prince of Orange," ſaid Conde, "has conducted himſelf through the whole action like a great general, except in expoſing his life like a young ſoldier."

A. D. 1675. After a receſs of fourteen months, the parliament aſſembled on the 13th of April, and immediately voted a bill to be brought in for preventing the growth of popery; in which it was declared, that the ſaying maſs ſhould be a ſufficient evidence of a perſon being a popiſh prieſt; and that a penalty ſhould be inflicted on all who aſſiſted at the catholic ſervice. They alſo framed a bill, declaring it treaſon to levy money without conſent of parliament; another for vacating the ſeats of members who accepted of offices; and a third for ſecuring the liberty of the ſubjects, and preventing their being tranſported as priſoners to diſtant iſlands.

The miniſtry on the other hand exerted all their influence in the upper houſe, and paſſed a bill for a new teſt, by which every member of parliament, and all perſons in office, were to take an oath in the following terms: "I declare, that it is not lawful, on any pretence whatever, to take up arms againſt the king; and that I abhor the maxim, as treaſonable, which holds, that one may take up arms, by the authority of the king, againſt his perſon, or againſt thoſe who act by virtue of his commiſſion; and I ſwear that I will never uſe any effort to change or alter the government in church or ſtate." This bill was vigorouſly oppoſed: ſome maintained that it was founded upon falſe principles; others that it would revive dangerous diſputes: even in the houſe of lords it was carried only by two voices. The oppoſition would have been ſtronger by the commons, had not an unforeſeen quarrel between the two houſes ſuſpended all buſineſs of that kind. Dr. Shirley having appealed to the houſe of lords from a decree in chancery given in favour of Sir John Fagg, a member of the commons, the latter aſſerted, that this proceeding was a violation of their privileges; that none of their members could be cited to appear before the lords; and that the lords could not even receive appeals. On the other hand, the lords reſolved, "That it was the undoubted rights of the lords in judicature to determine, in time of parliament, appeals from inferior courts, where the members of either houſe were concerned, that there might not be a failure of juſtice." Several conferences paſſed between the two houſes, but with ſo much rancour and animoſity, that the king, alarmed for the conſequences, came to the houſe of peers on the 9th of June; and after reproaching both branches of the legiſlature for carrying their differences to ſuch an indecent height, he prorogued the parliament to the 13th of October.

As the coffee-houſes were the reſort of politicians, and the places where ſarcaſms againſt the government were promulgated, the miniſtry was at once alarmed and exaſperated; and a proclamation was publiſhed, commanding all the coffee-houſes to be ſhut up: a ſtrange method of quieting the fears of the people, by giving them freſh cauſe of complaint. The keepers of the coffee-houſes promiſed not to ſuffer any ſeditious diſcourſe in their houſes, and on this condition they were ſoon opened again. But the general diſcontent continued to increaſe.

On the continent the war was ſtill carried on with great vigour, and the French arms were, in general, ſucceſsful. Though Turenne fell by a cannon-ball, and the prince of Conde had left the army; yet the defeat of the marſhal du Crequi, at Conſabrick, near Treves, was the only misfortune of that kind the French had experienced for 60 years.

The king opened the ſeſſion of parliament with a ſhort ſpeech on the 13th of October, in which, after recommending unity between the two houſes, he demanded a ſupply ſufficient for building ſeveral new ſhips, and clearing off the anticipations of his revenue. The commons abſolutely refuſed to give any money for paying off the debts of the crown, but voted 300,000 pounds for defraying the expence of building 20 ſhips of war, and appropriated the duties of tonnage and poundage to the ſupport of the navy. But the buſineſs of the nation was ſoon after ſuſpended by the revival of the diſpute between the two houſes, in the caſe of Shirley and Fagg. The commons were as reſolute and determined as ever in maintaining their privileges; and the king, to prevent the conſequences that might enſue from theſe alarming diſputes, prorogued the parliament for 15 months.

A. D. 1677. The two houſes, having met purſuant to their prorogation, acted as if they had forgotten theſe unhappy heats and animoſities which had put an end to the two laſt ſeſſions. The commons voted his majeſty 600,000 pounds for the uſe of the navy, and a continuance of the duty of exciſe upon ale and brandy for three years. In a word, every thing ſeemed to promiſe a happy union between the king and both houſes of parliament. But unfortunately, theſe pleaſing appearances were ſoon over; the rapid progreſs of the French on the continent filled the nation with the moſt alarming apprehenſions. At the ſame time it was evident that Charles had it in his power to give peace to Europe whenever he pleaſed, by declaring his intention to join the allies, unleſs Lewis would accept of a peace upon reaſonable terms. The parliament had therefore recourſe to every method to induce the king to take up arms. They promiſed that the moſt affluent ſupplies ſhould be the reward of his compliance. This offer was a powerful motive; he ſeemed willing to comply with the wiſhes of his people. He gave the princeſs Mary, daughter to the duke of York, to the prince of Orange in marriage, and diſplayed ſome proofs of firmneſs with regard to France. He even made preparations for war with the ſupplies he received from parliament. But ever fluctuating and irreſolute, ſometimes gained by the promiſes of Lewis, and ſometimes abſorbed in the charms of pleaſure, he neither fulfilled the expectations of the allies, or of the Engliſh.

A. D. 1678. Tired of the war, and finding there were no hopes of any aſſiſtance from England, the States General ſigned a ſeparate peace with Lewis on the 10th of Auguſt. By this treaty it was agreed, that each party ſhould retain what they were poſſeſſed of, except Maeſtricht and its dependencies, which Lewis was to reſtore to the Dutch, and were indeed all the French poſſeſſed of their conqueſts in the United Provinces; and by a ſecret article, Lewis engaged to reſtore all that belonged to the prince o Orange in France, Franche Comte, Charleroi an Flanders. Spain and the Empire ſoon after accepted the conditions, and peace was reſtored in every par of Chriſtendom. Holland, againſt whom alone th war was undertaken, and whoſe ruin ſeemed inevitable was ſo far from loſing any thing, that ſhe gained barrier; while every other power that had interpoſe to ſnatch her from deſtruction, found themſelves con ſiderable loſers, and obliged to accept the terms pre ſcribed them by Holland. It may, however, wit great truth be affirmed, that it was owing to the fau of the Engliſh monarch alone, that the allies had no a more advantageous peace; ſince the parliament wer both ready and deſirous to furniſh very ample ſupplie or carrying on the war againſt France, would Charles ave acted agreeable either to the intereſt of Europe n general, or of England in particular. This ſtrange onduct can be aſcribed only to his paſſionate deſire f executing his darling ſcheme, that of rendering imſelf the abſolute maſter of his people. Some have ccuſed him of labouring to introduce the popiſh religion into England; but this is a crime of which he as not guilty. All religions were alike to Charles; nd the conceſſions he often made in favour of the caholics, ſeem rather to have been the effect of his love or his brother, and ready compliance with any couneils he adopted, than his own attachment to that paricular mode of faith. He cared not whether popery or proteſtantiſm was the reigning religion in England f he could but enjoy pleaſure and eaſe.

Scotland had groaned beneath a load of tyranny uring theſe tranſactions. The duke of Lauderdale, n quality of royal commiſſioner, had been ſent into hat kingdom. By his arts and influence, he prevailed upon the Scottiſh parliament to declare, that he whole exterior power of the church was veſted in he crown. He alſo induced them to eſtabliſh a militia of 20,000 men, ready to act in every enterprize where either the power or the grandeur of the ſovereign were concerned. The duke was as fond of perſecution as his maſter was of toleration. The former ſtrained the laws in favour of the firſt, and the latter ſuſpended their force in favour of the ſecond. He did not reflect, that perſecution was the moſt dangerous of all remedies againſt the preſbyterian fanaticiſm diſſeminated through every part of Scotland. It would be endleſs to particularize all the inſtances of oppreſſion in that unhappy kingdom. Let it ſuffice to ſay, that they were at once cruel and impolitic. Becauſe the law for prohibiting conventicles had called them "Seminaries of Rebellion," he treated thoſe counties as rebellious where the conventicles moſt abounded; and the troops he detached into thoſe parts were guilty of the moſt horrid and ſhameful diſorders.

An antient law of Scotland enacts, that every perſon who was accuſed, and did not appear, was liable to be condemned for contumacy, and outlawed; and whoever afterwards held the leaſt communication with them, though only to give them the common aſſiſtances of humanity, was liable to the ſame penalties. This law, too odious to be executed with rigour, ocaſioned a great number of outlawries. Fearful of ppearing in a court where they could expect no ercy, they incurred, perhaps, a greater puniſhment y their abſence. In a word, the whole nation beame a prey to the rapacity of the duke and ducheſs f Lauderdale. Fearing that the complaints of the eople might find a way to the throne, Lauderdale orbad all who were poſſeſſed of lands in Scotland from eaving that kingdom. Biſhop Burnet tells us, that Charles one day ſaid to his friends, "I hear that Lauerdale behaves very ill to my people in Scotland; ut I do not find he has done any thing contrary to y intereſt." It is no wonder, when a prince makes diſtinction between his own intereſt and that of his ople, that the people follow the example.

The oppreſſions of the duke of Lauderdale in cotland; the deſire Charles had always ſhewn with egard to procuring the catholics the free exerciſe of eir religion; and his ſecret connections with Lewis XIV. which even the offer of the largeſt ſupplies ould not induce him to abandon; all tended to conrm the people in an opinion, that he intended to inoduce popery and arbitrary power. At this juncture, conſpiracy for eſtabliſhing the catholic religion was ſcovered by one Titus Oates. This man was orinally a clergyman of the church of England, and of a very indifferent character. At length he turned papiſt, and lived for ſome time with the Jeſuits at St. Omer's. Thence he went to Spain, where he was admitted to the councils of the Jeſuits; but being at length diſcharged from that ſociety, his reſentment induced him to turn informer. He now gave out, that his converſion to popery was a mere pretence, to enable him, to diſcover the ſecrets of the Jeſuits; and the ſubſtance of his depoſitions was, that the pope claimed the ſovereignty of England, and had commiſſioned the Jeſuits to exerciſe his rites. In conſequence of which, the general of the order had, by patents unto the pope's ſeal, diſpoſed of the principal offices, civil and military. That in a council of fifty Jeſuits, held at London, it was unanimouſly reſolved to kill the king; and that father de la Chaiſe, confeſſor to Lewis XIV. had promiſed a reward of 10,000l. to the regicide: that the crown was to be offered to the duke of York, on condition of his ſubmitting to receive it from the pope; but on his refuſing, he was to ſhare the fate of his brother. They (the Jeſuits) had formed a plan for ſetting fire to the city of London, and executing a general maſſacre of the proteſtants in every part of the kingdom. In a word, that they deſigned to overturn the whole conſtitution, and eſtabliſh, by blood and deſolation, the dominion of popery.

The univerſal conſternation which the information of Oates occaſioned cannot be deſcribed. Coleman, ſecretary to the ducheſs of York, being arreſted, copies of his correſpondence with father de la Chaiſe, the pope's nuncio, and ſome other papiſts, increaſed the alarm, and ſeemed to confirm the truth of Oates's narrative. In one of Coleman's letters to the French king's confeſſor, is the following paſſage: "We have a great work on our hands: nothing leſs than the converſion of the three kingdoms: God has given us a prince (meaning the duke of York) who is marvelouſly ambitious of being the inſtrument of this deſign; but as we muſt expect to meet with oppoſition, it behoves us to ſecure all the aſſiſtance poſſible." He therefore deſired de la Chaiſe to furniſh him with 300,000l. which would, he ſaid, engage the king to diſſolve the parliament, whoſe reſolutions were unfavourable to France. A new incident ſeemed to confirm the guilt of the Jeſuits, whoſe known bigotry had before rendered it probable. Sir Edmundſbury Godfrey, the juſtice of peace who had taken the depoſition of Oates, was found dead in a ditch, with his rings on his fingers, and his money in his pockets; a ſufficient proof that he had not been killed by robbers. This aſſaſſination, the author of which was never diſcovered, was conſidered as the act of the papiſts. The whole city was in alarm: every individual thought himſelf in danger, and the ſame precautions were taken as if an enemy had been at the gates. Whether Charles believed the truth of this conſpiracy, or thought the whole a forgery of Oates, is uncertain; but he mentioned it to both houſes, and recommended vigilance to the magiſtrates in diſcovering and proſecuting all who were concerned in ſo black an action. Danby, the prime miniſter, moved, in the houſe of lords, that the affair might be taken into conſideration, and his motion was agreed to. Oates was called before the houſe, and ſtrictly examined; and on his perſiſting that the narrative he had before given to Sir Edmundſbury Godfrey was ſtrictly true, the houſe reſolved, that the popiſh recuſants had formed an infernal plot againſt the king, the government, and the proteſtant religion.

During the time the parliament was engaged in this buſineſs, one Bedloe accuſed ſeveral papiſts, in the ſervice of the queen, of being concerned in the murder der of Godfrey. He alſo added ſome circumſtances to the depoſitions of Oates. Several noblemen, accuſed by theſe informers, were apprehended, among whom were the earl of Powis, the lord viſcount Stafford, and the lords Arundel of Wardour, Petre, and Bellaſis, who were ſent to the Tower.

The depoſitions of Oates and Bedloe being publiſhed, excited ſuch a ferment in the kingdom, that Charles was obliged to iſſue a proclamation, commanding all popiſh recuſants, under the ſevereſt penalty, to repair to their own houſes, and not venture farther than five miles from thence, without a particular licence. Another proclamation was alſo publiſhed, offering a reward to any perſon who ſhould apprehend a popiſh prieſt or jeſuit. The teſt, which declared popery to be idolatry, was now inſtituted; and all who refuſed to take it were excluded from parliament. The duke of York, with tears in his eyes, requeſted of the upper houſe an exemption in his favour, declaring, that his religion ſhould be altogether between God and himſelf, and never appear in his public conduct. It was with difficulty he carried his point by two voices. "I would not (ſaid one of the lords) have any thing of popiſh principles here, neither man, woman, dog, nor cat."

The parliament proceeded ſtill farther, for the houſe of commons, finding that Sir Joſeph Williamſon, ſecretary of Scotland, had counterſigned ſeveral commiſſions to popiſh recuſants, and being a member of the lower houſe, they committed him to the Tower. Charles, highly incenſed at this commitment of his ſervant, without making any application to him, immediately ordered him to be releaſed. He however revoked the commiſſions that had given offence, and the commons were ſatiſfied with this inſtance of royal condeſcenſion.

In the interim, Montague, ambaſſador in France, haſtily returned, and laid open a new ſcene. He produced a letter written by the high treaſurer Danby, during the late negotiations for a peace on the continent: by which it appeared, that the king had, in ſome meaſure, ſold the intereſts both of England and the allies. Among other particulars, it imported, that if the conditions of the peace were accepted by the allies, Charles was to be paid 6,000,000 by France within three years after the treaty ſhould be ſigned. Danby, whom it ſeems diſapproved of writing this letter, endeavoured to ſecure himſelf, by procuring it to be authenticated by the king, who had added, with his own hand, "This letter is written by my order, C. R." The commons now no longer doubted that Charles had acted in conſort with France; and though they perceived that the latter reflected greater diſhonour on the king than his miniſter, yet in order to diſcover the whole truth of this provoking myſtery, they impeached Danby of high treaſon, but the lords refuſed to put him under arreſt. The diſpute now became violent between the two houſes, and Charles, to prevent the diſagreeable conſequences that might reſult from a breach between two branches of the legiſlature, firſt prorogued, and afterwards diſſolved the parliament, now juſtly ſuſpicious and diſſatisfied, though at firſt very favourable to the intereſts of the crown. The alteration in the ſentiments of the commons was wholly owing to the conduct of the king, and the ſpirit of the nation.

The conſpirators trials now wholly engroſſed the attention of the public, and Coleman was the firſt that felt the weight of popular indignation. On the 27th of November he was brought to the bar of the King's-bench, where lord chief-juſtice Scoggs preſided. The evidences againſt him were Oates, Bedloe and his own letters. Oates and Bedloe ſwore that he had received a patent from the general of the Jeſuits, to act as ſecretary of ſtate; and that he had agreed to the aſſaſſination of the king. He was accordingly convicted of high-treaſon, and ſuffered on the 3d of December, but declared his innocence to the laſt. Father Ireland alſo ſuffered, though he alledged he was in Staffordſhire at the very time the accuſers ſwore he attended the meetings of the conſpirators in London. Every Jeſuit was conſidered as a villain, and that lying and mental reſervation made part of the principles of their order. Several other perſons were impeached, among whom were Thomas Pickering, a prieſt; John Grove, a lay-brother; Thomas Whitebread, provincial of the Jeſuits in England, and who, according to the evidence of Oates, was to have been created archbiſhop of Canterbury; Harcourt, Fenwick, Gaven and Turner, all Jeſuits, and Langhorne, a catholic lawyer. Theſe were all found guilty and executed.

A. D. 1679. On the 6th of March a new parliament met, when it was ſoon evident that a very conſiderable majority was on the ſide of the country party. Charles was alarmed; and in order to ingratiate himſelf with his new aſſembly, he prevailed upon his brother, the duke of York, to ſubmit to an order for his leaving England. He deprived Danby of the treaſurer's ſtaff, and gave it to the earl of Lauderdale; but in order to prevent the former, either through reſentment or fear, from diſcovering ſecrets he wiſhed to be concealed, he granted him a free pardon.

The leaders of the popular party in general, and Shaftſbury in particular, determined to avail themſelves of the popular commotions, and the majority in the commons, to carry into execution the plan they had formed for excluding the duke of York from the throne. Shaftſbury's object was to give the Engliſh crown to the duke of Monmouth, one of Charles's natural ſons. It was already reported, that a marriage had been contracted between the king and Lucy Walters, the duke of Monmouth's mother. It therefore became neceſſary for Charles either to diſapprove or confirm this report; and accordingly, he ſolemnly declared in full council, that it was falſe, and that Monmouth was illegitimate. The duke of York, who had obtained aſſurances from the king, before his departure from England, that he would ſupport his ſucceſſion to the crown, took up his reſidence at Bruſſels.

Being diſappointed in this attempt, the commons renewed the impeachment of Danby, notwithſtanding the king had granted him a free pardon, and aſſured the houſe that the miniſter had done nothing but by his particular orders. They inſiſted, that pardon from the crown was no arreſt of judgment with them; and it was voted, that if Danby did not appear on a day appointed, he ſhould be declared guilty. He did not chuſe to provoke farther the indignation of the commons; he appeared, and was committed to the Tower.

Theſe violent proceedings alarmed Charles, and induced him to ſummon Sir William Temple, whoſe virtues he knew were revered by the public, to attend his duty in council. More attracted by the charms of philoſophy than thoſe of ambition, Temple had retired into the country, where he cultivated his favourite ſtudies in a quiet retreat. But he no ſooner received the royal mandate, than he haſtened to court, always prefering the good of his country to his own. He propoſed to form a council, compoſed chiefly of the favourites of the people. By this means, ſaid he, the parliament will be leſs effe… ing, or, at leaſt, we ſhall have a ſtrong party in the houſe againſt the diſcontented and factious. His reaſons were thought to be well founded, and the ſcheme was carried into execution. But, contrary to his advice, Charles appointed Shaftſbury preſident of the new council. The king flattered himſelf that by co…

fering ſo honourable a poſt on that dangerous man, he would become a friend to the meaſures of the court. He was miſtaken. Shaftſbury, perceiving that the king's conduct towards him was leſs the effect of ſincerity than policy, changed not his conduct. He cultivated a ſtill cloſer correſpondence with the leaders of the oppoſition; and by being acquainted with the ſecrets of government, became a more dangerous enemy than ever.

The commons having acquired ſo able a leader, were determined to carry their reſentment to the greateſt lengths. They reſolved, that the duke of York's zeal for popery, and the hopes of ſeeing him on the throne, occaſioned popiſh conſpiracies. The king, who ſaw the deſign of this reſolution, endeavoured to prevent it, by propoſing conciliating meaſures. He offered to paſs a bill for reſtricting the power of a catholic prince, if ever one of that perſuaſion ſhould fill the Engliſh throne. He was not to have the right of conferring church dignities. The members of the privy council, the judges, the lord-lieutenants of counties, and their deputies, together with all the officers of the navy, were neither to be appointed nor removed, without conſent of parliament. Theſe extraordinary conceſſions, which muſt ſo greatly have limited the prerogative, were not ſufficient to appeaſe the houſe, which was conſtantly enflamed by the cabals of Shaftſbury.

A conſiderable majority therefore reſolved to bring in what was called "The Excluſion Bill," by which it was declared, "That the crowns of England and Ireland belonged to the next heir, the duke of York excepted; that if he appeared in either of theſe kingdoms, he ſhould be declared guilty of treaſon; and that thoſe who defended his title ſhould be deemed enemies and traitors." Nor was this the only popular act of the commons; they expelled all ſuch as poſſeſſed lucrative offices, in order to weaken ſtill farther the influence of the crown. They declared ſtanding armies, and even the royal guards, illegal; and they paſſed the famous Habeas Corpus bill, which is ſtill conſidered as the principal ſecurity of the ſubject. By virtue of this noble act, no perſon can be ſent to priſon beyond the ſea. No judge can refuſe a priſoner his habeas corpus, which obliges the goaler to produce the priſoner before any court the writ ſhall appoint, and there ſhew cauſe for the impriſonment. The priſoner is to be tried at the time appointed; and if he is diſcharged by a court of juſtice, he cannot be impriſoned again upon the ſame account. This bill ſoon after paſſed the upper houſe, and received the royal aſſent.

Theſe bills being paſſed, the commons reſumed the proſecution of Danby; and reſolved that to maintain the validity of the royal pardon in his caſe was an infringement of their privileges. They alſo demanded, that the biſhops, who were conſidered as entirely devoted to the court, ſhould abſent themſelves during this trial. This was oppoſed by the upper houſe; and the commons prepared a remonſtrance. Charles was alarmed at theſe proceedings; and fearful leſt they ſhould preſent a remonſtrance to him, which might have the moſt dangerous conſequences, he repaired to the houſe of lords on the 27th of May; and after giving the royal aſſent to five bills, he prorogued the parliament to the 14th of Auguſt. By this means the excluſion bill was dropped for a time, and the ſchemes of Shaftſbury rendered abortive.

The preſbyterians in Scotland were treated with as much rigour as the catholics in England. They bore their perſecutions for a long time; but at laſt ſeeing no proſpect of an end to their miſeries, they loſt all patience, and determined to take a full revenge on their perſecutors. Sharp, archbiſhop of St. Andrews, who had made his fortune by deſerting their party, and was now become as great a perſecutor as Lauderdale himſelf, was marked out for deſtruction. A large body of the covenanters accordingly lay in ambuſh for him, and as he was returning in his coach from the council at Edinburgh, they attacked him near a little village called Magus, about two miles from St. Andrews; they immediately dragged him out of his carriage, and regardleſs of the prayers, tears and ſupplications of his daughter, who happened to be with him, put him to death in the moſt inhuman and brutal manner.

A murder ſo exceedingly cruel was a ſignal for the covenanters to fly to arms. They accordingly aſſembled from every quarter, proclaimed the covenant at Rutherglen, ſurprized the city of Glaſgow, iſſued a proclamation, commanding the magiſtrates to drive all archbiſhops, biſhops and curates, out of the kingdom immediately; and inviting all their brethren to join them, and finiſh the good work they had ſo happily begun. They were ſoon joined by a vaſt multitude of people; but inſtead of confining themſelves to the redreſſing of grievances, they fell to plundering the adjacent country. This gave time to the magiſtrates to provide for the ſecurity of Edinburgh. The duke of Monmouth was ſent, at the head of an army, to reduce them, and ſoon executed his commiſſion. He came up with them at Bothwell-bridge; and falling upon them with incredible fury, ſoon gained a complete victory. Near 1000 of the inſurgents were left dead on the field of battle, and 1200 taken priſoners, among whom were ſeveral of thoſe concerned in the murder of archbiſhop Sharp. Theſe were all hanged up immediately; a few more were afterwards tried and executed; but the greateſt part were ſent to the plantations. Monmouth, deſirous of gaining the affections of the Scots, treated the people with great humanity.

During this rebellion in Scotland, the king was ſeized with a violent fever, which threw the whole kingdom into the utmoſt confuſion. The council aſſembled; and notwithſtanding the oppoſition of Shaftſbury, and ſeveral other members of the country party, they reſolved to ſend for the duke of York from Bruſſels. He ſoon arrived; but in the interval the king was pretty well recovered. The oppoſition was not, however, idle, during the king's ſickneſs: they demanded that the parliament ſhould be immediately aſſembled; and the court party, as a counterpoiſe to their petitions, preſented the moſt reſpectful addreſſes. This oppoſition in the two parties introduced the names of Whig and Tory. The former, which had been given to the Scotch fanatics, was now given to the oppoſition; and the latter, which had been originally applied to the rebels in Ireland, was now applied to the courtiers. Theſe odious appellations ſerved no other purpoſe than that of foſtering malignity and diſcord, and of widening the breach, already too large, between the two parties.

Monmouth's behaviour in Scotland alarmed the duke of York, who uſed every method in his power to procure the diſgrace of that popular nobleman. He ſucceeded in his attempts, and Monmouth was obliged to retire to the continent; while he himſelf, under pretence of quieting the minds of the Engliſh, obtained permiſſion to retire into Scotland, but made himſelf more enemies than friends in that kingdom. Shaftſbury, whoſe deſigns were now ſufficiently known, was diſmiſſed from his poſt of preſident of the council, and the earl of Radnor was appointed in his room. The earl of Eſſex reſigned his poſt as treaſurer, and Laurence Hyde was appointed in his room. Lord Ruſſel, one of the moſt popular and virtuous men in the kingdom, quitted the board, and Sir William Temple retired into the country.

The proſecutions carried on againſt the Roman catholics exaſperated them ſo much, that they determined to be revenged upon their proſecutors, and turn the late odium from themſelves to the preſbyterians. They had accordingly recourſe to one Dangerfield, a fellow who had ſuffered almoſt every puniſhment that the law could inflict on the moſt abandoned miſcreant. This man, who enjoyed the firſt place in the chronicles of infamy, was tutored for the purpoſe. He was confined in Newgate for debt, when he was pitched upon as the leader in this ſcene of action. The catholics releaſed him, and found him ſufficient employment. He pretended to have been privy to a deſign for deſtroying the king and royal family, and changing the government into a commonwealth. The king and his brother countenanced the information, and rewarded him for his diſcovery with a ſum of money. But certain papers, which he produced as evidences of his aſſertions, appearing to be forged by himſelf, he was ſent to priſon. His character was alone ſufficient to create ſuſpicions; all his haunts were ordered to be ſearched; and in the houſe of one Mr. Collier, a Roman catholic, his particular friend, they found the model of the plot fairly written in a book, tied with a ribbon, and concealed in a meal-tub. From this incident it was called the Meal-tub Plot. Finding the whole diſcovered, the miſcreant made a general confeſſion. He ſaid the ſcheme had been contrived by the counteſs of Powis, the earl of Caſtlemain, and the five lords confined in the Tower, in order to invalidate the evidences of Oates, Bedloe, and others, againſt the papiſts. He added, that he was inſtructed to accuſe the dukes of Monmouth and Buckingham, the earls of Eſſex, Hallifax, and others, of being concerned in a conſpiracy againſt the king and the duke of York. This diſcovery being made, lord Caſtlemain and lady Powis were committed to the Tower, and the people did not fail to cenſure both the king and his brother with being concerned in this perfidious ſcheme.

A. D. 1680. On the 26th of January the parliament met, when the king endeavoured to inſpire the members with the ſentiments of unanimity ſo neceſſary for the public welfare. "All Europe (ſaid he in his ſpeech at the opening of the ſeſſion) has its eyes on this aſſembly, and ſeems to think its fate involved in it, as well as ours. Let us beware of ſtrengthening our enemies, and diſheartening our friends, by unſeaſonable diſputes. Should theſe ariſe, the reproach will not fall upon me, for I have neglected nothing that might keep you in peace while I live, and to leave you ſo when I die." But the commons were far from entering into theſe views. They began with acts of violence againſt the Tories. No reſpect was paid to the habeas corpus bill: arbitrary impriſonments grew ſo common, that the whole nation complained of the violence. One Stowell had the courage to reſiſt an officer of juſtice, who attempted to impriſon him by an order of the houſe. He ſaid, in his defence, that he knew no law by virtue of which he could be deprived of his liberty. The commons did not think proper to proceed any farther; and in order to free themſelves from the embarraſſment, they gave out, that Stowell was ſick, and they had granted him a month for his recovery. They now revived the excluſion bill, and ſent it up to the lords for their concurrence. A violent debate ſucceeded, in which the eloquence of Shaftſbury was eclipſed by that of Hallifax, his nephew, a zealous partizan of the court. At laſt the queſtion was put, and the bill was rejected by a conſiderable majority. This deciſion rendered all the hopes of the commons abortive; and they diſcharged their reſentment on ſome catholic peers, whom they impeached as abettors of the popiſh plot. Five of them had been for ſome time confined in the Tower. The firſt they attacked was the old lord Stafford. Oates depoſed that he had ſeen a commiſſion ſent to him, ſigned by father Oliva, general of the Jeſuits. Two other witneſſes ſwore that he had engaged to kill the king; and Stafford was found guilty by his peers, upon a majority of twenty-four voices. His courage, ſupported by conſcious innocence, did not forſake him in the dreadful trial. Being very old and infirm, on going to his execution, he deſired a cloak: "I may tremble with cold; (ſaid he) but, thank heaven, I ſhall never tremble through fear." He declared, on the ſcaffold, his abhorrence of the corruptions of the church of Rome. "I die (ſaid he) in hopes that the deluſion will ſoon vaniſh, and that truth will oblige the world to do me juſtice at laſt." We believe you, my lord (replied the weeping populace); God bleſs your lordſhip." The executioner was melted into tears, and it was with the utmoſt difficulty that he performed his duty. The circumſtances of this execution ſhook the general belief of the conſpiracy; and though it ſtill continued to alarm the people, no more blood was ſhed upon that account. The commons perceived the paſſions of the people were turned againſt them, and they began to act with leſs reſolution.

The lower houſe was, however, ſtill determined to purſue the plan they had formed, and flattered themſelves the flexibility of Charles, and his neceſſities for money, would at laſt render them ſucceſsful. They accordingly propoſed ſeveral inflammatory bills; and at laſt voted, that they would grant no ſupplies till the excluſion bill was paſſed into a law. Convinced that nothing was now to be expected, Charles diſſolved the parliament. But though he had thus abruptly parted with one aſſembly, he hoped to have better ſucceſs with another: and accordingly ſummoned a new parliament to meet at Oxford, where the unfavourable diſpoſitions of the capital could have no effect on the members. This meaſure occaſioned the ſtrongeſt reſentment in the citizens. The old members were re-choſen, and thanked by their conſtituents for their enquiry into the popiſh conſpiracy, and for their attempt to exclude the duke of York from the throne: for, (added they) we look upon him as the principal cauſe of that ruin which threatens the nation. The duke of Monmouth, a the head of fifteen peers, oppoſed the deſign o holding the parliament at Oxford; and ſaid in his petition, "that the two houſes would be expoſed to the ſwords of the papiſts and their adherents, ſeveral of whom had crept even into the king's guards." This was followed by a more open attack; the ſpiri of rebellion no longer hid itſelf under the mantle o darkneſs.

A. D. 1681. The heads of the party arrived a Oxford ſtrongly eſcorted; and the repreſentatives o London, in particular, were followed by crouds o cititzens, with cockades, on which which were writ ten, "No popery, no ſlavery." In a word, bot parties endeavoured to make a pompous diſplay o their ſtrength; and the meeting of this parliamen had rather the appearance of thoſe in the diſtracte times of Henry VI. at Clarendon, Oxford, an Coventry, than the peaceable and amicable meetin of the ſovereign and his people.

Charles, being exaſperated at theſe appearance began to exert his authority with a vigour of whic he was thought incapable. He opened the ſeſſio with a noble and elegant ſpeech; in which, afte complaining of the diſreſpectful proceedings of th laſt parliament, which were ſuch, he ſaid, as fe princes beſide himſelf would have borne with equ patience, he declared, that as it was neither his d fi

ſire nor intention to exerciſe arbitrary power over them, ſo he would not allow it to be exerciſed over himſelf. He again inculcated moderation in their debates, as it was by that means alone the ends of the nation, who had deputed them as repreſentatives, could be anſwered. He told them he was willing to give them every ſatisfaction in his power, with regard to their fears of a popiſh ſucceſſor, by joining with them to eſtabliſh any practical ſcheme for putting the government entirely into the hands of proteſtants, during the reign of ſuch a prince. In a word, that as he would, on his part, perform every thing that could reaſonably be deſired of him, ſo he expected that they ſhould lay aſide their animoſities, and concur with him in that ſalutary intention; and not by a revival of their paſt irregularities inſpire him with a diſguſt to parliaments.

The deſired effect, however, was not produced by this ſpeech. Equally indifferent to the menaces and ſoothings of the king, they elected the ſame ſpeaker that filled the chair in the laſt parliament, and adopted the ſame meaſures, namely, the impeachment of Danby, the enquiry into the popiſh plot, and the bill of excluſion. They were ſo determined to carry the laſt meaſure, that they rejected every expedient. Ernely, one of the king's miniſters, in order to remove all their fears with regard to a popiſh ſucceſſor, propoſed, "that the duke of York ſhould be baniſhed 500 miles from the Britiſh dominions: that the government ſhould be wholly veſted in a regent: that this regent ſhould be the princeſs of Orange; and in caſe of her death without iſſue, in the princeſs Anne: that if the duke ſhould have a ſon educated in the proteſtant religion, then the ſaid princeſſes reſpectively to ſucceed in the regency, during the minority of ſuch ſon, and no longer: that notwithſtanding theſe kingdoms, out of reſpect to the royal family, and for preſerving the right of ſucceſſion, might be governed in the name of James II. yet no man ſhould take arms from him, or by virtue of his commiſſion, on pain of being capitally puniſhed: that all officers, civil or military, ſhall take an oath to obſerve this ſettlement of the government: that acts of a ſimilar nature ſhould paſs in the parliaments of Scotland and Ireland: that if the duke of York ſhould come into any of the three kingdoms, he ſhould be abſolutely excluded, and the government devolve to the regent: that all papiſts of any conſideration ſhould be baniſhed by name, and their children be educated in the proteſtant religion." But even this propoſal, which amounted very near to an excluſion, was rejected. They were determined on their object, and no palliative expedients would be accepted.

During the time of the parliament's being thus employed, one Fitz-Harris, an Iriſh catholic, had inſinuated himſelf into the favour of the court, by giving information concerning the ſchemes of the oppoſite party. He joined with one Everard in compoſing an infamous and injurious libel, apparently with a view of getting money by the information. A traitor never ſpares his aſſociate when it is his intereſt to give him up. Everard impeached Fitz-Harris, and he was immediately arreſted. The priſoner had now no hopes of eſcaping from the hand of juſtice, but by changing his party. He accordingly declared that he had been engaged by the court to write the libel in queſtion, to throw the odium on the partiſans of the excluſion bill. He added ſome other circumſtances concerning the popiſh plot, and pretended he could make very important diſcoveries. The commons, hoping to obtain freſh matter for defamation, afforded him their protection; and their firſt meaſure was to reſcue him out of the hands of juſtice. In order to this, they ſent up an impeachment againſt him to the lords, who thought proper to reject it. Exaſperated at this refuſal, the commons complained of a violation of privilege, and declared, that if any judge ſhould preſume to try Fitz-Harris, he ſhould be held guilty of that violation.

This altercation between the two houſes continued to increaſe, which afforded Charles a very favourable opportunity of putting a period to a parliament whom he found were determined to oppoſe him in every particular. He, however, kept his deſign a ſecret even from his moſt intimate friends; and on the 28th of March, the very day the excluſion bill was to be read the ſecond time, he repaired with the utmoſt privacy to the houſe, and before they had received the leaſt intimation of his deſign, diſſolved the parliament. This reſolute behaviour of the king diſconcerted all the meaſures of the Whigs. He afterwards publiſhed a proclamation, in which he gave his reaſons for diſſolving the two laſt parliaments, and accuſed the commons of a deſign to wreſt from him the regal authority, and totally ſubvert the conſtitution of England.

Being from experience convinced, that he had nothing to hope from the commons, he determined not to expoſe himſelf any longer to parliamentary ſtorms. He retrenched the expences of his government, relinquiſhed the town of Tangier in Africa, though the fortifications had coſt him very conſiderable ſums; and ſeemed reſolved to maintain the triumph he had gained over the oppoſition by his vigour. The clergy now boldly propagated the favourite maxims of the crown, and the whigs were repreſented as ſectaries and republicans of the moſt dangerous kind. Doubts were thrown out with regard to the truth of the popiſh conſpiracy; and could the king have maintained the ſame moderation in his conduct he had hitherto done, his triumph would have been worthy of him; but he ſuffered repriſals of too rigorous a nature to be made by the tory party. The ſpies who had ſerved the parliament now offered their ſervices to the court, and were accepted. Fitz-Harris was tried and executed. He declared before his execution that the libel was his own, and that he had compoſed it merely to give it up to the miniſtry for the ſake of a reward. The duke of York was recalled from Scotland, and reſumed his ſeat at the council board.

It is neceſſary here to obſerve, that Ireland had for ſome years been governed by the duke of Ormond, a zealous royaliſt, and a true friend to his country. He profeſſed the principles of the proteſtant religion, but was no bigot to his tenets: he was indulgent to thoſe of other perſuaſions, and, provided they did nothing to diſturb the peace of the government, was willing they ſhould worſhip their Maker in the manner moſt agreeable to their conſciences. Ormond had ſerved Charles faithfully; he never forſook him in his baniſhment; but diſdaining the meanneſs of flattery and adulation, he was long neglected by that prince, who could not number gratitude among his virtues. Dillon, an Iriſh colonel, once requeſted the duke to aſſiſt him on ſome particular occaſion with his intereſt at court, adding, that he had no other dependence but on God and him. "I am heartily ſorry for you, (replied the duke) you could not poſſibly have two friends of leſs credit at court." During his government, his whole ſtudy was to preſerve peace, and render the people happy. But his virtues were not ſufficient to defend him againſt the malice of Shaftſbury. He attacked him in parliament with all the powers of eloquence, and inſinuated crimes of which he was wholly a ſtranger. Ormond's only defender was his own ſon, the earl of Oſſory. He invalidated all the inſinuations of his adverſary, and after many juſt encomiums on the conduct of his father, added with a boldneſs that did him honour, "He never adviſed to break the triple alliance; he never adviſed to ſhut up the exchequer; he never adviſed the declaration in favour of the non-conformiſts; he never adviſed to break with Holland, to preſerve the alliance with France: let my father enjoy the privilege that all honeſt men ought to enjoy; let him be judged by his counſels and his actions." Shaftſbury felt the poignancy of the ſarcaſm, having been the author of thoſe evil counſels which the king had followed. The lords applauded the noble defence of Oſſory, and his true and ſimple narrative of facts prevailed over the artificial eloquence of his adverſary. Oſſory did not long ſurvive this triumph. His father was ſincerely affected with his death, and ſaid on that melancholy occaſion, "I would not change my dead ſon for any living ſon in Chriſtendom."

While the duke of York reſided in Scotland he practiſed all the ſeverities of arbitrary power. He eſtabliſhed a teſt by which the royal perogative, the ſupremacy, and paſſive obedience were expreſsly acknowledged. But the oath was drawn up in ſo prolix and ill-digeſted a manner, that Argyle thought ſome explanations neceſſary, before he could be prevailed upon to take it. This conduct exaſperated the duke, who determined to make him feel the weight of power. Argyle was arreſted and condemned; but found means to eſcape. Above two thouſand preſbyterians were proſecuted on this account with the moſt horrible ſeverity. An inquiſition more cruel than that of Spain was carried on in various parts of Scotland. The people complained, but without redreſs; the duke of York, who now directed the affairs of the kingdom, ſtifled all their applications.

A. D. 1683. Inſtead of being the parent of his people, Charles now openly headed a faction. Very extraordinary meaſures were taken to humble the city of London, whoſe power and political intrigues had given great umbrage to the court. A Quo Warranto, or an order to produce the charters of the city, was iſſued. If it ſhould appear upon ſtrict enquiry, that any of the conditions preſcribed in either of theſe charters had been violated in any eſſential point, the privileges of the city might be taken away. Two facts were cited to prove that the city had actually broken the conditions of the charter. This was denied by the council for the defendants with very ſtrong reaſons; but the judges, devoted to the court, paſſed ſentence agreeable to its intenſions. Struck with conſternation, the common-council aſſembled to conſult the moſt proper meaſures to be taken on this alarming exigency. It was propoſed, that an entire ſubmiſſion ſhould be made to the miniſtry, as the only means of preventing the total extinction of the liberties of the city. This propoſal was ſtrongly oppoſed by the whigs. They repreſented the late action of the court as a moſt notorious violation of their rights and privileges; and added, that they ſhould be in ſome meaſure acceſſary to this act of uſurpation, if, by a daſtardly ſubmiſſion, they acknowledged the unjuſt authority. Fear, blended with intereſt, however, prevailed over that firmneſs and reſolution which might have been expected from the capital of the Engliſh nation. An humble deputation was ſent to his majeſty, requeſting the reſtoration of their charter. Their petition was granted, but not till they had made ſuch conceſſions as in effect annihilated even the ſhadow of liberty.

Alarmed at the example of the capital, all the other corporations in the kingdom tamely reſigned their charters into the king's hands: nor could they obtain a reſtoration of them till they had paid conſiderable ſums; and even then all the places of power and profit were, like thoſe of the capital, left entirely at the diſpoſal of the crown. This may truly be conſidered as the triumph of deſpotiſm. The Engliſh were no longer that bold and reſolute people who, in defence of their antient privileges, had made their monarchs tremble on the throne, they were dwindled into ſlaves, who covered the yoke of oppreſſion, and offered the incenſe of adulation to the tyrant that trampled upon their liberties.

The duke of Monmouth, the earl of Shaftſbury, lord Ruſſel, and ſeveral other noblemen, had formed a plot for an inſurrection. After the diſſolution of the parliament at Oxford, Shaftſbury had been impriſoned, and an indictment for high treaſon had been preferred againſt him; but the bill was rejected by the grand jury. After the ſeizing of the city's charter he found means to renew the ſcheme; and it was propoſed to excite inſurrections in different parts of the country, and even to attack the king's guards. All their meaſures were taken, the time fixed, and a maniſeſto ready for juſtifying the revolt. But ſome unforeſeen accidents occaſioned delays. Shaftſbury, who knew the danger, deſpaired of ſucceſs. He therefore abandoned the enterprize, and retired into Holland, where he died ſoon after, diſregarded both by friends and enemies.

Shaftſbury's defection did not, however, intimidate the conſpirators; they determined to purſue their plan, and hoped for ſucceſs from the univerſal diſſatisfaction that prevailed in every part of the nation. While they were employed in concerting meaſures for carrying their deſign into execution, another plot was formed by a ſet of inferior conſpirators. The principal of theſe were colonel Rumſey, colonel Walcot, both republican officers: Goodenough, under-ſheriff of London; Weſt, Tyler, Norton, Ayloffe, Ferguſon, Rouſe, Home, Keiling, Holloway, Bourne, Lee and Rombald. The laſt, who was a malſter, poſſeſſed an eſtate in the road to Newmarket, called the Rye-houſe farm. Hence the conſpirators frequently met, and from this circumſtance the conſpiracy is generally known by the name of the Rye-houſe Plot. The deſign was to attack the king's guards, and ſeize the perſons of the king and his brother in their return from Newmarket. This being effected, the conſpirators were to have repaired, with the utmoſt haſte to London, in order to join their brethren in the city, aſſemble their forces, and break out into open rebellion.

The whole deſign, however, was diſcovered befor it could be carried into execution, by the confeſſion of Keiling. Orders were immediately iſſued for ſeizing the conſpirators. Terrified at their danger, Weſt and Rumſey ſurrendered with an intention o becoming evidences. The former had been admitted into the ſecret of the plot formed by the noblemen, and orders were accordingly iſſued for arreſting them. Ruſſel, Eſſex, Howard, Sidney, and Hambden, grandſon to the celebrated republican of that name, were apprehended, and ſent to the Tower. Monmouth abſconded. Walcot, Home, and Rouſe were firſt tried; the evidences againſt them were Rumſey, Weſt, an one Bourne, a brewer, who concurred in depoſing that they were all frequently at the meetings held th preceding year on the buſineſs of the plot. Walco in his defence, alledged, and offered to prove by undoubted teſtimony, that he was ill of the gout all th time the king was at Newmarket. The evidenc againſt him was, however, greatly ſtrengthened, b a letter he himſelf wrote, while under confinemen to ſecretary Jenkins; wherein he promiſed to revea all he knew relative to the plot againſt his majeſty provided he might be aſſured of the royal pardon The jury found them all guilty, and they were ſoo after executed at Tyburn.

Lord Ruſſel's trial followed that of Walco Howard, a man of a very profligate character, con deſcended to purchaſe his pardon, by turning ev dence againſt his friends. But his conduct rendered him ſo univerſally odious, that not a man of character or reputation in either party would afterwards admit him into their company. In adhering to the letter of the laws of England on the ſubject of treaſon, it was difficult to conſtitute the crime of the peers. According to the famous ſtatute of Edward III. there are two ſpecies of treaſon, the intention or attempt to take away the king's life, and the actual attempt to make war againſt him. According to a ſtatute of Mary, either of theſe crimes muſt be proved by the concurrent teſtimony of two evidences, with regard to any act tending to ſuch purpoſes. The refinements of the lawyers rendered the definition leſs limited, and, conſequently, the proof more eaſy. This was what condemned Ruſſel, who had long been the idol of the people. Too honeſt to deny that he had any concern in the propoſed inſurrections, he inſiſted only in ſaying, that he had no deſign againſt the life of the king. Monmouth offering to ſurrender himſelf a priſoner, if he thought that action would ſave his life, the earl nobly anſwered, "By no means; I ſhould gain nothing by ſeeing my friend die with me." He alſo rejected the offer of lord Cavendiſh, who was deſirous of changing dreſſes with him, in order to facilitate his eſcape.

Lord Ruſſel, on the morning of his execution, after winding up his watch, ſaid, "We have done with time, we have nothing now to think of but eternity." It was thought he would have been pardoned, could he have been prevailed upon to abandon a principle he had always maintained, and which was thought by the court incompatible with the duty and loyalty of a ſubject. This principle was, that the power of every king of England is limited by the laws; and that if he goes beyond theſe bounds, the ſubjects have a right, in their own defence, to bring him back. But he always declared, that he was incapable of the baſe deſign of aſſaſſinating the ſovereign. He often declared, that he preferred a violent death to any other; becauſe after being expoſed a few minutes to the eyes of the populace, every thing was over; and that there was leſs to be ſuffered than in the drawing of a tooth. He was attended in his laſt moments by Dr. Tillotſon and Dr. Burnet. He ſuffered on a ſcaffold erected in Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, on the 21ſt of July; and died like an Engliſhman, without ſhewing the leaſt weakneſs, though ſurrounded by a populace drowned in tears.

The next victim was the celebrated Algernon Sidney, ſon to the earl of Leiceſter. His prodigious genius, his inſuperable courage, and his paſſion for liberty, gave him a diſtinguiſhed place among the republicans. He oppoſed the reſtoration of monarchy with the ſame zeal he had before oppoſed the uſurpation of Cromwell. Finding that his oppoſition would be in vain, he withdrew into Holland; but deſirous of reviſiting his native country, he took the benefit of the act of indemnity, and returned to England. He ſoon joined the country party, and warmly ſupported the bill of excluſion. In a word, he oppoſed, with all his intereſt and eloquence, every deſign and meaſure of the court. Howard was the only evidence againſt him: his papers were therefore produced, in order to ſupply the reſt. Some writings, in which he declared his own ſentiments on the natural contract, on the reſiſtance to tyrants, on the advantages of a republican government, were conſidered as ſupplementary evidences, more than ſufficient to convict him. In vain did Sidney repreſent, that the reſemblance of a hand-writing, a proof rejected in England, was the only evidence that thoſe works were his; that beſides, they had never been publiſhed or communicated to any perſon; that they proved no recent conſpiracy, becauſe it was clear the writing was of an older date. He was, however, condemned: the duke thought him too formidable an enemy to eſcape. His ſentence had, however, no power to terrify him; he gloried in dying for the cauſe he had embraced from his infancy. This illuſtrious man muſt for ever be lamented, as, under a republican government, he muſt certainly have merited the higheſt applauſe.

Lord Eſſex being found dead in priſon, at firſt it was ſtrongly reported that he was murdered by order of the king and his brother; but there were afterwards found ſufficient proofs that he had put an end to his own life. This was the leſs ſurpriſing, as he had always been a ſtrong advocate for ſuicide. The principal friends of the duke of Monmouth being dead, that nobleman wrote two letters to the king, filled with the moſt humble and ſubmiſſive expreſſions. Monmouth was the favourite ſon of Charles, who now felt all his tenderneſs revive. He accepted of the guilty youth's ſubmiſſion, and permitted him to come to court. He even indulged him ſo far, that he was excuſed from giving evidence againſt any of his friends; but was required to ſign a paper, owning the plot in general, and tacitly juſtifying the evidence againſt thoſe who had ſuffered. In a few days, however, Monmouth repented of the ſtep he had taken, and, with the greateſt earneſtneſs, intreated the king to return him the paper. Charles was ſo highly incenſed at his behaviour, that he baniſhed him from court. Monmouth paſſed over into Holland, where the king, notwithſtanding all that had paſſed, correſponded with him by letter, unknown to the duke of York, and privately made him conſiderable remittances of money.

The king now enjoyed an almoſt unlimited authority in peace. The plot that had been formed againſt him rendered him dearer to his people, who imputed all the late ſeverities to the duke of York. The doctrine of abſolute ſubmiſſion and paſſive obedience became the prevailing ſyſtem; and the univerſity of Oxford condemned for thoſe propoſitions which before had been eſtabliſhed as principles. Among theſe were the following: "All civil authority is derived originally from the people: the ſovereignty of England conſiſts of three eſtates, the king, the lords, and the commons; and the king has a power equal to that of the two houſes. Self-preſervation is a fundamental law of nature, and over-rules all other laws, when put in competition with it." Theſe propoſitions were now condemned. Such is the inſtability of human opinions!

In order, if poſſible, to recover his popularity, the duke of York relaxed, for a time, the furious meaſure he had embraced; but his attempt was in vain; the veil was too thin to hide the enormity of his late conduct. Charles was more ſucceſsful. He knew the fear of popery had cauſed the moſt alarming apprehenſions in the minds of the people, and was deſirous of diſſipating their terrors. He thought proper to beſtow his neice, the princeſs Anne, daughter to the duke of York, on prince George, brother to the king of Denmark. But though he gratified his people in that particular, he never could be prevailed upon to call a parliament, or truſt the nation with the election of new repreſentatives, who might, in their collective capacity, become formidable to his newly aſſumed deſpotic power. York ſtrongly ſupported this reſolution of his brother; and at the ſame time prevailed upon him to purſue ſuch meaſures, as rendered it highly imprudent to convene that aſſembly.

Lord Danby, who had remained ſeveral years a priſoner in the Tower, was now admitted to bail; the four popiſh lords that ſtill remained in confinement were admitted to the ſame privilege. Lord Petre had died in the Tower about a month before. On his death-bed he wrote a letter to the king, aſſuring him on his hopes of ſalvation, that he was entirely innocent of the plot with which he was charged.

Charles, however, conſcious of being the oppreſſor of a free and generous people, pined beneath the oppreſſion under which the whole nation groaned. He had purſued meaſures he ſecretly condemned, and yielded to counſels which his own heart told him were equally inconſiſtent with his honour, and the happineſs of his people. Naturally of an eaſy temper, and a gentle diſpoſition, he had ſuffered arbitrary, and even cruel proceedings, to receive the ſanction of his authority, and the ſeal of royalty had been ſtamped on actions he never approved. He now ſaw, but it was too late, that while he compelled his people to ſubmit to his deſires through fear, he had loſt their affections as ſubjects. Penetrated with theſe reflections he formed a deſign of changing his conduct, and reſtoring the neglected intercourſe between himſelf and his parliament. The duke of York propoſing ſome meaſures which were extremely diſagreeable to the king, Charles ſaid to him, with ſome vivacity, "Brother, I am now too old to go a ſecond time upon my travels; you may do it if you pleaſe." But he lived not to carry the generous plan he had formed into execution.

A. D. 1684. The king was ſeized with an apoplective fit on the ſeventh of February, and four days after he expired, in the 55th year of his age, and the 25th of his reign, computing from his reſtoration. Some believed that he was poiſoned; but there ſeems very little foundation for that opinion. The papiſts, however, bore the odium of the act, and were ſaid to have perpetrated the execrable deed, in order to prevent his carrying on the reformation he had propoſed.

This monarch would have been more worthy had not indolence, and the indulgence of his paſſions, perverted his natural talents. He was an enemy to labour, forgetful of ſervices, attached to no perſon from eſteem, and negligent of every duty. His conduct gave ſufficient room for the cenſure of one of his intimate friends, that he never uttered a fooliſh ſentence, * nor ever did a wiſe action.

Moſt of his faults as well as his vexations, flowed from one ſource; his exceſſive love of pleaſure. To obtain the pecuniary aſſiſtance of France he formed an alliance with that power, which gave ſufficient room to expect that his real intention was that of making himſelf abſolute. This opinion gave riſe to all the diſputes between him and his parliament, and ſeemed even to threaten him with the loſs of his crown. He was guilty of the ſame miſtake that had involved all the Stuart family in diſtreſs; they thought their authority equal to that of the moſt powerful monarchs on the continent, and thence paid no regard to the Engliſh conſtitution. Their principles and conduct could not therefore fail of alarming a people whoſe liberties were founded on Magna Charta, and were now grown exceſſively jealous of their privileges. Had the Stuarts paid more reſpect to the laws and conſtitution of England their own prerogatives would have been ſecured, and they would have reigned with more honour to themſelves, and advantage to the people. In private life Charles had fewer faults. He was an obliging though negligent huſband, a generous lover, a tender father, a kind maſter; but gratitude was a virtue to which he was totally a ſtranger: the royaliſts ſerved him faithfully from affection; but he remembered not their ſervices; nor took any care to reſtore that fortune they had ſo generouſly ſpent in the ſupport of his family.†

Charles II. had no children by his queen, Catherine

* The earl of Rocheſter, alluding to his faults, and likewiſe his extreme fondneſs for Mutton, wrote the following epigramatic epitaph:

"Here lies the mutton-eating king,
"Whoſe word no man relies on:
"Who never ſaid a fooliſh thing,
"Or ever did a wiſe one.

† Perhaps a character was never drawn with greater energy of diction, ſtronger force of argument, or higher colouring, than that of this monarch by the admirable pen of Churchill. After allowing for the peculiar complexion of the times in which the poet invoked his muſe, it muſt be acknowledged that the principal features are juſtly marked, and the whole portrait finely pencilled. We ſhall therefore, without further apology, preſent it to our readers at full length.

From land to land for years compell'd to roam,
Whilſt uſurpation lorded it at home;
Of majeſty unmindful, forc'd to fly,
Not daring, like a king, to reign or die:
Recall'd to repoſſeſs his lawful throne,
More at his people's ſeeking than his own,
Another Charles ſucceeded.——In the ſchool
Of travel he had learn'd---to play the fool.
And, like pert pupils, with dull tutors ſent
To ſhame their country on the continent,
From love of England by long abſence wean'd,
From ev'ry court, he ev'ry folly glean'd;
And was, ſo cloſe do evil habits cling,
'Till crown'd, a beggar, and when crown'd, no king.
Thoſe grand and gen'ral pow'rs, which heav'n deſign'd
An inſtance of his mercy to mankind,
Were loſt, in ſtorms of diſſipation hurl'd,
Nor would he give one hour to bleſs a world;
Lighter than levity which ſtrides the blaſt,
And, of the preſent fond, forgets the paſt;
He chang'd and chang'd, but, ev'ry hope to curſe,
Chang'd only from one folly to a worſe;
State he reſign'd to thoſe whom ſtate could pleaſe,
Careleſs of majeſty, his wiſh was eaſe;
Pleaſure, and pleaſure only, was his aim;
Kings of leſs wit might hunt the bubble fame.
Dignity, through his reign was made a ſport,
Nor dar'd Decorum ſhew her face at court:
Morality was held a ſtanding jeſt,
And faith a neceſſary fraud at beſt.
Courtiers, their monarch ever in their view,
Poſſeſs'd great talents, and abus'd them too;
Whate'er was light, impertinent and vain,
Whate'er was looſe, indecent, and profane,
(So ripe was folly, folly to acquit)
Stood all abſolv'd in that poor bauble---wit.
In gratitude, alas! but little read,
He let his father's ſervants beg their bread;
His father's faithful ſervants, and his own,
To place the foes of both around his throne.
Bad counſels he embrac'd through indolence,
Thro' love of eaſe, and not thro' want of ſenſe:
He ſaw them wrong, but rather let them go
As right, than take the pains to make them ſo.
Women rul'd all, and miniſters of ſtate
Were for commands at toilets forc'd to wait;
Women, who have, as monarchs, grac'd the land,
But never govern'd well at ſecond hand.
To make all other errors ſlight appear
In mem'ry fix'd, ſtand Dunkirk and Tangier;
In mem'ry fix'd ſo deep, that time in vain
Shall ſtrive to wipe thoſe records from the brain, Amboyna ſtands—— gods! that a king ſhould hold
In ſuch high eſtimate, vile, paultry gold,
And of his duty be ſo careleſs found,
That when the blood of ſubjects from the ground
For vengeance call'd, he ſhould reject their cry,
And, brib'd from honour, lay his thunders by,
Give Holland peace, whilſt Engliſh victims groan'd,
And butcher'd ſubjects wander'd unatton'd.
O, dear, deep injury to England's fame;
To them, to us, to all! to him deep ſhame!
Of all the paſſions which from frailty ſpring,
Av'rice is that which leaſt becomes a king.
To crown the whole, ſcorning the public good,
Which through his reign he little underſtood
Or little heeded, with too narrow aim,
He reaſſum'd a bigot brother's reign;
And, having made time-ſerving ſenates bow,
Suddenly died, that brother beſt knew how.

rine of Portugal, a virtuous princeſs, who could never engage the affections of her huſband. He, however, left a numerous progeny, the fruits of his illicit love.

By Mrs. Lucy Walters, one ſon, James, duke of Monmouth, born in 1646.

By Mrs. Elizabeth Killigrew, viſcounteſs Shannon, one daughter, Charlotte-Maria Henrietta Jemima-Maria Fitzroy, married firſt to James Howard, and afterwards to the earl of Yarmouth.

By Mrs. Catherine Peg, one ſon, Charles Fitz-Charles, earl of Plymouth, born in 1658.

By Mrs. Barbara Villers, ducheſs of Cleveland, three ſons, and as many daughters; Charles Fitzroy, created duke of Southampton, and, after his mother's death, duke of Cleveland; Henry Fitzroy, duke of Grafton; and George Fitzroy, duke of Northumberland: Anne Fitzroy married to the earl of Suſſex; Charlotte Fitzroy, married to the earl of Litchfield; and Barbara, who took the veil in the nunnery of Pontoiſe in France.

By Loiſe de Querouaille, dutcheſs of Portſmouth, Charles Lenox, duke of Richmond.

By Mrs. Eleanor Gywnn, an actreſs, one ſon, Charles Beauclerk, duke of St. Albans. And

By Mrs. Mary Davis, a lady of the ſame profeſſion, one daughter, Mary Tudor, married to the earl of Derwentwater.

Independent of Hiſtorical facts, the following are the moſt remarkable occurrences which happened in this reign.

In 1663 news-papers were firſt printed in England.

The year 1665 gave riſe to the Gazette Royal, which was firſt publiſhed at Oxford (the court being there) in a folio half ſheet on the 7th of November. On the removal of the Court to London the title was changed to the London Gazette; the Oxford Gazette was publiſhed on Tueſdays, the London on Saturdays, and theſe have continued to be the days of publication ever ſince.

In 1666 happened the fire of London.

The year 1676 is remarkable for the invention of callico printing, which was firſt executed in London.

In 1678. Tea was firſt brought to England by Lord Oſſory from Holland, and being admired by perſons of rank it was imported from thence, and generally ſold for 60s. per pound, till our Eaſt-India Company took up the trade.

The year 1680 is diſtinguiſhed by St. James's Park being laid open for the uſe of the public, and the game of mall played in it by the nobility. The place ſtill retains the name, and the irons and ſide-guards for the bales were not removed till ſo lately as 1752.

The ſame year (viz. 1680) was firſt printed the votes of the Houſe of Commons.

In 1683 was one of the longeſt and hardeſt froſts that till then had happened in England. It began about the middle of December, and continued till the 5th of February. A fair was kept on the Thames, and oxen roaſted on the ice: the coaches drove from the Temple to Weſtminſter-hall on the river as frequently as in the ſtreets.

During this reign the Scotch pedlars in Poland, amounting to 53,000, were numbered and taxed by the pole, by permiſſion of the Poliſh monarch. The commiſſioners appointed for receiving this tax were Sir John Denham and Mr. Killegrew, who brought home 10,000l. ſterling, beſides defraying the expences of the commiſſion, voyage and journey.

SECTION II.

JAMES II.

NO ſooner did Charles II. pay the debt of nature than his brother James (notwithſtanding the endeavours of the two laſt parliaments to exclude him from the throne) was proclaimed king without the leaſt oppoſition from any of the people. But James himſelf dreaded the conſequences that might reſult from the more zealous part of his ſubjects, on account of his religion, which he was reſolved to ſupport, and, if poſſible, to re-eſtabliſh in England. He therefore thought it would be the moſt prudent method immediately to aſſemble the privy-council, and by delivering a flattering ſpeech, filled with promiſes he never intended to perform, endeavour to diſſipate the fears too many had entertained of the conſequences that might reſult from his religious principles.

Accordingly, when the council aſſembled, James, after beſtowing ſome praiſes on the memory of his predeceſſor, proceeded in the following manner: "I have been repreſented as infatuated with principles of arbitrary power; nor is this the only calumny that has been thrown upon me. But I now declare that I will endeavour to maintain the government both in church and ſtate, as by law eſtabliſhed. I am ſenſible that the church of England is favourable to monarchy, and that all the members of it have ſhewn themſelves faithful ſubjects. I ſhall therefore apply myſelf to ſupport and defend it. I am ſenſible, at the ſame time, that the laws of England make me as powerful a prince as I can wiſh to be; and my object is to preſerve the prerogative of my crown without invading the privileges of my ſubjects. I have often expoſed my life in defence of the nation, and am ſtill ready to expoſe it for the maintenance of its juſt rights and privileges."

It is no wonder that a ſpeech, filled with ſuch noble ſentiments, ſhould be received with general applauſe, and that it ſhould revive the ſpirits of the Engliſh, who had formed the moſt alarming apprehenſions of his conduct. James had eſtabliſhed his courage and conduct as a ſeaman, and he was conſidered as one of the moſt able perſons in Europe, with regard to maritime affairs. His friends magnified his probity to the ſkies; and the people readily believed them, becauſe they wiſhed it to be true. Addreſſes were ſent from every quarter of the kingdom, filled with the warmeſt expreſſions of duty and reſpect. Even the quakers followed the general practice, and waited on the king with a congratulatory addreſs, in which was the following remarkable paragraph: "We are come to ſignify our affliction for the death of our good friend Charles, and our joy to ſee thee made the ruler of the people. They tell us, thou art not of the church of England any more than we; ſo we hope thou wilt allow us the ſame liberty that thou takeſt thyſelf; and if thou doſt, we wiſh thee all manner of proſperity."

From the general marks of reſpect which James received from his ſubjects he had reaſon to think that, notwithſtanding the violent efforts made by the country party for his excluſion, he was firmly ſeated on the throne of England. But though the generality of the people entertained the moſt flattering hopes from their new monarch, yet the thinking part of the nation, particularly thoſe who were beſt acquainted with his temper, were not to be impoſed upon by ſpecious aſſurances. It was, indeed, a kind of infatuation to ſuppoſe, that he really entertained the ſentiments he profeſſed. They had known him, while duke of York, to be a bigot to the Romiſh religion, and a zealous oppoſer of the reformation: they had been often witneſſes that his diſpoſition was merciless and cruel; and that he totally diſregarded the liberties of the people and the eſtabliſhed form of government. They knew he was the principal adviſer and promoter of all the unpopular and arbitrary meaſures purſued by his brother during the latter part of his reign; and that he himſelf was the ſworn friend of Lewis XIV, whoſe ambition all Europe dreaded; and like that monarch, an inveterate enemy to all whom the Romiſh church ſtiled heretics. Was it therefore reaſonable to ſuppoſe that he would entirely alter his ſentiments when he came to the throne? James was ſenſible, penetrating, and enterprizing; but he was alſo headſtrong, violent, and arbitrary; and his judgment by no means clear. How could it be expected that a king, with this mixture of good and bad qualities, could ever render his people happy?

James did not long keep his ſubjects in ſuſpence with reſpect to his real ſentiments and intentions. The very firſt Sunday after his acceſſion he went publicly to hear maſs, though contrary to the eſtabliſhed laws of England; and the prieſts and jeſuits became his principal confidents. He alſo publiſhed a proclamation for levying the duties of exciſe and cuſtoms granted to his predeceſſors, as if given by parliament, though he well knew that the grant expired with the life of his brother. He, however, took care not to ſhew much partiality to thoſe of his own communion, in ſettling the officers of his houſhold; for all who poſſeſſed poſts under the late king were continued in their reſpective offices.

The great number of prieſts and jeſuits, who now baſked openly in the ſun-ſhine of the court, gave great offence to the people; But they were ſtill more irritated when it was known that James had ſent a meſſenger to Rome, in order to make ſubmiſſion to the pope, and to pave the way for a re-admiſſion into the boſom of the catholic church. Innocent XI. who at this time filled the papal chair, very prudently adviſed the king not to be too precipitate in his meaſures, nor raſhly attempt what repeated experience might convince him was abſolutely impracticable. The Spaniſh ambaſſador alſo, knowing the tranquillity of England abſolutely neceſſary for the ſupport of Spain, uſed the freedom of making the like remonſtrances. He obſerved how buſy the prieſts appeared at court, and adviſed the king not to liſten with too great facility to their dangerous councils. "Is it not cuſtomary in Spain, replied James, for the king to conſult his confeſſor?" "Yes, replied the ambaſſador, and it is for that reaſon our affairs ſucceed ſo ill."

The late king having been interred privately, and at a very little expence (a poor return for the tenderneſs he had ſhewn to his brother all his life-time) James and his queen were crowned by archbiſhop Sancroft, on St. George's day, April the 23d, 1685. The king would not receive the ſacrament, but all the reſt of the ceremony was performed according to the form of the church of England.

James now thought proper to ſhew his reſentment againſt thoſe who were the principal witneſſes for the popiſh plot. Among theſe the moſt conſpicuous was Titus Oates, who was tried in the court of King's-bench on two indictments for perjury, and found guilty of both. He was ſentenced to perpetual impriſonment, to ſtand five times every year on the pillory, and to be whipped firſt from Aldgate to Newgate, and the ſecond day after from Newgate to Tyburn. But notwithſtanding this dreadful puniſhment, which was executed with ſuch ſeverity that he fainted away ſeveral times, he would confeſs nothing. He continued in priſon till the revolution, when he obtained his liberty, and a penſion of 400l. a year.

Dangerfield, his principal aſſociate, was alſo tried for writing a ſeditious libel, and convicted. He was ſentenced to ſtand twice on the pillory, to be whipped from Aldgate to Newgate one day, and from Newgate to Tyburn another, and to pay a fine of 500l. As he was returning in a coach from his ſecond whipping, he was inſulted by one Francis, a barriſter of Gray's-Inn. Dangerfield reſented the unmanly treatment, and ſpit in his face. This ſo provoked the barriſter, that he puſhed his cane with the utmoſt violence in the face of Dangerfield, and ſtriking him directly on the eye, he died in torture a few hours after. Francis was immediately apprehended, tried for the offence, and executed at Tyburn.

Though James had expreſſed his diſlike to parliaments, and was confirmed in his ſentiments by the queen and his popiſh prieſts, it was abſolutely neceſſary, at the beginning of a reign, to ſummon that aſſembly. The low condition into which the whigs, or country party, had fallen during the laſt years of Charles's reign; the odium under which they laboured on account of the Rye-houſe conſpiracy, cauſed the elections in general to fall on the tories. At the ſame time the general reſignation of the charters had rendered the reſpective corporations abſolutely dependent on the crown; and the recommendations of the court, though, at that period, little aſſiſted by pecuniary influence, were become very prevalent. All theſe motives contributed to fill the houſe of commons with tories and zealous churchmen; and who, from their affections, were ſtrongly biaſſed to concur with the meaſures of the crown.

The parliament met on the 19th of May, when James opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne, in which, after ſolemnly repeating the promiſe he had made before the privy-council, of governing according to the laws, and of preſerving the proteſtant religion, he plainly told them he expected they would ſettle his revenue during his life, as they had done that of his brother. "I might," ſaid he, "uſe many arguments to inforce this demand; the "benefit of trade; the ſupport of the navy; the "neceſſities of the crown; and the well-being of the "government itſelf, which I muſt not ſuffer to be "precarious. But I am confident that your own conſideration, and your ſenſe of what is juſt and reaſonable, will ſufficiently ſuggeſt to you whatever, on "this occaſion, might be enlarged upon. There is, "indeed, one popular argument, which may be urged "againſt complying with my demand. Men may "think that by feeding me from time to time with "ſupplies, as they ſee convenient, they will better ſecure free meetings of parliament: but as this is the "firſt time I have ſpoken to you from the throne, I "muſt plainly tell you that ſuch an expedient would "be very improper to employ with me; and that the "beſt way to engage you to meet me often is always "to uſe me well."

This ſpeech wanted no comment to explain its meaning. It was ſufficiently evident, that James had already formed a reſolution of ſetting parliaments wholly aſide, in caſe he met with any oppoſition. The parliament, however, thought proper to diſſemble their apprehenſions, and voted the king the fixed revenues of his predeceſſor; but added, that they depended upon his royal word for the performance, with regard to his maintaining the religion of the church of England, as it was beneath the dignity of a king to falſify his promiſe.

The obliging diſpoſition of the parliament gave James the higheſt ſatisfaction, and he flattered himſelf with the hopes of a peaceful and happy reign. But he ſoon found himſelf greatly miſtaken. The earl of Argyle, who had been obliged to fly from Scotland during the late reign, on an accuſation of his having been concerned in a ſcheme formed by the duke of Monmouth for exciting a rebellion in that kingdom, flattered himſelf that the time was now come, when he might ſucceſsfully ſtir up his countrymen againſt James, whom he conſidered as the ſole author of his diſgrace and misfortunes. He imparted his deſign to Monmouth, who was then an exile alſo in Holland; and that giddy prince immediately conſented to the project.

Accordingly they hired a few ſhips of the Dutch, and got together about 2 or 300 of the Engliſh exiles in Flanders, men of deſperate fortunes, and who had no means of retrieving their affairs but by a change of government at home. This was the whole force the duke and earl had to depend upon, except their hopes of being joined by a formidable number of the whig party, in caſe they could effect a ſucceſsful landing either in England or Scotland.

Theſe meaſures being concerted, the two chiefs ſeparated in order to carry their deſign into execution. Argyle, at the head of a ſmall company, but with arms ſufficient for 5000 men, ſailed from Holland in the beginning of May, and made a deſcent on the coaſt of Scotland. But he ſoon found himſelf deceived in the hopes he had entertained of being joined by a great number of his friends. He was, indeed, fortunate enough to collect about 2000 men, chiefly belonging to his own clan in the highlands. But the government having received advice of his intended enterprize, were prepared for his reception. A conſiderable body of troops were ſent againſt him ſoon after his landing; while he, by the help of his ſhips, tranſported his men from place to place, till two or three of the king's ſhips arrived in theſe parts, when he was compelled to quit the ſea-coaſts, and march into the country, where he was inceſſantly purſued by the royal army. His followers, now perceiving that oppoſition was in vain, abandoned their maſter; and he himſelf was ſoon after ſeized and conveyed to Edinburgh, where he was publickly executed, and his head placed on the Tolbooth. Rombold, the contriver of the Rye-houſe plot, and ſome others who had fled from juſtice, and returned with Argyle, were alſo taken and executed.

Monmouth was no leſs unſucceſsful in his attempt. He ſailed out of the Texel on the 24th of May; and after having been detained nineteen days at ſea by contrary winds, landed at Lyme in Dorſetſhire on the 11th of June, with about eighty followers, but with arms for a much larger number. Some of his officers diſperſed themſelves about the country, in order, if poſſible, to engage the people to join him. They were ſo ſucceſsful, that in a ſhort ſpace of time the duke's little army was increaſed to near 2000 men. On his firſt landing he publiſhed a manifeſto, in which he declared, that the ſole intention of his coming was to aſſert his natural right, and deliver the nation from the tyranny of the duke of York, whom he accuſed of being the principal author of that dreadful conflagration which laid the capital in aſhes; of the late popiſh plot for aſſaſſinating the king, and ſubverting the proteſtant religion; of the murder of the earl of Eſſex in the Tower; and of having actually impriſoned the king his brother. He repreſented the duke as being incapable, by his religion, of ſwaying the ſcepire of England, which could never hope for peace and ſafety while a papiſt and a tyrant filled the throne.

This declaration, which upon the whole was fuller of invective than ſound reaſoning, produced very little effect in the duke's favour. Few perſons of any diſtinction joined his ſtandard, and the greater part of thoſe who did were a rude, undiſciplined rabble. On his reaching Taunton his army was increaſed to about 5000 men; but inſtead of marching directly to Briſtol, which was in no condition to reſiſt him, he ſpent ſeveral days in making preparations for a ſplendid proceſſion when he was proclaimed king, which was performed on the 18th of June. This ridiculous piece of oſtentation gave James time to aſſemble his forces, which were now in full march againſt him, under the command of the duke of Albemarle.

Monmouth began now to be ſenſible of the raſhneſs of his project; but it was too late to retreat. A ſingle alternative only remained; he muſt either conquer or periſh. A council of war was called, when it was determined to march and meet the royal army, in order to prevent a ſurprize, which muſt have been fatal. When the duke came in ſight of the royaliſts, he found them drawn up in excellent order on Sedgeley-moor near Bridgewater. Early the next morning (July 6) the fight began. Monmouth's horſe, commanded by lord Grey, fled at the firſt charge, owing to the inexperience, cowardice, or treachery of their general. He was himſelf taken priſoner, but readily obtained the king's pardon. The foot ſtood firm, and maintained their ground for a conſiderable time with great reſolution; but being deſerted by the horſe, and expoſed to a moſt dreadful fire from the artillery of the royal army, they at length gave way, and a moſt dreadful carnage enſued. Three hundred were killed upon the ſpot, above 1000 in the purſuit, and as many taken priſoners.

The duke, after uſing every method in his power to retrieve the fortune of the day, and diſplaying the moſt noble efforts of valour, was obliged to have recourſe to flight. His aſſumed ſovereignty vaniſhed like a dream, and all his mighty proſpects diſappeared in an inſtant. He fled, attended only by one ſervant, till his horſe dropped under him with fatigue. This incident obliged him to purſue his way on foot, till he reached a poor cottage, where he changed clothes with the peaſant, and continued his flight till he was wholly ſpent. Reduced to this extremity, he laid himſelf down in a ditch, covered with fern. Unfortunately for him, a party of the king's ſoldiers paſſing the next day by the ſame cottage, one of the officers knew the duke's clothes, in which the countryman was dreſſed. He was immediately ſeized; and to extricate himſelf from danger, pointed out the road the duke had taken; and, after a ſtrict ſearch, he was diſcovered in his hiding place, with his pockets filled with green peas, the only food he had eaten ſince his defeat. He was carried immediately to London, and committed to the Tower.

Monmouth, brave as he was in arms, was not proof againſt this cruel reverſe of fortune. On his arrival in London he wrote to the king, his uncle, in the moſt abject terms, humbly imploring his pardon, and proteſting, by the moſt ſolemn aſſeverations, that if his majeſty would be graciouſly pleaſed to overlook his former errors, he would endeavour, by his future conduct, to render himſelf worthy of ſo great a favour. All theſe ſubmiſſions, however, were of no effect; for James was inexorable. The duke ſued for an interview: James granted it; but it was only with an intent of making his own advantage by it. He thought his wretched priſoner might be induced, through fear of death and hope of pardon, to impeach his accomplices: but no ſuch infamy dwelt in the heart of Monmoth; culpable and miſtaken as he was, he refuſed to purchaſe life at the expence of honour. He reſigned himſelf to his fate; and James, forgetful of the blood from whence he ſprung, and regardleſs of his brother's recommendation of this unhappy youth to his favour, ordered him for immediate execution.

The duke's conduct in his laſt moments proved that his abject behaviour, on his firſt being apprehended, was the mere effect of human nature, oppreſſed by great calamity. He met his death in a manner that became his rank and character. On the 15th of July he was brought to the ſcaffold, attended by the tears of the multitude. He warned the executioner not to fall into the error which he had committed in beheading Ruſſel, where he was obliged to redouble the blow. But this precaution had not the deſired effect, for it ſo intimidated the man, that he could ſtrike only a feeble blow on the neck of Monmouth, who raiſed his head from the block, and looked him in the face as if reproaching him for his failure. He again laid down his head, and the executioner ſtruck him twice, but without effect; on which he threw aſide the axe, and declared himſelf incapable of finiſhing the bloody office. The Sheriff, however, obliged him to renew the attempt; and at two blows more the head was ſevered from the body. Thus died James duke of Monmouth, whoſe character, in many reſpects, was truly amiable: he was brave, gentle, generous, ſincere; but too open to flattery, and too warmly addicted to pleaſure, the effects of his education in a court which was the emporium of debauchery. He was the darling of the people; the conſciouſneſs of which, and the allurement of ambition, had engaged him in enterprizes for which he was of all men the leaſt qualified, and which, in the end, coſt him his life.

The execution of Monmouth was followed by many others of the moſt barbarous nature. The lord chief-juſtice Jefferies (the greateſt tyrant that ever filled the ſeat of juſtice) was ſent into the weſt, to try the unhappy perſons, who had been concerned in the late raſh, and ill-concerted rebellion. Colollel Kirke, a ſoldier of fortune, who had long ſerved at Tangiers, and, from his intercourſe with the Moors, had contracted a diſpoſition more inhuman than any known in Europe, attended him with a body of troops to keep the people in awe. The bare recital of the barbarities committed by theſe two inhuman monſters is ſufficient to fill the reader with horror. Thirty were hanged at one time, as a diverſion to colonel Kirk and his officers while they were at dinner. One execution was attended with ſuch circumſtances of perfidy, as well as barbarity, that its equal cannot, perhaps, be found in the hiſtory of any other country. A young maid, frantic with grief, repaired to the colonel, to implore pardon for her brother. She threw herſelf at his feet, armed with all the charms that beauty and innocence, bathed in tears, could poſſibly beſtow. Fired with luſt, rather than ſoftened by love and clemency, he promiſed to grant her requeſt, provided ſhe, on her part, would condeſcend to ſatisfy his deſires. The ſtruggle was ſevere between virtue and her affection for her brother. The latter at laſt prevailed; ſhe ſubmitted to the conditions; but after paſſing the night with this inhuman ruffian, he ſhewed her next morning, from the window of the apartment, her brother, the darling object for whom ſhe had ſacrificed her virtue, hanging on a gibbet, which he had privately cauſed to be erected for his execution. The ſhock was too great for human nature: rage, deſpair, and indignation, took at once poſſeſſion of her mind, and deprived her for ever of her ſenſes. All the inhabitants of the country, innocent as well as guilty, were expoſed to the ravages of this barbarian. The ſoldiers were ſuffered to live at free quarters; and his own regiment, inſtructed by his example, and encouraged by his exhortations, diſtinguiſhed themſelves in a more particular manner, by their outrages. By way of pleaſantry, he uſed to call them his "Lambs," an appellation long remembered in the weſt of England with horror.

The chief-juſtice Jefferies was equally cruel, and demands a ſevere reprehenſion, becauſe his office ſhould have taught him humanity. Mercy was a ſtranger to his breaſt; few eſcaped with life that were brought before him. He gloried in cruelty, and boaſted of the numbers he had put to death. A lady of the anabaptiſt perſuaſion was burnt for extending her charity to one of the rebels who had implored her aſſiſtance. The wretch ſhe had entertained was pardoned for turning evidence againſt her. Lady Liſle, though herſelf a loyaliſt, and her own ſon a volunteer in the king's army, was beheaded for entertaining a preſbyterian miniſter in Monmouth's party, though he had not been mentioned in the proclamation. The jury were melted into pity, and thrice refuſed to find a verdict againſt her; but at laſt the menaces of the inhuman Jefferies prevailed; and the lady, who was above eighty years of age, ſuffered on a ſcaffold. Father Orleans pretends, that James diſapproved of theſe cruelties, expreſſed his indignation, and repaired the injuſtice to the utmoſt of his power. But this is a proof that bigotry is capable of ſacrificing the moſt obvious truths to the ſupport of its party. James was ſo far from diſapproving the cruel proceedings of Jefferies, that he created him a peer at his return, and rewarded him with the poſt of chancellor.

Beſides the inſtances of cruelty inflicted on the weſtern rebels, a great many more were exerciſed in London, and different parts of the kingdom, on the proteſtant party, under pretence either of their having been concerned in the Rye-houſe plot, or of favouring Monmouth's attempt. Theſe meaſures were equally influenced by revenge, and the favourite deſign of eſtabliſhing popery in theſe kingdoms. This ſcheme had been long ſince formed by James while duke of York; but never openly attempted till now, when being freed from Monmouth's rebellion, the king thought himſelf capable of carrying it ſpeedily into execution. He accordingly began in Ireland, where he diſſolved the privy-council, appointed a new one, and took care that the majority of the members ſhould be papiſts. The proteſtants in that kingdom were every where diſarmed, while means were found to keep on foot a ſtanding army of catholics. Colonel Talbot, afterwards earl of Tyrconnel, by caſhiering ſuch officers and ſoldiers as he thought proper, and filling their places with others, ſoon modelled the army to the purpoſes it was intended to ſerve.

The ſituation of James was at this time as proſperous as any ſovereign could wiſh. He had a ſtanding army at his command: a parliament ready to ſecond him in all his deſires; paſſive obedience and non-reſiſtance were inculcated as articles in the Engliſh creed; while the foreign ſtates were vying with each other in courting the favour of a monarch, who confeſſedly held in his hands the balance of Europe. But James wanted prudence to take the advantage that now offered. Inſtead of inſpiring him with a conduct ſuitable to the ſtation he filled among the princes on the continent, which would not in the leaſt have impaired his power, it ſerved only to intoxicate him.

Perſuaded he had no longer any occaſion for diſguiſing his ſentiments, or ſuffering any reſtraint on his actions, James began to diſcover his deſigns in a manner too plain to be miſtaken. He opened the ſeſſion of parliament on the ninth day of November, with a ſpeech, in which, after congratulating them on the happy ſuppreſſion of the late rebellion, he obſerved, that the great reinforcements the rebels had received before they were quelled, had been entirely owing to the want of a regular force to diſperſe them at the firſt breaking out of the inſurrection. He added, that the houſe muſt be ſenſible the militia was very inſufficient for the defence of the kingdom in ſuch exigencies, and, therefore, plainly told them, that he was determined to ſupport the regular troops he had raiſed, amounting to fifteen thouſand men, and demanded a ſupply for their maintenance. At the ſame time he deſired the parliament not to take exception at his having admitted ſome catholic officers into the army, and diſpenſed with the teſt act in their favour. "They are, continued he, well known, "and have ſerved me faithfully during the late commotions: and I will deal plainly with you; having "received the benefit of their ſervices at a time of "ſo much danger, I will neither expoſe them to diſgrace, nor myſelf to the want of them."

The members of this parliament had, ever ſince their election, ſhewn the greateſt approbation of paſſive obedience and non-reſiſtance, and given very ſignal proofs of their attachment to the king's perſon. They had increaſed his annual revenues, rendered them perpetual, and, during the rebellion, granted him ſupplies greater than he could have aſked. Could it therefore be ſuſpected, that ſo complying a parliament would have made any difficulty in ſetting aſide ſo trifling a law as the teſt-act? James was perſuaded they would not; but he was miſtaken. This complaiſant, this ſubmiſſive parliament, ſtill remembered, that there was ſuch a thing as liberty entailed on the people of this happy land; and that they were the ſworn conſervators of that ineſtimable treaſure in behalf of the people. They would have gone any decent lengths rather than come to a rupture with the king, or incur his diſpleaſure: but this open declaration on his part to govern without the laws, and even to act repugnant to them, rouſed them from their lethargy; and ſome who had been the warmeſt oppoſers of the excluſion bill, began to be alarmed at the large ſtrides the king had made towards eſtabliſhing arbitrary power. The motion for an addreſs of thanks to the king for his ſpeech met with great oppoſition in the houſe of lords; and though it paſſed by a ſmall majority, the houſe reſolved to take the ſpeech into further conſideration. But it was different in the houſe of commons; for when lord Middleton, ſecretary of ſtate, made a motion for thanking the king for his ſpeech from the hrone, ſeveral of the members refuſed it; and a motion being made for an addreſs to the king againſt employing popiſh officers in the army, contrary to he known laws of the land, it was carried in the ffirmative, and the addreſs was accordingly pre-nted.

James was ſo highly offended at this liberty taken y the commons, that he ſent them a very ſharp reprimand; and abſolutely told them that he was fixed n his reſolution both with regard to keeping up a nding army, and employing catholic officers. Terrified by this haughty meſſage, the commons connted to indemnify the officers already employed; d to paſs a new act for qualifying a certain number whom the king ſhould name. But ſo imperious was James's temper, ſo lofty the idea he had entertained of his own authority, ſo violent the ſchemes ſuggeſted by his own bigotry and that of his prieſts, that, without any delay, or waiting for any farther provocation, he immediately prorogued the parliament; and a ſhort time after diſſolved that aſſembly.

A. D. 1686. Theſe arbitrary proceedings of the king ſtruck the whole nation with terror. The church, which had hitherto ſupported the monarchy, was terribly alarmed, and even the army, by whoſe aſſiſtance alone he could now propoſe to govern, were highly diſguſted. The former horror againſt popery was revived by polemical books and ſermons; and in every diſpute the victory ſeemed to be gained by the proteſtant divines, who conducted the argument with more learning and eloquence.

During theſe diſputes an incident happened that diſplayed popery in all its terrors. After Lewis XIV. had long moleſted and harraſſed the proteſtants, he at laſt entirely revoked the edict of Nantz, which had been enacted by Henry IV. for ſecuring them the exerciſe of their religion, and which had been declared irrevocable. All the cruelties inſeparable from perſecution were practiſed on theſe religioniſts, who became obſtinate in proportion to the oppreſſions they ſuffered; and either covered, under a feigned converſion, a more violent abhorrence of the catholic communion, or ſought in foreign nations that liberty they were denied in their native country. About half a million of the moſt uſeful and induſtrious ſubjects deſerted France, and exported, together with immenſe ſums of money, thoſe arts and manufactures which had chiefly tended to enrich that kingdom. They propagated every where the moſt tragical accounts of the tyranny exerciſed againſt them, and revived among the proteſtants all thoſe ſentiments of the bloody and perſecuting ſpirit of popery, to which experience in all ages had given too much foundation. Near fifty thouſand refugees paſſed over into England, and all men were diſpoſed, from their repreſentations, to imbibe the utmoſt horror againſt the projects which they apprehended were entertained by the king againſt the proteſtant religion.

When a man of ſo much humanity and ſignal prudence as Lewis could be engaged by the bigotry of his religion alone, without any provocation, to embrace ſuch ſanguinary and impolitic meaſures, it was aſked, what might be dreaded from James, who was ſo much his inferior in thoſe virtues, and had already been ſo highly exaſperated by ſuch violent oppoſition. It was in vain that the king ſeemed to blame the perſecutions of France; in vain he afforded the moſt extenſive protection and aſſiſtance to the diſtreſſed hugonots: all theſe ſymptoms of toleration were regarded as fallacious, and entirely oppoſite to the avowed principles of his ſect, and belied by his ſevere adminiſtration in Scotland againſt the non-conformiſts.

But neither his own promiſes, the complaints of his ſubjects, nor even the remonſtrances of ſome of the moſt ſenſible and prudent of his popiſh counſellors, could divert James from the purſuit of his darling purpoſe, the eſtabliſhment of the Romiſh religion in theſe kingdoms. Deaf to all reaſonable and ſober advice, he liſtened only to the dictates of his own ſuperſtition: and finding himſelf deſerted by the church party, he affected to careſs the preſbyterians.

Accordingly, he ſent his declaration into Scotland, ſuſpending by virtue of his ſovereign authority, prerogative royal, and abſolute power, all oaths, &c. impoſed upon non-conformiſts, who profeſſed the chriſtian religion. In this declaration he permitted the moderate preſbyterians to meet in their private houſes houſes only; but forbad all field conventicles under the ſevereſt penalties. He permitted the quakers to meet according to their form, in any place appointed for their worſhip. At the ſame time, the catholics were declared to be relieved from the penalties inflicted by any act of parliament made againſt thoſe of their faith. In this declaration the king likewiſe reiterated his promiſes made for maintaining the proteſtant religion, as by law eſtabliſhed, and its biſhops and regular clergy in the full enjoyment of their rights, liberties, and privileges.

Soon after this a ſimilar declaration was publiſhed for liberty of conſcience in England. It is not ſurpriſing that the ſeveral ſects of proteſtant diſſenters ſhould at firſt conſider theſe declarations as inſtances of great indulgence in the crown for the eaſe of tender conſciences. Accordingly, addreſſes from all parts of the kingdom were ſent to his majeſty, filled with the moſt fulſome flattery. They even exalted the royal power beyond all bounds; eſpecially the addreſſes preſented by the preſbyterians, who had firſt ſet the example, in the reign of Charles I. to the reſt of the nation, for preſcribing the ſtricteſt limits to the royal authority. Human nature is always the ſame. The diſſenters thought themſelves unkindly uſed by that monarch; they thought that James treated them like a tender parent, but they ſoon diſcovered that this act of the king was nothing more than a ſnare laid for extirpating the whole proteſtant intereſt in the kingdom: and therefore readily joined with the church of England in oppoſing the deſtructive doctines of paſſive obedience and nonreſiſtance.

A. D. 1687. James, finding the non-conformiſts were no longer to be deluded by his promiſes, determined to purſue openly the reſolution he had formed with regard to the eſtabliſhing the popiſh religion. Accordingly he ſent the earl of Caſtlemaine ambaſſador extraordinary to Rome, in order to expreſs his obedience to the pope; and to reconcile his kingdom to the catholic communion. Never man, employed on ſo important an errand, met with ſo many neglects, and even affronts, as Caſtlemaine. The pope, inſtead of being pleaſed with this precipitate ſtep, concluded, that a ſcheme, conducted with ſuch indiſcretion, could never be ſucceſsful; and being then engaged in a violent quarrel with the French monarch, a quarrel which intereſted him much more than the converſion of England, he had little regard for James, whom he conſidered as too cloſely connected with his capital enemy.

The king, therefore, received only one proof of complaiſance from his holineſs; that of ſending a nuncio into England, in return for the embaſſy. Every communication with the pope was, by act of parliament (that aſſembly not being at this time diſſolved) declared high-treaſon: yet ſo little regard did the king pay to the laws, that he gave the nuncio a public and ſolemn reception at Windſor. The duke of Somerſet, one of the lords of the bedchamber, was diſmiſſed from his employment, for refuſing to aſſiſt at this ceremony. The nuncio reſided publicly in London during the remainder of this reign. Four catholic biſhops were conſecrated in the king's chapel, and ſent out, under the title of vicars apoſtolical to exerciſe the epiſcopal functions in their reſpective dioceſes. Their paſtoral letters, directed to the lay catholics of England, were printed and publiſhed by the expreſs allowance and permiſſion of the king. The regular clergy of that communion appeared at court in the habits of their reſpective orders; and ſome of them were even ſo indiſcreet as to boaſt, they hoped, in a little time, to walk in proceſſion through the capital.

In the mean time the whole power in Ireland had been committed to the catholics. In Scotland all the miniſters, in whom the king placed any confidence, were converts to that religion. Every great office in England, civil or military, was gradually transferred from the proteſtants. Rocheſter and Clarendon, the king's brothers-in-law, though they had always been very faithful to his intereſt, could not, with all their ſervices, atone for their adherence to the proteſtant religion, and had accordingly been diſmiſſed from their employments: even the inhuman Jefferies himſelf, though he had proſtituted honour, juſtice and humanity to the arbitrary ſchemes of the court, declined every day in the king's favour, becauſe he refuſed to abandon his own religion.*

The only matter that now ſeemed wanting was, to procure admittance for the catholics into the churches and univerſities. James determined to uſe his utmoſt efforts to gain theſe points; by which he loſt every friend and adherent among the proteſtants. The firſt attempt was made on the univerſity of Cambridge; but that proving abortive, a ſecond was made at Oxford, and proſecuted with more inflexible obſtinacy. This univerſity had lately, in a famous decree, made a ſolemn profeſſion of paſſive obedience; and thence the court probably ſuſpected that they would ſhew their ſincerity, when their turn came to practice that doctrine. The principal of Magdalen college, one of the richeſt foundations in Europe, dying about this time, a mandate was ſent in favour of Farmer, a new convert, but one who, beſides his being a catholic, had not in other reſpects the qualities required by the ſtatutes for enjoying that office. The fellows of the college made very ſubmiſſive applications to the king for recalling his mandate; but before they received any anſwer, the day came on in which they were required by the ſtatutes to proceed to the election. They therefore choſe doctor Hough, a man of virtue, and alſo endued with that firmneſs and vigour ſo neceſſary for maintaining his own rights, and thoſe of the univerſity in this critical conjuncture. In order to puniſh the college for this act of contumacy, an eccleſiaſtical commiſſion was ſent down to Oxford, and the new preſident and fellows cited before that court. So very little regard had been paid to any other conſideration, except that of religion, that Farmer, on enquiry, was found guilty of the meaneſt and moſt ſcandalous vices; ſo that even the eccleſiaſtical commiſſioners were aſhamed to inſiſt on his election. A new mandate was therefore iſſued in favour of Parker, lately created biſhop of Oxford, a man of a proſtitute character, but who, like Farmer, had atoned for all his vices, by his declared willingneſs to embrace the catholic religion. Th college repreſented, that all preſidents had ever been appointed by elections, and there were even very few inſtances of the king's interpoſing in favour of any candidate: that having already made a regular election of a preſident, they could not, during his lif deprive him of his office, and ſubſtitute another i his place: that even if there was a vacancy, Parke by the ſtatutes of their founder, could not be choſen that they had all of them bound themſelves by oath to obſerve theſe ſtatutes, and never on any account to accept of a diſpenſation. They added, that Magdalen college had at all times diſtinguiſhed itſelf ſo much by its loyalty, that nothing but the moſt invincible neceſſity could now oblige them to oppoſe his majeſty's inclinations. Theſe reaſons availed them nothing. The preſident and all the fellows, except two, who complied, were expelled the college, Parker was put in poſſeſſion of the office, and the places of the deprived fellows were filled by papiſts.

* So biggotted was James to his favourite religion, that he even condeſcended to exhort Kirk to become a convert. The barbarian told him, that he would have been extremely willing to gratify his majeſty in this particular, but that he was unhappily pre-engaged, having already given his promiſe to the king of Morocco, that, if ever he changed his religion, he would tu Muſſelman.

James having now ſufficiently convinced the nation that he intended to reduce it to the moſt abject ſtate of ſubmiſſion, bitter reflections, pathetic remonſtrances, and loud complaints againſt the court, filled every mouth, and made the ſubject of almoſt every publication. The king was not inſenſible of the great popularity poſſeſſed by the prince of Orange in England, and that the princeſs his conſort was looked upon as preſumptive heir to the crown: he was therefore very deſirous of knowing their opinion concerning the penal laws and teſt, flattering himſelf, if he could procure their concurrence to a repeal, it would have great weight with the nation. By order of the king, one Mr. Stuart wrote to Fagel, the penſionary of Amſterdam, to ſound the prince and princeſs on this ſubject. Their anſwer was very diſagreeable to the court; notwithſtanding which it was confidently aſſerted that they had both declared their approbation of the repeal. Being informed of this report, their highneſſes ordered Fagel to draw up a letter to the court of England, which might contradict it, and inform the world of their true opinions. In this letter the penſionary declared, "That, although their royal highneſſes were for a full liberty of conſcience, and wiſhed not that any one ſhould be perſecuted or puniſhed for differing from the eſtabliſhed religion; yet they could by no means conſent to the repeal of the teſt and the other penal laws, which tended to the ſecurity of the proteſtant religion, eſpecially as thoſe laws could not be ſaid to carry in them any ſeverity againſt the Roman catholics on account of their conſciences, being only proviſions for qualifying perſons for a ſeat in parliament, or the enjoyment of public offices." The publication of this letter produced very different effects in the king, and the nation: to the former it gave the ſevereſt mortification, but to the latter it afforded the higheſt ſatisfaction.

A. D. 1688. On the 2d of January a proclamation was publiſhed, declaring the queen to be pregnant, and ordering a thankſgiving for ſo happy an event. The extravagant joy of the papiſts on this occaſion, and the ſanguine expreſſions of the jeſuits, (who aſſerted this conception was miraculous, and that the queen would certainly have a prince) induced the generality of the proteſtants to entertain ſuſpicions of this pregnancy, as a ſcheme of the papiſts to eſtabliſh their religion in England, by impoſing an heir on the kingdom; and from this time they ſeem to have baniſhed their forbearing principles, and to have taken up a reſolution of oppoſing the baleful deſigns of the king and his miniſtry.

Deſirous of confirming his deſpotic power, and inflamed by frantic zeal, James, on his ſide, ſeemed determined no longer to keep any meaſures with his ſubjects. On the 27th of April he publiſhed a ſecond declaration of indulgence, almoſt in the ſame terms with the former; and he ſubjoined an order, that, immediately after divine ſervice, it ſhould be read by the clergy in all the churches. This was a manifeſt inſult upon the miniſters of the eſtabliſhed religion; and could only be done to drive them to extremities, and then to take advantage of their non-compliance with the royal mandate. Some few of the biſhops obeyed, but the far greater number refuſed to read it. Lloyd, biſhop of St. Aſaph; Ken, of Bath and Wells; Turner, of Ely; Lake, of Cheſter; White, of Peterborough; and Trelawny, of Briſtol, met privately at the archbiſhop of Canterbury's palace, and concerted the form of a petition to the king: wherein they, in few words, repreſented, that, though poſſeſſed of the higheſt ſenſe of loyalty, a virtue of which the church of England had given ſuch eminent teſtimonies; though deſirous of affording eaſe in a legal way to all proteſtant diſſenters; yet, becauſe the declaration of indulgence was founded on a prerogative, formerly declared illegal by parliament, they could not, in prudence, honour, or conſcience, ſo far make themſelves parties as the diſtribution of it all over the kingdom would be interpreted to amount to. For which reaſon they beſought his majeſty not to inſiſt upon their reading the declaration.

The biſhops, headed by Sancroft the primate, preſented this petition to the king in the moſt humble and ſupplicating manner. But James, ever haughty and impatient of controul, diſmiſſed them from his preſence with telling them, that if they had forgot he was the ſupreme head of the church, he knew how to make himſelf acknowledged as ſuch. As the petition was delivered him in private, he ſummoned them before the council; and there queſtioned them whether they would acknowledge it. The biſhops ſaw his intention, and ſeemed long deſirous to decline anſwering; but being puſhed by Jefferies the chancellor, the archbiſhop of Canterbury at laſt acknowledged that it had been written by him, and the reſt declared they had ſigned it. Jefferies then aſked them if they would give bail to appear in the court of King's-bench, and anſwer to the charge which ſhould be brought againſt them for this libel. They replied, no: that their privileges as peers exempted them from the neceſſity of giving ſecurity, on being charged with a miſdemeanor; and that they were bound by oath to maintain the rights of the peerage as well as the rights of the church. Jefferies, enraged at this anſwer, told them, that unleſs they inſtantly retracted their aſſertions, and withdrew their petition, he would ſend them to the Tower. They anſwered, "That they ſubmitted to his majeſty's pleaſure, whatever it ſhould be; that their own conſciences told them they had acted nothing but what was agreeable to the laws, and the ſacred character with which they were inveſted; and that they depended on the king of kings to be their protector." A warrant was immediately iſſued for committing them to the Tower; and the crown lawyers received directions to proſecute them for a ſeditious libel.

All ranks of people were ſeized with aſtoniſhment, when they found theſe fathers of the church, theſe noble oppoſers of tyranny and oppreſſion, were to be dragged away to confinement. The court had ordered that they ſhould be conveyed from Whitehall to the Tower by water, in as private a manner as poſſible. But the alarm was ſoon ſpread, and the ſhore lined with innumerable ſpectators, who deplored the fate of theſe good prelates, and on their knees intreated their bleſſing. The conduct of the biſhops on this occaſion increaſed the love their ſufferings had begun; they checked the tranſports of the multitude, and exhorted them to fear God, honour the king, and maintain their loyalty. Even the ſoldiers, moved by the ſympathy of example, flung themſelves on their knees, craved the benediction of theſe criminals, whom they were appointed to guard, and expreſſed themſelves in the bittereſt terms of reſentment againſt their proſecutors.

Their trial came on in the Court of King's-Bench on the 29th of June. They were attended to Weſtminſter-minſter-hall by an infinite crowd of people, among whom were twenty-nine temporal peers, and numbers of the principal gentry. The lawyers for the priſoners were, Sir Robert Sayer, Sir Francis Pemberton, Pollexfen, Treby, and Sommers. They pleaded that the law allowed ſubjects, when aggrieved, to addreſs themſelves by petition to the king: that an active obedience, in caſes which were contrary to conſcience, was never pretended to be due to government; and law was allowed to be the great meaſure of the compliance and ſubmiſſion of ſubjects: that when commands were impoſed on a perſon, which he could not obey, it was more reſpectful to offer to the prince his reaſons for refuſal, than to remain in an obſtinate and refractory ſilence: that it was no breach of duty in ſubjects, even though not expreſsly called upon, to diſcover their ſenſe of public meaſures, in which every one had ſo much concern: that, in the preſent caſe, the biſhops were called upon, and muſt either expreſs their approbation by compliance, or their diſapprobation by petition: that it could be no ſedition to deny the prerogative of ſuſpending the laws, becauſe there was really no ſuch prerogative, nor ever could be, in a legal and limited government: that even if this prerogative was real, it had been frequently diſputed before the whole nation, in Weſtminſter-hall and in both houſes of parliament; and no one had ever thought of puniſhing the denial of it as criminal: that the prelates, inſtead of making an appeal to the people, had applied in private to his majeſty, and had even delivered their petition ſo ſecretly, that, except by the confeſſion extorted from them before the council, it was found impoſſible to prove them the authors: and that though the petition was afterwards printed and diſperſed, it was not ſo much as attempted to be proved, that they had the leaſt knowledge of that publication.

Though theſe arguments were received with approbation by the audience, and even ſome of the judges declared themſelves in favour of the priſoners, yet the jury took ſeveral hours to deliberate; during which the people were in the moſt anxious expectation. But when they at laſt brought in their verdict "Not guilty," the hall reſounded with ſhouts of joy. The happy news was inſtantly communicated to every part of the city, and from thence diſperſed with infinite joy throughout the kingdom. It happened that the king had that day reviewed his army, and was juſt retired into the general's tent, when the news of the biſhops acquittal reached the camp; on which the the whole army gave a loud ſhout, attended with the moſt extravagant ſymptoms of joy. The king enquiring, with ſome degree of aſtoniſhment, into the cauſe, lord Feverſham anſwered, "It is nothing but the rejoicing of the ſoldiers for the acquittal of the biſhops." "Do you call that nothing (replied the king) but ſo much the worſe for them."

As James had fixed his chief dependence on the ſubmiſſion of the army to his will, he was greatly alarmed at this incident; and determined to be ſatisfied how far he might depend upon the aſſiſtance of his forces. He accordingly ordered lord Litchfield's regiment to be drawn up, and appeared himſelf at their head. After walking for ſome time between the ranks, and commending their appearance, he gave orders that all the officers and ſoldiers who would not conſent to the repeal of the teſt and penal laws, ſhould lay down their arms: but his aſtoniſhment may be better conceived than expreſſed, when he ſaw the whole regiment, captains and a few popiſh ſoldiers only excepted, lay down their firelocks. He ſtood ſpeechleſs for ſome minutes, and then, with a ſullen air, bid them take up their arms, adding, "that for the future he would not do them the honour of aſking their advice."

A few days before the acquittal of the biſhops, the queen was (or ſuppoſed to be) delivered of a ſon, afterwards baptized by the name of James. This event, which inſpired the catholics with joy, was publiſhed by a proclamation; and a general thankſgiving was ordered to be obſerved throughout the kingdom. The people in general, were, however, poſſeſſed with a notion, that this was only a ſuppoſititious child, in order to cut off the princeſs of Orange from the ſucceſſion; and what tended to confirm them in this opinion were ſeveral myſterious circumſtances, both with regard to the pregnancy and delivery of the queen. At the ſame time, the proceedings of the court were ſo prepoſterous, that they rather augmented than removed the ſuſpicions of the populace. At the time of the queen's delivery, the princeſs of Denmark was at Bath, whither ſhe had retired a few weeks before, at the earneſt intreaty, if not by the command, of her father. The archbiſhop of Canterbury was in the Tower; and the Dutch ambaſſador, who ſhould have been preſent at the labour, in behalf of the prince and princeſs of Orange, was not called. In ſhort, the birth of this child, which, according to the common rule of things, ought to have proved the bond of union between James and his people, had the very contrary effect. Both parties, proteſtants and catholics, laboured under ſuch violent prejudices at this time, as could not fail of influencing their judgments. It is therefore no wonder if the latter ſtrenuouſly aſſerted the legitimacy of the child; and the former inſiſted that the whole was a deception.

The people were now fully convinced, that James was abſolutely determined to ſubvert the conſtitution both in church and ſtate; and therefore thought it high time to form a ſcheme for preventing the deſtruction of their laws, religion and liberties. Accordingly, many perſons of eminence and intereſt, both clergy as well as laity, who had gone very great lengths in ſupport of the royal authority, thought it more prudent to retract their doctrine of paſſive obedience and non-reſiſtance, than bring their country to the brink of ruin by an obſtinate adherence to it. At the ſame time, they entered into a ſtrict union with the non-conformiſts for their mutual ſecurity, and for inviting over the prince of Orange, in order to his heading the country party againſt the king. The prince no ſooner received an intimation of this diſpoſition in the Engliſh, to free themſelves from the yoke of his father-in-law's government, than he took every prudent precaution to render it ſucceſsful. He had ſent over Zuyleſtein, one of the gentlemen of his bed-chamber, to congratulate James on the birth of his ſon. This miniſter had orders to diſcover the real ſentiments of ſome of the greateſt perſons in the kingdom, with regard to this dangerous undertaking. Zuyleſtein ſoon informed his maſter that every thing appeared extremely favourable to his views: that the whole nation was ready to riſe, and wanted nothing more than a chief to head them. Several of the nobility going abroad, on various pretences, waited on the prince at the Hague, and confirmed this intelligence. As an uninterrupted correſpondence was carried on between England and Holland, a mutual intercourſe was ſupported between the Engliſh proteſtants; and by letters and meſſages that plan of operations was concerted, which at laſt delivered this nation from papal tyranny.

The ſituation of affairs in Europe was alſo very favourable to this deſign. The manifeſt partiality of James in favour of the ambitious ſchemes of Lewis XIV. had alarmed not only the proteſtants, but alſo the Roman catholic powers, who dreaded nothing more than a coalition between the courts of England and France. They ſaw no hopes of ſafety for themſelves but by a revolution in that kingdom. Innocent XI. known by the name of the proteſtant pope, on account of the wiſe diſregard he paid to the attempts of James to introduce popery into England, was far from being averſe to the intended reformation in the Engliſh government. The deſign was, however, managed with great ſecrecy both at London and at the Hague. But, when it came to be known, was approved by the whole nation; and even by all the courts of Europe, that of France only excepted. The prince of Orange, however, refuſed to engage in this ſcheme, till he had received a formal invitation from ſuch perſons, whom he knew had every thing to fear from a miſcarriage of their enterprize. This invitation was ſoon procured, and ſent by Zuyleſtein on his return from his embaſſy; when the prince readily accepted of the offer made him, to undertake the defence of the nation, againſt the machinations of James, and the catholic party.

No ſooner was this invitation diſpatched, than the leaders of the party diſperſed themſelves in the different counties, in order to gain the populace over to their intereſt, and, by aggravating the meaſures of the court, to ſpirit them up to a general revolt. In the mean time the prince of Orange conducted the neceſſary preparations with wonderful prudence and policy. Under pretence of interfering in the diſpute then ſubſiſting between prince Clement of Bavaria, and the cardinal of Furſtemberg, with regard to the election of an archbiſhop of Cologn, he collected an army of 9000 men, and ordered them to encamp near Nimeguen; a fleet of 50 ſail of men of war, and a ſufficient number of tranſports, were by degrees aſſembled in the Dutch harbours, waiting only for orders to take on board the troops deſigned for England. Theſe meaſures were conducted with a circumſpection and addreſs, which ſufficiently diſplayed the great capacity and abilities of the prince of Orange, who could conceal the intention of theſe powerful preparations under ſuch pretenſions as prevented the Engliſh court from ſuſpecting their true deſtination. He was, indeed, greatly indebted to the complaiſance of the ſtates, who, on this occaſion, heartily concurred with him in all his meaſures.

After the prince had determined to put himſelf at the head of the proteſtant party, he deſired the Engliſh lords at the Hague to demand the aſſiſtance of the ſtates, in the name of the whole kingdom. Little perſuaſion was neceſſary to induce the ſtates to grant their requeſt. They were indeed equally concerned with the Engliſh themſelves, as the deſtruction of Holland muſt doubtleſs have ſoon followed the ſlavery of England. Nor was it Holland alone that countenanced the prince's enterprize: many of the neighbouring princes promiſed their aſſiſtance; the electors of Brandenburg and Saxony, the landgrave of Heſſe Caſſel, and the whole houſe of Lunenburg, agreed to unite their forces, and protect the united provinces, during the abſence of their Stadtholder.

James did not, for ſome time, ſuſpect that his ſon-in-law had formed any deſign againſt him, or that the forces that prince had aſſembled were deſtined for invading England. Lewis, however, having received intelligence from the count d'Avaux, his ambaſſador at the Hague, of what was likely to be the event of theſe powerful preparations, tranſmitted it to James, and, at the ſame time, made him an offer of any number of troops he might think neceſſary for his defence: or, that he would immediately ſend over 15,000 men, provided James would put Portſmouth into their hands, in order to preſerve a free communication with France. Theſe offers were laid before the council; but the earl of Sunderland, who was prime miniſter, and not without reaſon ſuppoſed to have already entered into a private correſpondence with the prince of Orange, ſtrenuouſly oppoſed their being accepted. He alledged, in ſupport of his opinion, that a ſmall body of foreign troops would be diſadvantageous, as they muſt excite the murmurs of the people, without being able to keep them in ſubjection. He added, that the Engliſh ſoldiers were ſo naturally averſe to act in conſort with foreigners, that they would take every opportunity that offered to deſert. On the other hand, he obſerved it would require no leſs than 40,000 men to quell the diſcontented part of the nation: that ſuch an army would naturally receive all its orders from the court of France; and that while theſe foreign forces kept the Engliſh in awe, the ſtate of the king himſelf would be reduced to little leſs than that of a viceroy to the French monarch.

Theſe arguments, though dictated by perfidy, carried with them the appearance of ſound argument. The council ſubſcribed to the miniſter's opinion; and James refuſed, though with many expreſſions of gratitude, this important offer.

Lewis was ſtill unwilling to abandon his friend and ally, in whoſe welfare he conſidered himſelf as deeply intereſted. He therefore ſent orders to d'Avaux, to remonſtrate with the ſtates in his name, againſt the preparations they were making for a deſcent upon England. "The ſtrict friendſhip and alliance, ſaid "d'Avaux, ſubſiſting between the two nations, will "induce my maſter to conſider every attempt againſt "his ally as an act of hoſtility againſt himſelf." But this remonſtrance was ſo far from intimidating, that it ſerved only to incenſe the ſtates. They demanded, with great firmneſs, what was the purport of the late alliance between France and England, which had been concluded with ſo much ſecrecy? Whether it was of the ſame nature with the former, intended for the deſtruction of the proteſtant religion? If it was, it behoved them to provide inſtantly for their ſafety; and to render abortive thoſe projects that had been formed againſt them.

The king himſelf was highly provoked with Lewis for taking this raſh ſtep, and finding he had been adviſed to it by Skelton, the Engliſh envoy at the Hague, he immediately recalled that miniſter, and committed him to the Tower; diſclaiming publicly, at the ſame time, all alliance with France; and his having any knowledge of the remonſtrance. Whatever truth there might be in this aſſertion, neither the ſtates nor his own ſubjects gave the leaſt credit to it. The Engliſh in particular were more than ever incenſed againſt their ſovereign, whom they firmly believed had entered into a ſcheme with the French king for reducing them to abſolute ſlavery, and rendering himſelf arbitrary.

While James was diſtracted with fear and apprehenſions, he received certain advice of the prince of Orange's deſigns, and that he might ſoon expect to ſee the Dutch fleet upon the coaſt, with a land army on board, accompanied with many Engliſh noblemen and perſons of diſtinction, who had for ſome time concealed themſelves in Holland. Terrified at this intelligence, neither James nor his council could form any plauſible ſcheme for oppoſing this invaſion. The proteſtants, who compoſed the bulk of the nation, were known to conſider themſelves as victims devoted to deſtruction; and therefore would naturally join the prince in their own defence. It was even more than probable, that he was coming over on their expreſs invitation. Both the Engliſh fleet and land forces had already diſcovered their little inclination to ſupport the king in his deſigns: or rather their reſolution to oppoſe him to the utmoſt of their power.

James determined in this alarming exigency to place his dependence on the church of England, and by revoking ſeveral of his late unpopular edicts, to endeavour to retrieve the good-will and affections of his ſubjects. Accordingly, after conſulting the biſhops then in London, he aboliſhed the commiſſion for eccleſiaſtical affairs; took off the biſhop of London's ſuſpenſion; reſtored the charter of the city; removed the popiſh magiſtrates, and filled their poſts with proteſtants in their room, and took ſome other ſteps towards the redreſs of grievances. But theſe popular meaſures failed of producing the deſired effect: they came too late, and were generally conſidered as the reſult of fear, rather than that of inclination, or a real change of ſentiment. James ſeems alſo to have been at ſome pains to confirm his people in this opinion: for in the midſt of all his preſent diſtreſſes, he could not, at the baptiſm of the young prince, forbear requeſting the pope to be one of the godfathers, a ſtep which naturally rendered all his other proceedings ſuſpected.

The prince of Orange during theſe tranſactions applied himſelf, with the greateſt aſſiduity, to compleat his armament, and as ſoon as every thing was finiſhed, he publiſhed a manifeſto, explaining the true motives for his expedition. Copies of this declaration were ſent over to England, and carefully diſperſed through every part of the nation. He ſolemnly diſclaimed all thoughts of conqueſt, or of giving his father-in-law any diſturbance in the enjoyment of his ſovereignty; declaring that his ſole intention was nothing more than that of maintaining the proteſtant religion, the laws and liberties of theſe kingdoms, which had been ſo openly violated; and the procuring a free and general parliament, which might at once ſettle all the rights of the ſubject, and the prerogatives of the crown on a firm and permanent baſis. He added, that he had undertaken this neceſſary and difficult taſk at the invitation of many lords both eccleſiaſtical and civil, by numbers of gentlemen, and other ſubjects of all ranks in theſe realms.

The prince's meaſures were all ſo well concerted, that in three days above four hundred tranſports were hired; and the army being embarked, quickly fell down the rivers and canals from Nimeguen. The artillery, arms, ſtores, and horſes were embarked; and the prince ſailed from Helvoet Sluys, with a fleet of near 500 veſſels, and an army of 14,000 men. After ſailing about 14 leagues, the wind ſhifted to the weſt, and blew ſo violent a ſtorm, that, in a very few hours, ſcarce three ſhips were to be ſeen together. But this loſs being ſoon repaired, the fleet put again to ſea, under the command of Admiral Herbert, and ſtood away with a fair wind towards the weſt of England. The ſame wind which favoured the Dutch detained the king's fleet, in the river and gave the prince an opportunity of paſſing the ſtreights of Dover without moleſtation. Both ſhores were covered with multitudes of people, who, beſides admiring the grandeur of the ſpectacle, were held in anxious ſuſpence at the proſpect of an enterprize, the moſt important that had for ſome years been undertaken in this part of the world.

After a proſperous voyage the prince landed his army ſafely in Torbay, on the 5th of November, the anniverſary of the gunpowder treaſon. The Dutch army marched immediately to Exeter, and there the prince's declaration was publiſhed. But the whole county was ſo terrified at the dreadful executions that had enſued on Monmouth's rebellion, that nobody for ſeveral days joined the prince. The biſhop of Exeter fled with the utmoſt precipitation to London, and carried to court the firſt intelligence of this invaſion. The king was ſo pleaſed with this inſtance of zeal, that he rewarded the prelate with the archbiſhopric of York, which had been long kept vacant, with an intention of beſtowing it on ſome catholic.

Major Barrington was the firſt perſon who joined the prince, and his example was ſoon followed by the gentry of the counties of Devon and Somerſet. Sir Edward Seymour made propoſals for an aſſociation, which every one ſigned. By degrees, the earl of Abingdon, Mr. Ruſſel, ſon to the earl of Bedford, Meſſrs. Wharton, Godfrey, and Howe, came to Exeter: the whole kingdom was in commotion. Lord Delamere took up arms in Cheſhire; the earl of Danby ſeized York; the earl of Bath, governor of Plymouth, declared for the prince; and the earl of Devonſhire made a like declaration in Derby. The nobility and gentry of Nottingham embraced the ſame cauſe; and every day diſcovered ſome effect of that univerſal combination, into which the kingdom had entered againſt the meaſures of James. Even thoſe who did not take the field againſt him were able to embarraſs and confound his councils. A petition for a free parliament was ſigned by 24 biſhops and peers of the greateſt diſtinction, and preſented to the king; who returned for anſwer, that there was nothing he more earneſtly deſired than a free parliament, and that the moment the prince of Orange had quitted the kingdom, he would grant their requeſt with the greateſt diſpatch; but could not think of ſummoning that aſſembly while an enemy continued in the heart of the kingdom, and could command ſo many members to be returned. But the moſt alarming ſymptom was, the diſaffection, which, from the general ſpirit of the people, not from any particular reaſon, had crept into the army. The officers all ſeemed to prefer the intereſt of their country and of their religion, before thoſe principles of honour and fidelity, which are eſteemed the moſt ſacred ties by men of that profeſſion. Lord Colcheſter, ſon to the earl of Rivers, was the firſt officer who deſerted to the prince; but he was followed only by a few of his troops. Lord Loveleſs made a like effort, but was intercepted by the militia under the duke of Beaufort, and taken priſoner. Lord Cornbury, ſon to the earl of Clarendon, was more ſucceſsful: he attempted to carry over three regiments of cavalry, and actually brought a very conſiderable part of them to the prince's quarters. Several officers of diſtinction informed Feverſham their general, that they could not in conſcience fight againſt the prince of Orange, who came to defend the proteſtant cauſe.

Among others lord Churchill, afterwards the famous duke of Marlborough, had been raiſed from the rank of a page; inveſted with a high command in the army; created a peer, and owed his whole fortune to the king's bounty. Yet even this perſon could reſolve, during the preſent extremity, to deſert his unfortunate maſter, who had always repoſed unlimited confidence in him. He carried with him the duke of Grafton, natural ſon to the late king, colonel Berkley, and ſome troops of dragoons. This conduct was a ſignal ſacrifice of every duty in private life, to the happineſs of his country.

The king received this fatal news on his arrival at Saliſbury, the head quarters of his army. James, though a ſevere enemy, had always appeared a warm, ſteady, and ſincere friend; and was now extremely ſhocked at this, and many other inſtances of ingratitude, to which he was unhappily expoſed. There remained none about his perſon in whom he could confide. The whole army had diſcovered ſymptoms of diſcontent, whence he concluded it to be full of treachery; and being deſerted by thoſe, whom he had moſt favoured and obliged, he no longer expected that others would hazard their lives in his ſervice. Diſtracted and perplexed at theſe alarming circumſtances, James ſuddenly took the reſolution of returning to London: a meaſure which could have no other tendency than that of betraying his fears, and provoking farther treachery. But this was not the only, nor indeed the ſevereſt blow which Churchill had prepared for his benefactor. Himſelf and his lady had acquired an abſolute aſcendance over the family of prince George of Denmark; and a ſeaſonable opportunity now offered for overwhelming the unhappy king, who was ſtaggering under the violent ſhocks he had received from his adverſe fortune.

The firſt ſtage of his majeſty's retreat towards London was Andover, and there prince George, together with the young duke of Ormond, Sir George Huet, and ſeveral other perſons of diſtinction, deſerted him in the night, and retired to the camp of the prince of Orange. As ſoon as this news reached London, the princeſs of Denmark, pretending to dread the king's diſpleaſure, withdrew herſelf, in company with the biſhop of London and lady Churchill. She fled to Nottingham, where the earl of Dorſet received her with the greateſt reſpect; and the gentry of the county ſoon formed a troop for her protection.

Overwhelmed already with misfortunes, the wretched king was no ways prepared for this aſtoniſhing event. He burſt into tears, when the firſt intelligence was conveyed to him. In this incident, he doubtleſs foreſaw the total expiration of his royal authority. But the nearer and more intimate concern of a parent ſeized his heart, when he found himſelf utterly abandoned by a virtuous child, whom he had always regarded with the moſt tender affection. "God help me," cried he, in the extremity of his agony, "my own children have forſaken me!" But ſo great were the prejudices which then prevailed, that this wretched father, who had been deſerted by his favourite child, was believed, on her diſappearance, to have put her to death; a rumour that might have produced the moſt fatal conſequences, had not the truth been immediately diſcovered: for the populace, and even the king's guards themſelves, ſeemed determined to revenge the death of the princeſs, by a general maſſacre of the prieſts and Roman catholics.

The prince of Orange, having received advice of the king's return to London, advanced with his army to Sherborne, and thence to Saliſbury, which he entered in triumph; the king's forces having ſome days before retired to Reading. Surrounded with diſtreſs, and having no truſty friend, the king aſſembled all the proteſtant peers in town, and deſired their advice. He particularly addreſſed himſelf to the earl of Bedford in the following manner. "My lord, you are a good man, have great influence, and can do me ſignal ſervice." "Alas!" replied the earl "I am a feeble old man, very incapable of performing any conſiderable ſervice; but I had a ſon," added he, with a ſigh, "who, if now alive, could ſerve your majeſty in a more effectual manner;" alluding to the lord Ruſſel, who, towards the end of the late reign, had fallen a ſacrifice to the vengeance of the king, then duke of York. James was ſo thunderſtruck with this anſwer that he remained, for ſome time, ſpeechleſs; but having recovered his ſpirits, it was propoſed to call a free parliament, and to ſend commiſſioners to treat with the prince. This the king readily complied with, and the lord chancellor was ordered to iſſue the neceſſary writs for that purpoſe. The catholics were removed from the poſts and offices they held about the court; Sir Edward Hales, a perſon of that communion, and conſtable of the Tower, was removed from his poſt, and ſucceeded by Sir Bevil Skelton. Father Peters, the king's confeſſor, ſeeing the ſtorm riſe to ſuch an alarming height, wiſely conſulted his own ſafety by eſcaping into France. The marquis of Hallifax, the earl of Northampton, and the lord Godolphin were ſent to treat with the prince, who delivered to them a paper, containing certain propoſals. The chief articles were, that a free parliament ſhould be called; that all papiſts ſhould be diſarmed, and deprived of all the offices they enjoyed: that all proclamations againſt himſelf ſhould be recalled: that the command of the Tower ſhould be put into the hands of the lord-mayor: that if the king ſhould think proper to reſide in London during the ſeſſion of parliament, the prince ſhould alſo reſide near the ſame place, with an equal number of guards; or that the king and himſelf ſhould reſide at an equal diſtance from London: that both armies ſhould be removed thirty miles from the city: that no new forces ſhould be brought into the kingdom: that Tilbury-fort ſhould be put into the hands of the city magiſtrates: that till the parliament met, part of the revenue ſhould be appropriated to the maintenance of the prince's army: and, in order to prevent an invaſion from abroad, Portſmouth ſhould be committed to the care of ſome perſon, equally agreeable to the king and the prince.

James, when theſe propoſals were preſented to him, affected to think them as moderate, or even more ſo, than he could have expected in the preſent poſture of affairs; but, in all probability, his real ſentiments were otherwiſe. Finding himſelf attacked and purſued by one of his ſons-in-law; abandoned by the other; deſerted by his own daughters and boſom friends, and hated by his ſubjects, he conſidered his fortune as deſperate.

Her majeſty, likewiſe, obſerving the fury of the people, and knowing how much ſhe was the object of general abhorrence, was ſtruck with the deepeſt terror, and began to apprehend a parliamentary impeachment, from which ſhe was told the queens of England were not exempted. The popiſh courtiers, and particularly the prieſts, being aware that they ſhould be the firſt ſacrifice, and that their perpetual baniſhment was the ſmalleſt penalty they could expect from national reſentment, were deſirous of carrying the king with them, whoſe preſence they knew would be ſome reſource and protection to them in a foreign country; and whoſe reſtoration, if it ever happened, would again re-inſtate them in power and authority. The general defection of the proteſtants induced the king to conſider the catholics as the only ſubjects on whoſe counſel he could rely; while the fatal cataſtrophe of his father afforded them a plauſible reaſon for making him apprehenſive of a ſimilar fate. The infinite difference of circumſtances was not, in this criſis of diſtraction, ſufficiently weighed. Prudence gave way to danger, and ſelf-preſervation became the principal object of regard.

Barillon, the French ambaſſador, and other emiſſaries of that nation, were buſy about the king; and entertained a falſe notion, which they inſtilled into him, that nothing could more certainly retard the public ſettlement, and produce univerſal confuſion, than his deſerting the kingdom. The prince of Orange, on better reaſons, had embraced the contrary opinion, and conſidered it as extremely difficult to find expedients for ſecuring the nation while the king kept poſſeſſion of the throne. Actuated, therefore, by theſe motives, and perhaps equally by private ambition, he was determined to employ every expedient that had any tendency to intimidate the king, and make him deſert that throne which he was unable to fill.

During theſe tranſactions the news that arrived from all quarters helped to continue the panic into which the king was fallen, and which his enemies endeavoured to improve to their own advantage. Colonel Capel, deputy-governor of Hull, made himſelf maſter of that important fortreſs, and threw lord Langdale, the governor, into priſon; together with lord Montgomery, both of them catholics. The town of Newcaſtle received the lord Lumley, and declared for a free parliament. The duke of Norfolk, lord lieutenant of the county of that name, engaged the ſhire in the ſame meaſures. The prince's declaration was read at Oxford by the duke of Ormond, and was received with great applauſe by that loyal univerſity, who, at the ſame time, made an offer to the prince of their plate. Every day, ſome perſon of quality or diſtinction, and, among the reſt, the duke of Somerſet, went over to the the enemy. A very violent declaration was diſperſed the prince's name, but not with his participation; in which every one was commanded to ſeize and puniſh all papiſts, who, contrary to law, pretended to carry arms, or exerciſe any acts of authority.

Scotland was not free from the contagion of mutiny and diſobedience; whence the regular forces, contrary to the advice of Balcarras the treaſurer, were withdrawn, in order to reinforce the Engliſh army. The marquis of Athol, together with the viſcount Tarbot, and others, finding a favourable opportunity now offered, began to form intrigues againſt Perth the chancellor: and the preſbyterians and other malcontents flocked to Edinburgh. Apprehenſive of the conſequences, the chancellor thought it expedient to withdraw; and the populace, as if that event was a ſignal for their inſurrection, immediately took up arms, and rifled the popiſh chapel in the king's palace. All the catholics, and even the zealous loyaliſts, were obliged to conceal themſelves, and the privy-council, inſtead of their former ſubmiſſive ſtrains to the king, and violent edicts againſt their fellow ſubjects, now made application to the prince of Orange, as the ſole reſtorer of liberty and law.

The general diſſatisfaction alarmed the king every moment with new proofs of the diſaffection of the people. Therefore not daring to repoſe confidence in any but thoſe equally expoſed to danger with himſelf; agitated by indignation at the ingratitude of ſome, by deſpair at the infidelity of others; impelled by fears for his own and his adherents ſafety, he precipitately embraced the reſolution of withdrawing to France: and accordingly ſent off, before-hand, the queen and the infant prince, under the conduct of count Lauzun, an old favourite of the French monarch. He himſelf diſappeared in the night, attended only by Sir Edward Hales, a new convert, and made the beſt of his way to a ſhip, which waited for him near the mouth of the river.

James left a letter behind him for his general the earl of Feverſham, in which he declared, that if he could have relied upon all his troops, he ſhould not have been driven to this extremity; and at leaſt have hazarded one battle in ſupport of his crown and dignity. But as the whole army ſeemed diſpoſed to deſert him, he thought it madneſs to venture himſelf at their head againſt the prince of Orange: he thanked the general, and all the officers that had been faithful to him; deſired them not to hazard their lives and fortunes by an unavailing oppoſition: but at the ſame time cautioned them not to enter into any aſſociation againſt his intereſt.

Language cannot deſcribe the ſurprize that ſeized the city, the court and the nation, at the king's flight: and the more to increaſe the confuſion which James knew muſt be the natural conſequence of his taking ſuch a ſtep, he did not name any perſon who ſhould, in his abſence, conduct the affairs of the public. He threw the great ſeal into the river: burnt all the writs which had been made out for electinga new parliament; and cauſed a caveat to be entered againſt thoſe which were actually iſſued.

As ſoon as the general was informed of his majeſty's retreat he diſbanded the troops which were in the neighbourhood of London, and without either paying or diſarming them, left them to plunder the country at pleaſure. The populace of London now aſſembled, and pulled down the maſs-houſes; nor did the houſes of ſeveral of the foreign ambaſſadors eſcape their fury, from a notion that many rich catholics had depoſited in them their moſt valuable effects. Jefferies, the chancellor, who had concealed himſelf in a houſe at Wapping, while he waited for a ſhip to carry him over to France, was diſcovered and ſeized by them, and treated ſo ſeverely, that the lord-mayor, in order to prevent his being torn to pieces, was obliged to ſend him to the Tower, where he died ſoon after of the bruiſes he had received.

The biſhops and peers who were in town, being the only remaining authority of the nation (for the privy-council, compoſed wholly of the king's creatures, was totally diſregarded) thought proper to aſſemble, and to interpoſe for the preſervation of the community. They choſe the marquis of Hallifax their ſpeaker; gave directions to the mayor and aldermen to keep the peace of the city; and iſſued orders, which were readily obeyed, to the fleet, the army, and all the garriſons. They alſo made applications to the prince, whoſe enterprize they highly applauded, and whoſe ſucceſs they congratulated with the moſt joyful demonſtrations.

The prince, on his part, was not wanting to improve the tide of ſucceſs which now flowed in upon him, or backward to aſſume that authority which the preſent criſis had thrown into his hands. Beſides the general popularity attending his cauſe, a new incident rendered his approach towards London ſtill more unwelcome. In the preſent trepidation of the people, a rumour aroſe, either from chance or deſign, that the diſbanded Iriſh had taken arms and began an univerſal maſſacre of all the proteſtants in England. This ridiculous belief was ſpread all over the kingdom in one day, and occaſioned every where an univerſal conſternation The alarm bells were rung; the beacons fired; men fancied they ſaw the ſmoke of burning cities, and heard the groans of thoſe who were ſlaughtered in the neighbourhood. It is ſurprizing that the catholics did not all periſh amidſt the rage always attending ſuch popular panics.

The prince of Orange in the interim arrived at Windſor in his way to London to ſettle the affairs of the nation with the lords, by whom he was expected; on the ſuppoſition that the king was fled over to the continent, and had totally reſigned the reins of government. But to the no ſmall ſurprize of the prince, news ſuddenly arrived, that his majeſty had been diſcovered at Feverſham in Kent, on board a ſhip, in which he was waiting for a veſſel to carry him to France; and was confined in priſon after ſuffering ſevering indignities from the populace, who not knowing his perſon, had miſtaken him for ſome papiſt of quality endeavouring to make his eſcape. The peers hearing that his majeſty was ſtill in his own dominions, ſent down the earls of Middleton, Ayleſbury, Yarmouth and Feverſham, with a detachment of the guards, to attend the king to London, whither he immediately returned. The populace, touched with compaſſion for his unhappy fate, received him with ſhouts and acclamations of joy. An expreſs was immediately diſpatched to the prince of Orange, acquainting him with the return of his majeſty to London.

Trifling, however, was the homage paid the king, during his abode at Whitehall, by any of the nobility lity or perſons of diſtinction. They had, indeed, been greatly diſguſted on account of his extreme partiality to the catholics, and well knew that they were now become more criminal in his eyes by their late applications to the prince of Orange. Nor did the king himſelf ſhew any ſyſtem of ſpirit, or diſcover any intention of reſuming the reins of government he had ſo lately thrown aſide. It was thereſore evident that his authority was now plainly expired, and as he had exerciſed his power while poſſeſſed of it, with very precipitate and haughty council, he relinquiſhed it with a deſpair equally precipitate and puſillanimous.

Nothing now ſeemed wanting in this alarming criſis on the ſide of the victorious party, than how to diſpoſe of the king's perſon: For tho' the prince may juſtly be ſuppoſed to have poſſeſſed more humanity and generoſity to an unhappy monarch ſo nearly related to him, yet he alſo knew that nothing would ſo effectually promote his own views as the retreat of James into France; a country at all times ſufficiently obnoxious to the Engliſh. It was therefore determined to puſh him into that meaſure, which he himſelf ſeemed very ready to adopt.

Being determined on this meaſure, the king ſent lord Feverſham on a civil meſſage, deſiring a conference with the prince, in order to ſettle the nation; but that nobleman was put under an arreſt on pretence of his wanting a paſsport. The Dutch guards were ordered to take poſſeſſion of Whitehall, where the king then lodged, and diſplace the Engliſh; while Hallifax, Shrewſbury, and Delamere, brought a meſſage to the king, after midnight, ordering him to leave his palace next morning, and repair to Ham, a ſeat near the coaſt. This ſufficiently proved that the artifice had taken effect, and that the king, terrified with this harſh treatment, had renewed his former reſolution of leaving the kingdom.

James, although he did not intend to return to Whitehall, thought proper to continue ſome days at Rocheſter, under the protection of a Dutch guard, hoping he might yet receive an invitation to keep poſſeſſion of the throne. He was doubtleſs ſenſible, that as he had at firſt depended too much on his people's loyalty, and in confidence of their ſubmiſſion had offered the higheſt violence to their principles and prejudices; ſo had he, at laſt, on finding his diſappointment, gone too far in the other extreme, and as haſtily ſuppoſed them void of all duty or allegiance. But, obſerving the church, the nobility, the city, the country, had all concurred in neglecting him, and leaving him to follow his own councils, he ſubmitted to his melancholy fate; and being urged by earneſt letters from the queen, he privately embarked on board a frigate, which waited for him, and arrived ſafely at Ambleteuſe, in Picardy, on the 23d of December. On his landing in France, he haſtened immediately to St. Germain's, where Lewis received him with the higheſt generoſity, ſympathy, and regard; a conduct which contributed far more to the real honour of that monarch, than all his boaſted triumphs.

The unhappy king left a paper behind him containing his reaſons for withdrawing a ſecond time, wherein he obſerved that it would be ſtrange, if the world ſhould blame his conduct, after the prince of Orange had made the earl of Feverſham priſoner, whom he had ſent to procure a friendly conference, and commanding his own guards to take poſſeſſion of Whitehall after eleven at night, without acquainting him with it; and even ſending him an order, after he was in bed, commanding him to leave the palace. After ſuch conduct, he could have very little to hope from a perſon who had invaded his kingdom, and called the legitimacy of his ſon in queſtion. At the ſame time, he appealed to all that knew him, and even to the prince himſelf, if they could believe him guilty of ſo unnatural a villainy. He added that, being born free, he was deſirous of preſerving his independence, and for that reaſon had again withdrawn himſelf, though not for ever; for whenever the nation ſhould be convinced, that they had been abuſed and impoſed upon, by the ſpecious pretences of religion and property, he would be ready to aſſiſt them, and break the chains forged for them by ambitious men.

The reign of James certainly might have been as happy as any of his predeceſſors, had not his miſtaken notions of prerogative, his exceſſive bigotry to the Romiſh religion, hurried him into meaſures which rendered his government intolerable to a free and generous people; whoſe inherent principles of liberty would not permit them to ſubmit any longer to a prince, whom they ſaw totally guided by the violent councils of a popiſh jeſuitical faction, and blindly adopting their ſlaviſh ſuperſtition. In domeſtic life his conduct was irreproachable, and he is intitled to our approbation. And hence we ſhould learn how dangerous it is to allow any prince, infected with Romiſh ſuperſtition, to fill the throne of theſe kingdoms.*

Of fourteen children, whom James had by his two wives, Anne Hyde, daughter to the earl of Clarendon, and Maria d'Eſte, daughter to the duke of Modena, three only ſurvived him, viz.

Mary, his eldeſt daughter, born the 30th of April, 1662, and married to William Henry of Naſſau, prince of Orange, afterwards king of England. Anne his ſecond daughter, both by his firſt wife, born the 6th of February 1664, (and married to George prince of Denmark) afterwards queen of England.

James Francis Edward his imputed ſon, commonly known by the name of the Chevalier de St. George, or the Pretender, who reſided at Rome, where he died in the year 1766, aged 78. This ſon (if really ſo) was by his ſecond wife.

Stern perſecution rais'd her iron rod,
And call'd the pride of kings, the pow'r of God;
Conſcience and fame were ſacrific'd to Rome,
And England wept at freedom's ſacred tomb.
Her laws deſpis'd, her conſtitution wrench'd
From its due, natural frame, her rights retrench'd
Beyond a coward's ſuff'rance, conſcience forc'd,
And healing juſtice from the crown divorc'd,
Each moment pregnant with vile acts of pow'r,
Her patriot Biſhops ſentenc'd to the tow'r:
Her Oxford (who yet loves the Stuart's name)
Branded with arbitrary marks of ſhame,
She wept---but wept not long; to arms ſhe flew,
At honor's call th' avenging ſword ſhe drew,
Turn'd all her terrors on the tyrants' head,
And ſent him in deſpair to beg his bread.

The only remarkable civil occurrence in this æra, was the eſtabliſhment of Charity-ſchools, which happened in 1668. Thoſe uſeful inſtitutions were entered into in order to prevent the ſeduction of poor children into Popiſh Seminaries.

The moſt eminent perſons in literature, who flouriſhed during this and the preceeding reign, were,

Boyle, who was born the ſame year the great chancellor Bacon died, ſeems to have inherited the penetrating genius of that illuſtrious philoſopher. We are at a loſs which to admire moſt, his extenſive knowledge or his exalted piety. Theſe excellencies kept pace with each other: but the former never rendered him vain, or the latter enthuſiaſtical. He was himſelf the chriſtian virtuoſo he ſo well deſcribed. He particularly applied himſelf to chemiſtry; and made ſuch diſcoveries in that branch of ſcience as would hardly be credited by a leſs authority than his own. He greatly improved the air pump, invented by Otto Guericke, by which he was enabled to make a great variety of new and various experiments on the air and other bodies. Hence he was enabled to write a treatiſe on the weight and ſpring of the air; a work which acquired him the great reputation he ſo well deſerved. He was a ſtrenuous ſupporter of the mechanical philoſophy, recommended by the great Bacon, and carried to ſuch an amazing degree of perfection by himſelf and his illuſtrious aſſociates.

In Sir Iſaac Newton this iſland may boaſt of having produced the greateſt and moſt penetrating genius the world ever ſaw. This prodigious man was ſatisfied it was time to baniſh from natural philoſophy all vague hypotheſes and conjectures; or, at leaſt, to lay no ſtreſs upon them, and that this ſcience ſhould be entirely ſubjected to experiment and geometry. It was perhaps with this view that he began by inventing the doctrine of fluxions and infinite ſeries, whoſe uſes in geometry are very extenſive, but of ſtill greater advantage in determining the complicated effects obſerved in nature, where every thing ſeems to be performed by ſpecies of infinite progreſſions. He diſcovered the force that retains the planets in their orbits; he ſhewed us at once how to diſtinguiſh the cauſes of their motions, and to calculate them with an exactneſs that could hardly have been expected from the joint labour of ages. His immortal Principia appeared during the ſhort reign of James II. a work that at once aſtoniſhed the world, and occaſioned the greateſt revolution in the ſcience of philoſophy ever known before. It affords an illuſtrious proof of the vaſt power of the human mind: it being the higheſt inſtance that ever was, and probably ever will be, given of the exertion of that faculty. He formed a ſyſtem of optics entirely new, and ſhewed mankind the nature of the rays of light by decompounding them. He merits our higheſt acknowledgements for the infinite number of diſcoveries with which he has enriched philoſophy, and for his caution in keeping that ſcience within proper bounds: the firſt cauſes of the phænomena of nature always were, and ever will be, a ſecret to mankind.

> “ Nature and nature's laws lay hid in night,
> “ God ſaid, Let Newton be, and all was light.

Lock attempted the metaphyſical parts of ſcience, which Newton neglected, or at leaſt never publiſhed his thoughts on that ſubject. Metaphyſics may be ſaid to have been invented by Locke, as philoſophy was by Newton. He rightly judged that the abſtractions and ridiculous queſtions which had till then been debated, and falſly ſuppoſed the ſubſtance of philoſophy, ought entirely to be rejected. Accordingly, on examination, he found, that theſe abſtractions, and the abuſe of words, were the primary ſource of all our errors. In order to diſcover the nature of the ſoul, its ideas and affections, he declined the ſtudy of books, as they would only have been productive of errors; he entered deep into himſelf, and after contemplating and ſurveying what he experienced, publiſhed, in the reign of James II. his “ Eſſay on Human Underſtanding,” which he preſented to mankind as a mirror in which they might view themſelves. He reduced the ſcience to what it really is, The experimental philoſophy of the ſoul.

Polite literature did not make the ſame progreſs in England during this period, though the nation abounded with men of great genius and abilities. Their productions fell far ſhort of that correctneſs and delicacy we ſo much admire in the ancients. Moſt of the writers of this age remain monuments of genius perverted by indecency and bad taſte: the immeaſurable licentiouſneſs indulged in the court of Charles II. was more deſtructive of polite learning, than the fanatical enthuſiaſm that prevailed during the commonwealth.

Dryden was the great reformer of Engliſh verſification, and a ſtriking inſtance how far a great genius can be perverted by the bad taſte and licentiouſneſs of the age. The unhappy effects of his penury and dependence tended greatly to enervate his performances. He was not at liberty to purſue his own inclination, but frequently obliged to proſtitute his pen to ſuch perſons and things, as a man of his genius and talents muſt have deſpiſed. He failed in moſt of his dramatic writings; the prefaces, prologues and epilogues, are generally more valuable than the pieces to which they are affixed. There was a native fire in this poet, which poverty could not damp, nor old age itſelf extinguiſh. He was ſtill improving as a writer, while he was declining as a man; and was far advanced in years when he wrote his “ Alexander's Feaſt,” which ſtands confeſſedly at the head of lyric poems, and is written in the true ſpirit of the antients. His Abſolem and Achitophel contributed to the triumph of the Tories over the Whigs towards the end of Charles's reign, and is one of the beſt performance of this celebrated writer.

> “ Dryden himſelf to pleaſe a barb'rous age,
> “ Was forc'd to let his genius ſtoop to rage.
> “ Count not the writer's then, but people's ſin, > “ Almanzor's rage, and rants of Maximin.
> “ That fury ſpent in each elaborate piece,
> “ He vies for fame with antient Rome and Greece

Few poets ever touched the paſſions with a mor maſterly hand than Otway. He was acquainted wi all the avenues to the human heart, and at once kne and felt all its emotions. He could rouſe us in rage, or melt us into tenderneſs. His language is th language of nature, and therefore the ſimpleſt im ginable. Hence his tragedies were received wi ſilent tears rather than loud burſts of applauſe.

Butler ſtands unrivalled in burleſque poetry. H Hudibraſs is a remarkable inſtance of the force human genius. It abounds with uncommon learnin new rhymes, and original thoughts. Its images a truly and naturally ridiculous: we are never ſhocke with exceſſive diſtortions and grimace; nor is hum nature degraded into monkeys. It abounds wi ſtrokes of temporary ſatire; there are alſo ſome ch racters and alluſions which cannot be diſcovered this diſtance of time.

But notwithſtanding all the merit of Dryden, O way, and Butler, the court ſuffered them to live poverty, and die in diſtreſs. Charles, with more and knowledge, perhaps, than Lewis XIV. knew ſo well how to immortalize himſelf by rewarding nius. This is more ſurprizing in Butler than in a other, as the royal cauſe derived very ſingular adva ta tages from his poem, which diſplayed the fanaticiſm and falſe pretences of the parliamentary party, in the moſt ridiculous point of light.

Wycherly was a careleſs and negligent writer. His comedies are conformable to his perſonal character, which conſiſted of a large ſhare of wit, more libertiniſm, and very little virtue. Theſe acquiſitions were indeed conſidered in the reign of Charles II. as the firſt qualification of a fine gentleman, and the ſtrongeſt recommendations to the favour of the court. His "Plain Dealer," and his "Country Wife," are eſteemed the beſt of his productions. The character of the widow Blackacre in the former is truly original, and the maſter-piece of Wycherly.

The duke of Buckingham, the earls of Mulgrave, Dorſet, and Roſcommon, wrote in a good taſte; but their pieces are either feeble or careleſs. They, however, tended greatly to reform the licentious manner of writing ſo generally practiſed in this age of pleaſure and diſſipation.

But among all the writers of this period, Sir William Temple was, perhaps, the only one, who kept himſelf unpolluted by that inundation of vice and licentiouſneſs which overwhelmed the nation. He was truly an honour to his country. To the gift of genius and the acquiſition of philoſophy, he added what was then ſo uncommon, the merit of reſpecting morality, and the laws. He was as much above the common level of politicians, as he was above the common herd of authors.

Among a great number of phyſicians that flouriſhed about this time, Dr. Thomas Sydenham is juſtly placed at the head of that profeſſion. He was a perſon of great penetration and experience, and added conſiderable improvements to the healing art. He dared to deviate from the common practice, where nature and reaſon pointed out a better method; and was the firſt that introduced a cool regimen in the ſmall-pox; a diſcovery which has been ſince followed with amazing ſucceſs. His works are ſtill in the higheſt eſteem with the faculty.

Beſides Sydenham, Wallis, Sir George Ent, Gliſſon, Plunket, and Sir William Petty made ſeveral uſeful diſcoveries in phyſic, anatomy and botany.

From the Abdication of JAMES II. to the Acceſſion of the Brunſwick Line.

WILLIAM III. AND MARY II.

THOUGH the deliverance of theſe kingdoms was now effected by the prince of Orange, who expelled from the throne a powerful prince, ſupported by a formidable fleet and a numerous army, ſtill the more difficult taſk remained; that of obtaining for himſelf the crown, which his father-in-law had abdicated. Some lawyers, entangled in the ſubtilties and forms of their profeſſion, adviſed the prince to claim the crown by right of conqueſt; to aſſume immediately the title of ſovereignty; and to call a parliament, which, being thus legally ſummoned, by a king in poſſeſſion, could ratify whatever had been tranſacted before they aſſembled. But this meaſure, being deſtructive of all the principles of liberty, was prudently rejected by the prince, who, ſecure of the good opinion of the people, reſolved to leave them entirely to their own guidance and direction.

About 90 peers and biſhops drew up an addreſs, wherein they deſired the prince to ſummon a convention by circular letters: in the mean time, to aſſume the management of all public affairs, and to concert meaſures for the ſecurity of Ireland. But he ſeemed ſtill averſe to act upon an authority, which he deemed ſo imperfect, and expreſſed himſelf deſirous of obtaining a more expreſs declaration of the public conſent; to obtain which, the following judicious expedient was propoſed. All the members, who had ſat in the houſe of commons, during any parliament of Charles II. were invited to meet; and to them were added the mayor, aldermen, and 50 of the common-council of the city. When this repreſentative of the people, the moſt proper which could be ſummoned at the preſent criſis, was aſſembled, the members unanimouſly voted the ſame addreſs with the lords. The prince, being thus ſupported by all the legal authority, which could poſſibly be obtained at this juncture, wrote circular letters to the counties and corporations of England; and his orders were univerſally complied with. The fleet obeyed his commands. The army allowed him to new model them, without murmur or oppoſition. The city ſupplied him with a loan of 200,000l. In a word, the prince's adminiſtration was ſubmitted to, as if he had ſucceeded in the moſt regular manner to the moſt vacant throne; and a profound tranquillity prevailed throughout the kingdom.

Many Scotchmen of rank being in London, the prince ſummoned them together, and aſked their advice in the preſent ſtate of affairs. This aſſembly, conſiſting of thirty noblemen and about eighty gentlemen, choſe duke Hamilton for their preſident. The duke was determined to pay court to the preſent authority; but his eldeſt ſon, the earl of Arran, profeſſed an adherence to king James, whom he propoſed to invite back upon conditions. He was violently oppoſed in this motion by Patrick Hume, and not one member roſe to ſecond it, whereupon the aſſembly made an offer to the prince, of the preſent adminiſtration, which he willingly accepted; and having ſoon after ſent circular letters into Scotland, a convention was ſummoned on the 22d of March at Edinburgh; and it was ſoon viſible that the intereſt of the malecontents would entirely prevail; for the royaliſts, regarding this aſſembly as illegal, had neglected to appear at elections, by which means members of the other party were returned for moſt places. The revolution was not in Scotland, as in England, effected by the coalition of whig and tory. The former party alone had overpowered the government, and were too much enraged by the injuries they had ſuffered to admit of any compoſition with their former maſters. Accordingly, the purpoſe of the convention was no ſooner diſcovered, than the earl of Balcarras, and the viſcount Dundee, the leaders of the tories withdrew from Edinburgh, and the convention having paſſed a vote, that king James, by his mal-adminiſtration, and his abuſe of power, had forfeited all title to the crown, they made a tender of the royal dignity to the prince and princeſs of Orange.

Much about the ſame time it appeared that the members of the Engliſh convention were chiefly choſen from among the whig party; and after thanks were unanimouſly given by both houſes to the prince of Orange for the deliverance he had brought them, a memorable vote was paſſed by the commons, and ſent up to the houſe of peers for their concurrence. It was contained in theſe words; "that king James "the Second, having endeavoured to ſubvert the "conſtitution of the kingdom, by breaking the original contract between king and people; and having, by the advice of jeſuits and other wicked perſons, violated the fundamental laws, and withdrawn "himſelf out of the kingdom, has abdicated the government, and that the throne is thereby vacant." This vote, when carried to the upper houſe, was ſtrongly oppoſed, the cauſe of which we ſhall here explain.

In the interim the tories, perceiving themſelves at once menaced with the loſs of their laws and religion, had generouſly promoted the revolution; and, on that occaſion departed from thoſe principles of paſſive obedience and non-reſiſtance, of which they had, while the king favoured them, made ſuch ſtrong profeſſions. But their preſent apprehenſions had prevailed over their political tenets, and the unfortunate James, who had too much relied on thoſe general declarations, which will never be reduced to practice, found in the iſſue, that both parties were ſecretly united in an oppoſition to his meaſures. The danger, however, was no ſooner over, and the general fears ſomewhat allayed, than party prejudices reſumed, in ſome degree, their former aſcendancy, and the tories were aſhamed of the victory their antagoniſts had, during the late tranſactions, obtained over them. They were therefore inclined to ſteer a middle courſe; and though, in general, determined to oppoſe the king's return, they reſolved to refuſe their conſent for dethroning him, and altering the line of ſucceſſion. A regent, with kingly power, was the expedient they propoſed; and a late inſtance in Portugal ſeemed to give ſome authority to ſuch a plan.

It was urged in favour of this ſcheme, that by the uniform tenor of the Engliſh laws, the rights of the crown were ever regarded as ſacred; and could, on no account, nor by any mal-adminiſtration, be forfeited by the ſovereign: that to dethrone a king, and to elect a ſucceſſor, was a practice entirely unknown to the conſtitution, and tended to render all kingly power dependent and precarious: that where the prince, from his tender years, from lunacy, or any other natural infirmity, was rendered incapable of holding the reins of government; both the laws and former practice agreed in appointing a regent, who, during the interval, was inveſted with the whole power of the adminiſtration: that the inveterate and dangerous prejudices of king James had rendered him as unfit to ſway the Engliſh ſceptre, as if he had fallen into lunacy; and therefore it was natural for the people to have recourſe to the ſame remedy: that the election of one king was a precedent for the election of another; and, by that means, would either degenerate into a republic, or, what was ſtill worſe, into a turbulent and ſeditious monarchy: that the caſe was ſtill more dangerous, if there remained a prince who claimed the crown by right of ſucceſſion, and diſputed, on ſo plauſible a foundation, the title of the preſent ſovereign: that though the doctrine of paſſive obedience and non-reſiſtance might not, in every particular circumſtance, be abſolutely true, yet the belief of it was extremely expedient; and to eſtabliſh a government which ſhould have the contrary principle for its baſis, was to lay the foundation for perpetual revolutions and convulſions: That the appointment of a regent was, indeed, expoſed to many inconveniences, yet, while the line of ſucceſſion was continued entire, there was ſtill a proſpect of terminating, ſome time or other, the public diſorders: and that few, if any, inſtances occurred in hiſtory, eſpecially that of England, where a diſputed title had not been attended with much greater evils than thoſe the people had ſought to avoid, by departing from the lineal ſucceſſor.
